GIBBON, EDWARD, the celebrated historian, was born at Putney, in 1737; sent to Westminster-school, but soon transferred to a private tutor; then to Magdalen college, Oxford, for a short time, and finally to Lausanne, where he renounced the Roman Catholic faith, without embracing any other, and became a confirmed sceptic. On returning to England, he entered upon the duties of active life, but read much, and prepared himself for authorship. In 1763 he went on his travels; and while sitting amidst the ruins of the capitol at Rome, he formed the idea of writing the history of the decline and fall of that city. In the mean time, he joined M. Deyverdun in a journal called "Memoires Littéraires de la Grand Bretagne," which met with no success. In 1770 he began his celebrated history of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire: the first volume of which, in quarto, appeared in 1776; the second and third in 1781; and the concluding three volumes in 1788. Previous to this undertaking, Mr. Gibbon was chosen into parliament for Liskeard; and when hostilities commenced between this country and France, in 1778, he was employed to draw up the manifesto on that occasion; for which he was made commissioner of the board of trade, but lost the place on the change of administration in 1783. He then went to reside at Lausanne, where he continued till the French revolution obliged him to return to England; and died in 1794. Mr. Gibbon's celebrated history abounds with proofs of unexampled learning, of a mind penetrating and sagacious, and of almost unrivalled talents for ridicule. Upon Christianity, however, he has inflicted a serious injury, by unsettling the faith, or offending the feelings of many who, influenced by the philosophical spirit of the writer, or captivated by his style, gave a too ready acquiescence to his specious infidelity.

GIBBONS, GRAMLING, an eminent sculptor and statuary, was born in London about the middle of the 17th century. His flowers and foliage carved in wood have almost the lightness of nature; and he executed several fine pieces also in marble and bronze. Among his works are St. Paul's and Windsor choirs: the wooden throne at Canterbury; the monument of viscount Camden, at Exton, in Rutlandshire, the font in St. James church, the statue of Charles II. at Charing-cross, and that of James II. in Privy-gardens. He died in 1731.

GIBBONS, ORLANDO, an eminent musician, was born at Cambridge, in 1683. He became organist of the chapel royal at the age of 21, and in 1693 was created doctor of music. He was the best church composer of his time; and he also published madrigals. His two brothers and son were likewise good musicians; the latter, Dr. Christopher Gibbons, was organist to Westminster Abbey.

GIBBS, JAMES, an architect, was born at Aberdeen, in 1683. He designed the churches of St. Martin's and St. Mary-le-Strand, London; the senate-house, and the new buildings of King's college, Cambridge; the Radcliffe library, Oxford, &c. Died 1754.

GIBBS, Sir VICARY, chief justice of the Common Pleas, was born in 1752, at Exeter, in which city his father was a surgeon. He was educated at Eton, and King's college, Cambridge; entered at Lincoln's Inn; and, through the friendship of Mr. Dunning, afterwards lord Ashburton, he obtained briefs in abundance. On the death of Mr. Richard Burke, he was appointed recorder of Bristol, and was soon distinguished as an eloquent pleader and an able advocate. The trials of Horne Tooke, Hardy, and others, for high treason, brought the talents of Mr. Gibbs still more conspicuously before the public; and soon after he became king's counsel. He was also elected into parliament for the University of Cambridge; made chief justice of Chester; next solicitor, and afterwards attorney-general, with the honour of knighthood. In 1813, he was appointed a puisne judge of the Common Pleas; and the year following, lord chief justice. After discharging the duties of this office about four years, he resigned it, at the end of 1818, on account of infirmities, and died in 1820.

GIBSON, EDMUND, a learned prelate and antiquary, who was born at Knipe, Westmoreland, in 1669. After receiving a grammatical education at a free-school in his native country, he was sent to Queen's college, Oxford, where he applied particularly to the study of the northern languages. In 1691, he published a new edition of Drummond's Polemio Middiana, and James V. of Scotland's Canitena Rustica; translated the Saxon Chronicle, and Camden's Britannia; and produced several original works, the principal of which was his "Codex Juris Ecclesiastici Anglicani," in two folio volumes. In 1715, he was made bishop of Lincoln; was transferred to London in 1720; and died in 1748.

GIBSON, RICHARD, known by the name of the dwarf, an English painter in the time of Sir Peter Lely, whose manner he studied. In his youth he was servant to a lady at Mortlake, who, perceiving his taste for painting, put him under de Cleyn, for instruction. He was page to Charles I. and when he married Mrs. Anne Shepherd, who was also a dwarf, the king honoured the wedding with his presence, and gave away the bride. They were of equal stature, each measuring three feet ten inches. They had nine children, five of whom arrived at years of maturity, and were of the usual stature. Gibson died in his 75th year, and his wife in 1709, at the age of 89.

GIFFORD, ANDREW, a Baptist minister, and a learned antiquary, was born in 1700. He was assistant librarian of the British Museum many years, and died in 1784. He bequeathed his library to the Baptist academy at Bristol.

GIFFORD, JOHN, a political and historical writer, whose real name was JOHN RICHARD GREEN, was born in 1758; educated at St. John's college, Oxford; and was intended for the law; but having dissipated his property, which was but trifling, he went to the Continent, and assumed the name of Gifford, which he ever after retained. He returned in 1788, and, on the breaking out of the French revolution, devoted his pen to the defence of government in church and state. He contributed to the establishment of the British Critic, and afterwards of the Anti-Jacobin Review, which last arose out of a newspaper of the same name. He also wrote (besides many pamphlets), "The History of France," 5 vols. 4to.; the "History of the French Revolution," 4to.; and "The Life of the right hon. William Pitt," 3 vols. 4to. For these services he was rewarded with a pension, and made a police magistrate. Died, 1818.

GIFFORD, WILLIAM, a celebrated critic and satirist, and the founder of the Quarterly Review, was born at Ashburton, Devon. His father, who was a plumber and glazier, at South-Molton, died when he was twelve years old. The widow soon followed her husband to the grave; and the orphan was at first sent to sea in a coasting vessel, but shortly after apprenticed to a shoemaker in his native town. There he remained till he was in his 20th year; but being disgusted with his employment, and evincing talents of a superior order, Mr. Cookesley, a surgeon of the town, proposed to some of the inhabitants, to raise a subscription, with a view of purchasing his freedom, and giving him an education. This being effected, he was sent to Oxford, to pursue studies more congenial to his mind. While at the university he was fortunately introduced to the late lord Grosvenor, who engaged him to accompany his son, lord Belgrave, on his travels over the Continent. On his return to England, he settled in London, devoting his time to literature; and thenceforward fortune smiled on his career. In 1791, he published "The Baviad," a poetical satire, in which he severely lashed the poets and poetasters of the day; and in 1794, appeared "The Mæviad," a satire on the degraded state of the drama. In 1797, Mr. Gifford, became editor of the Anti-Jacobin, a weekly paper, established by the late Mr. Canning, and others of brilliant talents and high connections; and in which a corner was reserved for the insertion of a critical notice of the misrepresentations displayed by contemporary editors—which it was Gifford's peculiar province to detect and expose. This publication, which continued only one year, involved him in a quarrel with Dr. Wolcot, against whom he published a poetical squib, entitled, "An Epistle to Peter Pindar." In 1802, appeared his translation of Juvenal; in 1805, an edition of Massinger's plays; and subsequently the works of Ben Jonson, Ford, and Shirley; but it was in his capacity of editor of the Quarterly Review (which he conducted from its commencement in 1809 till 1824), that he was most generally known. He died in 1826; and, through the intimate friendship which had long existed between him and Dr. Ireland, dean of Westminster, his remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. Mr. Gifford held the office of paymaster of the band of Gentlemen Pensioners, with a salary of 300*l.* a-year; and for a time he was comptroller of the lottery, with 800*l.* a-year. He also enjoyed an annuity from lord Grosvenor; so that, with his well-paid literary labours, he was in opulent circumstances. His poetical satires are caustic and powerful; his prose writings, vigorous and correct; and his criticisms are generally distinguished by sound judgment and good taste.

GIL, FATHER, a Spaniard, born in 1748, who took an active part in the insurrection of 1806; greatly contributed to the surrender of Baylen; and is generally supposed to have originated, or greatly effectuated, the guerilla warfare carried on by order of the juntas of Seville and Cadiz, of which he was a member.

GILBERT, Sir HUMPHREY, an enterprising English navigator in the reign of Elizabeth, was born at Dartmouth, in 1539. He lost his father at an early age, and his mother married Mr. Raleigh, by whom she had the celebrated Sir Walter. Humphrey received his education at Eton and Oxford: after which he went, in a military character, to Ireland, where for his services, he was knighted in 1570. He returned soon after to England, and married a rich heiress, but lost great part of his property in a speculating concern with Sir Thomas Smith, for converting iron into copper. He published, in 1576, a discourse to prove the practicability of a north-west passage to China; and in 1578, he sailed on a voyage of discovery himself to the coast of America. In a second voyage, in 1583, he took possession of Newfoundland; but his ship foundered on her return to England, and all on board perished.

GILBERT, WILLIAM, a physician, and experimental philosopher, who discovered several of the properties of the loadstone, was born at Cochester, in 1540, educated at Cambridge; elected a fellow of the college of physicians, and became physician to queen Elizabeth. He was a strenuous advocate for the inductive mode of philosophical matters, and was the first who asserted the theory of a great central magnet in the earth, afterwards applied by Dr. Halley to the explanation of the variation and dipping of the needle in the mariner's compass. Died, 1603.

GILBERT, Sir JEFFERY, a judge and law writer, was born in 1674, was appointed an Irish judge in 1715; an English baron of the exchequer in 1723; and chief baron in 1726. He was the author of numerous professional works; and died in 1726.

GILBERT, NICHOLAS JOSEPH LAURENCE, a French satirical poet, born in 1751; died, 1780.

GILBERT, NICHOLAS PETER, an eminent French physician. After serving as a naval surgeon, and practising at Rennes, as a physician, he was appointed chief physician to the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and subsequently held a professorship at the hospital of instruction formed at Paris, in 1796. He was chief physician to the army of St. Domingo, in 1802, and held a similar post in the grand army from 1806 to 1812.

He was the author of several medical works. Died, 1814.

GILBERT, FRANCIS HILARY, a French writer on veterinary medicine and rural economy, was born at Chateaubault, in 1757. He devoted much of his time to the improvement of the system of cultivation, and to the management of sheep; and the French directory, in 1797, employed him to go to Spain for the purchase of a flock of Merinos; but they neglected to supply him with sufficient means; and the disappointment he experienced on that account caused him to destroy himself, while residing in Castile, in 1800.

GILBERTUS, ANGLICUS, a medical writer, who lived in the twelfth century, and is said to have been the first English physician that exposed the absurd practices of the monks in the treatment of diseases.

GILCHRIST, EBENEZER, a Scotch physician of some note, was born at Dumfries, in 1707. He studied at Edinburgh, London, and Paris; but took his doctor's degree at Rheims, after which he returned to his native country, where he practised till his death in 1774.

GILCHRIST, OCTAVIUS, a distinguished literary character, was born at Twickenham, in 1779; and received his education at Magdalen college, Oxford. His writings consist of essays, &c. relating to the rise and progress of the British stage, and of the respective merits of the elder dramatists. Died, 1823.

GILDAS, surnamed the Wise, a British ecclesiastic and historian of the 6th century, was the son of Caw, a British prince, who emigrated to North Wales, in order to avoid submission to the Anglo-Saxons. He appears to have been a monk; and, after residing in one of the small isles called the Holmes, in the Bristol Channel, retired to the abbey of Glastonbury, where he died. A book, ascribed to Gildas, has been repeatedly published, entitled, "Epistola de Excidio Britannicæ, et Castigatio Ordinis Ecclesiastici;" but it exhibits so frightful a picture of the depravity of manners, which pervaded all classes of Britons, that its authenticity has been questioned by some critics, who presume it must have been the work of a foe rather than of a friend to their race. Died 570.

GILL, ALEXANDER, a famous schoolmaster, was born in Lincolnshire, in 1564. He received his education at Christ Church college, Oxford, where he took his degrees in arts, and entered into orders. In 1604 he became master of St. Paul's school, where he brought up many eminent persons, and among the rest the celebrated Milton. Dr. Gill wrote a "Treatise concerning the Trinity in Unity;" "Logonomia Anglica;" "Sacred Philosophy of Holy Scripture," &c. Died, 1635.—His son, ALEXANDER, who succeeded him in the head-mastership of St. Paul's school, had also the honour of having Milton for his scholar while he was at Trinity college, Oxford; and it appears that the pupil had a great esteem for his preceptor in after life. Died, 1642.

thamptonshire, in 1697. His education was limited, owing to the contracted circumstances of his parents; but, by application, he became a good classical and oriental scholar. He commenced as a preacher at Higham Ferrers, from whence he removed to a congregation at Horsleydown, Southwark. He wrote an "Exposition of the Song of Solomon;" and "The Cause of God and Truth," 4 vols. 8vo. But his great work was an "Exposition of the Bible," 10 vols. 4to.

GILLIES, JOHN, LL.D. F.R.S. and historiographer to his Majesty for Scotland, was born at Brechin, Forfarshire, Jan. 18, 1747, and received his education at the university of Glasgow. When quite a young man he came to London, with the view of making literature his sole pursuit; but becoming acquainted with the earl of Hopetown, he was engaged as travelling tutor to Henry, the earl's second son; and, in consequence of his having relinquished some literary engagements to accept this, the earl settled upon him an annuity for life. The Hon. Henry Hope died on his travels; and Dr. Gillies went again to the Continent with the earl's younger sons, John and Alexander; the former being the late earl of Hopetown; and the latter, Sir Alexander Hope, lieutenant-governor of Chelsea Hospital. Dr. Gillies was appointed historiographer for Scotland on the death of Dr. Robertson; and he continued his literary labours to a late period of his life. His chief works are, "A History of Ancient Greece," 4 vols. 8vo.; "The Reign of Frederic II.," "History of the World, from Alexander to Augustus," translations from Aristotle, Isocrates, &c. Died, Feb. 15, 1836, aged 90.

GILPIN, BERNARD, one of the English Protestant reformers, was born at Kentnair in Westmoreland, in 1517, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, of which he became fellow. But he afterwards removed to Christchurch, where, by reading the works of Erasmus, he secretly embraced the principles of the reformation. In 1556 he was presented by his uncle to the archdeaconry of Durham, and the rectory of Easington, where he laboured with truly apostolical zeal; and, in his capacity of archdeacon made strict visitations, being a great enemy to non-residence and pluralities. He was next presented to the rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, where his labours in promoting the Protestant faith were so remarkable, that the sanguinary bishop Bonner threatened to bring him to the stake in a fortnight, and sent a messenger into the North for that purpose. On the road, however, Mr. Gilpin broke his leg, and, while he lay in the hands of the surgeon, the queen died; so that, instead of being carried to London, he returned to his parishioners. In the reign of Elizabeth he was offered the bishopric of Carlisle, and the provostship of Queen's college; but refused both, contenting himself with Houghton, where he died, deeply lamented by his parishioners, in 1583. His piety, unwearied exertions, and benevolence, earned him the glorious titles of the Apostle of the North, and the Father of the Poor.

GILPIN, WILLIAM, a divine of the Church of England, and an elegant writer, was born, in 1724, at Carlisle, and received his education at Queen's college, Oxford. For many years he kept a school at Cheam, in Surrey, and afterwards became vicar of Boldre, in the New Forest, and prebendary of Salisbury. He died in 1804, aged 80. Mr. Gilpin published the "Life of Bernard Gilpin," his ancestor, above-mentioned; the "Lives of Latimer, Wickliff, Huss, and archbishop Cranmer;" an "Exposition of the New Testament," 2 vols.; "Observations relative to picturesque Beauty," 8vo.; a "Tour to the Lakes," 2 vols.; "Remarks on Forest Scenery;" "Sermons to a Country Congregation," 2 vols.; "Moral Contrasts," &c. And it is especially worthy of note, that he left the profits of his publications for the endowment of a school at Boldre.

GILPIN, SAWREY, brother of the preceding, was born at Carlisle, in 1733. He was placed with a ship-painter, and his first works which attracted notice were some market groups, which he sketched from his window. But it was principally as an animal painter that he acquired his reputation, though his historical subjects were above mediocrity. He also etched the cattle for his brother's picturesque works. Died, 1807.

GIL POLO, GASPAN, a Spanish poet and advocate, was born at Valencia, in 1516, and died there in 1572. He is the author of "Diana Enamorada," so highly extolled by Cervantes, as combining elegance, sweetness, and purity.

GIL VICENTE, a Portuguese dramatist of the 16th century, who wrote nearly fifty plays, and excelled all the dramatic writers of that period in elegance of style and fertility of invention. He was born at Barcellos, in 1485, and died at Evora, in 1557.

GILRAY, JAMES, a celebrated caricaturist, unrivalled in his art for the rich broad humour and keen satire of his ready pencil. Died, 1815.

GINGUENE, PETER LOUIS, a French writer, born in 1748, at Rennes, in Brittany, was descended from an ancient but impoverished family, and obtained a small government office. At the revolution, in which he took an active part, he associated himself with the more moderate writers upon the affairs of the times, and narrowly escaped the scaffold during the reign of the Jacobins. The Directory appointed him ambassador at Turin, and Buonaparte gave him a seat in the senate. Upon being removed from this he applied himself wholly to literature. The work to which he is chiefly indebted for his fame is his "Histoire Littéraire d'Italie," in 9 vols. He died in 1816.

GIOCONDO, or JOCUNDUS, JOHN, an Italian architect and antiquarian, born at Verona about the middle of the 15th century. He built the bridge of Notre Dame, at Paris, and various other edifices both there and in Italy; fortified the city of Treviso; and was summoned to Rome by Leo X. after the death of Bramante, to assist in the building of St. Peter's. He belonged to the Dominican order; and as an antiquary and literary character, he also greatly distinguished himself.

HE WHO KNOWS THE WORLD WILL NOT BE TOO DASHFUL: HE WHO KNOWS HIMSELF WILL NOT BE TOO IMPUDENT.

ERROR IS AN ENEMY IN AMBUSH, PREPARED ON ALL OCCASIONS TO TURN YOU ASIDE FROM THE DIRECT ROAD.

GIOJA, FLAVIO, an Italian mathematician of the 14th century. He was a native of Pasitano, near Amalfi, and is considered as the inventor of the mariner's compass, in consequence of his having properly applied it; but that valuable instrument seems to have been known in Europe before his time.

GIORDANI, VITAL, a mathematician, was originally a soldier in the papal galleys, where he studied arithmetic, and on going to Rome, was made keeper of the castle of St. Angelo. Louis XIV. appointed him teacher in the academy which he founded at Rome; and he was also made engineer to the castle of St. Angelo, and mathematical professor in the college della Sapienza. Born, 1633; died, 1711.

GIORDANO, LUCA, a Neapolitan painter, the pupil of Spagnoletto and Peter of Cortona, who imitated the style of Titian so closely, that his pictures are not easily distinguished from the works of that great master. In fact, he imitated the best artists so successfully, that even connoisseurs were often deceived; while his celerity of execution was wonderful. Born, 1632; died, 1704.

GIORGI, AUGUSTINE ANTHONY, a learned Italian ecclesiastic, was born, in 1711, at St. Maur, in the diocese of Rimini; entered the Augustine order; and became an eminent orientalist. In 1746, he was invited to Rome by Pope Benedict XIV. to fill the theological chair of La Sapienza; he also made him librarian of the Angelica. The emperor Francis I. gave him repeated invitations and the most liberal offers, to settle at Vienna, all of which Giorgi declined. He wrote an able work, entitled "Alphabetum Thibetanum," relating to the geography, mythology, and antiquities of Thibet; besides several others on antiquities, subjects of oriental criticism, and polemics. Died, 1797.

GIORGIONE, or GEORGE BARBARELLI, was an eminent painter of the Venetian school, born in 1477, at Castelfranco. He received his first instructions from John Bellini; but, studying afterwards the works of Leonardo da Vinci, he soon surpassed them both, and became the first colourist of his time. He died of the plague, in 1511. Giorgione excelled in fresco painting; and was the first of the Lombard school who found out the effects of properly contrasting strong lights with strong shadows.

GIOTTO, or ANGIOLOTTIO, an ingenious painter, sculptor, and architect of Florence, was born in 1276. He was the son of a peasant; and his real name was Ambrogio Burdono; but being observed by Cimabue drawing figures on the ground while feeding his sheep, he took him, and instructed him in the art of painting. He soon surpassed his master, and acquired such a reputation, that Benedict IX. sent a person to Tuscany to make a report of his talents, and to bring a design from each of the Florentine artists. When the messenger came to Giotto, and informed him of his business, the painter took a sheet of paper, and, with one stroke of his pencil, drew a circle as perfect as if it had been performed by a pair of compasses. On presenting this, the man said, "I want a design;" to which Giotto replied, "Go about your business; his Holiness asks nothing else of me." The Pope, on being made acquainted with this, sent for him to Rome, where, besides painting many pictures, he made a ship of mosaic, which is over the portico at the entrance of St. Peter's church, and still known by the name of Giotto's vessel. In 1334 he undertook the famous tower of Santa Maria del Fiore, at Florence, for which he was made a citizen, and rewarded with a pension. Among the men of genius with whom he was intimate, he could number Dante and Petrarch as his particular friends. Died, 1336.

GIRALDI, LILIO GREGORIO, better known by his Latin name of GYRALDUS, a learned Italian writer and Latin poet, was born at Ferrara, in 1479; and has been considered by Causabon and other authorities as one of the most learned men whom modern Italy has produced. At the sacking of Rome by the troops of Charles V. he lost all his property, and was reduced to indigence; but he wrote numerous works, the principal of which is a "History of the Heathen Deities," and eventually triumphed over his adverse fortune, having accumulated 10,000 crowns before his death, which took place in 1552.

GIRALDI-CINTIO, JOHN BAPTIST, a relative of the preceding, was an Italian poet and physician, born at Ferrara, in 1504. He was secretary to the duke of Ferrara, and professor of philosophy and medicine in the university of his native city, and afterwards professor of rhetoric at Pavia. He wrote nine tragedies in Italian; but his principal work is entitled "Hecatomitii," which consists of a hundred tales, in the manner of Boccaccio. Died, 1573.

GIRARD, GABRIEL, an ingenious French ecclesiastic, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, in 1678. He was the author of a celebrated work, entitled, "Synonymes François;" was almoner to the duchess de Berri, and the king's interpreter for the Russian and Slavonian languages. He also wrote a work, entitled, "Principes de la Langue Française." Died, 1748, aged 70.

GIRARDON, FRANCIS, a sculptor and architect, was born at Troyes, in 1628. His chief works are the mausoleum of Richelieu, in the church of the Sorbonne; the equestrian statue of Louis XIV., and the rape of Proserpine, in the gardens of Versailles. Died, 1715.

GIRODET, TRISSON NICHOLAS, the most original, versatile, and scientific of the modern school of French painters, was born at Montargis, in 1767; was first a pupil of Regnault, and afterwards studied under David. His subjects are distinguished for fulness and beauty, and his colouring is rich, transparent, and harmonious. Among his principal works are Endymion sleeping; Hippocrates refusing the Presents of Artaxerxes; the Deluge; the Burial of Attala, &c. He also painted Napoleon receiving the keys of Vienna; full-length portraits of the Vendean leaders, Bonchamp and Cathelineau; and St. Louis in Egypt, which was his last great work. Died, 1824.

GIRTIN, THOMAS, an artist, was born in London, in 1773. He was a pupil of Dayes;

THE TROPHY OF A GENERAL IS HIS OWN CONSCIENCE, AND HIS VALOUR IS HIS TOMB'S TREASURY.

DO WELL; BUT DO NOT BOAST OF IT. NEVER FISH FOR PRAISE; IT IS NOT WORTH THE BAIT.

after which he studied the works of Canaletti, and the colouring of Rubens. He first introduced the custom of drawing upon cartridge paper, and he also painted excellently in oil colours. He took many beautiful views in Scotland, Wales, and various parts of England and France. He also painted a panorama of London, which was exhibited in Spring-gardens. Died, 1802.

GIULIO ROMANO, the most distinguished of Raphael's scholars and assistants, was born at Rome, in 1499. He resided principally at Mantua, and there found a wide field for the exercise of his powerful genius, both in architecture and in painting. He was unequalled for the boldness of his style, the grandeur of his designs, and the loftiness of his poetical conceptions. Died, 1546.

GUISTINIANI, POMPEY, by birth a Corsican, was an eminent general in the Spanish service, and obtained the name of Iron-arm, by having one of iron made, to replace the arm he lost at the siege of Ostend. He was governor of Candia, where he was killed, in 1616; and the Venetian senate erected an equestrian statue to his memory.

GLANVIL, or GLANVILLE, RANULPH DE, an English baron of the twelfth century, celebrated as a lawyer and a warrior. During the reign of Henry II., he was chief justiciary of the kingdom, and signalized his valour by repelling the invasion of William, king of Scotland, who was taken prisoner while besieging Alnwick castle. Richard I. is said to have extorted from him the sum of 15,000*l.* towards the expenses of a crusade to the Holy Land. The aged magistrate accompanied his master on the expedition to which he had so largely contributed, and was killed at the siege of Acre, in 1190. A curious treatise on the Laws and Customs of England is attributed to his pen.

GLANVIL, JOSEPH, an English divine and philosopher, was born at Plymouth, in 1636. He was first of Exeter college, Oxford, and afterwards of Lincoln college. At the Restoration he became one of the most active members of the Royal Society. In 1666 he was presented to the rectory of the abbey church at Bath, where he died in 1680. He was a strenuous opponent of the Aristotelian philosophy, but a believer in witchcraft.

GLANVIL, SIR JOHN, an eminent lawyer and statesman in the reigns of Charles I. He graduated at Oxford; entered at Lincoln's Inn; obtained a serjeant's coif in 1639, and, being a member of parliament, was chosen speaker of the House of Commons in the year following. His attachment to the royal cause rendered him obnoxious to the republicans, who imprisoned him, and he was not restored to liberty till 1648. He recovered his rank on the return of Charles II., but died soon after, in 1661.

GLAUBER, JOHN RODOLPH, a chemist, alchemist, and physician, of Amsterdam, who died in 1668. Chemistry is indebted to him for facilitating many useful processes, as well as for the discovery of the purgative salt which bears his name. Like others of his day, he was incessantly occupied in attempts to find out the philosopher's stone, and his experiments, however futile for his professed object, threw light on the composition and analysis of various metals, inflammable substances, &c.

GLEICHEN, FREDERICK WILLIAM VON, a German naturalist, was born at Bayreuth in 1714. He was a lieutenant-colonel in the army, but retired in 1736 with the rank of privy councillor. He constructed a universal microscope, of which he published a description; and wrote various works on entomology, botany, and animalculism.

GLEIM, FREDERICK WILLIAM LOUIS, a celebrated poet, sometimes called the German Anacreon, was born in 1719, at Ermlieben; filled the office of secretary to the chapter of Halberstadt; and died in 1803, aged 84. He owes his chief fame to his war songs, composed for the Prussian army; and they will long be remembered by his countrymen for their spirit-stirring power.

GLENDOWER, OWEN, a celebrated Welshman, locally descended from Llewellyn, the last prince of Wales, and who opposed Henry IV. fourteen years, declaring him a usurper of the English throne. Born, 1330; died, 1416.

GLICAS, or GLYCAS, MICHAEL, a Greek historian of the 13th century. His Annals from the Creation, and the History of the Byzantine Emperors, are extant, and were published by Labbe at Paris, 1660.

GLENIE, JAMES, an eminent mathematician, was born in Ireland, and educated at St. Andrew's. During the American war he distinguished himself as an officer of artillery; but having written a pamphlet, ridiculing the duke of Richmond's plan of fortification, he was compelled to leave the service, and he afterwards experienced much of the vicissitudes of life. He was a member of the Royal Society; and the author of a "History of Germany," and several mathematical works. Died, 1817.

GLISSON, FRANCIS, an anatomist and physician, was born at Rampham, in Dorsetshire, in 1596; educated at Caius college, Cambridge; and appointed regius professor of physic, which office he held forty years. On the breaking out of the civil war, he settled at Colchester, but removed to London, and became president of the college of physicians. Among his works, which have been warmly praised by Boerhaave and Haller, are Treatises on the Rickets; on the Anatomy of the Liver; and a metaphysical work of great profundity, entitled, "De Natura Substantiæ Energetica, seu de Vita Naturæ," &c. Died, 1677.

GLOUCESTER, ROBERT OF, the oldest of our English poets, lived in the time of Henry II. Camden quotes many of his old English rhymes, and speaks highly of him. He died, at an advanced age, about the beginning of the reign of king John.

GLOUCESTER, WILLIAM FREDERICK, duke of, the son of prince William Henry, duke of Gloucester, (brother to George III.) by his wife the countess dowager of Waldegrave, was born at Rome, in January, 1776; and his education was completed at the university of Cambridge. He entered the army, served a campaign under the duke of York, in Holland, and subsequently attained the exalted rank of field-marshal. In 1805 he married his cousin, the princess Mary, fourth daughter of George III., but had no issue by her. The duke usually acted with the Whig opposition, and was generally distinguished by the support of popular philanthropic measures, especially of the Anti-slavery Society. But he opposed the Reform Bill, introduced by his quondam political friends, and voted and spoke against it. He was of an open disposition and affable manners, utterly devoid of ostentation, and lived in the greatest harmony with his duchess. He was chancellor of the university of Cambridge; in which office he was succeeded by the marquis of Camden. He died in 1834, bequeathing to his illustrious widow the greater portion of his property, which was very large, owing to the inexpensive, though not illiberal, style with which he supported his high rank.

GLOVER, RICHARD, a poet and dramatist, was the son of a London merchant, and born in 1712. He was educated at Cheam school, where, at sixteen, he wrote some verses to the memory of Sir Isaac Newton, which obtained considerable attention. On leaving school, he entered on the mercantile line under his father, who was engaged in the Hamburg trade. In 1737, he married a lady of fortune; soon after which he published his "Leonidas," an epic poem. His poem of "London, or the Progress of Commerce," appeared in 1739. The same year he published his popular ballad, entitled, "Hosier's Ghost," intended to rouse the national spirit against the Spaniards. About this time he distinguished himself as a city politician; and his oratorical talents and knowledge of public affairs were so great, that he was appointed to manage an application to parliament in behalf of the London merchants; on which occasion his speech at the bar of the House of Commons was printed, and much applauded. In 1753 his tragedy of "Boadicea" was brought out at Drury-lane, but, though supported by Garrick, Mossop, Mrs. Cibber, &c., it was performed only nine nights: his "Medea," some years after, met with greater attention. At the accession of George III. he was chosen M.P. for Weymouth, and was esteemed by the mercantile interest as an active and able supporter. He died in 1785, aged 73; leaving the world with a most estimable character as a man, a citizen, and an author.

GLUCK, CHRISTOPHER, one of the most eminent musical composers of modern times, was born in Bavaria, in 1714; devoted himself to the study of music, and became a skilful performer on several instruments. He came to London in 1745, and composed for the Italian opera. He then went to the Continent; and Vienna, Naples, Rome, Milan, and Venice, were in turn the theatres of his glory. His "Alceste," and "Orpheus," produced at Vienna, between the years 1762 and 1769, had an overwhelming effect by their boldness and originality, and served, together with some later ones, to establish the fame of their author. In 1774, Gluck went to Paris; and the celebrated Piccini arriving there shortly after, the French capital was divided upon the merits of the two composers. Such a scene, indeed, of musical rivalry had never before been known. He now brought out his long promised opera of "Iphigenia in Aulis." It was received with enthusiastic applause, and represented one hundred and seventy times in the course of two seasons. In 1787, he returned to Germany, with a large fortune, and died at Vienna in the same year.

GRELIN, JOHN GEORGE, a botanist and physician, was born at Tubingen, in 1709. He went to Petersburg, where he became member of the academy, and professor of chemistry and natural history. In 1773, he was sent with a company employed to explore the boundaries of Siberia. He published "Flora Siberica," and "Travels through Siberia." Died, 1755.

GRELIN, SAMUEL THEOPHILUS, nephew of the preceding, was born at Tubingen, in 1743; went to Petersburg, and obtained a professorship. He spent some years in travelling through Tartary, where he died in prison, into which he had been thrown by one of the chiefs, in 1774. He wrote his "Travels through Russia," and a "Journey from Astracan to Czarizyn."

GRELIN, JOHN FREDERIC, a physician and chemist, was born at Tubingen, in 1748. He became professor of chemistry and natural history, at Gottingen; and published several works on chemistry, mineralogy, and natural history. One of the most celebrated is his edition of the "Systema Naturae of Linnaeus." He was also the author of "A History of Chemistry;" and the world is indebted to him for the discovery of several excellent dyes, extracted from mineral and vegetable substances. Died, 1805.

GOAD, JOHN, an eminent schoolmaster, was born in London, in 1615; educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and St. John's college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He also became vicar of St. Giles's, Oxford; and afterwards of Yarn-ton, when he took his degree of bachelor in divinity. In 1661, he was made master of Merchant Tailors' school; but lost the mastership in consequence of his inclining to popery. He then kept a private seminary; and died in 1689. His works are, "Genealogicon Latinum;" "Astro-Meteorological or Aphorisms and Discourses of the Bodies Celestial, their natures, influences, &c." The subject of this is a kind of astrology founded on reason and experiment, and gained him great reputation.

GOBELIN, GILES, a French dyer of the 17th century, who resided at Paris, and is said to have invented or greatly improved the process of dyeing scarlet. In 1666, a royal establishment for the manufactory of fine tapestry was founded on the spot, where his premises stood, whence the work produced there was termed the Gobelin tapestry.

GNEISENAU, NEIDHARD, count, an able and highly-distinguished Prussian general, was born, in 1760. He was educated with a view to the military profession; and, at the age of twenty, he entered into the service of the margrave of Anspach. His first employment was in America, whither he was sent with the auxiliary troops of the margrave in British pay. In 1792, he became attached to the Prussian army as a subalter; and in 1807, he had attained the rank of a lieutenant-colonel, and defended the fortress of Calberg against the forces of Buonaparte. For his skill and bravery on that occasion he was promoted; and he was afterwards employed in a secret mission to England. In 1810, he was appointed to a situation in the Prussian war-office; and in 1813, he commanded in the memorable retreat of the combined forces of Russia and Prussia, after their defeat at Lutzen and Breslau. He subsequently served under Blücher, and is supposed to have greatly contributed to the victories over the French on the Katzbach, at Brienne, &c.; and he gained fresh laurels, when, after Napoleon's return from Elba, he was pursued to the gates of Paris. In reward of his numerous services, the king of Prussia raised him to the dignity of a count, made him a field marshal and governor of Berlin, and granted him an estate in Silesia, producing an income of more than 10,000 dollars a year. Died, 1829.

GOBBO, PETER PAUL CORTONESE, a celebrated painter of fruit and landscapes, born at Cortona, in 1580. He copied nature with the greatest accuracy; and by his skill in the chiaro-scuro, he gave an exact and expressive roundness to his fruits, &c. but he chiefly excelled in colouring. Died, 1640.

GODDARD, JONATHAN, an able chemist and physician, born at Greenwich, about the year 1617. He was educated at Oxford; graduated at Cambridge, and on the breaking out of the civil war was attached to the parliament. He attended Cromwell in his expeditions to Scotland and Ireland, as physician to the forces; was appointed warden of Merton college; and in the parliament of 1653, sat as sole representative for Oxford. Died, 1674.

GODEAU, ANTOINE, an eminent French prelate, and one of the earliest members of the French Academy, was born in 1605, at Dreux. He translated the book of Psalms, wrote an ecclesiastical history, and many devotional treatises. By the exercise of his talents, seconded by the patronage of cardinal Richelieu, he was raised to the bishopric of Vence. Died, 1671.

GODFREY of BOUILLON, chief of the first crusade, and king of Jerusalem, was the son of Eustace II. count of Boulogne and Lens. He served with great gallantry in the armies of the emperor Henry IV. who conferred upon him the title of duke of Lorraine; and when the first crusade was set on foot, the fame of his exploits caused his election as one of the principal commanders. In 1096, accompanied by his brothers, Eustace and Baldwin, he commenced his march, and on arriving at Philopolis, in Thrace, he compelled the emperor Alexis Comnenus to allow him a free passage to the East. Several difficulties occurred; but at length the Turks were vanquished, and the great object of his ambition was effected. Jerusalem was carried by storm, after a siege of five weeks (July 15, 1099); and, in eight days after, Godfrey was proclaimed king, by the unanimous voice of the crusading army; but the piety and humility of the conqueror would not suffer him to wear a crown in the holy city, and he declined the regal title, contenting himself with that of Defender and Guardian of the holy Sepulchre. The sultan of Egypt, at the head of 400,000 men, now attempted to dispossess him of his newly-acquired territory, but Godfrey gave him battle in the plain of Ascalon, and 100,000 men were left dead on the field. He died after one year's reign, in 1100.

GODFREY of VITERBO, an historian who lived in the 12th century, was chaplain and secretary to Conrad III., and the emperors Frederic and Henry VI. He laboured forty years in compiling a chronicle from the creation of the world to the year 1186. It is written in a mixture of prose and verse; and was first printed at Basil, in 1559.

GODOLPHIN, JOHN, a learned civilian of the 17th century, was a native of one of the Scilly islands. During the protectorate of Cromwell, he was appointed a judge of the admiralty-court; but at the restoration he became a warm assertor of royal supremacy, and was one of the king's advocates. Died, 1678.

GODOLPHIN, SIDNEY, earl of, lord high treasurer of England, was a native of Cornwall, and educated at Oxford. He was employed in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., though he had voted for the exclusion of the latter, in 1680. In the convention parliament, he voted for a regency; notwithstanding which he was made first commissioner of the treasury; and on the accession of queen Anne was placed at the head of that office; which situation he discharged to the public satisfaction. In 1704 he was honoured with the order of the garter; and, two years after, was raised to an earldom. Died, 1712.

GODOLPHIN, SIDNEY, a poet, was born in Cornwall, in 1610; educated at Exeter college, Oxford; and having joined the king's army, he fell in an engagement at Chagford, Devon, in 1643. Besides several poems, he translated that part of Virgil which recites the loves of Dido and Æneas.

GODWIN, earl of Kent, a powerful Anglo-Saxon lord. In 1017 he accompanied Canute in an expedition against Sweden, where he behaved with such valour as to receive the daughter of that monarch in marriage, and large grants of land. On the death of Canute, the earl sided with Hardicanute against Harold, but afterwards he espoused the cause of the latter. He was charged with murdering Alfred, one of the sons of Ethelred II., from which he vindicated himself by oath. On the death of Hardicanute he joined Edward, who married his daughter, but afterwards he rebelled against Edward, and, being unsuccessful, fled to Flanders. Having gathered fresh forces, he sailed up the Thames, and appeared before London, which threw the country into such confusion, that the king was obliged to negotiate peace with Godwin, who was restored to his estates. He died suddenly, while dining with the king at Winchester, in 1053.

GODWIN, THOMAS, an English bishop, was born at Oakingham, in Berkshire, in 1517. In 1544 he was promoted to the see of Bath and Wells; but not long after he was suspended by the queen for marrying a second wife. He died in 1590.

GODWIN, FRANCIS, son of the preceding, was born at Havington, in Northamptonshire, in 1561. He received his education at Christchurch college, Oxford; and greatly assisted Camden in his topographical inquiries. In 1601 he was promoted to the see of Llandaff, and was translated to that of Hereford in 1617. He died in 1633. He was the author of "Rerum Anglicarum Hen. VIII.," &c.; and a curious book, entitled, "The Man in the Moon, or a Discourse of a Voyage thither, by Domingo Gonzales."

GODWIN, THOMAS, a distinguished scholar, who in the 17th century was the master of the foundation school at Abingdon, Berks. He was the author of a useful work, entitled "Romanæ Historiæ Anthologia;" a "Synopsis of Hebrew Antiquities;" and a treatise on Jewish rites and ceremonies. Died, 1643.

GODWIN, WILLIAM, the well-known author of "Political Justice," "Caleb Williams," &c., was the son of a dissenting minister, and born at Wisbeach, in 1756. He was designed for the same calling as his father; but, while studying at the Dissenters' college, Hoxton, his religious opinions had undergone repeated changes; and though he commenced as a preacher, he ultimately abandoned the pulpit in 1783, and came to London as a literary adventurer. His first publication was a series of six sermons, called "Sketches of History;" and he soon after had the good fortune to obtain employment as a principal conductor of the Annual Register, from which he derived a small but certain income. Associating with the violent democrats of the day, and expressing opinions in unison with theirs, he soon became notorious, and enlisted under their banners. But it was the stormy elements of the French revolution which called forth his extraordinary powers of mind, and gave birth to that bold and astounding masterpiece of republicanism, his "Political Justice." Lauded and flattered as he was by those of kindred feelings, he yet had the discretion to retract, in a second edition, many of the most wild and destructive tenets which appeared in the first; but the poison was disseminated, and the author's character fully understood. In 1794 he published his celebrated novel of "Caleb Williams," a work which produced nearly as great a sensation as the former, its object being to decry the existing constitution of society, while it portrayed, with appalling force, the effects of crime. He was now an avowed freethinker, a despiser of revealed religion, and the advocate of every desperate leveller. After the trial of his friends, Hardy, Thelwall, and Horne Tooke, he published a pamphlet, containing strictures on Judge Eyre's charge to the jury, the circulation of which government tried in vain to prevent. Mr. Godwin did not appear again as an author till 1797, when he published a series of essays under the title of "The Enquirer." In the following year he produced the "Memoirs of Mary Wolstoncroft," authoress of a "Vindication of the Rights of Woman," whose congenial mind in politics and morals, and whose masculine spirit of defiance to the authority of man, he ardently admired. This work was most disreputable to them both: she appears to have been a compound of all that is repugnant to our best feelings—a woman without religion, without delicacy, without shame. He had lived with her some time before their marriage; and in her "Memoirs" he says, "the principal motive for complying with the ceremony, was the circumstance of Mary's being in a state of pregnancy." She, however, died a few months after, in giving birth to a daughter. In 1799 he produced another work, entitled "St. Leon," a romance; and it was evident his opinions had undergone some modification. In 1801 he again married, and shortly after opened a bookseller's shop in Skinner-street, where he ushered forth a variety of juvenile publications, many of which were his own composition. Though engaged in trade, he continued to wield the pen of an experienced author. He wrote the novels of "Fleetwood" and "Mandeville;" a "History of the Life and Age of Geoffry Chaucer;" a "History of the Commonwealth of England; two unsuccessful tragedies; an "Exposition of Mr. Malthus's Theory of Population;" "Cloudesley," a novel; "Thoughts on Man; his Nature, Productions, and Discoveries;" "The Lives of the Necromancers," &c. &c. As a novelist, Godwin is decidedly original; combining a depth of thought, singular independence, and energy of style; but the dark and repulsive picture which he draws of mankind, and the scenes of vice which he depicts, will often, it is to be feared, contaminate the innocent, and disgust those whom they are intended to reform. During the administration of earl Grey, he was appointed to the sinecure office of yeoman-usher of the exchequer, by which his latter days were rendered comfortable. Died, April, 1836.

GODWIN, Mrs., wife of the preceding, though better known as MARY WOLSTONCROFT, was born in 1759. The poverty of her parents could only afford her the commonest mode of education. Reading, and reflection, with extraordinary talents, her biographer tells us, supplied all deficiencies; so that, at the death of her mother, she opened a school with her sisters at Islington, from whence they removed to Newington Green. Shortly after, Mary quitted her sisters to attend upon a sick lady who had been her benefactress, and who died at Lisbon. Upon her return she engaged herself as governess to lord Kingsborough's children. In 1786 she fixed her residence in London, and began her literary pursuits with "Thoughts on the Education of Daughters." In 1792 she formed, what has since been termed, a platonic attachment to the artist Fuseli. Mary then visited France; but instead of finding the French happy, as she had fondly imagined, in their newly acquired freedom, they were convulsed by political parties, and enacted the parts of demons. While at Paris she became acquainted with a Mr. Imlay, to whom she was soon much attached; and, being so ardent an admirer of the new system of French philosophy, she was a willing convert to that part of it which regarded the marriage rite as a despicable ceremony, formed upon the basis of policy and interest, and calculated to enslave the freedom of the mind! But the birth of a child, and the desertion of her paramour, made her acquainted with the stern truth, that a breach of the established laws of society generally brings with it its own punishment. It is, however, unnecessary to dwell further on the subject of this article, the other events of her life are noticed at sufficient length in the preceding sketch.

GODWIN, WILLIAM, son of the author of "Caleb Williams," and the brother of Mrs. Shelley, was a contributor to some of the best periodicals of the day, and a parliamentary reporter. His essays showed that he was an attentive observer of men and manners, and were written with considerable tact and vivacity. He was attacked with cholera in 1832, and died, sincerely lamented by a large circle of friends.

GOECKINGK, LEOPOLD FREDERIC GUNTHER VON, a German poet, born at Gruningen, 1748; studied the law; wrote songs, epigrams, and fables; and filled several important situations in the Prussian government. Died, 1828.

GOERTZ, GEORGE HENRY, baron, was an active and intelligent statesman, born of a noble family in Holstein. He joined Charles XII. of Sweden, at Stralsund, on his return from Turkey; and, by his activity and intelligence, was soon placed at the head of affairs. But scarcely had Charles fallen before Frederickshall (Dec. 11th, 1718), when the foreign minister fell a sacrifice to the hatred of the nobility and of the successor to the throne. He was arrested, and charged with having induced the Swedish monarch to engage in ruinous enterprises, and of having mismanaged the sums entrusted to him; no time for repelling the accusations was allowed; and on the 28th of February, 1719, he was condemned and beheaded, without a hearing.

GOETHE, JOHN WOLFGANG VON, the greatest modern poet of Germany, and the patriarch of German literature, was born at Frankfurt, on the Maine, August, 28, 1749. His father was a doctor of law and imperial counsellor; and being in good circumstances, possessing a taste for the fine arts, and having made a tolerable collection of pictures and other objects of virtue, young Goethe had an early opportunity of indulging his fancy and improving his mind. Drawing, music, natural science, the elements of jurisprudence, and the languages, occupied his early years; and when he was fifteen, he was sent to the university of Leipsic, but did not follow any regular course of studies. In 1768 he quitted Leipsic, and subsequently went to the university of Strasburg, to qualify himself for the law; but he paid more attention to chemistry and anatomy than to his nominal pursuit. In 1771 he took the degree of doctor of jurisprudence, and then went to Wetzlar, where he found, in his own love for a betrothed lady, and in the suicide of a young man named Jerusalem, the subjects for his "Werther;" which appeared in 1774, and at once excited the attention of his countrymen, while it produced an instantaneous effect on his country's literature. Having, in 1782, entered the service of the duke of Saxe-Weimar, whom he had met in travelling, he was made president of the council chamber, ennobled, and loaded with honours. Asplendid galaxy of talent assembled at Weimar, and united itself to Goethe. The direction of the theatre was confided to him, and he there brought out some of the noble dramatic chef d'œuvres of Schiller, with an effect worthy of them. There, too, his own dramatic poems first appeared, viz., "Goetz de Berlichingen," "Faust," "Iphigenia in Tauris," "Tasso," "Clavijo," "Stella," and "Count Egmont." In 1786 he made a journey to Italy, where he remained two years, visited Sicily, and remained a long time in Rome. In 1792 he followed his prince during the campaign in Champagne. He was afterwards created minister; received, in 1807, the order of Alexander-Newsky from Alexander of Russia, and the grand cross of the legion of honour from Napoleon. Died at Weimar, March 22, 1832, aged 80. Goethe was an intellectual giant; and it is the philosophy of life and of individual character pervading his works, which places them among the first ever produced. Hence his greatest production is his "Faust," emphatically a philosophical poem, which will long remain unrivalled. His beautiful songs and shorter poems, elegies, distichs, &c. have the same peculiar character; for, though many or most of them cannot be called pre-eminently philosophical, yet they are all tinged with the profound reflections of his philosophical mind, and continually remind us of the deep springs, in which our griefs and joys, our fears and hopes, are found. The whole of Goethe's writings are by far too voluminous to be here enumerated; but we must not close this sketch without mentioning "William Meister's Apprenticeship," an ethic fiction; "Herman and Dorothea," and a miscellany on literature and the fine arts, entitled "Ueber Kunst und Alterthum am Rhein und Mayn, mit einem Nachbilde der Vera Icon Byzantinisch," in 3 vols.

GOETZE, JOHN AUGUSTUS EPHRAIM, a German naturalist, was born at Ascherleben, in 1731; and died in 1793. He made many microscopic discoveries, and wrote several books on natural history; among which are "Entomological Memoirs," 4 vols.; "A History of Insect Vermin;" and an "European Fauna," 9 vols. He was pastor of the church at Quedlinburgh, and died in 1793.

GOETZE, JOHN MELCHIOR, brother of the preceding, was a famous protestant minister at Hamburg, whose orthodoxy led him to publish many works, theological and controversial. Died, 1786.

GOFF, THOMAS, a divine and dramatic writer, was born in Essex about 1592, and educated at Westminster-school, and Christchurch, Oxford, where he took his degree of B.D. In 1623 he was presented to the living of East Clandon, in Surrey; where he died in 1629. He published some sermons and Latin orations: and after his death appeared five tragedies and some of his poetical pieces.

GOQUET, ANTHONY YVES, a Parisian advocate, and a writer on jurisprudence. His principal work, exhibiting much industry and learning, appeared in 1758, (the year in which he died), and is entitled "Origine des Loix, des Sciences, et des Arts, et de leurs Progres chez les Anciens Peuples."

GOICOECHEA, JOSEPH ANTHONY DE LIEUDOV, professor of philosophy and theology at Guatemala, in South America, and founder of the Economical Society there, was a Franciscan friar, but at the same time a public-spirited member of the state. He published a number of memoirs on botany, agriculture, &c., and had the honour of importing and naturalizing into his own country many valuable inventions and discoveries. Died, 1814.

GOLDING, ARTHUR, an English writer, of the Elizabethan era, patronized by Cecil, Sir Philip Sidney, and other cotemporary literati, was the translator of Ovid's Metamorphoses into English verse, and of Caesar's Commentaries into prose. He was likewise the author of an account of the earthquake of 1580, and of several devotional and other treatises.

GOLDONI, CHARLES, a celebrated Italian dramatist, was born at Venice, in 1707; and, it is affirmed, that so early did his taste for the drama appear, that before he was eight years old he actually sketched the plan of a comedy. His father, who was a physician, having left Venice, and settled at Perugia, intended that his son should follow the medical profession, and took him occasionally to visit his patients; but Goldoni, dissatisfied with this pursuit, obtained permission to study law in Venice. After committing many youthful follies, he brought a few pieces upon the stage, which procured but little profit, and not much praise; and he continued to live in a continual scene of dissipation and intrigue, until he married the daughter of a notary in Genoa, and removed to Venice. Here he first began to cultivate that department of dramatic poetry in which he was to excel; namely, description of character and manners, in which he took Moliere, whom he began to study about this time, for his model. Having, through indigence, removed with his family to Rimini, he took the direction of the theatre at that place, set about the reformation of the Italian stage, and for some time lived in comfortable circumstances. In 1761 the manager of the Italian theatre at Paris wished him to undertake a similar office there. On the conclusion of his engagement he obtained an introduction to court, and was appointed Italian master to the princesses, with apartments in Versailles, and a pension. For thirty years he resided in the French capital; but the Revolution having deprived him of his chief resources, he sank into a profound melancholy, and died in 1793, aged 85.

GOLDSMITH, OLIVER, a celebrated poet, historian, and essayist, was born in 1731, at Pallas, in the county of Longford, Ireland. He was the son of a clergyman; and was educated at the universities of Dublin, Edinburgh, and Leyden, with a view to the medical profession. But his eccentricities and careless conduct were the prolific source of difficulty to himself and friends; and when he abruptly quitted Leyden he had but one clean shirt, and no money, though he intended to make the tour of Europe on foot, and actually travelled through Flanders, part of France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy—often subsisting on the bounty of the peasants, and returning the obligation of a night's lodging, or a meal, by his skill on the German flute, which he fortunately carried with him as his stock in trade. In 1758 he arrived in England; and, by the assistance and recommendation of Dr. Sleight, his countryman and fellow-collegian, obtained a situation as usher in a school at Peckham; where, however, he did not remain long, but settled in London, and subsisted by writing for periodical publications. One of his first performances was an "Enquiry into the State of Polite Learning in Europe;" but he emerged from obscurity, in 1763, by the publication of his poem, entitled "The Traveller, or a Prospect of Society," of which Dr. Johnson said, "that there had not been so fine a poem since Pope's time." The year following appeared his well-known novel of the "Vicar of Wakefield." His circumstances were now respectable, and he took chambers in the Temple; but the liberality of his temper, and a propensity to gaming, involved him in frequent difficulties. In 1768 he brought out his comedy of the "Good-Natured Man" at Covent-garden, but its reception was not equal to its merits. In 1770 he published "The Deserted Village," a poem, which, in point of description and pathos, is above all praise; yet such was his modest opinion of its merits, that he could hardly be induced to take the proffered recompense of 100*l.* from his bookseller. In 1772 he produced his comedy of "The Stoops to Conquer," which was highly successful and profitable. Besides these performances he produced a number of others:—as a "History of England, in a Series of Letters from a Nobleman to his Son," 2 vols.; "A History of England," 4 vols.; "A Roman and a Grecian History," each 2 vols.; "A History of the Earth and Animated Nature," 8 vols.; "Chinese Letters," &c. Goldsmith was the friend of Johnson, Reynolds, and Burke, and a member of the Literary Club established by the former. He died at his chambers, in the Temple, April 4, 1774; and was buried in the chamber-yard of the Temple; but a monument was afterwards erected to his memory in Westminster Abbey.

GOLDSMITH, LEWIS, by birth an Englishman, but by his creed a Jew, was born in 1763. He exercised the business of a notary in London, till the French revolution; when he attracted persecution by writing his "Crimes of Cabinets." To escape the pecuniary consequences of a sentence for libel and sedition, he went to France, and there edited the "Argus," with funds supplied by the minister of foreign affairs. In this paper he attacked every thing English with the same ferocity as he subsequently attacked every thing French in the "Antigallican," and the "Cabinet of Buonaparte." Being informed of a base plot of the police, to deliver him up to the British government in exchange, he made overtures for a reconciliation with the latter; returned to this country; and, after being subjected to the form of a trial for high treason, which ended in his discharge on giving recognizances, he began a weekly attack on Buonaparte in the "Antigallican Monitor;" continued it till the time of his abdication; renewed it during the hundred days; and is said to have subsequently (in 1817) obtained a large sum and a pension from Louis XVIII.

GOLIUS, JAMES, an eminent oriental scholar, was born at the Hague, in 1596; educated at Leyden; and in 1622 went as interpreter to the Dutch embassy in Morocco. On his return he was appointed professor of Arabic at Leyden, and afterwards also nominated professor of mathematics, and interpreter of the oriental languages to the United States. His principal works are, an "Arabic Lexicon; a "Persian Dictionary;" "The History of the Saracens, translated from Elmacin;" and "The Life of Tamerlane." He died in 1667.—His brother PETER, who was also an excellent orientalist, became a catholic, and founded a Carmelite convent on Mount Libanus. He died, in 1673, at Surat, in the East Indies, whither he had proceeded as a missionary.

GOLTZIUS, HUBERT, an eminent antiquary, born at Venloo, in 1526. He was patronized by the emperor Ferdinand, and made several tours through the Low Countries, Germany, France, and Italy, in pursuit of his favourite study; in illustration of which he published some valuable works. Died, 1583.

GOMAR, or GOMARUS, FRANCIS, a protestant divine, born at Bruges, in 1563; educated at Oxford and Cambridge; and became theological professor at Leyden, in 1673; and afterwards professor of Hebrew and divinity at Groningen, where he died in 1641. He was the great opponent of his fellow-professor Arminius, and is chiefly remarkable for the intolerant bigotry he displayed while defending the points of election and predestination. His partisans in Holland were called Gomarites.

GONGORA, LOUIS, a celebrated Spanish poet, was born at Cordova, in 1602, and is called by his countrymen the prince of lyric poets. His style, however, is often difficult to comprehend, even to the Spaniards themselves, among whom he has had almost as many censurers as admirers. Died, 1627.

GOMEZ DE CIVIDAD REAL, ALVAREZ, a Spanish poet, was born at Guadalupe, in 1468, and died in 1539. He was page of honour to Charles V., and wrote several Latin poems, the principal of which is on "The Order of the Golden Fleece."

GONSALVO OF CORDOVA, HERNANDEZ Y AGUILAR, a celebrated Spanish warrior, was born at Moudilla, near Cordova, in 1413. He entered the army when only fifteen; distinguished himself against the Moors, Turks, and Portuguese; was appointed viceroy of Naples, after having conquered that kingdom; and universally obtained the appellation of the Great Captain. Died, 1515.

GOOD, JOHN MASON, a physician, poet, and philologist, was the son of a dissenting minister, and born, 1764, at Epping, in Essex. Having been apprenticed to a surgeon, he first practised at Coggeshall; but in 1793 he settled in London, as a surgeon and apothecary; and having obtained a diploma from the university of Aberdeen, he commenced practice as a physician in 1820. Dr. Good exercised the most indefatigable perseverance in the attainment of knowledge, without allowing his literary studies to interfere with the duties of his profession. It is stated of him, that so incessant and multifarious were his labours in 1803, that he was finishing a translation of "Solomon's Song," carrying on his "Life of Dr. Geddes," walking from twelve to fourteen miles a day to see his patients, (his business as a surgeon then producing upwards of 1400*l.* per annum), editing the "Critical Review," and supplying a column of matter, weekly, for the Sunday Review; added to which he had, for a short period, the management of the British Press Newspaper. Yet such was the energy of Mr. Good's mind, and such his habits of activity and order, that none of these occupations were neglected, or inadequately executed. In the winter of 1810 Mr. Good commenced his lectures at the Surrey Institution, which were published in 1826, in 3 vols., entitled, "The Book of Nature." He produced many other valuable works, among which are "The Study of Medicine," 4 vols. He died in 1827.

GOODAL, WALTER, a Scotch antiquary, was born in Banffshire, in 1706; studied at King's college, Aberdeen; and afterwards became keeper of the Advocates' Library, at Edinburgh. His principal literary performance is "An Examination of the Letters said to be written by Mary, Queen of Scots, to James, Earl of Bothwell," 2 vols. 8vo.; in which he proves (to the satisfaction of many who have investigated the subject), that the whole are forgeries.

GOODRICH, THOMAS, an English prelate, was born in Lincolnshire, and educated at Bennet college, Cambridge. He was chosen bishop of Ely, in 1534, and proved a zealous promoter of the reformation. He was made lord-chancellor in 1551; and, though the seals were taken from him by queen Mary, he was suffered to retain his bishopric. Died, 1554.

GOODWIN, FRANCIS, an eminent architect, the chief of whose public works are to be seen in the churches erected of late years in various provincial towns. He was also the architect of many municipal buildings, of which the Manchester Town Hall may be termed his chef d'œuvre. When public buildings were offered to competition, Mr. Goodwin frequently furnished plans, and in several instances he obtained premiums; and it was owing to his intense application, while engaged in producing plans for the erection of the new Houses of Parliament, that he fell a victim to an attack of apoplexy, Aug. 30, 1835.

GORDIAN, MARCUS ANTONIUS, the elder, a Roman emperor, surnamed Africanus, was descended from the Gracchi, and the family of Trajan. He was born A.D. 137, and the early part of his life was spent in literary pursuits. After being edile, twice consul, and proconsul of Africa, he was, at the age of eighty, raised to the throne, in conjunction with his son; who being slain in battle six weeks after their accession, the father, in an agony of grief, put a period to his own existence.

GORDIAN, MARCUS ANTONIUS, grandson of the preceding, was called to the throne when he was only thirteen years of age. He became a renowned warrior, and was styled the Guardian of the Commonwealth. He died, near Circesium, in 244; and it is said he was treacherously assassinated by Philippus, the Arabian, who was one of his generals, and his successor in the empire.

GORDON, THOMAS, a political writer, was born at Kirkcudbright, in Scotland. He received a liberal education in his own country, and settled in London as a classical teacher, but soon turned his attention to politics, and was employed by Harley, earl of Oxford. Mr. Trenchard next took him to live with him, and they wrote in conjunction "Cato's Letters," and the "Independent Whig." On the death of Trenchard, Gordon married his widow, and thus gained possession of a fine estate. They were both zealous whigs, and inveterate enemies of religion. Sir Robert Walpole employed Gordon to defend his administration, and made him a commissioner of wine-licences. He translated Tacitus and Sallust; and after his death, which happened in 1750, appeared "A Cordial for Low Spirits," and the "Pillars of Priestcraft and Orthodoxy shaken."

GORDON, ALEXANDER, a Scotch antiquary, who lived many years in Italy, and other parts of the Continent, and, in 1736, was appointed secretary to the society for the encouragement of learning. In 1741, he went to Carolina, where he held several offices, and had some grants of land. He died in 1760. Among his works are the "Lives of Pope Alexander VI. and his son Cæsar Borgia;" "A Complete History of Ancient Amphitheatres," &c.

GORDON, the Hon. GEORGE, usually called lord George Gordon, son of Cosmo George, duke of Gordon, was born in 1750. He entered when young into the navy, but left it during the American war, in consequence of a dispute with lord Sandwich, relative to promotion. He sat in parliament for Luggershall, and became conspicuous by his opposition to ministers; but, though eccentric, he displayed no deficiency of wit or argument. He soon, however, became an object of great notoriety; for, a bill having been introduced into the house, in 1780, for the relief of Roman Catholics from certain penalties and disabilities, he collected a mob, at the head of whom he marched to present a petition against the proposed measure. The dreadful riots which ensued, led to his lordship's arrest, and trial for high treason; but, no evidence being adduced of such a design, he was acquitted. In the beginning of 1778, having been twice convicted of libelling the French ambassador, the queen of France, and the criminal justice of his country, he retired to Holland; but he was arrested, sent home, and committed to Newgate, where he died, in 1793.

GORDON, the Right Hon. GEORGE, duke of Gordon, marquis of Huntly, &c. &c., was born at Edinburgh, 1770; and at about the age of eighteen entered the army as an ensign in the 35th regiment. In 1791 he raised an independent company of foot, and was appointed to a company of the 42nd. In 1792 he was made capt.-lieutenant of the 3rd foot-guards; embarked with that regiment to Holland in the following year; and was present in the actions of St. Amand, Famars, Lannoi, and Dunkirk, and at the siege of Valenciennes. In 1794 he was appointed to the command of the 92nd regiment of foot, which he had previously raised, and went out with it to Gibraltar. During the Irish rebellion, the 92nd regiment was actively engaged, and its commander made a brigadier-general. In 1799 it formed a part of the expedition to Holland; and there, at the battle of Bergen, the marquis was severely wounded. He received the rank of major-general in 1801; became colonel of the 42nd, or Royal Highlanders, in 1806; a lieutenant-general in 1808; commanded a division of the army in the unfortunate expedition to the Scheldt; was appointed colonel of the first foot-guards in 1830; and removed to the third guards on the death of the duke of Gloucester, in 1834. He succeeded to the dukedom on his father's death, in 1837; and died, May 26, 1838. The duke was a large contributor to many of our charitable institutions, and endeared himself to his countrymen by an uninterrupted course of benevolent acts. He was generous, kind-hearted, and brave; an admirable chairman at festive meetings, and a conservative in politics.

GORE, Vice-admiral Sir JOHN, was the son of colonel Gore, lieutenant of the Tower, and entered the navy in 1781. His early years were passed in active service in the West Indies, having been present with Sir Samuel Hood, in his brilliant actions at St. Christopher's and at the engagements between Rodney and De Grasse. At the commencement of the French revolutionary war, he was lieutenant on board the Lowestoff, 32 guns, and in that frigate he accompanied lord Hood's fleet to the Mediterranean. He was afterwards removed to lord Hood's flag-ship, the Victory, and was often engaged with the enemy, both in floating-batteries and on shore. In this service he was on one occasion severely wounded, in the head; and, on another, blown out of his boat, and seriously burnt by the explosion of a fire-ship. He was afterwards employed to assist the British troops in Corsica, where he remained until the surrender of Bastia, in 1794, when he was promoted to post-rank. He was next appointed in the Windsor Castle of 98 guns; afterwards to Le Censeur, 74; then to the Robust, 74; and in 1796, he was employed in the Triton frigate, on Channel service, until the escape of the French fleet from Brest, April 23, 1799; when he was dispatched with the important information to Earl St. Vincent, commander-in-chief on the Mediterranean station. He was now sent with two frigates to reconnoitre the coasts of France and Spain, from Toulon to Cadiz, in which latter port he at length discovered the enemy's combined fleets, amounting to 28 sail of the line, besides frigates, corvettes, &c. Waiting till they set sail, he observed their destination round Cape St. Vincent, and then hastened to Plymouth, with the intelligence of their junction and movements, five days before they reached Brest. Upon this, captain Gore was placed in command of a squadron of five frigates, to observe the enemy's movements; and, while cruising near Ferrol, he had the good fortune to assist at the capture of the Santa Brigida, Spanish treasure ship, his prize-money from which exceeded 40,000*l*. In 1801, when our government had good reason to expect Buonaparte's threatened invasion, captain Gore commanded a light squadron, in watching Boulogne; and his vessel, the Medusa, a 32-gun frigate, to which he had been recently appointed, bore the flag of Nelson. No great result followed this, further than that it rendered the projected invasion still more impracticable, and it was ultimately abandoned. In 1804, he assisted at the capture of three valuable Spanish merchant-ships; in 1806, he received the honour of knighthood, and sailed to Bengal; and, on his return, he was removed into the Revenge, 74, and formed part of the squadron under Sir S. Hood. In 1807, Sir John Gore was sent to join Lord Collingwood, who gave him the command of the in-shore squadron off Cadiz, where he continued for about a-year; but finding his health much impaired, when he arrived at Portsmouth, he obtained leave to retire for a time from the fatigues of active service. From 1810 to 1813, he was actively employed in various cruises, blockades, &c.; and at the close of the latter year, he was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral. In 1815, he was nominated a K.C.B.; in 1826, he became a vice-admiral; and he died in August, 1836.

GORE, CHRISTOPHER, a governor of the state of Massachusetts, was born at Boston, in 1638; his father being an opulent mechanic there. In 1776, he graduated at Harvard university, studied the law, and soon acquired a lucrative practice. Before he was thirty, he was elected by the citizens of Boston, with Hancock and Samuel Adams, to the convention of the state, which adopted the federal constitution. In 1789, Washington appointed him the first United States' attorney for the district of Massachusetts; and in 1796, he was selected by the president as the colleague of the celebrated William Pinkney, to settle the American claims upon England for spoils. In this situation he evinced his wonted energy and talent, and recovered property to a very great amount for his fellow-citizens. In 1803, he was left in London as charge d'affaires, when Rufus King, the American minister, returned to America. In 1805, he was chosen governor of Massachusetts, but retained this dignity only for one year. In 1814, he was called to the senate of the Union, and served in this capacity for three years; when he retired from public affairs, and died in 1837, aged 68. He was a good scholar, and had an excellent knowledge of the world; which qualities were set off to the best advantage by his fine person and graceful manners.

GORGAS, LEONTIUS, a celebrated orator, of the school of Empedocles, was a native of Leontium in Sicily, and flourished in the fifth century, B.C. A statue of gold was erected to his honour at Delphi; and Plato has given his name to one of his dialogues. He lived to the age of 103.

GOSSEC, FRANCIS JOSEPH, an eminent French musical composer, was born at Versailles, in 1733; and died, at Pamy, in 1829. His compositions are numerous, and the character of his music is light, pleasing, and spirited. In 1770, he founded the Concert of Amateurs, at which the Chevalier de St. George, played the first violin. He composed the apotheosis of Voltaire and J. J. Rousseau, and the funeral hymn for Mirabeau.

GOSSELINI, JULIAN, an Italian writer, was born at Rome, in 1855. He became secretary to Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily, (whose "Life" he wrote), and afterwards was in the service of Spain, where he was imprisoned on a charge of conspiracy, but soon obtained his liberty; on which he went to Milan, and there died in 1897.

GOSSELIN, PASCAL FRANCIS JOSEPH, an eminent French geographer, born at Lille, in the Netherlands, in 1781. He was engaged in a tour through Europe, for several years, and made many valuable researches concerning ancient geography. In 1799, he was admitted a member of the National Assembly, and, in 1791, nominated a member of the central administration of commerce. He was subsequently employed in the war department; became a member of the legion of honour; and was ultimately made keeper of the king's library, and cabinet of medals, &c. at Paris. His works relate to ancient geography, and possess much merit. Died, 1830.

GOSSON, STEPHEN, a divine and poet; born in Kent, in 1554; educated at Christchurch, Oxford; held the living of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate; and died in 1622. He wrote three dramatic pieces; notwithstanding which, he published "Play confuted in five several Actions," and "The School of Abuse," against poets and actors.

GOTHOFFRED, DENIS, an eminent French lawyer, born of an illustrious family at Paris, in 1549. France being involved in confusion by the leaguers, he accepted of a professor's chair at Geneva, until he was employed by Henry IV.; but being afterwards deprived of his office, as a Huguenot, he retired to Heidelberg, and died in 1622. He wrote many books, the chief of which is the "Corpus Juris Civilis."

GOTHOFFRED, THEODORE, son of the preceding, was born at Geneva, in 1580. As soon as he had finished his studies, he went to Paris; where he conformed to the Romish religion, and applied with indefatigable industry to the study of history. In 1632, Louis XIII. made him one of his historiographers, with a stipend of 3000 livres; and, in 1636, he was sent to Cologne, and subsequently to Munster, to assist at the treaty of peace negotiating there. He died in 1643. His principal work is an "Account of the Ceremonial of the Kings of France."

GOTHOFRED, DENIS, son of Theodore, was born at Paris, in 1615. He studied history, after his father's example; became as eminent in that department of knowledge; and obtained the reversion of his father's place of historiographer royal, from Louis XIII. when he was but twenty-five years of age. He finished the "Memoirs of Philip de Commines," began by his father; and was preparing a history of Charles VIII., when he died, in 1681.

GOTTSCHED, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a German writer, was born at Königsberg, in 1700; and is considered to have contributed much towards the reformation of German literature. He was successively professor of the belles-lettres, philosophy, metaphysics, and poetry, in the university of Leipzig; and died in 1766. He was assisted in his dramatic writings by his wife, who was a woman of splendid talents.

GOTTER, FREDERIC WILLIAM, an eminent poet and dramatic writer, who held the office of archivist of Gotha, and died in 1797.

GOTTI, VINCENT LOUIS, a Dominican friar, who arrived at the cardinalate, and distinguished himself by his theological writings. Died, in 1741.

GOUFFIER, MARIE GABRIEL AUGUSTE LAURENT, count de Choiseul, was born in 1752. At the age of twenty-two he travelled through Greece and the neighbouring islands; and on his return to France he published a splendid work, entitled "Voyage Pittoresque de la Grece," beautifully illustrated. But he had completed only one volume of his work, which was published in parts, when, in 1784, he was appointed ambassador to Constantinople. Intending to prosecute his design of illustrating the antiquities of Asia and Greece, he took out with him several artists and literati, with types and other implements necessary for carrying it into execution on the spot. But the events of the French revolution having disarranged his plans, he went to Russia, where he was made a privy counsellor, director of the academy of arts, and superintendent of the imperial libraries. In 1803, his name being erased from the list of emigrants, he returned to France; and the year following was chosen a member of the National Institute. He now published a continuation of his work upon Greece; but became involved in disputes with Le Chevalier and Casass, who had, as he conceived, injured him, by sending to the press their works on the same subject, after having been employed under his auspices. On the return of Louis XVIII., he was made a peer of France; and died in 1817.

GOUGE, WILLIAM, an English divine, was born at Bow, in Middlesex, in 1578. He became fellow of King's college, Cambridge, and in 1608 obtained the living of Blackfriars, London. He was a member of the assembly of divines at Westminster; officiated there as moderator; and was also one of the annotators on the Bible appointed by that body. He died in 1633.

GOULSTON, Theodore, an English physician, was born in Northamptonshire, and studied at Merton college, Oxford. He died in 1632, bequeathing 200*l.* for a pathological lecture to be read yearly in the college of physicians.

GOUGH, RICHARD, an eminent antiquary and topographer, the son of a London merchant, was born in 1733. He received a private education, and at the age of eleven years translated from the French, a History of the Bible, of which twenty-five copies were printed at the expense of his mother, who, with a pardonable fondness for his precocious talents, made presents of them to her friends. This was followed by a translation of Fleury's treatise on "The Customs of the Israelites," when he was only fifteen. In 1752, Mr. Gough became a student of Bennet college, Cambridge, but antiquities were his favourite study, and he left the university without taking a degree, and devoted the rest of his life to antiquarian researches. Besides many papers in the Archaeologia, the Bibliotheca Topographica, and the Gentleman's Magazine, he published "Anecdotes of British Topography," 2 vols. 4to.; "The Sepulchral Monuments of Great Britain," 2 vols. folio; an enlarged edition of Camden's Britannia, &c. Died, 1809.

GOUJON, JEAN, a French sculptor and architect in the sixteenth century, who, being a Protestant, fell in the massacre of St. Bartholomew, 1572. He designed the fine facade of the old Louvre, and other works, which procured him the title of the French Phidias.

GOUVION ST. CYR, General LAURENT, marquis de, an eminent French commander, commenced his military career during the revolution. In the campaign on the Rhine, in 1795, he repeatedly distinguished himself; and in the following year he attracted the particular attention of Moreau, who hesitated not to attribute to his skill and bravery, much of the success which attended the French arms. He was afterwards entrusted with some diplomatic missions; and when these were performed, he returned to the camp, and in 1800 commanded the centre of the army of the Rhine. In 1804 he was made colonel-general of the cuirassiers, and grand officer of the legion of honour. He continued to pursue a successful career, during the following campaigns in Italy and Germany; and when the French first invaded Spain he was employed in Catalonia, where he also displayed considerable ability. In the disastrous campaign of Buonaparte in Russia, he succeeded marshal Oudinot in the command of the central army; and for his services on that occasion he was promoted to the rank of marshal. He behaved with great judgment and bravery at the battle of Dresden, and was left there with a garrison of 16,000 men; but succeeding events rendered it impossible for him to maintain the place. On the restoration of the Bourbons he was created a peer, and made a commander of the order of St. Louis. In 1817 he was appointed minister for naval affairs, and he subsequently filled the highest office in the war department. Died, 1830.

GOWER, JOHN, an English poet of the fourteenth century, supposed to have been born in Yorkshire about 1320. He was a member of the society of the Inner Temple; and some writers assert that he became chief justice of the Common Pleas; though the more general opinion is, that the judge was another person of the same name. He died in 1402, and was buried in the conventual church of St. Mary Overy, Southwark, to which he was a benefactor, and where his tomb is still to be seen. He was author of a tripartite work, entitled "Speculum Meditantis;" "Vox Clamantis," and "Confessio Amantis."

GOZON, DEODATI, grand-master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, was celebrated for his courage and other virtues. A fabulous story is told of his killing a dragon of a monstrous kind, that infested the island of Rhodes. Died, 1332.

GRABE, JOHN EMMERT, a learned divine and critic, was born in 1696, at Königsberg, Prussia. Being dissatisfied with Lutheranism, he was prevailed upon to go to England; here he received considerable patronage, king William III. allowing him an annual pension of 100*l.*, and the university of Oxford conferring on him the degree of D.D. He also entered into orders, and published several valuable works, the principal of which is, an edition of the Septuagint, from the Alexandrian MS. in the royal library. He died in 1713.

GOZZI, GASPARE, count, an Italian; author of "Dramatic Pieces;" "Poems;" "Familiar Letters;" and a work on the plan of the Spectator, called the "Venetian Observer." Born at Venice, 1713; died, 1786.

GOZZI, CHARLES, count, brother of the preceding, a dramatic writer, known as the persevering enemy and rival of Goldoni.

GOYEN, JOHN VAN, a painter of landscapes, cattle, and sea-pieces, was born at Leyden, in 1696; and was the pupil of Vanderweide. He possessed great facility and freedom; his works are consequently more general throughout Europe than those of any other master, but such as are finished and remain undamaged are highly valued.

GRACCHUS, TIBERIUS SEMPRONIUS, was a celebrated Roman, of eminent talents and patriotism, who distinguished himself at the taking of Carthage, and was elected tribune of the people. Having, in their name, demanded of the senate the execution of the agrarian law, by which all persons possessing above 500 acres of land, were to be deprived of the surplus, for the benefit of the poor citizens, among whom an equal distribution of it was to be made, it met with violent opposition, and Tiberius fell a victim to his zeal and the fury of the offended patricians, B.C. 133.

GRACCHUS, CAIUS, a younger brother of the preceding, who possessed similar talents and principles, and pursued similar measures. He was twice tribune, and obtained the passing of various laws obnoxious to the patricians; but, at length, he was slain in battle, when contending with the consul Opimius, B.C. 121.

GRACIAN, BALTHASAR, a Spanish Jesuit, and one of the most popular preachers and writers of his time, was born in 1584, and became rector of the college of Tarragona. He wrote several works; the chief of which are, "The Courtier;" "The Hero;" and "The Art of Prudence." Died, 1658.

GRÆME, JOHN, a Scotch poet, was born at Carnwarth, in Lanarkshire, in 1746. He was the son of a poor farmer, but discovering a superior genius, obtained a liberal education, first at Edinburgh, and next at St. Andrew's. He was preparing for the ministry, when he died in 1772, leaving behind him a volume of elegiac and miscellaneous poetry, which was afterwards published.

GREFE, or GRÆVIUS, JOHN GEORGE, a learned classical scholar, born at Naumburg, Saxony, in 1632. His avidity for study in his early years was astonishing. He succeeded Gronovius in the professorship of history at Deventer, and removed from thence to Utrecht, where he died in 1703. He published editions of several of the classics; but his greatest works are his "Theaurus Antiquitatum Romanorum," 12 vols. folio, and "Theaurus Antiquitatum et Historiarum Italice," 6 vols. folio.

GRAFFIGNY, FRANCES D'ISEMBOURG D'HAFONCOURT DE, was born at Nancy in 1694. She was the wife of Graffigny, chamberlain to the duke of Lorraine, from whom she was legally separated on account of his brutal conduct. Her best literary productions are a sentimental work, entitled, "Lettres d'une Peruvienne," and the drama of "Cenile." She was an associate of the academy of Florence, and received a pension from the court of Vienna. Died, at Paris, in 1758.

GRAFTON, RICHARD, an English historian, who carried on an extensive business in London, as a printer, in the sixteenth century. He greatly assisted in the compilation of "Hall's Chronicle," and also produced another, entitled "A Chronicle at large of the Affaires of England from the Creation of the World unto Queene Elizabeth." Grafton's Chronicle was republished, in 3 vols. 4to., in 1609.

GRAFTON, AUGUSTUS HENRY FITZROY, duke of, was born in 1736; succeeded his grandfather in the family honours in 1757; and in 1765 was appointed secretary of state; but the year following he relinquished that station, and soon after became first lord of the treasury, which he held till 1770. During his administration, he was virulently attacked by Junius, who seems to have been actuated quite as much by personal enmity, as by political hostility. In 1771 the duke was nominated lord privy seal, which office he resigned in 1773, and acted in opposition to the court till 1782, when he was again in place for a short time. After this, he was uniformly an opponent of ministers, till his death. In 1766 the duke was elected chancellor of Cambridge; an office, one would have imagined, quite incompatible with the Unitarian tenets which he openly professed. He was the author of a volume of theological essays, &c. Died, 1811.

GRAHAM, GEORGE, an ingenious watch-maker, and a most accurate mechanician, was born at Kirklington, Cumberland, in 1675. He came to London, and lived with Tompion the watch-maker, whom he succeeded in business, but far excelled in scientific attainments. He invented various astronomical instruments, by which the progress of science was considerably furthered. The great mural arch in the observatory of Greenwich was made for Dr. Halley, under his inspection, and divided by his own hand. He invented the sector with which Dr. Bradley discovered two new motions in the fixed stars. He furnished the members of the French academy, who were sent to the north to measure a degree of the meridian, with the instruments for that purpose; and he composed the whole planetary system, within the compass of a small cabinet, from which model all succeeding orreries have been formed. Mr. Graham was a member of the Royal Society, to which he communicated several useful discoveries. He died in 1761, and was interred in Westminster abbey.

GRAHAM, SIR JOHN, the faithful companion and fellow-patriot of Sir William Wallace. He fell at the battle of Falkirk, July 22, 1298.

GRAHAM, SIR RICHARD, lord viscount Preston, was born in 1648. He was sent ambassador by Charles II. to Louis XIV., and was master of the wardrobe and secretary of state under James II. When the Revolution took place, he was tried and condemned, on an accusation of attempting the restoration of that prince, but, through the queen's intercession, he was pardoned. He spent the remainder of his days in retirement, and published an elegant translation of Boethius on the Consolations of Philosophy. Died, 1695.

GRAHAME, JAMES, a Scottish poet, was born, in 1765, at Glasgow, and educated at the university of that city. He was bred to the law, but relinquished forensic pursuits for clerical; and died in 1811, curate of Sedgfield, near Durham. His poetry is mostly of a religious character, solemn, yet animated, flowing, and descriptive. His principal pieces are "The Sabbath;" "The Bards of Scotland;" and "British Georgics."

GRAINGER, JAMES, a poet and physician, was born at Dunse, in Scotland, in 1733. After serving his time to a surgeon at Edinburgh, he became a regimental surgeon in the English army in Germany; but on the restoration of peace in 1748, he took his doctor's degree, and settled as a physician in London; where, however, he principally supported himself by writing for the press. An "Ode to Solitude," published in Dodley's collection, first procured him reputation; and, among others, the acquaintance of Shenstone and Dr. Percy. In 1759 he published his Elegies of Tibullus, which, owing to some severity of criticism, involved him in a paper war with Smollett. He then went to the West Indies as tutor to a young gentleman, and, during the voyage, formed an attachment to a lady, whom he married on his arrival at the island of St. Christopher's, of which her father was governor. Here he successfully established himself as a medical practitioner, but did not lay aside his pen. He wrote a West Indian Georgic, or didactic poem, entitled "The Sugar Cane," and the ballad of "Brian and Percene." He died at Basseterre, St. Christopher's, in 1707.

GRAMAYE, JOHN BAPTIST, a Flemish traveller, poet, and historian; born at Antwerp; was made historiographer of the Netherlands, and became provost of Arnheim. He travelled through Germany and Italy; but as he was proceeding by sea to Spain, he was taken by an Algerine corsair, and carried to Barbary. On his liberty being obtained, he travelled into Moravia and Silesia; was made president of the college of Louvain; and died near Lubeck, in 1635. His works chiefly relate to the history and antiquities of his native country; but he also published "Africa Illustrata;" "Diarium Algeriense," some Latin poems, &c.

GRAMMONT, PHILIBERT, count of, a celebrated wit of Charles the Second's court, was the son of Anthony, duke of Grammont. After serving in the army under Condé and Turenne, he came to England in the early part of the reign of Charles II., with whom, as well as his mistresses, he became a great favourite. He married the daughter of Sir George Hamilton, fourth son of the earl of Abercorn, and died in 1707. He is described as possessing, with a great turn for gallantry, much wit, politeness, and good-nature; but he was a great gamester, and seems to have been indebted for his support chiefly to his superior skill and success at play. His memoirs were written by his brother-in-law, Anthony, usually called count Hamilton, who followed the fortunes of James II., and ended his days in the service of France.

GRAMMONT, the duke of, father of the duke of Grache and the countesses of Tankerville and Sebastiani, died at Paris, aged 81, Aug. 1836. Some years ago he instituted a suit in the French courts to establish his claim to the citadel of Blaye and its dependencies; and the cour royale of Bordeaux decreed that, at the expiration of three years, the state should pay the duke an annuity of 100,000 francs, or restate him in the possession of the citadel. The present duchess de Grammont is sister to count Alfred D'Orsay.

GRANBY, JOHN MANNERS, marquis of, a famous English general, was the eldest son of the duke of Rutland, and commanded with honour during the seven years war in Germany. After the peace of 1763 he retired to private life, greatly beloved by all ranks for his many virtues. He died in 1770, aged 50.

GRANDIER, URBAN, curate and canon of Loudon, whose tragical end disgraced France in the seventeenth century, was born at Bouvere, near Sablé. On obtaining the living of Loudon, he became so very popular as a preacher, that the envy of the monks was excited against him. He was first accused of incontinency; but being acquitted, his enemies instigated some nuns to play the part of persons possessed, and in their convulsions to charge Grandier with being the cause of their visitation. This horrible, though absurd charge, was countenanced by cardinal Richelieu, who had been persuaded that Grandier had seduced him; and he was tried, declared guilty, and burnt alive, April 18, 1634.

GRANDIUS or GRANDI, Guido, an Italian mathematician, was born in 1671, at Cremona. He became professor of philosophy at Florence, and zealously advocated the Cartesian doctrines; subsequently removed to Pisa; was appointed professor of mathematics in that university; and died in 1742. He corresponded with Newton, Leibnitz, and Bernouilli, and published several works, the chief of which is a Latin treatise "De Infinitis Infinitorum."

GRANDMAISON, MICHEL, born in 1771; a French terrorist, of infamous notoriety; member of the revolutionary committee of Nantes, and chief agent in Carrier's horrible Noyades and Fusillades. On the reaction of 1794, against his patrons, he was himself condemned to the guillotine. It was proved on his trial, that he armed himself with a sabre, and chopped off the hands and fingers of those who tried to save themselves from the Noyades by grasping the edges of the boats.

GRANET, FRANCIS, deacon of the church of Aix, and an able critic, was born in 1692, at Brignolles in Provence. He continued Desfontaines's "Nouvelles du Parnasse," till the work was suppressed; after which he published "Reflexions sur les Ouvrages de Literature," in 12 vols. He also translated Newton's Chronology, and edited Lannoy's works. Died, 1741.

GRANGE, JOSEPH DE CHANCEL DE LA, a poet, was born in 1676, in Perigord. He wrote a comedy at nine years old, and a tragedy at sixteen; but the work which made him known, was a satire, entitled "Philippics," containing many infamous accusations against Philip duke of Orleans. For this he was seized, and ordered to be imprisoned in the Isle of St. Margaret; but he contrived to effect his escape, and on the regent's death returned to France, where he was allowed to live unmolested. His works, consisting of operas, tragedies, and miscellaneous poems, form 5 volumes. Died, 1738.

GRANGER, JAMES, an English divine, who published a valuable and highly interesting work, entitled, "The Biographical History of England," in 4 vols. 8vo. He was a native of Berkshire; received his education at Christ-church, Oxford; became vicar of Shiplake, in Oxfordshire; and his death was occasioned by a fit of apoplexy while administering the sacrament, in 1776.

GRANT, FRANCIS, lord Cullen, an eminent Scotch judge, was born about 1660. He studied at Leyden under Voet; and on his return home was admitted an advocate. He distinguished himself by his publications in favour of the Revolution, for which he was rewarded, first by a baronetcy, and soon after by being appointed one of the judges, or senators in the college of justice, when he took the title of lord Cullen. He continued to discharge the duties of his office for twenty years, with the highest reputation; and died in 1726.

GRANT, CHARLES, an eminent and benevolent East India proprietor and director, was born in Scotland, in 1746. By the death of his father, who fell at the battle of Culloden, the care of his education devolved on his uncle, who sent him out to India. Here he soon found patronage in the civil service, and in 1770 returned to Scotland and married. In 1772 he went out to Bengal as a writer; and was shortly after appointed secretary to the board of trade. In this situation he became the patron of several Christian missions; and, in 1790, on his return to England, he obtained a seat in the East India direction. He was also a member of the House of Commons, where his opinion on Indian affairs obtained great attention. He now wrote his important "Observations on the State of Society among the Asiatic Subjects of Great Britain;" which, in 1813, the House of Commons caused to be printed for the use of its members. Mr. Grant was also one of the commissioners appointed by Parliament to superintend the building of new churches; a member of the society for promoting Christian knowledge; and a vice-president of the Bible society. Died, 1822.

GRANT, Sir WILLIAM, late Master of the Rolls; an excellent equity judge, the promptitude and wisdom of whose decisions were appreciated no less by the public than by the profession, of which he was a distinguished member. Born at Elchies, in Scotland, 1754; died, 1832.

GRANT, Sir COLQUHOUN, K.C.B., &c., a lieutenant-general, and colonel of the 15th hussars, entered the army in 1793, as an ensign in the 36th foot, then in the East Indies. He soon exchanged into the 25th dragoons, served during the Mysore campaign, and was present at the capture of Seringapatam; after this he was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 72d foot, and was at the taking of the Cape of Good Hope, under Sir David Baird, in 1806. He exchanged into the 15th hussars in 1808, and was wounded at the battle of Sahagun, where the 15th greatly distinguished itself. In 1811 he was appointed aide-de-camp to the prince regent; embarked for Spain in 1813, and commanded the hussar brigade at the action of Morales; he was present also at the battle of Vittoria; and, as major-general, he commanded a brigade at Waterloo, where he had five horses killed or wounded during the battle. Died, 1835.

GRANT, JAMES, a Scotch barrister, and at the time of his death the father of the Scottish bar. He was early distinguished for his liberal political principles, and could number among his friends Henry Erskine, Sir James Mackintosh, and many others, eminent for their attainments and the lead they took in the politics of the day. He was the author of "Essays on the Origin of Society;" "Thoughts on the Origin and Descent of the Gael," &c. Died, 1835, aged 92.

Lansdowne, in 1643, and descended from the family of Rollo, the first duke of Normandy. He was born in 1667; sent to Trinity college, Cambridge, when only eleven years of age; admitted M.A. at thirteen; having before he was twelve, spoken a poetical address of his own composition to the duchess of York, when she visited the university. He had a strong inclination for a military life; but this was checked by his friends, and he employed himself, during the various political changes that occurred, in cultivating his taste for literature. In 1696, his comedy, called "The Gallants," was performed at the theatre-royal in Lincoln's Inn Fields, as was his tragedy of "Heroic Love" in 1698. On the accession of queen Anne, he made his first appearance at court; took his seat in the House of Commons as member for Fowey; became successively secretary of war, comptroller of the household, treasurer, and one of the privy council. On the queen's death he not only lost his post, but being suspected of disaffection to the Hanoverian succession, was arrested and sent to the Tower, where he remained upwards of a twelvemonth. He then retired to the Continent for ten years; and on his return passed his life as a country gentleman, amusing himself with the republication of his poems, and in writing a vindication of his uncle, Sir Richard, against the charges of Clarendon and Burnet. Died, 1735.

GRATIAN, a Roman emperor, was the son of Valentinian I. by his wife Severa, and born in 359. His father took him as his associate in the empire when he was only eight years old. In his 17th year he succeeded to the throne, on the death of his father. Gratian defeated the Goths, and exerted himself with energy and success in defending the empire, but was put to death in a revolt, in Gaul, A.D. 383.

GRATIAN, a Benedictine in the 19th century, was a native of Chiusi, in Tuscany. He employed twenty-four years in compiling an abridgment of the canon law, commonly called Gratian's Decretal.

GRATIUS, FALISCUS, a Latin poet, supposed to be contemporary with Ovid. He wrote a poem, entitled "Cynogeticon," or the Art of Hunting with Dogs.

GRATTAN, HENRY, an eminent Irish orator and statesman, was born about the year 1750, at Dublin, of which city his father was recorder. He finished his education at Trinity college, whence he removed to England, and became a student in the Middle Temple. He was called to the Irish bar in 1772, and brought into the parliament of Ireland in 1775, where he immediately became distinguished for his patriotic speeches, and that vigorous opposition to the statute of 6th Geo. I., which roused the whole island, and produced its repeal, in 1782. For his share in this transaction, Mr. Grattan received addresses from all parts of the country, and was rewarded with the sum of 50,000*l.* voted to him by the parliament of Ireland. In 1790, he was returned for the city of Dublin, principally for the purpose of opposing the union; but when that measure was carried, he did not refuse a seat in the united House of Commons. The latter years of his parliamentary attendance were chiefly devoted to a warm and energetic support of Catholic emancipation; and it may be truly said, that he died in the service of this cause. Mr. Grattan was the zealous and unequivocal friend to Ireland, and to what he deemed her best interests, from first to last. There was nothing temporizing or uncertain about him: he was a warm friend, or a bitter enemy. As a public speaker, he had to contend with a defective voice; but his eloquence was at all times animated, combining strength with beauty, and energy with elegance. Died, 1820; aged 70.

GRAUN, KARL HEINRICH, an eminent German musician, chapel-master to Frederick the Great, was born in 1701, and died in 1759. He enjoyed a reputation in Germany scarcely inferior to that which Handel enjoyed in England; and was the author of an immense number of masses, oratorios, and other musical compositions.

GRAUNT, EDWARD, a scholar of the 16th century. He was appointed master of Westminster school in 1572; resigned the mastership in 1591; and died, rector of Toppersfield, in Essex, 1601. He was the author of "Græcæ, Linguae, Spicilegium," &c.

GRAVES, RICHARD, a clergyman of the church of England, but better known as a novelist and poet than as a divine, was born at Mickleton, in Gloucestershire, in 1715. He was a student of Pembroke college, Oxford, and afterwards obtained a fellowship of All Souls. In 1750, he was presented to the rectory of Claverton, near Bath; and in that pleasant sequestered village he resided till the time of his death, in 1804. His various works are, "The Festoon, or a Collection of Epigrams;" "Lubrications in prose and rhyme;" "The Spiritual Quixote," a novel ridiculing the extravagancies of Methodism, as they appeared among the immediate followers of Whitfield and Wesley, and combining much shrewdness, wit and humour; "Columella, or the Distressed Anchorite;" a collection of political pieces under the title of "Euphrosyne;" "Eugenius, or Anecdotes of the Golden Vale;" "Plexippus, or the Aspiring Plebeian;" "The Reveries of Solitude;" "The Coalition," a dramatic piece; Sermons on various subjects; "The Farmer's Son," a moral tale; "The Invalid with the means of enjoying long life;" and "Scillities." He also published the "Life of Commodus," from Herodian, and the "Meditations of Antonius."

GRAVESANDE, WILLIAM JAMES LEA, an eminent Dutch geometrician and philosopher, was born at Bois-le-Duc, in 1688. He was bred a civilian, and practised some time at the bar with reputation; but about 1715, he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy at Leyden, where he taught the Newtonian system. He died in 1742. His principal works are, "Physices Elementa Mathematica," &c. "Matheseos Universalis Elementa," &c. "Philosophia Newtoniana Institutionis;" "Introductio ad Philosophiam Metaphysicam et Logicam continens."

Calabria, in 1664; became professor of civil and canon law at Rome; was one of the founders of the Arcadian Academy, and the early protector of Metastasio; and died in 1718. His works are numerous; and the principal one, "Origines Juris, Civilis," is said to be replete with learning.

GRAY, STEPHEN, a gentleman belonging to the Charter-house, who, early in the 18th century, distinguished himself as an experimental philosopher. He discovered the method of communicating electricity to bodies not naturally possessing it, by contact or contiguity with electric; and he projected a kind of luminous orrery, or electrical planetarium; thus leading the way to future discoveries and improvements.

GRAY, THOMAS, a celebrated English poet, was born in London, in 1716; educated at Eton, and Peter-house, Cambridge; and entered himself at the Inner Temple, with a view of studying for the bar. Becoming intimate, however, with Horace Walpole, he was easily induced to accompany him in his tour of Europe; but they parted at Reggio, and Gray returned to England in 1741. Here he occupied himself several years in laying literary schemes and plans of magnitude, which he admirably commenced, but wanted energy to mature. So slow was he to publish, that it was not until 1747, that his "Ode on a distant Prospect of Eton College" made its appearance; and it was only in consequence of the printing of a surreptitious copy, that, in 1751, he published his "Elegy, written in a Country Church-yard." He declined in the office of laureate on Cibber's death, in 1757; and the same year published his two principal odes, "On the Progress of Poesy," and "The Bard." In 1763, the duke of Grafton presented him with the professorship of modern history at Cambridge. This place was valuable, the salary being 400*l.* a year; and was the more acceptable, in consequence of its being given to him without solicitation. But though Gray published little besides his poems, he was a man of extensive acquirements in natural history, the study of ancient architecture, &c.; his correspondence places him among our best epistolary writers; and some of his posthumous pieces afford proof of his profound and varied erudition. As a poet he is energetic and harmonious, and his lyrics, though few, have been rarely, if ever, surpassed. Died, 1771.

GRAGGINI, ANTHONY FRANCIS, an Italian poet of the 16th century. He was the originator of the Della Crusca Academy; and the author of poems and tales, the latter rivalling, in purity of style, those of Boccaccio. Born, at Florence, 1503; died, 1583.

GREATOREX, THOMAS, an eminent musician, was born at North Winfield, Derbyshire, in 1758. He was a pupil of Dr. Cook; and at the establishment of the ancient concerts in 1776, he assisted in the chorusses, and continued to perform there till 1780, when he accepted the place of organist in Carlisle cathedral. In a few years after this, he went to Italy, where he studied vocal music under Santarelli, at Rome; and having made himself acquainted with all the knowledge he could gather by a professional tour to the principal cities of Italy, Germany, Switzerland, and the Netherlands, he returned to England in 1788, and established himself in London, as a teacher of music; in which he was eminently successful. In 1793, he succeeded Mr. Bates, as conductor of his majesty's concert of ancient music, and in 1819 he obtained the situation formerly held by Dr. Cooke, as organist, and master of the singing boys at Westminster Abbey. He harmonized various airs, adapted many of Handel's productions, and arranged parts for the grand orchestra with great ability. But he did not devote his attention wholly to music; mathematics, astronomy, botany, and chemistry, each occupied his mind by turns; and he was a fellow of the Royal Society. Died, 1831.

GREAVES, RICHARD, an orientalist and mathematician, was born at Colmore, Hants, in 1602; educated at Balliol college, Oxford; and chosen professor of geometry at Gresham college, in 1630. He next went to Leyden, where he studied the Arabic language under Golius; after which he travelled into the Levant, to purchase manuscripts for archbishop Laud. He also visited Egypt, and made a survey of the pyramids; and, in 1640, returned to England, when he was deprived of his Gresham professorship; but the king gave him that of astronomy, at Oxford, which he also lost on the ruin of the royal cause. While in Egypt, he had made an accurate measurement, &c. of the principal pyramids, which he gave to the world under the title of "Pyramidographia;" he also published an ingenious work, entitled "Epochæ Celebrioris;" and a "Dissertation on the Roman Foot and Denarius." Died, 1652.—His brothers, THOMAS and EDWARD, were also men of learning; the former, a good orientalist; the latter, eminent as a physician, and created a baronet by Charles II.

GRECOURT, JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH VILLART DE, a French ecclesiastic, famous as a wit and a poet, was born at Tours, in 1684. He was a general favorite in the fashionable circles of Paris, among which he threw off the restraints of his profession to reside. He excelled in epigrams, tales, sonnets, and fables, a collection of which was published in 4 vols. Died, 1743.

GREENE, MATTHEW, author of "The Spleen," a clever poem, was a native of London. He held a situation in the custom house, and is described as a man of great probity and suavity of manners. Died, 1737.

GREEN, JOHN, bishop of Lincoln, was born at Hull, in 1706; became a fellow of St. John's college, Cambridge; was elected master of Corpus Christi, in 1750; vice-chancellor in 1756; and obtained the see of Lincoln, in 1764. He wrote a treatise "On Religious Enthusiasm," &c.; and contributed to the "Athenian Letters." Died, 1779.

GREEN, VALENTINE, a celebrated engraver in mezzotint, was a native of Warwickshire, and intended for the legal profession; but he left it for the art in which bishop of Nyssa, in 372. The zeal he displayed against the Arians excited the resentment of the emperor Valens, who belonged to that sect, and he was banished; but, on the accession of Gratian, he was restored to his see. He drew up the Nicene creed at the council of Constantinople; and died in 386.

GREGORY, JAMES, an eminent mathematician and philosopher, was born at Aberdeen, in 1638. He received his education in the Marischal college of his native place, where he published, in 1683, his "Treatise on Optics," in which he imparted his invention of the reflecting telescope. About 1665, he went to Padua, where he printed a work on the "Quadrature of the Circle and Hyperbola." On his return from his travels, he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society of London; and merit procured him the mathematical chair at St. Andrew's. In 1674, he removed to Edinburgh, on being appointed to the mathematical professorship; but he held the situation only for a short time, for while showing the satellites of Jupiter to some pupils, in October 1675, he was suddenly stricken blind, and died a few days after.

GREGORY, DAVID, nephew of the preceding, and the inheritor of his abilities and his fame, was born at Aberdeen, in 1661; studied at Edinburgh; and became professor of mathematics in that university. He was afterwards elected Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, carrying his election against Halley, who was also a candidate for that situation. In 1693, he published his "Cateptra et Dioptrae Sphaericae Elementa." His demonstration of the curve, called the catenarian, appeared, in 1697, in the Philosophical Transactions; but his greatest work was published in 1702, and entitled "Astronomiae Physicae, et Geometricae Elementa." It was afterwards translated into English, in 2 vols. 8vo. Dr. Gregory died while engaged in superintending an edition of Apollonius's Conics, in 1710.

GREGORY, JOHN, M. D. a physician and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1724, at Aberdeen; studied at Edinburgh and Leyden; became professor of philosophy at Aberdeen, and afterwards professor of physic at Edinburgh; and was appointed first physician to the king for Scotland. His works are, "A Comparative View of the State and Faculties of Man, with those of the Animal World;" "Observations on the Duties and Offices of a Physician;" "Elements of the Practice of Physic;" and "A Father's Legacy to his Daughters." Died, 1773.

GREGORY, GEORGE, D. D., a divine and miscellaneous writer, was a native of Ireland, and born in 1754. With an intention of following mercantile pursuits, he was placed in a counting-house at Liverpool; and it was not till 1779, that he took orders. In 1782, he settled in London, where he obtained the curacy of Cripplegate and was chosen evening preacher at the Foundling. Having written in defence of the Addington administration, lord Sidmouth, in 1804, procured for him the living of Westham, in Essex, which he held till his decease. Among Dr. Gregory's works, are "Essays, Historical and Moral;" a "Church History," 2 vols.; "The Life of Chatterton;" "The Economy of Nature," 3 vols.; "Sermons;" "Letters on Philosophy," 2 vols.; and a Translation of "Lowth's Lectures on Hebrew Poetry," 2 vols. Died, 1808.

GREGORY, JAMES M.D. and F.R.S. was born at Aberdeen, in 1753. He was the author of "Philosophical and Literary Essays," 2 vols.; "Cullen's First Lines of the Practice of Physic, with Notes," 2 vols.; and "Conspectus Medicinæ Theoreticae," 2 vols. Died, 1821.

GREGORIE, HENRY, count, bishop of Blois, a French prelate, distinguished by his love of democracy, no less than by his inflexible integrity and active philanthropy, was born in 1750, at Vatro, near Lamoignon. In 1789, he was nominated by the clergy of his province a member of the states-general; and in the constituent assembly he distinguished himself by the boldness of his opinions relative to civil and religious liberty. He was among the first of the clergy who swore fidelity to the constitution; but during the reign of terror, when the bishop of Paris abdicated his office, and several of the clergy abjured Christianity, the bishop of Blois stood forward as the supporter of the religion of his country, undaunted by the execrations of infidel regicides, and the horrors of the blood-stained guillotine. He also opposed the accession of the first consul to the throne of France; and he, alone, objected to the obsequious address of the senate to the new sovereign. On the restoration of the Bourbons, he was excluded from the Institute, and deprived of his bishopric. He spent the remainder of his life in retirement, and died at Paris, in 1831. As a literary character, the constitutional bishop of Blois was also distinguished; among his writings are, "Essai sur l'Amélioration Politique, Physique, et Morale des Juifs;" "Mémoires en faveur des Gens de Couleur, ou Sang-mêlés de St. Domingue;" "Essai Historique sur les Libertés de l'Eglise Gallicane;" "Les Ruines de Port Royal," &c.

GREIG, SAMUEL CARLOWITZ, an eminent naval officer in the Russian service, was a native of Scotland, and first served in the navy of Great Britain; distinguishing himself at the defeat of Confans, by admiral Hawke, the taking of the Havannah, and several other engagements. After the peace of 1763, he entered into the Russian service; and, at the battle of Chio, contributed greatly, by his advice and exertions, to the destruction of the whole of the Turkish fleet. Sensible of his great professional merit, the empress promoted him to the chief command of the Russian navy, gave him an estate in Livonia, and honoured him with many other marks of her favour. Died, 1788.

GRENVILLE, GEORGE, an English statesman in the reigns of George II. and III., was younger brother of Richard Grenville, earl Temple, and the father of lord Grenville, a sketch of whose life follows the present article. He entered parliament as member for Buckinghamshire, and was distinguished for his eloquence. He successively filled the situations of treasurer of the navy, first lord of the admiralty, and first lord of the treasury. In 1763, he became chancellor of the exchequer, but, in 1765, he resigned his post to the marquis of Rockingham. His administration having been violently attacked by the press, he published "Considerations on the Commerce and Finances of England, and on the Measures taken by the Ministers," &c. in its defence. He died in 1770.

GRENVILLE, Rt. Hon. WILLIAM WYNDHAM, lord, third son of the preceding, was born in 1759. On completing his studies at Oxford, he entered one of the Inns of Court, with an intention of studying for the bar; but forming an early acquaintance with Mr. Pitt, it caused him to abandon all thoughts of the law, and seek distinction in the senate. In 1782 he accompanied earl Temple to Ireland as his secretary, and after a stay of only one year, he succeeded Mr. Burke in the office of paymaster-general of the army. He began his parliamentary career as the representative for Buckinghamshire; filled the speaker's chair six months; and then succeeded lord Sidney, as secretary for the home department. In 1790 he was raised to the peerage, and in the following year made secretary of state for foreign affairs. The revolutionary principles of that period were making rapid progress, and it appeared to Lord Grenville that a war with France was inevitable. Acting on this opinion, he refused to admit the visits of the ambassadors from the French Directory, which being contrary to the opinion of Mr. Pitt, his lordship resigned, and was succeeded in his office by Lord Dundas. He signified himself as a powerful orator, on the debate following the bill for "providing for the better security of his Majesty's person;" which had been introduced in consequence of the king having been grossly treated by the mob on his way to the Parliament-house. Lord Grenville took an active part in promoting the union with Ireland, and joined with Mr. Pitt in favourable intimations to the Catholics; and when afterwards, ministers found that there were strong reasons why those intimations could not be fulfilled, they resigned. Lord Grenville then took part with the opposition, and adhered to that party till the death of Mr. Pitt, in 1806. In the cabinet which followed that event, he was made first lord of the treasury, which office he held but for a short period; and he lost his popularity by filling, at the same time, the office of auditor. On the dissolution of the ministry, his lordship principally confined his senatorial exertions to the cause of Catholic emancipation, for which he was always a steady and consistent advocate. He was distinguished for his general literary attainments, as well as for his political knowledge, and he held the office of chancellor of the university of Oxford; to which, on his death, in 1834, the duke of Wellington was elected.

GREPPI, CHARLES, an Italian dramatist, was born at Bologna, in 1751. He quitted the profession of an advocate to write for the stage; became a zealous liberal; and held considerable offices under the Cisal-pine republic. He wrote several comedies and tragedies, besides poems. Died, 1811.

GRESHAM, Sir THOMAS, a patriotic merchant and citizen of London, the son of Sir Richard Gresham, a merchant and lord-mayor of London, was born in 1519, and educated at Cambridge. On leaving the university he was placed under his uncle, Sir John Gresham; and being designed for a mercantile life, was enrolled a member of the mercer's company. His father had been the king's agent at Antwerp; and the person who succeeded him having mismanaged the royal affairs there, Sir Thomas was sent over, in 1552, to retrieve them. This he did so effectually, that in two years he paid off a heavy loan, and raised the king's credit considerably. Elizabeth, on her accession, removed him from his office, but soon restored it, and knighted him. He now planned and erected a bourse or exchange for the merchants of London, in imitation of that of Antwerp; and in 1570 it was opened by the queen in person, who dined with the founder, and named it the Royal Exchange. Sir Thomas was also anxious to promote the interests of science; for which purpose he determined on founding a college. Having built a mansion in Bishopsgate-street, for his town residence, he directed by his will that it should be converted into habitations and lecture-rooms for seven professors or lecturers on the seven liberal sciences, who were to receive a salary out of the revenues of the Royal Exchange; but Gresham college has since been converted into the general excise office, and the lectures are now given in a room over the Exchange. This munificent patron of commerce and science also founded various alms-houses, and made many charitable bequests; and his liberality, together with the situation he held, universally procured for him the name of "the royal merchant." He died in 1579.

GRESSET, JEAN BAPTISTE LOUIS, a French poet and dramatist, born in 1709; entered the society of Jesuits, but withdrew from them at the age of twenty-six. For a long time he excited the admiration of Parisian circles, wrote some elegant poems, became a member of the Academy, and was the companion of the wits and literati of the French capital; but at length he renounced his favourite pursuits, and retired from the gay world, to enjoy the tranquillity of retirement. Died, 1777. His literary fame rests principally on his "Ver Vert;" his "Chartreuse;" and "Le Moebant."

GRETREY, ANDRÉ ERNESTE MODÈSTE, an eminent musical composer, was born, in 1744, at Leige; and such was the precocity of his talents and the sweetness of his voice, that his future fame was very early predicted. He first studied under Moreau, then went to Rome, and finally settled at Paris in 1766. He produced upwards of forty operas, of which about twenty retain possession of the stage, and two of them, "Zemire et Azor," and "Richard Cœur de Lion," have been translated, and played in London with success. Died, 1813.

GREVILLE, FULKE, lord Brooke, a patron of letters and an ingenious writer, was born in 1554, and descended from the noble families of Neville, Beauchamp, and Willoughby de Brooke. He was in great favour with Elizabeth, and was created lord Brooke by James I., who gave him Warwick castle. In 1614 he was made under-treasurer, chancellor of the exchequer, and one of the privy council. He founded a history lecture at Cambridge. This accomplished nobleman was stabbed by a servant, named Haywood, whom he had reprimanded for an insolent expression; after which the assassin committed suicide with the same weapon. This was in 1628. After his lordship's death appeared several of his poetical works, and the life of his friend Sir Philip Sidney, written by him.

GREW, NEHEMIAH, a learned physician and botanist, born at Coventry, in 1628. He was one of the first who illustrated the doctrine of the sexes of plants. Died, 1711.

GREY, Lady JANE, an illustrious female, whose accomplishments and misfortunes have rendered her an especial object of interest, was the daughter of Henry Grey, marquis of Dorset, (afterwards duke of Suffolk) by the lady Frances, daughter of Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, and Mary, younger sister of Henry VIII. She was born in 1537, at Bradgate, her father's seat in Leicestershire; and early in life gave proofs of talents of a superior order. She wrote an incomparable hand; played well on different instruments; and acquired a knowledge of the Greek, Hebrew, and Latin, as well as of the French and Italian languages. Roger Ascham has given a beautiful and affecting narrative of his interview with her at Bradgate, where he found her reading Plato's Phædon, in Greek, while the family were amusing themselves in the park. In 1551 her father was created duke of Suffolk; and at this time lady Jane Grey was much at court; where the ambitious duke of Northumberland projected a marriage between her and his son, lord Guildford Dudley, which took place at the end of May, 1553. Soon after this Edward VI. died, having been prevailed upon in his last illness to settle the crown upon the lady Jane, who reluctantly accepted the crown, and was proclaimed with great pomp. This gleam of royalty, however, was of short duration; for the pageant reign lasted but nine days. The kingdom was dissatisfied, and the nobility indignant at the presumption of Northumberland; so that Mary soon overcame her enemies, and was not backward in taking ample revenge. The duke of Northumberland was beheaded; and lady Jane and her husband were arraigned, convicted of treason, and sent to the Tower. After being confined some time, the council resolved to put these innocent victims of a parent's unprincipled ambition to death. Lord Guildford suffered first; and as he passed her window, his lady gave him her last adieu. Immediately afterwards she was executed on the same scaffold; suffering with calm resignation, and a firm attachment to the protestant religion, Feb. 12, 1554.

GREY, Dr. ZACHARY, an English divine, well known for his edition of Hudibras. He also published "Notes on Shakspeare,"

2 vols.; and an "Answer to Neale's History of the Puritans," in 3 vols. Died, 1766, aged 79.

GREY, Dr. RICHARD, a learned English divine, was born in 1693. He was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford. He obtained successively the livings of Kilnecote, Leicester, and Hinton in Northamptonshire; and a prebend in St. Paul's cathedral. His principal works are "Memoria Technica, or a new Method of Artificial Memory;" "A System of English Ecclesiastical Law;" "A new and easy Method of learning Hebrew, without Points," &c. Died, 1771.

GRIESBACH, JOHN JAMES, an eminent German theologian, born in 1745, at Butzbach, in the duchy of Hesse Darmstadt. He studied successively at Frankfurt, Tübingen, Halle, and Leipsic; became rector of the university of Jena; and ecclesiastical privy councillor to the duke of Saxe-Weimar; and died in 1812. His works, which are too numerous to particularize here, possess great erudition; but the most valuable is an edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings.

GRIFFIER, JOHN, known by the appellation of old Griffier, an eminent painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1658, and died at London in 1718. He succeeded chiefly in landscapes, and painted several views on the Thames. He also etched prints of birds and beasts. His son Robert, called the younger Griffier, was born in England, and was a good landscape painter, though not equal to his father.

GRIFFITH, ELIZABETH, a native of Wales, who jointly with her husband wrote two novels, entitled "Delicate Distress," and "The Gordian Knot," and "the Letters of Henry and Frances." She also produced several works of her sole composition, among which are, "Lady Juliana Harley;" "The Morality of Shakspeare's Drama illustrated;" and some plays. Died, 1793.

GRIMALDI. The Grimaldi family have ever been of great importance in Genoa, and many of its members are conspicuous in the history of that republic.—1. RANIERI GRIMALDI was the first Genoese who conducted the naval forces of the republic before the straits of Gibraltar. In the service of Philip the Fair of France, Grimaldi sailed to Zealand, in 1304, with sixteen Genoese galleys and twenty French ships under his command; and defeated and made prisoner the count Guy of Flanders, who commanded the enemy's fleet of eighty sail.—2. ANTONIO GRIMALDI was also a distinguished naval commander. His victories over the Catalonians and Arragonese, who had committed aggressions on the Genoese, for a long time gave the latter a decided maritime ascendancy; but at length, in 1553, the Catalonians, assisted by the Venetians, under the command of Nicholas Pisani, gave him battle, and nearly destroyed his whole fleet.—3. GIOVANNI GRIMALDI is celebrated for the victory he gained over the Venetian admiral Trevesani, on the Po, in 1431; when, in sight of Carmagnola's army, he succeeded in taking twenty-eight galleys and a great number of transports, with immense spoils.—4. and vice-legat of Avignon, was eminent both as a naval commander and as a zealous extirpator of heresy from the Romish church. At the battle of Lepanto, in 1571, though a bishop at the time, he is said to have distinguished himself by his skill and courage.—G. GERONIMO GRIMALDI, born in 1597, was sent by Urban VIII. as nuncio to Germany and France; and the services he rendered the Roman court were rewarded, in 1643, by a cardinal's hat. His whole career was highly honourable. He was bishop of Aix, and endeavoured to reform the manners of the clergy in his diocese, by establishing an ecclesiastical seminary; he also founded an hospital for the poor, and annually distributed 100,000 livres of his vast property in alms. He died at Aix, in 1668, aged 69.

GRIMALDI, GIOVANNI, an eminent painter, also called Bolognese, was born at Bologna, in 1606. He studied under Annibal Caracci, to whom he was related; and became distinguished chiefly as a landscape painter, though he was also employed on historical subjects, particularly in the Vatican. Nor was he merely a painter; as an architect he was greatly distinguished, and as an engraver also his merit was conspicuous. Cardinal Mazarin invited him to Paris, where he enjoyed a pension, and was much noticed by Louis XIII. He died at Rome in 1680.

GRIMALDI, FRANCESCO MARIA, a learned Jesuit and an eminent mathematician, was born at Bologna, in 1613. He assisted Riccioli in his scientific labours; and was the author of "Physico-mathesis de Lumine Coloribus et Iride, aliisque annexis," &c. Died, 1663.

GRIMALDI, WILLIAM, (marquis GRIMALDI, of Genoa), was born, in 1785, in Westminster, and in early life entered into the service of the East India company, but afterwards held a situation in the War-office at the Horse-guards. In 1828 he travelled in search of his hereditary rights, and discovered that he was sole heir of the late marquis of Grimaldi; but he never enjoyed any advantage from it, being attacked by a fit of apoplexy while at his prayers.

GRIMALDI, JOSEPH, an unrivalled pantomimic clown, born in 1779, was the son of Signior Grimaldi, an artiste, noted for his humour and eccentricities, who by day followed the profession of a dentist, and by night that of ballet-master at Drury-lane. For a period of forty years "Grimaldi the clown" delighted the laughter-loving audiences of Drury-lane, Covent-garden, and Sadler's Wells, with a rich and (paradoxical as the term may seem) intellectual species of buffoonery, peculiarly his own—portraying to the life all that is grotesque in manners, or droll in human action.—Died, 1837.

GRIMANI, DOMINICK, a cardinal, was born, in 1460, at Venice, of which city his father was doge. The son was, in consequence, employed in many negotiations; and in 1493 was raised to the cardinal dignity, by Alexander VI., as a reward for his filial piety in offering to become a prisoner instead of his father, who had fallen under popular displeasure, by having been defeated in an action with the Turks. Died, 1523.

GRIMBALD, ST., a learned ecclesiastic of the 9th century, who was invited over from Flanders by Alfred the Great. He brought with him several learned associates, and settled at Oxford; but disputes arising between the strangers and the students before placed there, he retired to a monastery, founded by Alfred, at Winchester. It is supposed that he was skilful as an architect, and that the crypt of St. Peter's church, Oxford, is his work.

GRIMM, FREDERIC MELCHIOR, baron de, counsellor of state of the Russian empire, and a man of letters, was born, in 1723, at Ratisbon. Going to Paris, he became principal secretary to the duke of Orleans, and acquainted with Rousseau and other Parisian philosophers; an account of whose writings, friendships, disputes, &c., has been preserved in his "Correspondence;" which extraordinary medley, after a lapse of thirty years, was published in 16 vols. In 1776, being appointed envoy from the duke of Saxe-Gotha to the French court, he was honoured with the title of baron, and invested with several orders. On the revolution breaking out, he retired to the court of Gotha, where he found a safe asylum. In 1795, the empress of Russia made him her minister plenipotentiary to the states of Lower Saxony; and he was confirmed in that post by Paul I., and retained it till ill health obliged him to relinquish it. He then returned to Gotha, where he died, in 1807.

GRIMOARD, count PHILIP DE, a French diplomatist, general, and author, descended from an ancient family, one of whose members was pope Urban V. Louis XVI. entrusted him with a negotiation in Holland; and on his return he formed the plans, offensive and defensive, for the campaign of 1792. The fall of the king interrupted his career, and he retired to private life, devoting himself to literature. He wrote "Essai Theorique et Pratique sur les Batailles;" "Recherches sur la Force de l'Armée Française;" &c.; and "Tableau Historique de la Guerre de la Revolution de France," 1806, in conjunction with general Servan; of which work only 3 vols. were published, when it was suppressed by order of Buonaparte. Died, 1815.

GRIMSTON, SIR HARBOTTLE, an eminent English lawyer in the time of Cromwell, was born in Essex, about 1564. He studied in Lincoln's Inn; and in 1636 became recorder of Colchester; for which place he was also returned to parliament in 1640. He acted for some time in opposition to the king, but disapproved of the violent measures to which his party had recourse, and after the king's death he went abroad. In 1660 he was chosen speaker of what was called "The healing parliament;" and he was one of the commissioners who waited on Charles II. at Breda; on whose restoration he was made master of the rolls. He published the Reports of Sir George Croke, and died in 1683.

berland, in 1519. In 1539 he was chosen master of Pembroke-hall, and the same year preferred to the see of London; and in 1570 he was translated to York; and in 1575 to Canterbury. Two years afterwards he was suspended from his archiepiscopal functions, for refusing to obey queen Elizabeth's order to suppress prophesying, or associations of the clergy to expound the scriptures. At length his sequestration was taken off, though he never completely recovered the royal favour. He contributed to Fox's Acts and Monuments, and founded the celebrated school of St. Bee's, in Cumberland. He was a man of great learning, piety, and moderation, and an ornament to the church of which he was a prelate. Died, 1583.

GRISAUNT, WILLIAM, an English physician, astronomer, and mathematician, in the 14th century. He was suspected of magic, and retired to France, where he dedicated himself to the study of medicine. His son became pope Urban V.

GROCVN, WILLIAM, a distinguished classical scholar, born at Bristol, in 1443, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He was the friend of dean Colet, the tutor of Erasmus, and god-father to Lilly the grammarian. A Latin epistle of his to Aldus Manutius is prefixed to Linaere's translation of Proclus de Sphæra.

GROHMANN, JOHN GODFREY, a native of Upper Lusatia, and a lecturer on philosophy at the university of Leipzig. As a compiler and translator, particularly of works relating to the fine arts, he was both able and industrious. Among his labours are—"A new Historico-Biographical Dictionary," 7 vols.; "An abridged Dictionary of the Fine Arts," 2 vols.; "Vestiges of Egyptian Architecture;" "A Dictionary of Civil Architecture," &c. Died, 1805.

GROLLIER, JOHN, a patron of learned men, was born at Lyons, in 1479. He was grand treasurer to Francis I., who sent him on an embassy to Rome, where he employed the Alduses to print some classics for him. He also made a large collection of valuable books; and settled pensions on many eminent scholars. Died, 1565.

GRONOV, or GRONOVIUS, JOHN FREDERIC, an erudite writer, born at Hamburg, in 1611. He studied at Leipsic and Jena; travelled through France, Holland, and England; and became professor of belles-lettres at Leyden, where he died in 1671. With extensive knowledge he combined indefatigable industry, a modest opinion of his own merit, and amiable manners. He published a number of classics, with valuable notes and improved readings; of which "Commentarius de Sestercia," and his edition of Hugo Grotius's work, "De Jure Belli et Pacis," will serve as instances.

GRONOVIUS, JAMES, son of the preceding, was born at Deventer, in 1645. He was educated entirely under his father, whom he surpassed in learning, though he fell short of him in modesty and liberality. After studying the civil law, he visited England, where he resided some months in both universities; and, on his return to Leyden, published an edition of Macrobius, and another of Polybius. In 1672 he went to France, and from thence to Italy, where the grand duke of Tuscany gave him a pension, and obtained for him a professorship at Pisa. This he held two years, and then returned to Leyden; and was appointed to the professorship of belles-lettres and geography in that university. His acquirements in criticism and philology were very extensive; he compiled the valuable "Thesaurus Antiquatum Græcorum," 13 vols. folio; and edited a variety of classics. Died, 1716.

GROSE, FRANCIS, an eminent English antiquary, was born in 1731, at Richmond, in Surrey. His father was a Jeweller, and left him a good fortune, which he soon spent, and became adjutant and pay-master in the Surrey militia. He was remarkable for his wit and humour, and of a generous disposition; but his imprudences involved him in great difficulties; to clear himself from which, he published his "Views of Antiquities in England and Wales," 8 vols. 4to. The success of this elegant work induced him to make a tour of Scotland with the same object; and before he had completed this publication, he went to Ireland, with the design of surveying and sketching the antiquities of that kingdom, but while thus employed he died, at Dublin, in 1791. Besides his "Antiquities," he published a "Treatise on Ancient Armour and Weapons;" "Military Antiquities," and other works.

GROSSETESTE, or GROSTHEAD, ROBERT, an English prelate, was born at Stradbroke, in Suffolk, about 1173, and died in 1263. His "Opuscula Varia" were published at Venice in 1514, and his "Compendium Sphære Mundi" in 1508. Some of his discourses and letters are extant.

GROSLEY, PIERRE JEAN, a French writer, born at Troyes, in 1718. He was educated for the legal profession, but declined it for the belles-lettres. He was the author of many works; among which are, "Essais Historiques sur la Champagne," and "Observations sur l'Angleterre," 2 vols. Died, 1785.

GROSSMANN, GUSTAVUS FREDERIC WILLIAM, a celebrated actor and dramatist, born at Berlin, in 1746. He was originally employed in some subordinate diplomatic situations at Warsaw and Berlin; but having become acquainted with Lessing at the latter place, an accidental hint from that celebrated writer induced him to try his fortune as a dramatist; and he wrote several successful plays. He afterwards became an actor and manager; manifesting considerable talents, and effecting many reformations in the German stage; but his bad success as a manager led to habits of intemperance, and involved him in great distress. Died, 1796.

GROTIUS, or DE GROOT, HUGO, an eminent scholar and statesman, was born at Delft, in Holland, in 1583. He was descended from a noble family, received an excellent education, and gave early manifestations of surprising talents. In 1599 he commenced his career as a legal advocate, and also as an author; and he was successively appointed historiographer, advocate-general of Holland and Zealand, a member of the states-general, and envoy to England. Hitherto his life had been marked by splendour, but now it began to be clouded by the part which he took in the Arminian controversy. In 1613 he became syndic, or pensioner, of Rotterdam; and, declaring himself on the side of Barneveldt, he supported him, and the cause of the Arminians, by his pen and influence. But he narrowly escaped the fate of Barneveldt, who suffered on the scaffold, and received sentence of imprisonment for life in the fortress of Louvestein. From this, however, at the expiration of eighteen months, which he had employed in writing his celebrated "Treatise on the Truth of the Christian Religion," he succeeded in escaping. This was effected by the management of his wife, who contrived to have him carried out of the castle in a chest that had been used for the conveyance of books and linen. Grotius at first sought an asylum in France; and it was during his residence there that he composed his great work, "De Jure Belli et Pacis." After an absence of twelve years, he returned to his native country, relying on the favour of Frederic Henry, prince of Orange, who had written him a sympathizing letter. But, by the influence of his enemies, he was condemned to perpetual banishment. He passed the remnant of his life in the diplomatic service of Sweden, and died, at Rostock, in 1645. With the talents of the most able statesman, Hugo Grotius united deep and extensive learning. He was a profound theologian; a distinguished scholar; an acute philosopher; a profound jurist, and an erudite historian. Among his works not mentioned above, may be noticed, "De Antiquitate Reipublice Bataviae;" "Institutiones of the Laws of Holland;" a "History of the Goths," &c.

GROTO, LEWIS, an Italian poet, surnamed Il Cicco, was born at Adria, in 1541. He was blind from his infancy; notwithstanding which he displayed an uncommon facility for learning, and at the age of fourteen delivered public orations at Venice. He died in 1585, having a short time before performed the part of Œdipus in a play at Vicenza, with great reputation.

GROVE, HENRY, a dissenting minister, born at Taunton, Somersetshire, in 1683. He was the author of several religious works; among which are "An Essay towards a Demonstration of the Soul's Immortality;" "The Evidence of Our Saviour's Resurrection;" "Wisdom the first spring of Action in the Deity," &c. Died, 1738.

GRUBENMANN, JOHN ULRIC, and JOHN, two Swiss mechanics, who having been brought up as carpenters, devoted their entire attention to the construction of wooden bridges without the support of piers. The most extraordinary of these were at Reichenau, Wettingen, and Schaffhausen; the latter, over the Rhine, being nearly 400 feet long. During the campaign of 1799 they were all destroyed by the French. The ingenious builders died about the end of the 18th century.

GRYPHIUS, SEBASTIAN, a printer in the 16th century, who settled at Lyons, and was distinguished for the beauty of his Greek and Hebrew types. Died, 1536.

GRYPHIUS, ANDREW, a celebrated German dramatist, was born at Glogau, in 1616. He was called the Cornellie of Germany, and his tragedies acquired great popularity. He also wrote a keen satire on the old comedies of his countrymen, and produced some smart epigrams. Died, 1664.

GRYPHIUS, CHRISTIAN, son of the preceding, was born in 1649; became professor of rhetoric at Breslaw, principal of Magdalen college, and librarian of the university. Died, 1708.

GUA, JOHN PAUL DE, a French ecclesiastic, was born in Languedoc, in 1712. He became prior of St. George de Vigors, a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and of the Royal Society of London. He laid the plan of the Encyclopædia, and wrote a number of mathematical papers in the Memoirs of the Academy; besides which he translated some English works into French. Died, 1783.

GUALDO PRIORATO, GALESSO, an Italian historian, born at Vicenza, in 1606; author of a "History of the Troubles in France;" an "Account of the Administration of Cardinal Mazarin," and his "Life;" a "History of the Wars of the Emperors Ferdinand II. and III." &c. Died, 1678.

GUARINI, GUARINO, a native of Verona, descended of an illustrious family, and celebrated as having been the first who taught Greek after the restoration of letters in Europe. Died, 1460.

GUARINI, BATTISTA, a celebrated Italian poet, born at Ferrara, in 1537. He was secretary to Alphonso, duke of Ferrara; next, to Ferdinand de Medici, grand duke of Tuscany; and, subsequently, to the duke of Urbino. He was well acquainted with polite literature; wrote several admired poems; but his chief composition is his pastoral drama, entitled "Il Pastor Fido." Died, 1613.

GUAY-TROUIN, RENÉ DU, a French naval officer, was born at St. Maloes, in 1673. He commanded a ship at the age of eighteen, and had great success on the coast of Ireland, but at last fell into the hands of some English cruisers, and was carried into Plymouth; from whence he made his escape, and in a short time renewed his depredations in the British Channel, and also on the coast of Spain. In 1709 he was ennobled, and two years afterwards he made himself master of Rio Janeiro. Died, 1736.

GUDIN DE LA BRENELLERIE, PAUL PHILIP, a French dramatist, and miscellaneous writer, born in 1736. Among his works are "Observations on Good Manners;" "On the Progress of the Arts under Louis XV.;" "The Conquest of Naples," 3 vols.; several tragedies, poems, &c. Died, 1812.

GUELF, or GUELPHS (from the Italian Guel and the German Welf), the name of a celebrated family, which, in the 11th century, was transplanted from Italy to Germany, where it became the ruling race of several countries. The family still continues in the two lines of Brunswick—the royal in England, and the ducal in Germany. The memory of this ancient name has lately been revived by the foundation of the Hanoverian Guelphic order.

GUERCINO (properly GIANFRANCESCO BARNIERI, but surnamed Guercino da Cento from his aquinting), was a celebrated painter, born at Cento, near Bologna, in 1590. He studied under Cremonini and Gennari; but adopted two or three styles in succession, and afterwards perfected himself in the school of Lodovico Caracci. He executed 106 altar-pieces for churches, and 144 historical pieces, besides numerous performances in fresco; in short, such was the uncommon rapidity of his pencil, that, having been requested by some monks, on the eve of a festival, to paint Jehovah for the grand altar, he finished the picture in one night by torch light. The duke of Mantua conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and several sovereigns endeavoured, in vain, to draw him into their service. He died in 1666, very rich, notwithstanding he had expended large sums in building chapels, founding hospitals, and other acts of charity and devotion.

GUERICKE, OTTO VON, a distinguished experimental philosopher, was born, 1602; studied at Leipzig, Jena, and Leyden; travelled in France and England; and settled at Magdeburgh, where he eventually became burgomaster. He invented the air-pump, and in 1634 made the first public experiments with his machine, at the diet at Ratisbon, before the emperor Ferdinand III. several electors, and other estates of the empire. The pressure of the atmosphere he exhibited by means of two large hollow hemispheres of copper and brass, an ell in diameter. These being fitted closely together, the air contained in the hollow sphere thus formed was exhausted by means of an air-pump. Gericke then harnessed horses to strong rings, attached to the hemispheres, and they attempted in vain to separate them. The number of the horses was increased to thirty without success; but an additional number at length made them separate with a loud report. His electrical and astronomical knowledge also was considerable. Died, 1666.

GUERRERO, VICENTE, elected president of the United Mexican States, in 1829, was by birth a Creole. At the very commencement of the revolution in Mexico he took arms against the royalists, and never ceased to occupy a prominent position in the affairs of that country. On repeated occasions, from 1819 to 1828, general Guerrero became the rallying point of the liberal or popular party, the Yorkinos, and was repeatedly called into active service in his military capacity. Having been successful in various contests with the aristocratical party, he at length, in 1829, was elected to the presidency. The expedition of Barradas soon gave employment to the new government; and the better to enable the president to meet the exigency, he was invested with extraordinary powers; but after the victory over the Spanish troops, and when the invading expedition was destroyed, Guerrero evinced an unwillingness to relinquish the dictatorship, which became the pretext of another revolution; and Bustamante, the vice-president, assumed the reins of government. Guerrero, however, was not long idle: in September, 1830, he collected a large force at Valladolid, and established a form of government in opposition to that of Bustamante, and the whole country was agitated by troops in arms. But his career was almost run. In February, 1831, he was taken, and shot.

GUEVARA, ANTHONY DE, a Spanish writer, and prelate, was born at Alaba; and appointed preacher and historiographer to Charles V. He was also made bishop of Guadix, and afterwards of Mondoñedo in Galicia. He wrote "The Dial of Princes; or the Life of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus;" a kind of moral romance.

GUEVARA, LOUIS VÉLÉZ DE LAS DUENAS Y, a Spanish dramatist and romance writer, was born, in 1574, at Ecija, in Andalusia. He was an advocate, and by his flashes of wit often drew forth peals of laughter from the court. He was a great favourite of Philip IV. who, knowing his peculiar talent, encouraged him to write for the stage. Several of his comedies are excellent; but the work which especially established the fame of Guevara was his "Diablo Cojuelo," an admirable romance, which afforded the idea of Le Sage's famous "Diable Boiteux." Many of his witty sayings have become familiar to the people, and to this day are often heard as proverbs in Spain. Died, 1646.

GUIBERT, JACQUES ANTOINE HYPOLITE, count de, a celebrated French tactician, was born at Montauban, in 1743. He studied the military art under his father, with whom he served in the German war; and in the expedition to Corsica, he was made a colonel, with the cross of St. Louis. On his return to France, he published his "Essai Générale de Tactique," which work being diametrically opposed to Foillard's, excited a vehement controversy. He was also the author of some tragedies; historical eulogies on marshal Catinat, the chancellor de l'Hôpital, and Frederic the Great; "Travels in Germany;" and "Travels in Switzerland." Died, 1790.

GUICCIARDINI, FRANCIS, an Italian historian, was born at Florence, in 1482. He was bred to the law, and appointed professor of jurisprudence in his native city. Politics, however, occupied the rest of his life. In 1512 he was sent ambassador, on the part of the republic, to the Spanish court at Bruges; for his services in which mission he was received with great honour by his countrymen; and Leo X. constituted him advocate of the consistory. In 1516, he was made governor of Modena and Reggio, and next of Parma, where he drove out the French, and confirmed the inhabitants in their obedience. He was afterwards appointed to the government of Modena, and the presidency of the Romagna; and in 1531, he was made governor of Bologna, where he assisted at the coronation of Charles V. After a life of great activity, he returned to his native city, and there began his great work on the "History of Italy during his own Time," which he had nearly completed at the time of his death, in 1540. He was a man of great gravity of temper and demeanour, and displayed much political sagacity and love of justice. When the courtiers of Charles V. once complained of the preference he gave to Guicciardini and other Florentines, he replied, "I can make a hundred Spanish grandees in a minute, but I cannot make one Guicciardini in a hundred years."

GUEROULT, PIERRE CLAUDE BERNARD, a learned Frenchman, born at Rouen, in 1745. He was the author of "La Journée de Marathon," "Histoire Naturelle des Animaux de l'Île," &c. He was director of the Normal school at Paris, from which he retired in 1815, and died in 1831.

GUIDI, ALESSANDRO, an Italian lyric poet, was born at Pavia, about 1650; and died in 1712. He was patronized by Christina, the abdicated queen of Sweden, who allowed him apartments in her palace.

GUIDO RENI, one of the most eminent among the Italian painters, was born at Bologna, in 1575. Combining the beauties of Albert Durer and Caravaggio with the school of Caracci, he soon gave his teachers occasion to admire his talents, and is even said to have excited the jealousy of Annibal Caracci. He was honoured, caressed, and employed by the great, and might have accumulated great wealth; but, to satisfy an unfortunate passion for gambling, he often sold his paintings at any price, and became involved in pecuniary embarrassments, so that, in 1642, he died in a state of poverty and dejection. Guido imitated the beautiful in nature, and was pre-eminently the painter of youth and female loveliness.

GUIDO, CAONACCI, an historical painter, born at Bologna in 1600, and a disciple of Guido Reni. He died in 1680.

GUIGUES, JOSEPH DE, born at Pontoise, in 1721, was distinguished for his knowledge of the Oriental languages, and obtained the appointment of royal interpreter in 1745. He was the author of "Histoire Générale des Huns, des Turcs, des Moguls, et des autres Tartares Occidentaux," 8 vols. 4to., and many other able works, but was reduced to poverty by the revolution, and died at Paris, in 1800.

GUILIM, JOHN, the reputed author of the celebrated work, entitled, "The Display of Heraldry," which was in reality written by Dr. Barkham, was born about 1565, and died in 1621. He was rouge croix pursuivant at arms.

GUILLEMEAU, JAMES, an eminent French surgeon, who became the professional attendant of Charles IX. and Henry IV., and died at Paris, in 1609.

GUILLEMINOT, a native of Belgium, an able military officer, who fought in the insurgent army against the Austrians, in 1790; but, at the defection of Dumouriez, having been made prisoner, he found an asylum in the ranks of the French army, and became a valuable officer under Bonaparte. In 1814, the king made him a knight of St. Louis, and an officer of the legion of honour.

GUILLOTIN, JOSEPH IGNATIUS, a French physician who, during the revolution, proposed the use of the guillotine, an instrument made after the fashion of the maiden, which was used on the Scottish borders in the 16th century. Mons. Guillotin practised medicine in Paris many years, and was much respected for his general conduct. He was a member of the National Assembly, where his political principles were marked by moderation; and his introduction of this instrument of death was from a humane motive;—that of rendering capital punishment less painful, by decapitation. He was not, as has been reported, the victim of his own contrivance, though greatly annoyed by its being called by his name. He died, in peaceful retirement, in 1814.

GUISCARDI, CHARLES GOTTLIEB, an able writer on military tactics, was a native of Magdeburg. He entered into the service of Holland, from which he removed into that of Prussia, where Frederic the Great honoured him with the appellation of Quintus Icilius, the commander of Cæsar's tenth legion, in compliment to his military knowledge. His works are "Mémoires Militaires, sur les Grecs, et les Romains," and "Mémoires critiques et historiques sur plusieurs points d'Antiquités Militaires." Died, 1778.

GUIRAN, GALLIARD, counsellor of state to the prince of Orange in the 17th century; author of an "Historical and Chronological Register of the Seneschals of Nîmes and Beaucaire." Died, 1690.

GUISE, FRANCIS OF LORRAINE, duke of, an illustrious warrior of France, but as ambitious and bigotted as he was brave. He was born in 1519; distinguished himself by his bravery at the siege of Boulogne, the defence of Metz, the conquest of Calais, &c.; and lost his life by assassination, in 1563.

GUISE, CHARLES OF, usually called the CARDINAL OF LORRAINE, was the minister of Francis II. and Charles IX. He is notorious for his violent and intolerant spirit, and his memory will ever be held in execration for the furious persecution he promoted against the Protestants of France. Born, 1538; died 1574.

GUISE, HENRY OF LORRAINE, eldest son of Francis, duke of Guise, was born in 1550. He is memorable in the history of France for his bravery; but he was of a turbulent, ambitious, and cruel disposition. After having distinguished himself in Hungary, by his valour against the Turks, he placed himself at the head of an armed band, which he called the League, under the pretext of defending the Roman Catholic religion, Henry III. the king, and the state, against the designs of the Huguenots, or French Protestants. This plan was formed by his brother, the cardinal; and the Huguenots were massacred by thousands. But their violence did not stop here. Guise now became an open rebel; he entered Paris against the king's express order, and put to the sword all who opposed him; and the streets being barricaded to prevent his progress, this fatal day is called in French history, "the day of the barricades." The king escaped to Blois, and convened an assembly of the states; and the duke of Guise had the boldness to appear there to a summons sent him for that purpose. A forced reconciliation then took place between them, by the advice of this assembly; but it being afterwards discovered that Guise had formed a plan to dethrone the king, the latter, wanting the resolution to bring him to a trial, procured his assassination as he was entering the council chamber, Dec. 23, 1554.

GUISE, HENRY II. duke of LORRAINE, a grandson of the preceding, was born in 1614. He is described as prodigal and brave, addicted equally to love and war. After having joined in the rebellion of the count de Soissons, and received a pardon, he was induced to join the revolted Neapolitans; and, at their head, displayed great gallantry; but he at length fell into the hands of the Spaniards. Died, 1684.

GUISE, WILLIAM, an English divine, was born near Gloucester, in 1663, and educated at Oriel and All Soul's colleges, Oxford. He published, with a commentary, Dr. Bernard's work, entitled, "Missa pars ordinis primi Zselai, Tituli septem." 4to.; and a tract "De Victimæ Humanæ." Died, 1684. His son was the celebrated general Guise, who left his collection of paintings to Christ-church, Oxford. He died in 1763.

GUITON, JOHN, a citizen of Rochelle, who was chosen mayor of the town when it was besieged by Cardinal Richelieu, in 1637. He refused the post, unless permitted to have a poniard to stab the first who should offer to surrender. Being told that famine had carried off many of the inhabitants, he answered, "It matters not, provided there is one left to shut the gates."

GUIZOT, ELIZABETH CHARLOTTE PAULINE, a French lady, whose works written for the instruction of youth have given her a deserved celebrity, was born at Paris, in 1773. Her father died when she was child, and her family having been brought to distress by the revolutionary changes, she was induced to attempt authorship, in order to provide for their exigencies. She accordingly produced the novels, entitled "Les Contradictions." and "La Chapelle d'Ayton." she also wrote in the public journals; and her articles on manners, the drama, &c., attracted considerable attention. At length she became acquainted with M. Guizot, a gentleman of superior talent, and since distinguished also as a statesman; in 1813 they were married; and she subsequently acquired no small share of literary distinction for her "L'Ecolier ou Raoul et Victor." 4 vols.; "Nouveaux Contes." and "Lettres de Famille sur l'Education Domestique." Died, 1827.

GULDENSTADT, JOHN ANTHONY, a native of Riga, who became professor of natural history at St. Petersburg. He spent three years in travelling through Tartary, on a scientific tour, and on his return published the result of his researches. Died, 1781.

GUNDLING, NICHOLAS JEROME, a German philosopher, born in 1671. He became successively professor of philosophy, of rhetoric, and of the law of nature and nations, at Halle; he was also privy counsellor to the king of Prussia. Among his numerous works are "The Road to Truth." 3 vols.; "A History of Moral Philosophy." "Otia." a miscellaneous collection of essays, &c. Died, 1729.

GUNDULF, bishop of Rochester, was one of the Norman ecclesiastics brought over by William the Conqueror. He was a celebrated architect; and built that part of the Tower of London called the White Tower. He also erected Rochester castle, and rebuilt the cathedral. Died, 1108.

GUNNER, JOHN EARNEST, bishop of Drontheim, was born at Christians, in Norway, in 1718. He founded the Royal Norwegian Society, in the Transactions of which he published several valuable papers on natural history. On account of his zeal for botany, Linnæus gave his name to a plant in his system. He published "Flora Norvegica." and died in 1773.

GUNNING, PETER, a learned and magnificent English prelate, was born at Hoo, in Kent, in 1613. He was a principal manager on the side of episcopacy in the Savoy conference; and, in 1670, was made bishop of Chichester; from which see he was translated, in 1674, to Ely, where he died in 1684.

GUNTER, EDMUND, a mathematician, was born in Herefordshire, in 1581. He was educated at Westminster school; from whence he went to Christ-church, Oxford. He was promoted to the professorship of astronomy in Gresham college, where he died in 1626. He invented a portable quadrant, for astronomical purposes; and the famous "rule of proportion," which, in its mechanical form is styled "Gunter's scale." He also discovered the variation of the magnetic needle. His works were collected into one volume, and have been repeatedly published. Died, 1626.

GUSTAVUS I., king of Sweden, known by the name of GUSTAVUS VASA, was born in 1496. Having delivered Sweden from the Danish yoke, he was, in 1523, elected king of that country; reigned gloriously for thirty-seven years; and died in 1540.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS, king of Sweden, the grandson of Gustavus Vasa, was born at Stockholm in 1593, and ascended the throne in 1611. He brought the war in which his country was then involved with Denmark, Russia, and Poland, to a successful issue; and afterwards led an army of sixty thousand men into Germany, for the noble purpose of rescuing the protestants from the tyranny of the house of Austria. He penetrated from the Vistula to the Danube, and twice defeated the celebrated Tilly. This great prince fell in the battle fought on the plains of Lutzen, in 1632. He was humane, pious, and charitable; unostentatious in his manners, moderate in his conduct, and possessed a vigorous understanding.

GUSTAVUS III., king of Sweden, was the son of Adolphus Frederic, and Louisa Ulrica, sister of Frederic II., king of Prussia. He was born in 1746, and succeeded his father in 1771. He abolished the practice of torture, and introduced other good regulations in the administration of justice. He also formed a college of commerce, and reformed his army and navy. In 1788 he was involved in a war with Russia, which power was assisted by Denmark. Gustavus headed his army himself, and stormed the defences of Frederickshall, where he took and destroyed a great number of vessels. On the breaking out of the French revolution, a coalition was formed between the northern powers and Spain, by which it was agreed that Gustavus should march against France at the head of a considerable army; but while preparations were making, he was shot at a masquerade by Ankarstroom, a disbanded officer of the army, March 15, 1793, and died on the 30th.

GUTTENBERG, or GUTTENBERG, JOHN, usually called the inventor of printing, was born at Mentz, in 1400. In 1427 he resided at Straaburg, as a merchant; but returned to Mentz in 1430. About 1438, Guttenberg made use of moveable types of wood; and, in 1450, formed a co-partnership with John Faust, or Fast, a rich goldsmith, who furnished money to establish a press, in which the Latin Bible was first printed. Guttenberg, whose printing-office remained in Mentz till 1463, died in 1468.

GUTHRIE, WILLIAM, an indefatigable writer, was born at Brechin, Scotland, in 1708; and after receiving his education at King's college, Aberdeen, settled in London as an author. Among the various works which bear this author's name, are, a "History of England," 3 vols.; folio; a "History of Scotland," 10 vols.; an "Universal History," 13 vols.; the "Geographical Grammar;" "The Friends," a novel; "Remarks on English Tragedy;" also a translation of Quintilian, 3 vols., and Cicero's Offices. Died, 1770.

GUTCH, JOHN, an antiquarian writer, who was registrar of the university of Oxford, rector of St. Clement's, and chaplain of All Souls' college. He published "Collectanea Curiosa," from the MSS. of archbishop Sancroft, 3 vols.; "The History and Antiquities of the Colleges, &c., from MSS. in the Bodleian library, written by Anthony Wood;" "The Antiquities and Annals of the University," &c. Died, 1631, aged 80.

GUY, THOMAS, the founder of Guy's hospital, was the son of a lighterman of Horsleydown, and born in 1644. He was brought up to the business of a bookseller, and had a lucrative trade by dealing largely in the importation of Bibles from Holland, and afterwards contracting with Oxford for those printed at that university; but his principal gains arose from the disreputable purchase of seaman's prize tickets, and jobbing in South sea stock. By these means, joined to most penurious habits, he amassed a fortune of nearly half a million sterling, of which he spent about 200,000*l.* in building and endowing the hospital, in Southwark, which bears his name. He also erected almshouses at Tamworth, and made bequests to Christ's hospital and various other charities; besides leaving 50,000*l.* to be divided among those who could prove any degree of relationship to him. He died in 1726, aged 80.

GUYON, JEAN MARIE BOUVIERE DE LA MOTHE, a French lady, celebrated as a religious enthusiast, was born at Montargis, in 1648, and became a widow, with three children, at the age of twenty-eight. Having a strong predilection for the practice of a kind of mystical devotion, she relinquished the care of her children to others, and gave up a part of her fortune for their maintenance, while she professed to be wholly guided by "divine impulses," thereby implying a complete renunciation of self, the silence of the soul, and the annihilation of all earthly cares and emotions—which has since obtained the name of quietism. Misled by the ardour of her zeal and a heated imagination, she imagined that heaven destined her for an extraordinary mission. Thus for several years she wandered from place to place, preaching her doctrines, and making converts; till her fame reaching Paris, and calumny having been busy with her character, she was by the king's order shut up in a convent. Through the intercession of madame de Maintenon, however, she soon obtained her liberty; and such were the attractions of her eloquence, and the tenderness and apparent fervour of her piety, that she not only made proselytes of many ladies of the court, but enlisted the illustrious Fenelon in her cause. Her doctrines and conduct at length excited the resentment of Bossuet and other rigid ecclesiastics, and she was compelled to sign a recantation. But, again pursuing the same career in Paris, she was confined in the Bastille. On being liberated, in 1702, she retired to Blois, and there passed the remainder of her life in the private exercise of "quietism." Her works, which are very voluminous, are now scarcely remembered, except the one entitled "The Song of Songs interpreted according to its mystical sense." Died, 1719.

GUYON, MARIE CLAUDE, a priest of the Oratory at Paris; author of a "History of the Amazons;" a "History of Empires and Republics," 12 vols.; a "History of the Indies," 3 vols., &c. Born, 1701; died, 1771.

GUY, PETER AUGUSTINE, a French merchant, born at Marseilles, in 1720; whose love of letters induced him, when trading to the Levant, to make frequent excursions into Greece, with Homer in his hand, for the purpose of making his comments on the spot, and tracing the vestiges of its ancient glories. The fruit of his researches appeared in a work, entitled, "Voyage Littéraire de la Grèce." He also wrote "Relation Abrégée de les Voyages en Italie et dans le Nord."

GUYTON DE MORVEAU, LOUIS BERNARD, an eminent French chemist, was the son of a lawyer at Dijon, where he was born in 1737. He was bred to the bar, and became advocate-general to the parliament of his native city; but he applied chiefly to natural philosophy and chemistry, in which latter science he made many discoveries. In 1777 he was appointed to examine the coal-mines of Burgundy, on which he made a mineralogical tour of that province; and in the course of these enquiries he discovered a rich lead-mine. Soon after this he was engaged in writing the articles on chemistry in the Encyclopédie Méthodique; in 1782 he published his new Chemical Nomenclature; paid great attention for a time to the science of aerostation; and by various discoveries materially promoted the advance of science. He figured among the earliest and most violent of the revolutionists; bore a decided enmity to the kingly authority and the priesthood; became successively a member of the Legislative Assembly, the Convention, the Committee of Public Safety, and the Council of Five Hundred; was made a member of the legation of honour, and a baron of the empire, by Buonaparte; and was director of the Polytechnic school, and administrator of the mint. Besides his share in the "Encyclopædie Methodique," he was one of the principal editors of the "Annals of Chemistry," and wrote some other chemical works. Died, 1816.

GWILYM, DAVID AP, a British bard, known by the name of David of Glamorgan, and styled the Welch Ovid, was born in 1340, in the county of Cardigan. He was one of the itinerant bards, and became steward and tutor in the family of Ivor Hael, where he died, in 1400. His poems were published in 1792, and are said, by those who profess to be judges, to be unsurpassed by any of his bardic successors.

GWINNE, MATTHEW, was a physician, of Welsh descent, but born in London. After taking his degrees at Oxford, he commenced practice there; but on the settlement of Gresham college, he was chosen professor of physic, and in 1605 appointed physician to the Tower. Dr. Gwinne seems to have known and practised the courtier's art pretty well; for, knowing the mortal antipathy James I. had to tobacco, he took occasion, when the sapient monarch visited Oxford, to make an oration against that "filthy weed." He also wrote a comedy called "Vertumnus," which was performed before the king at St. John's college. His other works consist of "Orations," "Letters on Chemical and Magical Secrets," &c. Died, 1637.

H.

HAAK, THEODOR, a German writer, born at Newhausen, in 1605. He studied at Oxford; translated the Dutch "Annotations of the Bible," 3 vols.; was one of the founders of the Royal Society; and died in 1690.

HAAREN, WILLIAM VAN, a Dutch statesman and poet; author of "Leonidas," a poem; and an epic, entitled "The Adventures of Friso." Born, 1700; died, 1783.

HAAREN, ONNO ZWEER VAN, a member of the same family as the preceding, and also a statesman and poet. Though he filled several situations with integrity and honour, yet he was subject to the most virulent accusations, and expelled from the assembly of the states-general. He was the author of some tragedies, &c. Born, 1713; died, 1779.

HAAS, WILLIAM, a letter-founder at Basel, who improved the art of printing by the invention of a balance-press, &c. D. 1800.

HABERLIN, FRANCIS DOMINIC, a German historian and antiquary; author of the "History of the German Empire," 20 vols., but which, owing to his death, in 1767, was left incomplete. He was a native of Swabia, and professor of history at Helmsstadt.

HABERLIN, CHARLES FREDERIC, son of the preceding, was professor of jurisprudence in the university of Helmsstadt, and the author of various legal works. D. 1808.

HABERT, GERMAIN, a French poet, was abbot of Notre Dame de Ceris, and one of the first members of the academy. He died in 1655. His principal poem is entitled "Metamorphose des Yeux d'Iris changés en Astres." He also wrote "The Life of Cardinal de Berulle."

HABERT, ISAAC, bishop of Vabres, in France; distinguished himself as a controversialist against Jansenism; and left a translation of the pontifical of the Greek church, some Latin poems, and other works. Died, 1668.

HABERT, LOUIS, a doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at Blois, in 1636, and died in 1718. His works are, "A complete System of Divinity," 7 vols., and "La Pratique de la Penitence."

HABINGTON, THOMAS, a gentleman of landed property, at Henlip, in Worcestershire, who was implicated in various treasonable practices, but who had the good fortune, though detected, to escape from the full penalty of them. He was found guilty of engaging in a conspiracy to release Mary, queen of Scots; for which he was imprisoned six years. And he was afterwards convicted of concealing some of the agents in the gunpowder-plot, and received sentence of death; but obtained a pardon, owing, as some assert, to his having been the godson of queen Elizabeth; though, more probably, to the circumstance of his daughter being the wife of lord Montague, and the supposed writer of the mysterious letter that led to its discovery. He was, however, restrained from ever leaving Worcestershire: in consequence of this, he employed the rest of his life in collecting a mass of topographical materials, which subsequently formed the foundation of Dr. Nash's history of that county. Born, 1580; died, 1647.

HABINGTON, WILLIAM, son of the preceding, was born at Henlip, Worcestershire, in 1605; and was both a poet and an historian. He was educated at St. Omer's and Paris; married the daughter of the first lord Powis; and published a volume of poems, under the title of "Castara;" which, according to the judgment of modern critics, possess much fancy, elegance, and moral feeling. His other works are, "The Queen of Arragon," a tragedy-comedy;

"Observations upon History;" and "A History of Edward IV." Died, 1645.

HACKET, DR. JOHN, bishop of Lichfield, was born in 1592; received his education at Westminster, and Trinity college, Cambridge; and became chaplain to James I. This appointment soon led to other church preferment. In 1623 he was presented to a stall in Lincoln cathedral, and, shortly after, to the rectory of St. Andrew's, Holborn, with that of Cheam, in Surrey. In 1631 he was made archdeacon of Bedford; and in 1641 he exchanged his prebend at Lincoln for a residentiaryship at St. Paul's. At the restoration he was made bishop of Lichfield and Coventry; and in that situation he exhibited a degree of munificence worthy of his station, by expending 20,000*l.* in repairing his cathedral, and by being a liberal benefactor to the college of which he had been a member. He was the author of "A Century of Sermons;" "Loyola," a Latin play, twice performed at the university before James I.; and the "Life of Bishop Williams." Died, 1670.

HACKSPAN, THEODORA, a Lutheran divine, and professor of divinity at Altdorf, was born at Weimar, in 1607, and died in 1639. He wrote several works, in Latin, of a theological character.

HACQUET, BALTHAZAR, an eminent naturalist, born at Conquet, in Brittany, in 1740. After making a scientific tour, he settled at Laybach, in Carniola; became professor of surgery at the Lyceum there; and in 1788 the emperor of Germany gave him a professorship at the university of Lemberg, and made him a member of the council of mines at Vienna. He produced several works illustrative of the natural history and state of the countries he explored; and died in 1815.

HADDICK, ANDREW, count de, a German field-marshal, who distinguished himself in the seven years' war, and who, in 1789, had the chief command of the Austrian forces against the Turks. He was alike renowned for his bravery and skill, and, as a commander of cavalry, he has rarely been equalled. Died, 1790, aged 60.

HADDON, WALTER, an eminent English lawyer, who, on the deprivation of Gardiner, bishop of Winchester, from the mastership of Trinity-hall, was selected to fill the vacant situation. He was afterwards president of Magdalen college, Oxford; but during the reign of Mary he was compelled to seek obscurity. Under Elizabeth he became judge of the Prerogative Court; and he was one of the three commissioners who met at Bruges in 1566, to arrange a treaty of commerce between England and the Netherlands. He was otherwise much employed for the government; particularly in drawing up the celebrated code, "Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum;" and he wrote various poems and treatises in Latin, the purity and elegance of which are highly commended. Died, 1572.

HADLEY, JOHN, an English philosopher, who lived in the early part of the 18th century. He invented the quadrant which bears his name, and also a reflecting telescope; was vice-president of the Royal Society; and contributed several papers to the Philosophical Transactions.

HAEN, ANTHONY DE, or VAN HAEN, a celebrated physician, was born at Leyden, where he studied under Boerhaave. He first settled as a physician at the Hague; but after twenty years' residence, he removed to Vienna, where he obtained a professorship, and died in 1776. He was a man of great learning and professional experience; and his works are all valuable, except the one called "De Magia," in which he attempts to prove the reality of incantations and other supernatural arts.

HAfiz, or HAFIZ, MOHAMMED SCHERREDDIN, the most popular of the Persian poets, was born at Schiraz, and flourished in the 14th century. Like Anacreon, his muse is dedicated to love and wine, and, it is said, he practised what he preached. If we may judge of their general merit from the odes which have been translated by Sir W. Jones and others, we must admit that the fame of Hafiz has never been over-rated. He died in 1390; and his countrymen erected a monument to his memory, which was destroyed by an earthquake in 1835.

HAGEDORN, FREDERIC, a celebrated German poet, was born at Hamburg, in 1708. He was educated in the college of his native city; came to London in the suite of the Danish ambassador; and in 1733 was appointed secretary to the English factory at Hamburg. He was the author of Fables, Songs, Tales, and Moral Poems; in all of which there is considerable originality, and many of them are extremely graceful. Died, 1754.

HAGEDORN, CHRISTIAN LEWIS, brother of the preceding, held the rank of counsellor of legation, and was eminent as a connoisseur of the fine arts. He wrote "Remarks on Painting," 3 vols., &c. Born, 1717; died, 1780.

HAGER, JOSEPH VON, professor of the oriental languages in the university of Pavia, was born at Milan, in 1750; studied at Vienna; and devoted himself to the acquisition of a critical knowledge of the Chinese tongue. He resided some time in London, where he published several works explanatory of the Chinese language; but meeting with little success, he went to Paris, and there published many more. Among his works are, "The Chinese Pantheon;" "An Explanation of the Elementary Characters of the Chinese Language;" "A Dissertation on the newly-discovered Babylonian Inscriptions," &c. Died, at Milan, 1820.

HAGUE, DR. CHARLES, an eminent musician, born at Tadcaster, Yorkshire, in 1769. Manifesting a talent for music at a very early age, he was sent to Cambridge, where he received lessons from Mainini and the elder Hellendaul. He was indebted for his subsequent instructions to Salomon and Dr. Cooke; and in 1799 he succeeded Dr. Randall in the professorship of music at Cambridge. He composed a variety of excellent glees and other pieces, all remarkable for purity and good taste. Died, 1821.

HAHN, SIMON FREDERIC, was born at Bergen, in Hanover, in 1692. At ten years of age he was versed in history, mathematica, and the ancient languages; and at fourteen he pronounced before the university of Halle a Latin oration, on the origin of the monastery of Bergen, which was printed, with some other pieces. In 1708 he published a continuation of the "Chronica Bergense;" and in 1711 two dissertations, one on "Henry the Fowler," and the other on the kingdom of Arles. At the age of twenty-four he was appointed professor of history at Helmstadt. He was also counsellor, historiographer, and librarian, to the elector of Hanover. Died, 1729.

HANN, PHILIP MATTHEW, a celebrated mechanical genius, born in 1739, at Scharnhausen. While at the university of Tübingen, he spent his leisure hours in making sea-dials and speaking-trumpets, grinding glasses, &c. He continued his labours with unremitting assiduity, and eventually produced works of great ingenuity; as, a clock showing the course of the earth and other planets, as well as that of the moon and other satellites, and their eccentricities; a calculating machine; and many other ingenious inventions. Died, 1790.

HAILLAN, BERNARD DE GIRAUD, Sieur d', a French historian, was born at Bourdeaux, in 1533. He was originally a protestant, but changed his religion for interest at court, where he was appointed historiographer of France. Besides some poems and translations, he published a curious work, entitled, "Of the State and Success of the Affairs of France," which went through several editions. He also wrote a History of France, from Pharamond to Charles VII.; and some other works. Died, 1610.

HAKEM-BAMRILLAH, caliph of Egypt, a sovereign remarkable for the impious extravagance of his conduct, succeeded his father Aziz, in 906, at the age of eleven. At first he was a zealous Mahometan, founding mosques, colleges, &c.; but after a time he took a fancy to establish a religion of his own. He styled himself the visible image of God upon earth; and claimed the honours of adoration. He persecuted the Jews and Christians; and having gained many followers, he attempted to reform Mahometanism, by suppressing the pilgrimages to Mecca, &c.; but this proved his destruction, and he perished in a conspiracy of his subjects, in 1020. The Druses of Mount Lebanon, to the present day, believe in the divinity of the caliph Hakem.

HAKEWILL, GREGORY, an English divine, was born at Exeter, in 1579. He studied at Alban-hall, Oxford, after which he became fellow of Exeter-college. Having taken his degree of D.D. he was made chaplain to prince Charles, and archdeacon of Surrey; but never rose higher in the church, owing to his writing a tract against the proposed marriage of his patron with the Infanta of Spain. For this he not only lost his chaplaincy, but was sent to prison, though he soon obtained his release. Some time after, he was elected rector of Exeter-college, which he held with the living of Heanton, in Devonshire, where he died in 1649. His greatest work is entitled "An Apology or Declaration of the Power and Providence of God in the Government of the World."

HAKLUYT, RICHARD, a naval historian, was born at Eytou, in Herefordshire, in 1553. He received his education at Westminster-school, and at Christchurch, Oxford, where he made cosmography his favourite study, and read lectures on it. About 1584 he went to Paris as chaplain to the English ambassador, and, during his absence, was made prebendary of Bristol. On his return to England he published several works, particularly, a translation from the Spanish of "Leo's Geographical History of Africa," and Peter Martyr's "History of the West Indies." In 1605, he was promoted to a prebend of Westminster, and the rectory of Wetheringset, in Suffolk. His principal work is a valuable collection of the "Voyages and Discoveries of the English Nation," in 3 vols. folio.

HALDE, JOHN BAPTIST DU, a French Jesuit, was born at Paris in 1674, and died there in 1743. He published some Latin poems, and other works; but is best known by his "Description Historique, Geographique, Chronologique, et Physique de l'Empire de la Chine, et de la Tartarie Chinoise," 4 vols. folio.

HALE, Sir MATTHEW, an eminent English judge, was born at Aldersley, in Gloucestershire, in 1600; educated at Magdalen-hall, Oxford; and removed to Lincoln's-inn, where he studied the law with great application. He acted as counsel for Straford, Laud, Hamilton, and even for Charles himself; yet, by dint of importunity, Cromwell prevailed upon him to become one of the justices of the Bench; but, refusing to warp the laws, he offended the Protector, and refused to try any more criminal causes. In the parliament which recalled the king, he sat for his native county; and, soon after the restoration, was made chief baron of the Exchequer; from which he was advanced to the chief-justiceship of the King's Bench. He resigned his office in 1675, and died the following year. He was a learned man, an upright judge, and an exemplary Christian. His writings are numerous on theological, philosophical, and legal subjects. The principal are, "The Primitive Origination of Mankind considered and explained according to the Light of Nature;" "The History of the Pleas of the Crown;" and "Contemplations, Moral and Divine," 3 vols. 8vo. He also wrote various mathematical and philosophical works; and left a very valuable collection of manuscripts relating to history and jurisprudence, which are preserved in the library of Lincoln's-inn.

HALES, JOHN, commonly called "the ever-memorable," was born at Bath, in 1644. He suffered great hardships in the rebellion, and died in 1656. He was a man of learning and skill in argument, as appears from his works, which were collected after his death, and published under the title of "Golden Remains of the ever-memorable Mr. John Hales, of Eton college," 3 vols.

HALES, STEPHEN, a divine and philosopher, was born in Kent, in 1677, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, of which he became fellow in 1703. He invented a machine for demonstrating the motions of the planets, nearly similar to the orrery, and in 1741 published his invention of ventilators. He contented himself with the rectory of Teddington, near Hampton-court, refusing higher dignities; and died in 1761. He was indefatigable in his scientific researches, particularly in those which relate to vegetable physiology; and his communications to the Philosophical Transactions were very numerous; besides which he published four volumes of Statistical Essays, &c.

HALHED, NATHANIEL BRASSRY, an eminent orientalist, was educated at Harrow-school, and afterwards became a civil officer in the East India Company's service. He published "A Code of Gentoo Laws on Ordinances of the Pundits, from a Persian translation;" "A Grammar of the Bengali Language;" and "A Narrative of the Events which have happened in Bombay and Bengal, relative to the Mahratta Empire since July, 1777." After this he returned to England, and obtained a seat in parliament as a member for Lymington; but it appears that he laboured under a species of mental delusion, or he never could have patronized and defended the lunatic prophet Brothers, whose confinement in Bedlam he denounced in parliament as an instance of tyranny and oppression. Born, 1761; died, 1830.

HALIFAX, GEORGE SAVILE, marquis of, an eminent statesman, was born in 1630; contributed to the restoration of Charles II., who made him a privy counsellor, and rewarded him with a coronet. On the accession of James he was appointed president of the council, from which he was dismissed for refusing his consent to a repeal of the tests. In the convention parliament he was chosen speaker of the House of Lords, and at the accession of William and Mary was made lord privy seal. He died in 1695. His lordship wrote an excellent piece, entitled, "Advice to a Daughter," and various political tracts.

HALIFAX, SAMUEL, bishop of St. Asaph, was born at Mansfield, Derbyshire, in 1733; received his education at Cambridge; graduated as LL.D., and obtained the professorship of Arabic, which he resigned soon after for that of civil law. In 1775 he was presented to the rectory of Worksop, Nottinghamshire, and made king's chaplain. In 1781 he was raised to the see of Gloucester; from which he was translated to the more valuable diocese of St. Asaph, in 1789. He was a prelate of deep erudition, and much beloved for his benevolent disposition and amiable manners. His writings are select rather than numerous, and consist of Sermons, a volume on the Prophecies, and an Analysis of Butler's Analogy. Died, 1790.

HALKET, Lady ANNE, the wife of Sir James Halket. She was the daughter of Mr. Robert Murray, of the Tullibardin family, and born in 1622. Her father was preceptor to Charles I., and afterwards provost of Eton college; and her mother was sub-governess to the duke of Gloucester and the princess Elizabeth. Anne received a liberal education; but theology and physic were her favourite studies. Her skill in the latter was so great, that persons came from Holland, and other countries, to benefit by her advice and treatment. Died, 1690.

HALL, RICHARD, an English divine of the Romish church, who, in the reign of Elizabeth, went to Flanders, and became professor of divinity at Douay, and canon of St. Omer. He published, among other works, a "History of the Troubles of his Time;" and is very severe on the protestants. Died, 1604.

HALL, JOSEPH, an eminent and learned English prelate. He was born, in 1574, at Ashby-de-la-Zouch; was educated at Emmanuel college, Cambridge; and became dean of Worcester. In 1634 he refused the bishopric of Gloucester: but, three years afterwards, he accepted that of Exeter; from which see he was removed, in 1641, to that of Norwich. In a few weeks after his translation, he was sent to the Tower, with twelve other prelates, for protesting against any laws passed in parliament during their forced absence from the house. In June, 1642, he obtained his release; but the next year he suffered much persecution from the puritans, who plundered his house, and despoiled the cathedral. His estate also was sequestered; and thus, in his old age, he was reduced to poverty, which he endured with fortitude, and continued still to preach occasionally. His "Meditations" are well known; and his poetical talents, chiefly exercised in satire, were very respectable. He is universally allowed to have been a man of great wit and learning, and of as great meekness, modesty, and piety. His works have gained him the appellation of the "Christian Seneca." Died, 1658.

HALL, JOHN, an English lawyer and poet, was born at Durham, in 1627; educated at Cambridge; removed to Gray's Inn, and in due course was called to the bar. He died in 1697. He published a volume of poems in 1646, and translated Longinus into English.

HALL, EDWARD, an old English chronicler, whose works rank with those of Hollingshed and Stow. He was a native of London, and being a lawyer by profession, attained the rank of a judge in the sheriff's court. His death took place in 1547. As affording delineations of the manners, dress, and customs of the age, his "Chronicle," which Grafton completed, is very curious.

HALL, ROBERT, a celebrated Baptist preacher, and a distinguished theological writer, was born at Arneby, in Leicestershire, in 1764. His father, who was also a Baptist minister, early remarked his precocity of talent, and in 1773 placed him under the instruction of the learned and pious John Ryland, of Northampton. At fifteen he became a student in the Baptist college at Bristol; and at eighteen he entered King's college, Aberdeen, where he took the degree of M.A. He then was chosen as colleague with Dr. Caleb Evans, in the ministry at Bristol, and adjunct professor in the institution. Here he attained great popularity; but he was obliged to retire from this situation, in consequence of approaching symptoms of mental derangement. By judicious treatment, during a long seclusion from the world, his powerful mind regained its former vigour; and, in 1791, he removed to Cambridge, being chosen successor to the celebrated Robert Robinson. He now appeared as the author of a pamphlet, entitled, "Christianity not inconsistent with the Love of Freedom." This was shortly after followed by his "Vindication of the Freedom of the Press," which passed through several editions, and is still regarded as a standard work. But it was his Sermon on Modern Infidelity, that established his fame as a divine. In 1802, Mr. Hall's mind again received a shock, which obliged him to suspend his pulpit labours; and on his recovery he removed to Leicester, where he remained as pastor of the Baptist congregation upwards of twenty years. On the death of Dr. Ryland, in 1826, he succeeded to the presidency of the Bristol academy, and the pastorate of Broadmead chapel; and there he continued till his death, which took place in 1831. Mr. Hall was gifted with a powerful and persuasive eloquence; and to great talents and learning he united a benevolent disposition and a truly liberal mind. Dr. Parr, who was his intimate friend, says of him, in his last will and testament, "Mr. Hall has, like Jeremy Taylor, the eloquence of an orator, the fancy of a poet, the subtlety of a schoolman, the profoundness of a philosopher, and the piety of a saint." His works have been collected and published since his death, in 6 vols. 8vo.

HALL, Sir JAMES, bart., F.R.S. and S.A., Edinburgh, was the eldest son of Sir John Hall, the third baronet of Dunglass, and born in 1760. He was the author of "An Essay on the Origin, Principles, and History of Gothic Architecture," and of many papers in the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. He devoted much of his time to scientific pursuits, and made some ingenious researches and discoveries in mineralogy and geology, particularly by his experiments in the fusion of stony substances—tending to establish the truth of the Huttonian theory of a central fire, against the Wernerian or aqueous system. Died, at Edinburgh, 1832.

HALL, JOHN, an English surgeon in the reign of queen Elizabeth; author of "A Compendium of Anatomy," &c.

HALLE, PETER, professor of canon law in the university of Paris; born, 1611; died, 1689.

HALLE, ANTHONY, professor of eloquence at Caen; author of a Latin grammar, and poems in the same language. He died in 1675, aged 83.

HALLE, JEAN NOEL, a French physician and natural philosopher, born in 1754. He succeeded Corvisart.

HALLER, ALBERT VON, an eminent Swiss physician, was born at Berne, in 1708. The early display of his abilities was most extraordinary; and when in his thirteenth year, he was not only distinguished for his knowledge in Greek and Latin, but also for his poetical genius. In his sixteenth year he began to study medicine at Tubingen, but the fame of Boerhaave induced him to remove to Leyden, where, animated by the example of the great geniuses around him, he spent his days and nights with the least possible intermission, in the most intense study. In 1727 he visited England, and formed an acquaintance with Sir Hans Sloane, Cheselden, and other eminent men. He received the title of physician and counsellor to king George II., at whose request Francis I. gave him a patent of nobility, as a baron. After seventeen years' absence at Gottingen, the fame of whose medical school he had greatly extended, he returned, in 1753, to Berne, where his countrymen received him with the respect due to his great fame and talents. Having been elected a member of the sovereign council of the state, he soon obtained one of its magistracies; and his various duties as a statesman, a physician, and a medical teacher, occupied his attention till his death. His "Elementa Physiologie," and "Bibliotheca Medicinæ," afford ample proofs of his penetrating genius and solid judgment; and his philosophical and descriptive poems display great depth of thought and richness of imagination. He was, in short, a profound philosopher, an admirable poet, and a first-rate physician and botanist; yet not more eminent for his various scientific knowledge, than for his piety and active benevolence. He died in 1777.

HALLEY, EDMUND, an eminent English astronomer and mathematician, was born, in 1656, at Haggerston, near London. He received his education at St. Paul's school, and Queen's college, Oxford, where he made so great a proficiency in his mathematical studies, that in 1676 he published observations on a spot in the sun, by which the motion of that body on its axis was determined. The same year he went to St. Helena, where he determined the position of 350 stars, which procured him the name of the Southern Tycho. On his return to England he was created master of arts, and chosen a fellow of the Royal Society; which learned body deputed him to go to Dantzic, to adjust a dispute between Hooke and Hevelius, respecting the proper glasses for astronomical purposes. In 1680 he made the tour of Europe with Mr. Nelson; and on the passage to Calais was the first to observe the great comet—the same erratic body which visited our hemisphere again in 1835, and was visible in England, to the naked eye, about the middle of October, as a tolerably bright star, just above the constellation of the Great Bear. After his return, he turned his attention to the theory of the planetary motions, which brought him acquainted with Isaac Newton, who entrusted to him the publication of his Principia. To ascertain exactly the cause of the variation of the compass, he was made commander of a ship in 1698, and sent to the Western Ocean; but his crew being mutinous, he was obliged to return. The year following he sailed again, and proceeded as far south as the ice would permit; the result of which observations he published in a general chart. Soon after this he was employed to observe the course of the tides in the Channel; and to make a correct chart of the same. Having accomplished this object, he went to make a survey of the coast of Dalmatia, for the emperor. In 1703 he was appointed Savilian professor of geometry at Oxford; in 1708 he made public his valuable researches on the orbits of comets; in 1713 he became secretary to the Royal Society; and in 1719 he succeeded Flamsteed as astronomer royal. The remainder of his life was chiefly spent in the sedulous performance of his duties in that situation, especially in completing the theory of the motion of the moon. He died, at Greenwich, Jan. 14, 1741-2. Fontenelle thus speaks of Halley: "To his great extent of knowledge was added constant presence of mind, and a freedom of expression, at once pertinent, judicious, and sincere. He was naturally of an ardent temper and a generous disposition, open and punctual in his transactions, candid in his judgment, simple and blameless in his manners, affable, communicative, and disinterested." His principal works are "Catalogus Stellarum Austrarium;" "Tabule Astronomicæ;" "An Abridgment of the History of Comets," &c.

HALLORAN, SYLVESTER O', an Irish antiquary. He was born in 1736; was brought up and practised as a surgeon, and wrote several medical treatises. But it is as an antiquary and historian that he is now principally known. In 1773 he published an "Introduction to the Study of the History and Antiquities of Ireland," &c., which was followed by a "General History of Ireland," 3 vols., 4to. Died, 1807.

HALMA, NICHOLAS, born in 1780; a French poet and dramatist. His best work is the tragedy of "Astræa."

HALS, FRANCIS, an eminent portrait painter, born at Mechlin, in 1584, who was considered as ranking next to Vandyke. Died, 1666.—His brother, DIRK HALS, was famous for painting merry-making and subjects of drollery. Died, 1666.

HAMBERGER, GEORGE ALBERT, a mathematician, was born at Beyerberg, in Franconia, in 1622. He studied first at Heilbronn, next at Altorf, and lastly at Jena, where he took his degrees, and became professor of natural philosophy and mathematics. He wrote several books on hydraulics, optics, and other subjects. Died, 1726. His son, GEORGE EDWARD HAMBERGER, succeeded him, but quitted the professorship of mathematics for that of physic, which he held to his death, in 1758. Among his works are two on Medical Physiology; treatises on Venesection, Respiration, and the Secretions; "The Elements of Physics;" "The Art of Healing," &c.

HAMANN, JOHN GEORGE, the soi-disant "Northern Magian," was born at Königsberg, in 1730. He travelled about in different parts of his native country; was private tutor in several places; received an office in the customs at Königsberg, in 1777; and died, at Münster, in 1798. He published several humorous works, which were little noticed at the time; but since Herder, Goethe, Richter, and others, have spoken of them with approbation, they have been considered worthy of republication.

HAMARSKJÖLD, LORENZ, a Swedish philosopher; author of a "History of Philosophy," in 4 vols. Died, 1827.

HAMEL, JOHN BAPTISTE DU, a French ecclesiastic and a philosopher, was born at Vire, in Lower Normandy, in 1634. He studied at Caen and Paris; became a member of the congregation of the Oratory, but left it for the living of Neuilli upon the Marne; and when the Royal Academy of Sciences was established, he was appointed secretary. In 1678 appeared his "Philosophia Vetus et Nova," 4 vols., to which were afterwards added two more volumes. In 1697 he resigned his situation in the academy, to devote himself to theology. His chief works, besides the one mentioned above, are, "Regis Scientiarum Academicæ Historia," 4to, and an edition of the Vulgate Bible, with notes, and tables, chronological and geographical. He died in 1704.

HAMEL DU MONCEAU, HENRY LOUIS DU, an eminent French philosopher, and writer on agriculture, born at Paris, in 1700. His whole life was dedicated to the cultivation of useful science; and besides largely contributing to the transactions of different learned societies, of which he was a member, the following are among his separate works:—"Traité de la Culture des Terres," 6 vols. "Elements of Agriculture," 2 vols. "Traité des Arbres et Arbustes qui se cultivent en France en pleine terre," 2 vols. 4to. "Physique des Arbres," 2 vols. 4to. "De l'exploitation des Bois," 2 vols. 4to. "Traité des Arbres Fruitières," 2 vols. 4to. "Elémens de l'Architecture Navale;" besides many other treatises on various arts and manufactures. Died, 1783.

HAMILTON, ANTHONY, count, a poet, courtier, and man of letters in the seventeenth century. He was descended from an ancient Scotch family, but born, in 1646, in Ireland; from whence he was taken to France, when a child, by his parents, who were attached to Charles the Second. When James II. was obliged to contend for his crown in Ireland, he gave count Hamilton a regiment of infantry, and made him governor of Limerick; but on the ruin of the royal cause, he accompanied James to France, where he passed the rest of his life. His wit and talents secured him admission into the first circles; and he died at St. Germain, in 1730. Count Hamilton is chiefly known as an author by his "Memoirs of Count Grammont," a lively and spirited production, exhibiting a free and faithful delineation of the voluptuous court of Charles II. His other works are "Poems and Fairy Tales," which, as well as the Memoirs, are in French, and display elegance of style with fertility of invention.

HAMILTON, GAVIN, an historical painter, and connoisseur of ancient art, was born at Lanark, in Scotland. Having discovered an early genius for painting, he was sent to Italy, and placed under Augustine Massacci, by whose instructions he profited considerably; after which he applied with great diligence to the study of the antique, which has given his paintings of ancient subjects that propriety with regard to costume, which distinguished them at the time from the generality of modern compositions. One of his greatest works was his Homer, consisting of a series of pictures, representing scenes taken from the Iliad. The latter part of his life was employed in making excavations, at Tivoli, among the ruins of Adrian's villa, and in various other places in Italy; by which he was enabled to bring to light many of the long buried treasures of antiquity; so that the success which crowned his researches made ample amends for the loss which painting may have suffered by the intermission of his practice. He died at Rome, in 1796.

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, an historical painter, was born in 1750. He went to Italy when very young, and was there placed under the instruction of Zucchi, the painter of arabesque ornaments, at Rome. On his return to England he acquired considerable employment; and, in 1789, was admitted a royal academician. Died, 1801.

HAMILTON, WILLIAM, a Scotch poet, was born at Bangour, in Ayrshire, in 1704. He joined the Pretender in 1745, and narrowly escaped being taken after the battle of Culloden. Died, 1754. Among his songs and ballads is the well known "Braes of Yarrow."

HAMILTON, JAMES, duke of, was born in Scotland, in 1606; became a favourite at court; and when the troubles broke out in Scotland, had the command of the fleet. In 1643 he was created a duke; but soon afterwards his loyalty became suspected, and he was sent prisoner to Pendennis-castle, and next to that of St. Michael's-mount, in Cornwall. There he remained till 1646, when he regained his liberty and went to Scotland; where he was accused of having betrayed the king, and received a share of the money. To wipe off this disgrace he raised some forces, and entered England; but was defeated at Preston, in Lancashire, August 17, 1648, and sent to Windsor castle. After a summary trial before Bradshaw, he was sentenced to be beheaded, which was put in execution March 9, 1648-9.—His brother, WILLIAM, who succeeded him in the title, was mortally wounded at the battle of Worcester, Sept. 3, 1651.

HAMILTON, PATRICK, the first Scotch reformer, was nephew to James, earl of Arran, and born in 1503. He was educated at St. Andrew's; after which he went abroad, where he imbibed the opinions of Luther. On his return home he was made abbot of Ferne, in the shire of Ross, where he promulgated the new doctrines with so much zeal as to excite the wrath of the clergy, who caused him to be apprehended and sent to Beaton, archbishop of St. Andrew's. After a long examination he was declared contumacious, and burnt at a stake opposite St. Salvador's college, March 1, 1527.

HAMILTON, WILLIAM GERARD, a statesman who obtained the appellation of "Single Speech Hamilton," from the extraordinary impression produced by the first and almost only speech he ever made in the British parliament, was the son of a barrister of Lincoln's Inn, where he was born in 1729. He was educated at Winchester school and Oriel college, Oxford. In 1754 he was elected into parliament for Petersfield, and the year following delivered the speech alluded to. In 1761 he went to Ireland as secretary to lord Halifax, and in the parliament of that kingdom he confirmed the reputation which he had gained in England by his oratory. He was above twenty years chancellor of the exchequer in Ireland, but retired from public life in 1784. His works, consisting of "Parliamentary Logic," "Speeches," &c. were printed in 1808, with the life of the author prefixed. Among the many to whom the Letters of Junius were once ascribed, Mr. Hamilton was one; but there was scarcely the shadow of an argument to support the conjecture. Died, 1796.

HAMILTON, ELIZABETH, a lady of great literary attainments, was born at Belfast, in Ireland, in 1758. She wrote the "Letters of a Hindoo Rajah," 2 vols.; "The Life of Agrippina," 3 vols.; "Memoirs of Modern Philosophers;" "Popular Essays," 2 vols.; "On the Elementary Principles of Education;" "Letters on the Formation of the Religious and Moral Principle;" and other works, replete with sound sense and information. Died, 1816.

HAMILTON, SIR WILLIAM, bart. was a native of Scotland, born in 1730. His mother having been the nurse of George III. young Hamilton very naturally obtained that prince's patronage. Sir William was generally distinguished for his taste in the polite arts; employed a large portion of his life in the study of natural history, and supplied the Philosophical Transactions and the Archæologia, with many learned articles. During his residence as ambassador from England to the court of Naples, he published his "Campi Phlegrei," from his observations of Mount Vesuvius, Mount Etna, and other volcanoes. He presented many books, manuscripts, and geological curiosities to the British Museum; and, after his death, his superb collection of antique vases was purchased by parliament for that institution. Died, 1803.

HAMILTON, Lady EMMA, wife of the above-mentioned Sir William, was (according to the memoirs which appeared in her name in 1815), the daughter of a female servant, who had no means but her wages to support herself and child. At the age of thirteen, she obtained a situation for her daughter, called Emma Harte, in the house of Mr. Thomas, of Howarden, Flintshire, to nurse and wait on his children. Emma, it seems, thought the situation dull, and left it. At sixteen, she went to London; got a place in the house of a shopkeeper in St. James's Market; and soon after was hired to wait upon a lady of rank, where, having only the duty of dressing her mistress, she passed her leisure time in reading novels and plays. She soon acquired a taste for the drama; and employed herself in imitating the attitudes and manners of persons on the stage, from a desire to become an actress. She thus laid the foundation of her extraordinary skill in pantomimic representations. But she neglected her business, was dismissed, and went to serve in a low tavern, frequented by actors, painters, musicians, &c. In this service, she formed an acquaintance with a Welsh youth, who, being pressed upon the river, she hastened to the captain and obtained the boy his liberty. The captain loaded her with presents, and with him she remained for some time; at length she quitted him for a gentleman of large fortune, who kept her in great affluence for a short period; but disgusted by her extravagance, and induced by domestic considerations, he dismissed her. Reduced to the greatest poverty, she became one of the most common of degraded females. From this state she was relieved by the infamous Dr. Graham, who, perceiving the beautiful symmetry of her person, took her to his house, and there exhibited her, covered only with a transparent veil, under the name of the goddess Hygeia. Painters, sculptors, and others, paid their tribute of admiration at the shrine of this new goddess. The artful quack had her bust modelled; numbers purchased it, and a greater number came to admire the original. She was an adept in deceit; with a violent and impassioned temper, she assumed the appearance of candour, innocence, and simplicity. Charles Greville, (of the Warwick family), became enamoured with, and would have married her, but for the interference of his uncle, Sir W. Hamilton, who, according to some accounts, made an agreement with Greville to pay his debts, on condition that he should give up his mistress; or as others state the circumstance, in his endeavours to save his nephew, fell into the snare himself, and became the victim of her arts. He made her his wife in 1791; introduced her at the court of Naples, where the queen became so infatuated with the new ambassadress, as frequently to keep her a visitor at the palace. It was there that she feigned a violent passion for England's naval hero, then commanding the Agamemnon; and from that period, she became the companion of Nelson, to whom she was sometimes useful as a political agent. After the victory of Aboukir, when the conqueror was received in Naples with extravagant rejoicings, Lady Hamilton was the heroine of the crowd, and accompanied the slave of her charms wherever he went. But such were the degrading properties of her mind, that she influenced her benefactors to acts of vengeance, which entailed upon them the hatred of their subjects. To the advice of Lady Hamilton is attributed the ignominious death of prince Caracciolo, the oldest and the best officer in the Neapolitan navy. The life of this female terminated in 1816, in the neighbourhood of Calais. She had dissipated all the fortune which had been lavished upon her, and, with the daughter she had by Lord Nelson, supported a miserable existence on the small pension that had been settled on her.

HAMILTON, ROBERT, LL.D. and F.R.S., a political economist and an able mathematician, was fifty years professor in the university at Edinburgh, and died at Aberdeen, in 1829. He published, in 1777, "An Introduction to Merchandize;" in 1788, "A System of Arithmetic and Book-keeping;" and, in 1813, "An Inquiry into the Rise and Progress, the Redemption and present state of management of the National Debt of Great Britain."

HAMILTON, JAMES, inventor of the Hamiltonian system of teaching languages, died at Dublin, where he had gone for the purpose of giving lectures, Sept. 16, 1823.

HAMILTON, SIR JOHN, bart., a lieutenant-general in the army, was born in 1755, and entered the military service in 1771 as a cadet in the Bengal army. At the escalade of the fortress of Gualior he greatly distinguished himself in leading the storming party. After remaining some years in India, and receiving promotion till he obtained a majority, he purchased the lieutenant-colonelcy of the 61st regiment. In 1803 he was appointed a brigadier-general on the staff in Ireland, and in 1809 was made inspector-general of the Portuguese army. During the whole peninsular war he maintained a high character for skill and valour; and for his spirited repulse of Soult, under the disadvantage of a very unequal force, at Albu de Tormes, he was created a baronet. Died, 1833.

HAMILTON, ALEXANDER, a distinguished American officer and legislator, in the war of independence, was born in 1757. While a student of Columbia-college, at the age of seventeen, he published several essays concerning the rights of the colonies, which were marked by vigour and maturity of style, as well as by soundness of argument. Before he was nineteen he entered the American army, with the rank of captain of artillery; and by the time he was twenty, the commander-in-chief had made him his aid-de-camp, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. From this time he continued the inseparable companion of Washington during the war, and was always consulted by him on the most important occasions. After the war, colonel Hamilton, then about twenty-four, commenced the study of the law, and was soon admitted at the bar. In 1782 he was chosen a member of congress from the state of New York, where he quickly acquired the greatest influence and distinction. He contributed greatly to the favourable reception of the constitution, by the essays he wrote, in conjunction with Madison and Jay, in the "Federalist." On the organization of the federal government, in 1789, he was appointed secretary of the Treasury; and during his continuance in that office, about five years, he raised the public credit from the lowest state of depression to a height altogether unprecedented in the history of the country. In 1798, when an invasion was apprehended from the French, and a provisional army had been called into the field, his public services were again required; and on the death of Washington, in 1799, he succeeded to the chief command. When the army was disbanded, Hamilton again returned to the bar, and continued to practise, with increased reputation and success, until 1804. A quarrel having taken place between him and colonel Burr, the latter challenged him, and they met at Hoboken on the 11th of July. At the first fire Hamilton fell, mortally wounded, on the same spot where, a short time previously, his eldest son had been killed in a duel. The sensation which this occurrence produced throughout the United States, was very great; for, of all the American statesmen, he displayed the most comprehensive understanding and the most varied ability.

HAMMOND, ANTHONY, an ingenious writer, was born at the family seat of Somersham-place, Huntingdonshire, in 1658. He was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, and became a member of parliament, where his eloquence procured him the name of "Silver Tongue." He was also a commissioner of the navy; but died a prisoner in the Fleet, in 1738. He was the author of a "Miscellany of Original Poems."

HAMMOND, JAMES, an elegiac poet, was born in 1710; received his education at Westminster school; was appointed equerry to Frederic, prince of Wales; and sat in parliament for Truro. He died in 1741, his health, if not his intellects, having been disordered by an unfortunate attachment to a young lady who rejected his addresses. After his death, a small volume of his "Love Elegies" was published, which, though chiefly imitations of Tibullus, are obviously the fruits of a cultivated taste, and possess much warmth and tenderness.

HAMOLSWOLD, a Dutch orientalist, of great erudition, born in 1743; died in 1812. He is distinguished by his speeches, as a conventionalist, and by his works, as an author in favour of the Jews.

HAMPDEN, JOHN, a political character of great notoriety in the reign of Charles I., was descended of an ancient family in Buckinghamshire, and born in London, in 1594. In 1636 he distinguished himself by his spirited opposition to the payment of ship-money, by which he acquired great popularity. He became a leading man in the House of Commons; and at the commencement of the civil war he took up arms against the king, and accepted the command of a regiment in the parliamentary army, under the earl of Essex. Prince Rupert having beaten up the quarters of the parliamentary troops near Thame, in Oxfordshire, Hampden eagerly joined a few cavalry that were rallied in haste, and, in the skirmish that ensued, received a wound, which in a few days proved fatal. His character and conduct, throughout his contest with the crown, showed great firmness and moderation; and his name has become a sort of watch-word to many who, lacking his stern republican virtues, exult in displaying their patriotism by resisting not merely taxation by prerogative, but the law of the land. Died, 1643.

HAMPER, WILLIAM, an antiquarian and miscellaneous writer, was a native of Birmingham. His principal publication is "The Life, Diary, and Correspondence of Sir William Dugdale." He was a contributor to several archaeological works, and furnished the Gentleman's Magazine with numerous sketches and descriptions. Died, 1831.

HANDEL, GEORGE FREDERIC, an illustrious musician, was born at Halle, in Saxony, in 1684. His father, who intended him for the law, perceiving his propensity to music, discouraged it as much as possible, and especially forbade him to touch an instrument. The boy, however, contrived to have a small clavichord concealed in the garret, where he used to amuse himself when the family were asleep. At the age of seven he went with his father to the court of the duke of Saxe-Weissenfels, to whom Handel's brother-in-law was valet. While there, it was impossible to keep the child from the harpsichords, and he sometimes went into the organ-loft at church, and played after service was over. On one of these occasions, the duke going into the church, was surprised at hearing some person playing on the organ; and more so at finding that it was a child of seven years old, the brother of his own valet. Upon this he reasoned in strong terms with the father, who agreed to place his son under Zuckau, the organist of the cathedral at Halle, a man equally capable and disposed to do justice to so promising a pupil. At the age of nine, Handel composed the church service, for voices and instruments; and when he was fourteen he far excelled his master, and was sent to Berlin, where the sovereign made him liberal presents. On the death of his father, in 1703, he proceeded to Hamburg, then celebrated for the excellence of its musical performances, and procured an engagement there, in the orchestra at the opera. In 1704 he brought out his first opera, "Almira." Soon after this he visited Italy, and at Florence produced the opera of "Rodrigo." He subsequently went to Venice, Naples, and Rome; and having altogether remained in Italy about six years, he accepted the pressing invitations he had received from many of the British nobility to visit London, and set out for England, where he arrived in the latter end of 1710. The flattering reception he experienced induced him to perpetuate his stay, and he rose, during the fifty years which followed, to the height of professional honour. In 1741 he brought out his chef-d'aure, the oratorio of the "Messiah;" and although this sublime composition was not at first duly appreciated, yet its vast merits were soon made known, and it increased constantly in reputation. Some time previous to his decease, he was afflicted by total blindness; but this misfortune had little effect on his spirits, and he continued not only to perform in public, but even to compose, till within a week of his death, which took place in London, in 1759. Handel's manners were rough, and his temper even violent; but his heart was humane, and his disposition liberal. His musical powers can hardly be estimated too highly. In boldness and strength of style, and in the combination of vigour, spirit, invention, grandeur, and sublimity, he has never been surpassed. "Conceive," said Arbuthnot to Pope, "the highest you can of his abilities, and they are much beyond anything you can conceive." This great composer was buried in Westminster Abbey, where a monument is erected to his memory.

HANMER, Sir THOMAS, an English statesman and writer, was born in 1676, and succeeded his uncle in his title and the family estate of Hanmer. He was elected M.P. for Suffolk, and, in 1713, chosen speaker of the House of Commons, an office which he discharged with great impartiality. Towards the close of his life he withdrew altogether from public business, and occupied himself in elegant literature; the fruits of which appeared in a corrected and illustrated edition of Shakspeare's dramatic works, in 6 vols. 4to. Died, 1746.

HANNEMAN, ADRIAN, an eminent historical and portrait painter, was born at the Hague, in 1611. He imitated Vandyke so closely, that his portraits are not often to be distinguished from those of that great master. He came to England in the reign of Charles I., and continued here several years. Died, 1680.

HANNIBAL, general of the Carthaginians, was the son of Amilcar, who caused him, at the age of eight years, to swear before the altar eternal enmity to the Romans. In the year of Rome 534, and B. C. 220, he took the command of the army, on the death of his brother Asdrubal. After achieving several conquests in Spain, he turned his arms against the Romans, and crossed the Alps by a new road. Having defeated Scipio and other commanders, in separate actions, he marched towards Rome, and gained the victory of Cannæ, B. C. 216. Instead of following up this advantage, Hannibal rested at Capua, which enabled the Romans to recover from their fright, so that when the Carthaginians encamped before the city, their appearance created no alarm. Hannibal, finding it hopeless to make any attempt upon the capital, retreated. Two years afterwards he defeated Marcellus; but notwithstanding this, finding his affairs growing desperate in Italy, where he had now been sixteen years, he made overtures of peace, which terminated without effect. The battle of Zama, in which he lost twenty thousand men, completely ruined Hannibal, and he retired to Asia, where he took refuge with Prusias, king of Bithynia; but being apprehensive that he should be delivered up to the Romans, he took poison, at the age of 64, B. C. 183.

HANNO. There were several Carthaginian generals of this name.—One of them made a voyage on the western coast of Africa, of which he has left a description, called the "Periplus of Hanno." The purpose of this voyage was to make discoveries for the benefit of commerce, and to settle colonies, of which he established several.—Two Carthaginian generals, of the name of Hanno, commanded in Sicily, successively, during the first Punic war.—Another Hanno was one of the commanders under Hannibal in Italy, and was successful on several occasions.

HANRIOT, or HENRIOT, FRANÇOIS, one of the most infamous wretches that ever soiled the annals of any people, was born at Nanterre, in 1761. Having robbed his master, an attorney in Paris, he was driven on the town without resource, and became a spy of the police. He first appeared in his revolutionary character the day after the taking of the Tuilleries, in 1793. A few months after, he was one of the most sanguinary of the Septemberists; and presided at the massacre of the prisoners of Orleans. The execrable commune of Paris then made him chief of the sans-culottes section; their object being to organize a system of terror and sanguinary predominance over the national representatives. With these banditti, armed with bayonets and cannon, he marched to the Convention, and demanded the proscription of the Girondists. Under terror, the assembly consented to give up twenty-nine of their most talented and trustworthy members to the guillotine. He afterwards became the willing and blood-thirsty satellite of Robespierre. When that wretch was outlawed, and condemned to death by the Convention, Henriot and Coffinhal, the vice-presidents of the revolutionary tribunal, made an effort to raise the Jacobin factions in his favour; and might have succeeded, but his courage failed just as the brigands were pointing their cannons against the Convention, and the moment was lost; some of the sections, and a body of gens-d'armes, rallied in favour of the latter, and Henriot was outlawed, and arrested in a state of powerless intoxication, produced by drinking large draughts of brandy, in order to sustain his courage. His colleague, Coffinhal, was so maddened by the loss of the day, that, rushing upon him in the upper room of the Hotel de Ville, where both were confined, he threw him out of the window. He fell into a drain, and tried to hide himself, but his groans discovered his hiding-place; he was dragged out, and sent next day to the scaffold, with Robespierre and his colleagues. This monster was only thirty-three when he suffered. It was he that made a motion for burning all the public libraries and books in France.

HANSARD, LUKE, an industrious and successful printer, was born at Norwich, in 1752. He served his apprenticeship in his native city; and, at its expiration, he started for London, with a good character, and one solitary guinea in his pocket. His first situation in London was that of a compositor in the printing-office of Mr. Hughes, printer to the House of Commons; in which he acquired the full confidence of his employer, and, by his indefatigable attention, extended the business. In 1774 Mr. Hansard became a partner in the concern; and when the whole of the business devolved upon him, by the death of Mr. Hughes, he spared no cost nor personal labour in performing the important duties entrusted to him. He amassed a very considerable property, and finished his useful and laborious life in 1828, aged 76.

HANWAY, JONAS, an eminent philanthropist, was born at Portsmouth, in 1712, and being bred a merchant, formed a connexion with a commercial house at St. Petersburg, in consequence of which he travelled into Persia, of which country he published an account, in 2 vols. 4to. He was the chief founder of the Marine Society and the Magdalen hospital; and contributed to the establishment of Sunday schools. He wrote several religious books; the best of which is entitled "Domestic Happiness promoted." But it is by his numerous acts of benevolence, more than by his writings, that Mr. Hanway will be remembered. He died in 1786, and a monument was erected to his memory in Westminster abbey.

century. Prolific as German writers in general are, honest Hans must ever be regarded as an extraordinary instance of poetical fertility, if what his countrymen assert be true, namely, that he wrote no less than ten thousand eight hundred and forty compositions in verse, among which are two hundred and eighteen comedies and tragedies! To this we are bound to add, as an additional proof of his industry, that he was a shoemaker, and worked all his life at the trade.

HARDENBERG, CHARLES AUGUSTUS, (baron, afterwards prince of); a famous Prussian statesman, born in 1750; became cabinet minister in 1793; and his signature will be found to most of the treaties of coalition against Napoleon, with Russia and Austria, till the battle of Austerlitz, in 1805; after which he retired (having been accused by the French party of wishing to preserve Hanover to England) for some time from public affairs; but returned to his post soon after, and in 1810 he was made chancellor of state. He was one of the Russian plenipotentiaries signing the treaty of Paris in 1814; was created prince; accompanied the allied sovereigns to London; was one of the most prominent actors at the congress of Vienna; and afterwards made president of the council of state. He was present, in 1818, at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle; in 1819, at Carlsbad; in 1820, at Vienna, at Troppau, and Verona. He died at Genoa, in 1832.

HARDER, JOHN JAMES, a physician of Basel, born in 1666, and died in 1711. He was professor of medicine, anatomy, and botany, at his native place, and for his merit was created a count of the empire. He wrote "Prodromus Physiologicus" and several other medical works.

HARDI, ALEXANDER, a French dramatist, who died at Paris in 1630. He wrote above six hundred plays, of which thirty-four were published, in 6 vols. 8vo., 1628. He has been reckoned the father of the stage, and, previous to Corneille's appearance, he ranked as their first tragic writer.

HARDICANUTE, king of England and Denmark, was the son of Canute, and succeeded his father on the Danish throne in 1035; and at the same time laid claim to that of England, which had devolved to his half-brother, Harold. A compromise was effected, by which he governed the southern part of the kingdom during Harold's life, and succeeded to the whole on his death. His conduct was violent and tyrannical; he revived the odious tax called danegelt; and his subjects rejoiced at his early death, which happened in 1041.

HARCOURT, Right Hon. WILLIAM, earl of, was born in 1745, and entered as ensign in the 1st foot guards, in 1759. He accompanied his father in 1761, when the earl was sent to conduct the destined consort of George III. from the court of Strelitz; and at his return received an appointment in the queen's household. While on duty in America he performed a singular service, by going in one day 70 miles, on the same horse, through an enemy's country, with only a patrol of thirty men, and bringing back general Lee, who had deserted from the British army; and whom he took out of his quarters when surrounded by 2000 of the American troops. On his return he was made aid-de-camp to the king, and had the command of the queen's regiment of light dragoons, which he held from 1779 till his death. In 1809 he succeeded to the family title and estates, and was made master of the horse to the queen. He was assistant to the chief mourner at the funeral of George III., bore the union standard in the coronation procession of George IV., and carried the baton of the commander-in-chief at the funeral of the duke of York. Died, 1830.

HARDING, THOMAS, an English divine, born at Combe-Martin, Devonshire, in 1612. He was educated in the Romish faith at Winchester, and New-college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1649 he was chosen Hebrew professor, and conformed to the established religion during that reign and the next. He was also tutor to lady Jane Grey, whom he instructed in the protestant faith. But on the accession of Mary he apostatized; for which his excellent pupil remonstrated with him, as appears by an admirable letter of hers preserved by Fox. In 1654 he took his doctor's degree, and was made prebendary of Winchester and treasurer of Salisbury. When Elizabeth came to the crown, Harding went to Louvain, where he carried on a long polemical controversy with bishop Jewel. Died, 1672.

HARDINGE, GEORGE, son of Nicholas Hardinge, who held the office of clerk to the House of Commons, was born in 1744. He was educated at Eton, and Trinity college, Cambridge, studied the law, and was called to the bar in 1769; attained the rank of a serjeant-at-law; and was subsequently appointed solicitor-general to queen Charlotte. In 1787 he was made a Welsh judge, and two years after, the queen's attorney-general. He died on the circuit, at Presteign, Radnorshire, in 1816. He was a man of cultivated talents, possessing a rich flow of convivial humour, joined to good sense and an acute judgment. Several of his parliamentary speeches and his contributions to miscellaneous literature have been published.

HARDION, JAMES, a French writer, was born at Tours, in 1686. He became a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and was appointed keeper of the library and antiquities in the royal cabinet. He had also the honour to instruct the princesses in history and geography, and for their use wrote his "Histoire Poétique," 3 vols. 12mo; and his Universal History, 18 vols. 12mo. Died, 1765.

HARDOUIN, JOHN, a learned French Jesuit, the author of several works, but remarkable as the author of one in particular, (which excited equal interest and animadversion at the time), the object of which was to show that almost all the writings under the names of the Greek and Roman poets and historians are the spurious productions of the 13th century. Born, 1647; died, 1729.

Thoughts, and Fenelon's Telemachus, into rhyme. Born, 1735; died, 1817.

HARDT, HERMAN VON DER, a German writer of great merit, born in 1660, at Melle, in Westphalia. He was librarian to the duke of Brunswick, and professor of the Oriental languages in the university of Helmstadt. He was afterwards rector of the gymnasium of Marienburg. Among his works are "Magnum Consilium Constantiense de universali Ecclesiæ Reformatione, unione, et fide," and "Historia literaria Reformationis." Died, 1746.

HARDWICKE, PHILIP YORKE, earl, an eminent English lawyer, was born at Dover in Kent, in 1690. After serving the offices of solicitor and attorney general, he was in 1733 appointed chief justice of the king's bench, and created a peer. In 1736 he was made lord chancellor, which situation he held twenty years. In 1754 he was created earl of Hardwicke. Died, 1764.

HARDWICKE, PHILIP YORKE, earl of, eldest son of the preceding, was born in 1720. In 1738 he was appointed one of the tellers of the exchequer; and in 1764 succeeded his father in the earldom. He died in 1790. Lord Hardwicke wrote a poem on the death of queen Caroline; and with his brother, the honourable Charles Yorke, projected the "Athenian Letters, or the Epistolary Correspondence of an Agent of the King of Persia, residing at Athens during the Peloponnesian War." A few copies only of this work were at first printed for private circulation; but in 1798 an elegant edition, in 3 vols. 4to., was published. Lord Hardwicke also printed "The Correspondence of Sir Dudley Carleton, in the Reign of James I.," and "Miscellaneous State Papers from 1601 to 1786."

HARDWICKE, PHILIP YORKE, the third earl of, was the eldest son of the Right Hon. Charles Yorke, lord chancellor of England, and was born in 1757. From 1801 to 1805 he filled the office of lord lieutenant of Ireland, and his viceroyalty was distinguished by wisdom and moderation, combined with firmness, courtesy, and hospitality. His lordship was through life, in fact, considered as a model of an English gentleman, munificent, accomplished, and public-spirited. He was high steward of the university of Cambridge, registrar of the court of Admiralty, LL.D. F.R.S. &c. &c. Died, 1834.

HARDY, SIR CHARLES, an English admiral, and the grandson of an eminent naval commander of the same name, in the reign of queen Anne. He had the command of the channel fleet in 1779, but died the same year at Spithead.

HARE, DR. FRANCIS, bishop of Chichester, and author of some celebrated polemic tracts, particularly those relating to the Bangorian controversy, in which he was an opponent of Hoadley. Died, 1740.

HARGRAVE, FRANCIS, an eminent legal writer and barrister, born in 1741. He was less distinguished at the bar than as a chamber counsel, and the author of numerous professional works. Among his publications are, "State Trials," 11 vols. folio; and "Juridical Arguments and Collections," 3 vols. 4to. Died, 1821.

HARIOT, THOMAS, an English mathematician, was born at Oxford, in 1560, and educated at St. Mary hall. He accompanied Sir Walter Raleigh to America, and published an account of the discovery of Virginia. He lived some time in Sion college, and died in 1621. His "Arus Analyticæ Praxis" was printed after his death, and there is great reason to believe that Descartes drew from it all his pretended discoveries in algebra.

HARLEY, ROBERT, earl of Oxford and Mortimer, a distinguished English statesman, was born in 1661. At the Revolution he was returned to the House of Commons for Tregony, in Cornwall; and in 1703 he was chosen speaker, which office he held while secretary of state, but resigned the latter place in 1708. In 1710 he again came into office, as a commissioner of the treasury, and chancellor of the exchequer. Shortly after, he was stabbed by the marquis of Guiscard, a Frenchman, when under examination at the council-board; but he recovered from his wound, and the assassin died in prison. He was then advanced to the peerage, and made lord high treasurer; which office he resigned a few days before the death of queen Anne, in 1714. On the accession of George I. he was impeached by the House of Commons, and committed to the Tower, where he was kept two years, and then, after a public trial, he was acquitted. After this, he retired wholly from public business, and died in 1734. Lord Oxford was a liberal encourager of literature, a decided patron of Pope and Swift, the author of some few pamphlets himself, and a great collector of books.

HARLOW, GEORGE HENRY, an English painter, was born in 1707; studied under Drummond and Sir Thomas Lawrence; and died in 1819. He produced several good pictures; among which is the well-known scene from Shakespeare's Henry the Eighth, containing portraits of the Kemble family and other distinguished actors.

HARMAR, JOHN, a learned divine, was the son of Dr. John Harmar, warden of Winchester, and born in 1594. He was educated at Winchester school, and Magdalen college, Oxford; he afterwards became master of the school at St. Alban's; and, in 1630, was made Greek professor at Oxford. In 1659 he was presented to the rectory of Ewhurst, in Hampshire, but was deprived of that and his professorship at the Restoration. His chief publications are, "Præcis Grammaticæ;" "Janua Linguarum;" and "Lexicon Etymologicum Græcum." He wrote Latin and Greek panegyrics on Oliver Cromwell, Richard his son, and Charles II. Died, 1670.

HARMER, THOMAS, a dissenting minister at Wattenfield, in Suffolk, was born in 1715, and became eminent as an oriental scholar. His chief work is entitled, "Observations on divers Passages of Scripture, illustrated by Accounts of Travellers in the East." Died, 1768.

HAROLD I., surnamed Harefoot, king of England, succeeded his father, Canute, in 1035. He reigned four years, and died in 1040.

HAROLD II., king of England, was the second son of Godwin, earl of Kent. Upon the death of Edward the Confessor, in 1066, he took possession of the throne, without attending to the more legal claim of Edgar Atheling, or the asserted bequest of Edward in favour of William, duke of Normandy. The latter accordingly invaded England with a large army, and Harold fell at the memorable battle of Hastings, Oct. 14, 1066; by which the conquest of the kingdom was effected, and the Norman rule began.

HAROUN, or AARON AL RASCHID, a celebrated caliph of the Saracens, ascended the throne in 786, and was the most potent prince of his race, ruling over territories extending from Egypt to Khorassan. He gained many splendid victories over the Greek emperors, and obtained immense renown for his bravery, magnificence, and love of letters; but he was cruel and tyrannical. Died, 808.

HARPALUS, an ancient Greek astronomer, who flourished about 480 B. C.

HARPE, JOHN FRANCIS DE LA, a French dramatic poet, was born in 1739. His father was an officer in the army, and, dying in indigence, the son was taken into the college of Harcourt by the president, M. Asselin; but lost the favour of his patron, by a satire, of which he was suspected to be the author. After a confinement of some time he was set at liberty; but it disgusted him with his situation, and he resolved to trust to his talents as an author for support. In 1763 he wrote his tragedy of "Warwick," which met with great success. This was followed by "Timoleon," "Pharamond," and some others, not equally successful. But when his series of Eloges appeared, they gained him great credit, particularly one on Henri Quatre. During the fury of the revolution, though he embraced the principles of republicanism, the moderation of his views rendered him an object of suspicion, and he was thrown into prison in 1793. Though sentenced to deportation, he regained his liberty, and lived in retirement till the time of his death, in 1803. His principal work is "Lyceum, or a complete course of Literature," 12 vols. 8vo.

HARRINGTON, JOHN, lord, was the eldest son of lord and lady Harrington, to whose care James I. committed his daughter Elizabeth, afterwards the wife of Frederic, elector palatine and king of Bohemia. He died at the age of 22, in 1613. His lordship was the intimate companion and correspondent of Henry prince of Wales, and the letters which passed between them, in Latin, are extant.

HARRINGTON, Right Hon. CHARLES, earl of, G.C.B. was born in 1753, and entered the army as an ensign in 1769, and served first in America. After that campaign, he purchased a company in the foot guards; and then, having received the command of the 85th, he proceeded to the West Indies, and on his return was made one of his majesty's aides-de-camp. In 1783, the king, who honoured him with his personal friendship, presented him with the colonelcy of the 65th; and in 1792, he became colonel of the 1st regiment of life guards. Died, 1829.

HARRINGTON, JAMES, a celebrated political writer, was born, in 1611, in Northamptonshire. His chief work is entitled "Oceana," a political romance, in which he defended republicanism. In 1661, he was, on a charge of treason, sent to the Tower, from whence he was removed to St. Nicholas's Island, near Plymouth, but was afterwards released on bail. He died, dejected in his intellects, in 1677.

HARRIS, JOHN, an English divine and mathematician, who was secretary to the Royal Society, and died in 1719. He published a translation of Pardie's Elements of Geometry, a "History of the County of Kent," &c.; but he is best known by having been the first projector of a Cyclopaedia, or Dictionary of Sciences. This work was entitled, "Lexicon Technicum," in 3 vols. folio.

HARRIS, JAMES, a philological writer, was born at Salisbury, in 1700. In 1774 he was made secretary and comptroller to the queen; and died in 1780. He wrote "Three Treatises; the first concerning Art; the second concerning Music, Painting, and Poetry; and the third concerning Happiness;" "Hermes, or a Philosophical Enquiry concerning Universal Grammar," "Philosophical Enquiries," &c. His "Hermes" displays much ingenuity, and an extensive acquaintance with the writings of the Greek poets and philosophers.

HARRIS, WALTER, a physician, was born in 1647, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowship. He embraced the Roman catholic religion, and went to France; but afterwards returned to London; renounced popery; and at the Revolution was appointed physician to the king.

HARRIS, WILLIAM, a Baptist minister at Honiton, in Devonshire. He wrote the Lives of James I., Charles I. and II., Oliver Cromwell, and Hugh Peters, in the manner of Bayle, in 5 vols. folio. Died, 1770.

HARRIS, General Lord GEORGE, colonel of the 73d foot, and governor of Dumbarton castle, entered the army as a cadet in the royal artillery, before he was 13 years of age, in 1759. He served during the campaign in America, and received a wound in the head at the battle of Bunker's Hill, which obliged him to be trepanned and to be sent home; but he returned in time to take the field previously to the army landing on Long Island. He subsequently distinguished himself in India, and continued in active service until the capture of Seringapatam; when his services were rewarded with the honours of the Bath, and a British peerage. Died, 1829.

HARRISON, JOHN, celebrated as the inventor of the time-keeper for ascertaining the longitude at sea, was born at Foulby, near Pontefract, Yorkshire, in 1693. His father, a carpenter or builder, brought him up to the same occupation; but by dint of his own ingenuity and perseverance, he learned to make clocks and watches; and having turned his attention to the improvement of pocket watches, he was induced to make a time keeper, in that form, which he finished in 1759. This chronometer, in two voyages, having been found to correct the longitude within the limits required by the act of parliament, Harrison applied for the proposed reward of 20,000*l.* which he received. Died, 1776.

HARRISON, THOMAS, an architect, was born, in 1744, at Richmond, in Yorkshire; and having studied in Italy, returned to England, and attained considerable eminence in his profession. Died, 1829.

HARRISON, JOHN, one of the regicide judges who sat upon the trial of Charles I., was the son of a butcher, and became a general in the parliamentary army. He was one of the ten who were executed for that act, after the Restoration.

HART, Lieut.-general GEORGE VAUGHAN, entered the army in 1775, as an ensign in the 46th foot, and immediately embarked with his regiment for North America. He was present at many actions and dangerous enterprises during the difficult and disastrous campaigns of Sir William Howe; in which he acquitted himself with great credit, and was promoted to a lieutenancy. He was next employed in expeditions to St. Lucia, Barbadoes, and other places in the West Indies; and, being raised to the command of a company, in 1781, he returned for a short time to England. He next accompanied major-general Meadows, as his aid-de-camp, on an expedition to Buenos Ayres; but this design being abandoned, they were destined for the capture of the Cape of Good Hope. This also was frustrated, in consequence of their being attacked and disabled by a French squadron, under admiral Suffrein, at Praya Bay; but having captured a Dutch East India ship, in which authentic accounts were found of Madras being in imminent danger from the invasion of Hyder Ally, major-general Meadows instantly proceeded thither with his troops. Captain Hart had been promoted to the majority of the 75th; and was now employed in the several capacities of aid-de-camp, military secretary, and deputy-adjutant-general. He was present at the siege and capture of Bangalore; at the assault of the hill forts of Nundy Droog, and Seven Droog; the first and second sieges of Seringapatam; and with lord Cornwallis's army until the conclusion of that war. In 1795, he became lieutenant-colonel of the 75th; and, in 1798, was promoted to the rank of colonel. He was afterwards personally present at the assault and capture of Seringapatam, where, with a detachment of the Bombay army, to which he then belonged, he took and maintained the advanced post of Argaum, where all the enfilading batteries were erected. He was then placed in command of the newly-conquered province of Canara, and resided chiefly at Mangalore, the great naval arsenal of Tippoo Sultan, until his third and final departure from the East Indies. On his return home he was placed on the staff in Ireland; appointed major-general in 1805; and lieutenant-general in 1811; and subsequently, to the command of the northern district. He represented, for many years, the county of Donegal, in parliament; and was governor of Londonderry and Culmore. When the gallant general Sir W. Meadows died, in 1813, he bequeathed his sword, a silver cup, and one thousand pounds to his old friend and brother officer, by whom he had been so closely accompanied during many years of his active and valuable life. General Hart died at his seat, Kildare, Ireland, in 1832, aged 60.

HARTE, WALTER, an English poet and historian, was born and educated at Marlborough in Wiltshire. He published a poetical collection, called the "Amaranth;" a History of Gustavus Adolphus, 2 vols. 4to.; and Essays on Husbandry. Died, 1773.

HARTLEY, DAVID, an English physician, was born at Armley, in Yorkshire, in 1705, and died at Bath, in 1787. He wrote an excellent work, entitled, "Observations on Man," 2 vols. 8vo.

HARTLEY, DAVID, son of the preceding, was born in 1730; educated at Merton college, Oxford; became M.P. for Hall; was distinguished by his strenuous opposition to the American war; and was appointed one of the negotiators to treat with Dr. Franklin. He had the merit of several ingenious inventions, one of which is a mode of securing buildings from fire. Died, 1813.

HARTMANN, PHILIP JAMES, an eminent German physician, distinguished for his researches concerning natural history and comparative anatomy. He wrote some valuable papers which are extant in the Miscellanea Curiosorum Naturæ.

HARTSOEKER, NICHOLAS, a Dutch metaphysician and natural philosopher, was born at Gouda, in 1656. He became professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, and mathematician to the elector palatine. He died in 1725. He wrote a "Course of Natural Philosophy," "Physical Conjectures," and other scientific works. He was very successful in the construction of telescopes; and to his discovery of the spermatic animalcules, physiologists are indebted for a new theory of generation.

HARTZHEIM, JOSEPH, a learned jesuit, was born at Cologne, in 1694. He became professor of Greek and Hebrew at Milan, but afterwards returned to Cologne, where he held the chair of philosophy and divinity. Among his works are "Summa Historiæ omnis ab Exordio Rerum ad Ann. à Christo nato;" "Bibliotheca Scriptorum Colonialium;" "Dissertationes historico-critice in Sacram Scripturam," &c. He also edited and published the Councils of Germany, 4 vols. folio. Died, 1763.

HARVARD, JOHN, a non-conformist divine, who died in 1688, at Charlestown, in New England. He is deserving of commemoration by being the founder of a college bearing his name, at Cambridge, in North America.

HARVEY, WILLIAM, a celebrated physician, was born at Folkstone, in Kent, in 1578. He discovered the circulation of the blood, of which he published an account in 1628, entitled, "Exercitatio Anatomica de Motu Cordis et Sanguinis." In 1633 he was made physician to Charles I., and adhered faithfully to the king; for which, in 1645, he was chosen warden of Merton college, Oxford; but when the parliamentary visitors came there, he left it for London. In 1651 appeared his "Exercitationes de generations animalium." The following year he presented to the college a convocation room, and museum filled with books and instruments. After this he gave up his paternal estate to their use, on condition that a yearly oration (now called "the Harveian") should be delivered in the college, and provision made for the keeper of the library and museum. Died, 1658.

HARWOOD, Sir BUSICK, an English physician and anatomist, was a native of Newmarket. After attending the London hospitals, he went out to India as an army-surgeon; and there, having the good luck to cure one of the native princes of a dangerous wound, it speedily raised him to fortune and reputation. In 1790 he was appointed professor of medicine at Downing college; was knighted in 1806; and died in 1814.

HASSAN PACHA, grand vizier of the Ottoman empire, was an African by birth, and when young served in the Algerine navy. Being taken prisoner by the Spaniards, and sent to Naples, he found means of obtaining his liberty, went to Constantinople, and entered into the Turkish service. Here he soon distinguished himself by his superior skill and bravery, and was appointed capitan pacha, or high admiral. He vanquished the Egyptian insurgents; took Gaza, Jafia, and Acre; and beheaded the famous Daher, shiek of the latter city, who had for years defied the power of the Porte. He twice reduced the beys of Egypt to subjection, and carried with him vast treasures to Constantinople. In the war between Turkey and Russia, in 1790, although Hassan was then eighty-five years old, he was appointed to the supreme command of all the forces, and made grand vizier; but though there was no want of energy on his part, age had impaired his abilities, and the Ottoman forces were subjected to repeated discomfiture. The vizier was accordingly dismissed from his high command; and he died in 1799.

HASE, HENRY, chief cashier of the Bank of England. He possessed extraordinary abilities; and from his strict attention to business, great arithmetical attainments, and unswerving integrity of principle, rose gradually from a comparatively low station, to the office of chief cashier, on the death of Mr. Abraham Newland.

HASE, THEODORE DE, a German divine, was born at Bremen, in 1682. On completing his studies, he became professor of belles lettres at Hanaui; was next appointed professor of Hebrew and minister at Bremen; and in 1723 he obtained the theological chair. He was the author of "Dissertations," which are much esteemed; and he assisted Lampe in his "Bibliotheca Historico-Philologico-Theologica." Died, 1731.

HASSE, JOHN ADOLPHUS, chapel-master of Augustus, king of Poland and elector of Saxony, was born at Bergeford, near Hamburgh, in 1659. After making several tours through the Continent, and gaining great success, by composing operas for the chief theatres of Italy, he came to London, in 1733, where he was received with great distinction. He soon, however, went to Dresden, and finally removed to Venice, where he died, in 1783. Hasse is deservedly celebrated as the most natural, elegant, and judicious composer of his time.—His wife FAUSTINA, who died in the same year, aged ninety, was eminent as the inventor of a new method of singing, by running divisions with astonishing neatness and precision.

HASSELQUIST, FREDERIC, a Swedish naturalist, and one of the most celebrated of all the pupils of Linnæus, was born in 1732. Having formed the scheme of making researches, on the spot, into the natural history of Palestine, he embarked for Smyrna in August, 1749, went to Egypt, remained some time at Jerusalem, and afterwards visited other parts of the country. Returning to Smyrna, he brought with him an admirable collection of plants, minerals, fishes, reptiles, insects, and other natural curiosities. His "Iter Palæstinum; or, a Journey to the Holy Land," was derived from his journal, and was drawn up by Linnæus.

HASTED, EDWARD, a topographer and antiquary, was born at Hawley, the seat of his family, in Kent, in 1732. He devoted the greatest part of his life to the labour of compiling a History of his Native County, which was published in 4 vols. folio, 1799. At one time he possessed a competent landed property, and acted as chairman at the quarter-sessions at Canterbury; but being reduced in his circumstances, owing to an expensive litigation with regard to some of his Kentish property, he was presented by Lord Radnor to the mastership of the hospital at Corsham, in Wiltshire, where he died in 1812.

HASTINGS, Lady ELIZABETH, daughter of Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon, was born in 1662. She remained single through life, and distinguished herself by works of piety and benevolence. She erected schools, built churches, supported many indigent families, and founded five scholarships in Queen's college, Oxford. Died, 1739.

HASTINGS, WARREN, was born in 1733, at Churchill, Oxfordshire, where his father was the clergyman. He was educated at Westminster, and at the age of seventeen went out to India as a writer in the Company's service. On his arrival he applied with diligence to the duties of his station, and at his leisure studied the oriental languages. After fourteen years' residence in Bengal he returned to England; but in 1760 he went out as second in council at Madras, where he remained about two years, and then removed to the presidency of Calcutta. This was a critical period, and the state of Hindostan soon became perilous from the revolt of the native subjects, the defection of allies, and the increasing power of Hyder Ally, the sovereign of Mysore; aided by the land and sea-forces of France. In this exigency the governor-general had to depend solely upon his own exertions; and he succeeded beyond all expectations, in saving British India from a combination of enemies, and in increasing and strengthening the power of the Company at the expense of the native princes. Notwithstanding this, party spirit at home turned the merit of Mr. Hastings into a crime, and charges were brought against him in parliament. In 1786 he returned to England; when he was accused of having governed arbitrarily and tyrannically; of having extorted immense sums of money; and of having exercised every species of oppression. An impeachment followed, which, in contempt of all the principles of justice, lasted nine years. He was at length acquitted, and sentenced to pay only the costs of prosecution (71,030*l.* sterling) for which the East India Company indemnified him by a pension of 4,000*l.* for life. He lived, however, to see his plans for the security of India publicly applauded; and died in 1818. Mr. Hastings was a man of mild and unassuming manners, and an elegant scholar. He wrote "A Narrative of the Insurrection at Benares," "Memoirs relative to the State of India," some fugitive poetry, &c.

HASTINGS, FRANCIS RAWDON, marquis of, son of the earl of Moira, was born in 1754, and entered the army in 1771. He greatly distinguished himself in the American war; was appointed, in 1778, adjutant-general of the British forces there, and rose to the rank of a brigadier-general; but a severe illness compelled him to return home before the conclusion of hostilities, when he was made ad-de-camp to the king, and created an English peer. Advanced to the rank of a major-general in the summer of 1794, he was sent, with a reinforcement of 10,000 men, to join the duke of York, opposed to the French in Holland; and materially contributed to mitigate the disasters of that memorable campaign. When the Whigs, with whom he had acted, came into power, in 1806, he was appointed master-general of the ordnance, which post he resigned on the fall of his party. In 1812 he obtained the appointment of governor-general of British India, which he held till 1823; and during the ten years of his sway he overcame the Nepaulese, the Pindarees, and other native powers, and rendered the British authority supreme in India. While absent he was created marquis of Hastings. Ill health compelled him to return; and in 1824 he was appointed governor of Malta; but his health growing worse, his lordship proceeded to Naples, and died on board the Revenge, in Bala Bay, Nov. 20th, 1825. He was an excellent officer, an acute statesman, and a man of a noble-minded and generous disposition. The marquis left a letter, in which, among other requests, he desired that his right hand might be cut off, and preserved until the death of the marchioness, and be put into the coffin to be buried with her. The hand was taken off as he desired.

HATSFELD, JOHN, chief clerk to the House of Commons, was born about 1733; was educated at Cambridge; studied at the Middle Temple; became chief clerk in 1768; retired from office in 1797; and died in 1820. He was the author of a "Collection of Cases of Privilege of Parliament;" "Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons," 6 vols. 4to.; and "Rules and Standing Orders of the House," &c.

HATFIELD, THOMAS, bishop of Durham, was the especial favourite of Edward III., at whose desire he was elected to the bishopric in 1345. He distinguished himself soon after his consecration, by repelling the Scots, who had invaded the principality, and were defeated by lord Percy and the bishop in person, at the head of their respective forces. On this occasion the king of Scotland fell into the hands of the victors, and was afterwards ransomed. He was the founder of Trinity college, Oxford, which was at first called Durham college. He also built a palace for himself and his successors, in the Strand, called Durham-house; and he founded a Carmelite friary, at Northallerton, in Yorkshire. He died in 1381, and was buried in his cathedral, where his effigies are still to be seen.

HATTO, or HATTO VERCELLENSIS, was bishop of Vercelli, in Italy, in the tenth century. His work on the grievances of the church, (which is curiously illustrative of the spirit and complexion of the times), together with his canons and epistles, were published in 1768.

HATTON, SIR CHRISTOPHER, an eminent statesman, and lord chancellor of England, was born at Holdenby, in Northamptonshire; educated at St. Mary hall, Oxford; and studied at the Inner Temple. Instead, however, of following the law, he became a courtier, and attracted the queen's notice by his graceful dancing in a masque. From this time he rose to several degrees of favour, and, in 1687, was made both chancellor and knight of the garter. His inexperience created much prejudice against him at first, but his excellent natural capacity and sound judgment were seldom found defective either in judgment or equity. He died in 1691 of a broken heart, as some historians affirm, occasioned by the queen's demanding a debt, which he was unable to pay. He wrote the fourth act in the tragedy of Tancred and Sigismunda; and to him is ascribed "A Treatise concerning Statutes or Acts of Parliament."

HATZFELD, FRANCIS LOUIS, prince of, was born at Vienna, in 1756, and was governor at Berlin, when the French entered that city in 1806. The French having discovered that prince Hatzfeld continued to give the Prussian government information, &c., Napoleon ordered him to be tried as a spy. The wife of the prince being informed of the danger, hastened to Napoleon, and threw herself at his feet, assuring him that her husband was incapable of doing a dishonourable action; but when the emperor showed her the letter, and she recognized the hand-writing of the prince, she fainted away. On her recovering, Napoleon told her that she held in her hand the only document there was against her husband, and asked her why she did not burn it. The hint was of course sufficient, and Napoleon pardoned him. The Memorial of Las Cases contains the affecting letter which Napoleon wrote on this occasion to the empress. Hatzfeld was afterwards employed on various diplomatic missions, and died, at Vienna, in 1827.

HAUBOLD, CHRISTIAN GOTTLIEB, a celebrated German jurist, was born at Dresden, in 1766. He was made doctor of law in 1788; and eventually became ordinary professor of law in the university of Leipsic. He was profoundly versed in the science of jurisprudence; and in the study of Roman law, more especially, to which he directed all the powers of his mind, there scarcely ever was his equal. As an academical instructor he was pre-eminent, and crowds of students from all parts of Germany flocked to his lecture-room. His library, consisting of nearly 10,000 volumes, on Greek and Roman law, was purchased by the emperor Alexander for the university of Abo.

HAUGWITZ, CHRISTIAN HENRY CHAS., count of, an eminent Prussian statesman, was born in Silesia, in 1758. When the Prussian minister, Hertzberg, retired from public affairs, Frederic William entrusted Haugwitz with the portfolio of foreign affairs and the presidency of the cabinet. In this situation he gave the king great satisfaction, and was rewarded with the order of the black eagle, and the grant of estates in South Prussia. When Frederic William III. ascended the throne, Haugwitz retained his station; and the tendency of his policy was to bring France and Prussia into a closer connexion. But, when the French troops occupied Hanover, in 1803, this step appeared dangerous to the neutrality of northern Germany, which Prussia had sought to maintain, and the views of the king were changed. Haugwitz now retired to his estates; and Hardenberg, who succeeded him, adopted a different system, so that Prussia remained neutral. In 1805, Haugwitz left his retreat, to negotiate with Napoleon at Vienna; and concluded, after the battle of Austerlitz, the convention by which Hanover was ceded to Prussia, and the neutrality of northern Germany was acknowledged. But this treaty involved his country with England, while her position with France became more embarrassing than ever. Haugwitz then went to Paris to reconcile contending interests, but returned without effecting his object, and once more retired to his estates in Silesia. He died, at Vienna, in 1832.

HAUKSBEE, FRANCIS, an English philosopher of the 18th century, who made many experimental discoveries in electricity, and published them.

HAUTEFEUILLE, JOHN, a mechanic, was born at Orleans, in 1647. He made several discoveries and improvements in clock-making; and invented the spiral spring which moderates the vibration of balance-wheels in watches, which Huygens afterwards perfected. He also wrote several short treatises on mechanical subjects; also, "The Art of Breathing under Water;" "The Perpetual Pendulum;" "A new System of the Flux and Reflux of the Sea," &c. Died, 1724.

HAUY, RENE JUST, abbé, a celebrated mineralogist, born at St. Just, in Picardy, in 1742. He first studied theology, and was twenty-one years professor of languages. But mineralogy was his favourite pursuit; and to him science is indebted for an admirable theory of crystallization, founded on geometrical laws. In 1783 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences; and, wholly devoting himself to his studies, he long remained a stranger to the revolution, and all its horrors. But at length, having refused to take the oath of obedience to the constitution required of the priests, he was deprived of his place, and was arrested, in the midst of his calculations, as a recusant priest. He was, however, released; and was subsequently appointed, by Buonaparte, professor of mineralogy at the botanic garden, and to the faculty of sciences, at Paris. In 1803, at the command of Napoleon, he wrote his "Traité de Physique;" and when the emperor, after his return from Elba, visited the museum, he said to Haüy, "I read your physics again in Elba, with the greatest interest;" and then decorated him with the badges of the legion of honour. The esteem which the emperor had for this distinguished man was the more honourable, both to him and to Haüy, as the latter had opposed Buonaparte's elevation to the imperial dignity, by signing nay when the question was proposed for the ratification of the nation. He died in 1822, aged 80. His treatises on Mineralogy, Crystallography, and Natural History, are all highly esteemed; and his beautiful collection of minerals, for which he had refused an offer of 600,000 francs, was bought by the duke of Buckingham.

HAUY, VALENTINE, a brother of the preceding, born in 1746, was the founder of the institution for the blind at Paris. The institution did not, however, succeed to the extent anticipated, and was therefore abandoned; but a pension of 2000 francs was granted to him, and he accepted an invitation to go to St. Petersburg, to undertake one there. He returned to Paris in 1806, and died a few months before his brother, in 1822.

HAVERCAMP, SIGEBERT, a celebrated philologist, was born at Utrecht, in 1643; and became professor of Greek, history, and eloquence, at Leyden. From travelling in Italy, he derived a taste for the study of medals and coins, and published some excellent treatises on numismatics. But his chief fame lay in his critical editions of classic authors; of which his Terullian, Lucretius, Josephus, Orosius, Salust, and Censorinus, afford ample evidence. Died, 1742.

HAWES, STEPHEN, a poet of the fifteenth century, was a native of Suffolk, and educated at Oxford. He afterwards held a situation in the household of Henry VII., who took great pleasure in his conversation. His works are, "Pastime of Pleasure," "The Temple of Glass," &c.

HAWES, WILLIAM, an English physician, and founder of the Humane Society, was born at Islington, in 1753; studied medicine, and followed the profession of an apothecary, which he practised in the Strand until 1780, when he took his degrees as a physician. Before this, however, he had become deservedly popular by his zealous exertions in the establishment of the Humane Society, to the benefits of which institution he may truly be said to have devoted the best part of his life. He wrote several useful tracts, and among others, "An Examination of the Rev. John Wesley's Primitive Physic," being at once an ironical and serious exposure of the absurdities of that production. This benevolent physician died in 1808.

HAWKE, EDWARD, lord, a brave British admiral, was the son of an eminent barrister, and entered into the navy at an early age. In 1734 he obtained the command of a man-of-war, and distinguished himself by his bravery in the famous engagement in 1744, wherein the British fleet was commanded by Matthews, Lastock, and Rowley. In 1747 he was made rear-admiral of the white, when he defeated a large French fleet, and captured five ships of the line; on which he was created knight of the bath. In 1759 he defeated admiral Coadans, off Belleisle, and was rewarded with a pension of 2000*l.* a-year. In 1763 he was appointed vice-admiral of Great Britain, and first lord of the admiralty. In 1776 he was created a British peer; and died in 1781.

HAWKESWORTH, JOHN, LL.D. the son of a watchmaker at Bromley, Kent, was born in 1716, and apprenticed to his father's trade; but he soon left it for literary pursuits, and eventually became an author of eminence. He is chiefly remembered by his "Adventurer," a series of periodical essays; and the following sentence, taken from the last number of that work, is inscribed on a marble monument erected to his memory in Bromley church. "The hour is hastening, in which, whatever praise or censure I have acquired, will be remembered with equal indifference. Time, who is impatient to date my last paper, will shortly moulder the hand which is now writing it in the dust, and still the breast that now throbs at the reflection. But let not this be read as something that relates only to another; for a few years only can divide the eye that is now reading from the hand that has written." Died, 1773.

HAWKINS, SIR JOHN, a brave English admiral under queen Elizabeth, was a native of Devonshire. He was rear-admiral of the fleet, which she sent against the Spanish Armada, and had a great share in that glorious victory. He was afterwards made treasurer of the navy. But his memory is disgraced by his being the first European who carried off slaves from the coast of Africa, and introduced that inhuman traffic into the West Indies. Queen Elizabeth herself, while she honoured his bravery by knighthood, threatened him with the divine vengeance for this practice. He died in the West Indies in 1593, aged 74.

HAWKINS, SIR JOHN, a lawyer and miscellaneous writer of the 18th century, was born in London, in 1719. He practised as a solicitor, with reputation, for some years; and having made general literature the study of his leisure hours, he also wrote for the periodical press. A taste for music led him to become a member of the Academy of Ancient Music; and in 1743 he was chosen a member of the literary club, established by Dr. Johnson, with whom he formed an acquaintance which lasted during their joint lives. Having, in 1753, married a lady of great fortune, and becoming possessed of a much greater one in 1759, on the death of her brother, he gave up his profession, and became a magistrate for Middlesex.

His principal work is "A General History of the Science and Practice of Music," in 8 vols. 4to; and his edition, with notes, of "Isaac Walton's Complete Angler," acquired deserved popularity. Died, 1789.

HAWKER, DR. ROBERT, an evangelical clergyman of some note, who, for half a century, was vicar of the parish of Charles the Martyr, at Plymouth. He was the author of a commentary on the Bible, sermons, and other religious works. Died, 1827.

HAWKWOOD, SIR JOHN, a general of the fourteenth century, who distinguished himself in the wars of Edward I., and received the honour of knighthood from that monarch. After the peace of 1360 he associated with other soldiers of fortune, who harried and plundered their old enemies, the French, notwithstanding the cessation of national hostilities. From France they passed into Italy, where Sir John found employment in the service of Pisa, and next in that of Florence, which state he defended so successfully, that his death, in 1363, was considered as a public loss.

HAWLEY, JOSEPH, a distinguished American patriot, was born, in 1734, at Northampton, Massachusetts, and being bred a lawyer, soon acquired great eminence in his profession. But he was mostly distinguished for his knowledge of political history and the principles of free government—a circumstance that rendered him one of the ablest advocates of American liberty in the legislature, previous to and during the contest between the colonies and the parent state. Died, 1788.

HAY, JAMES, earl of Carlisle, who came to England with James I., was the first Scotchman created an English peer. His first title was baron Hay, he was afterwards made viscount Doncaster, and lastly, earl of Carlisle. Died, 1632.

HAY, WILLIAM, an English writer, was born at Gledbourne, in Sussex, about 1700, and died in 1785. He was member for the borough of Seaford; and he wrote "Religio Philosophi;" an "Essay on Deformity;" and other pieces.

HAYDN, JOSEPH, an eminent German musician, was born, 1732, in the village of Rohrau, on the borders of Hungary and Austria. He was the son of a poor wheelwright, who, having a taste for music, played the harp on Sundays, his mother accompanying with her voice; a circumstance which accounts for the strong predilection which their son showed for the sciences even in his infancy. When but eight years old, he became a chorister in St. Stephen's, and at ten years of age, composed pieces for several voices. With his fine soprano, he lost his place, and his situation was very discouraging; but he had the good fortune to become acquainted with prince Esterhazy, who placed him at the head of his private chapel. For this prince he composed some beautiful symphonies,—a department in which he excelled all other composers,—and the greatest part of his fine quartets. When, after a period of about twenty years, the prince reduced his court, and Haydn received his discharge, he went to London, to which capital he had often been invited. In 1794, having made a second journey thither, he found a most splendid reception, and the university of Oxford conferred upon him the degree of doctor of music. On his return from England, he purchased a small house and garden in one of the suburbs of Vienna, where he died. To the English public he is universally known, by his noble oratorio of the "Creation," which is considered a chef-d'œuvre. Among his numerous works are "The Seasons," an oratorio; also a Te Deum, a Missa, with many concerts, marches, masses, &c. He was inexhaustible in invention and execution—always new and original—always surprising and satisfying his enraptured hearers. Died, 1809.

HAYES, WILLIAM, a musical composer, was originally organist of St. Mary's, Shrewsbury; from whence he removed to Christ-church, Oxford, where he took his degrees in music, and was elected professor in that faculty. He published a collection of English ballads; but is best known by his church compositions and catches. He defended Handel against Avonon, in a pamphlet written with some asperity. Born, 1706; died, 1777.

HAYES, CHARLES, a mathematician, born in 1078. He published a Treatise on Fluxions, and some other mathematical pieces; besides several works of a theological nature. Died, 1700.

HAYLEY, WILLIAM, an English poet, was born at Chichester, in 1745. After quitting Trinity college, Cambridge, he settled at Earthing, in Sussex, and devoted his time principally to literature. He was the author of an "Essay on History, in three poetical Epistles to Edward Gibbon;" "Triumphs of Temper;" "Essays on Painting and Sculpture;" a prose "Essay on Old Maids," 3 vols.; and lastly, "The Life and Correspondence of the poet Cowper." Died, 1820.

HAYNE, ISAAC, a colonel in the American army, and a martyr (according to the opinion of many of his countrymen) to the cause of independence, was descended from a highly respectable family in South Carolina. After the capitulation of Charlestown, he consented to subscribe a declaration of his allegiance to the king of Great Britain, provided he might not be compelled to bear arms against his countrymen. He was summoned, however, after the successes of Greene had changed the face of affairs, to repair immediately to the British standard. This he refused, as a violation of the compact he had entered into, and hastened to the American camp. Being shortly after taken prisoner by the English, he was tried, and condemned to be hanged, "for having been found under arms, and employed in raising a regiment to oppose the British government, though he had become a subject and accepted the protection of that government." This cruel sentence, notwithstanding the mitigating circumstances of the case, was accordingly put into execution Aug. 4, 1781.

HAYMAN, FRANCIS, an English painter, and one of the first members of the Royal Academy, was born in 1708, at Exeter. Coming to London when young, he was employed as a scene-painter at Drury-lane theatre. The principal productions of his pencil are historical paintings, with which he decorated some of the apartments at Vauxhall. He also furnished designs for the illustration of the works of Shakespeare, Milton, Pope, Cervantes, &c. Died, 1776.

HAYM, NICHOLAS FRANCIS, a musical professor of Rome, who came to England at the beginning of the eighteenth century, and attempted to establish an Italian opera, but with indifferent success. He also tried other schemes, among which was the publication of "Il Tesoro Britannico," 2 vols. 4to. or a description of coins, gems, &c. in English cabinets, besides an able work on Italian bibliography, and two tragedies. Died, 1730.

HAYNE, THOMAS, a learned schoolmaster and divine, born at Thrusington, in Leicestershire, in 1581. He took his degrees in Lincoln college, Oxford; after which he became one of the ushers at Christ's Hospital, where he died in 1643. He endowed a school at Thrusington, and founded two scholarships in Lincoln college. His works are "Grammatices Latine Compendium;" "Linguarum Cognatio;" "The Life and Death of Luther," &c.

HAYNES, HORRON, paymaster of the mint, and principally tally-writer of the exchequer, was the author of a book, entitled, "The Scripture Account of the Attributes and Worship of God, and of the Character and Offices of Jesus Christ. Died, 1749.

HAYNES, SAMUEL, son of the preceding, was canon of Windsor, and rector of Clithall and Hatfield, Hertfordshire. He published a collection of state papers relating to Henry VIII. Edward VI. Mary, and Elizabeth. Died, 1652.

HAYWARD, SIR JOHN, an English historian, who flourished in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. Some passages in his "Life of Henry IV." concerning hereditary right in matters of succession, gave great offence to the queen, and he was thrown into prison; but upon the accession of James he was released, resumed his literary labours, obtained the honour of knighthood, and continued to receive proofs of court favour during the remainder of his life. Died, 1627.

HAYWOOD, ELIZABETH, an ingenious writer, was born in London in 1693, and died in 1756. She published the "Female Spectator," 4 vols.; "Epistles for the Ladies," 2 vols.; "Fortunate Foundling;" "Adventures of Nature," &c.

HAZLITT, WILLIAM, a distinguished modern writer, both as a critic and essayist, was the son of a dissenting minister, and educated at the Unitarian College at Hackney. He began life as an artist; but though he always preserved an intense love for the arts, he soon relinquished the pencil for the pen; and when he was not borne away by violent prejudices, he appeared as one of the most able, powerful, and judicious critics of the day. Besides being a constant contributor for many years to the Morning Chronicle and Examiner newspapers, he occasionally wrote in others; and was so alert and indefatigable, that he was continually producing some new work of sterling merit. Among the most popular of his writings are several volumes collected from periodical works, under the titles of "Table Talk," "The Spirit of the Age," and "The Plain Speaker." The largest and most elaborate, though not the most successful of his works, is the "Life of Napoleon," 4 vols. His "Characters of Shakspeare's Plays" attracted much notice; as did also his "View of the English Stage," "Political Essays and Sketches of Public Characters," "The Literature of the Elizabethan Age," "The Modern Pygmalion," &c. His last work was a very interesting volume, entitled "Conversations of James Northcote, Esq. R. A." A contemporary writer, in an eulogistic analysis of his character and abilities, makes the following remarks: "Connected with the philosophical examination of painting and sculpture, the drama and the theatre came naturally within his inquiries. Into these subjects he poured the tide of his luminous mind, and soon acquired the reputation of being one of the highest critical authorities on the drama and the fine arts. He penetrated boldly, and wrote graphically; and whether his opinions were always profound or just, you felt that they were dextrously said, and hardly cared to question farther." Died, 1830.

HEARD, Sir ISAAC, garter principal king-at-arms, was born at Ottery St. Mary, Devon, in 1730. In the early part of his life he served, as a volunteer, in the royal navy, but after the peace of 1751 he quitted it; and, having the patronage of the earl of Effingham, in 1759 he obtained his first appointment in the herald's college. At the conclusion of the war in 1814, he had the honour of personally investing the emperor of Austria and the king of the Netherlands with the order of the garter; and in the course of his long life the melancholy ceremony of proclaiming the style and titles of deceased members of the royal family, was performed by him to six generations of the House of Brunswick, viz. from the funeral of George II. to that of the princess Charlotte of Wales and her infant. Though he was 90 years of age at the accession of George IV. he personally discharged the active duties of his situation, but he was unable to go through the fatigue of officiating at that monarch's coronation in the following year. He died in 1822, and was buried in St. George's chapel, Windsor, his mortal remains being honoured by every mark of respect that could be manifested by a public funeral.

HEAPY, THOMAS, a celebrated painter in water colours, and the first president of the Society of British Artists. Died, October, 1835, at the age of 60. His pictures are well known and appreciated.

HEARNE, SAMUEL, a traveller who, from 1769 to 1772, was employed by the Hudson Bay Company to explore the north-west coast of America, and who was the first European that succeeded in reaching the Arctic Ocean. Born, 1742; died, 1792.

HEARNE, THOMAS, an eminent antiquary and classical editor, was born in 1678, at White Waltham, in Berkshire, of which parish his father was clerk and schoolmaster. He published several ancient MSS. and editions of old books; as the Life of Alfred by Speiman; Leland's Itinerary, 9 vols. 8vo.; a collection of curious Discourses written by eminent antiquaries, &c. &c. Died, 1766.

HEARNE, THOMAS, an artist of considerable talents, was born in 1744, at Marshfield in Gloucestershire. He was eminent as a topographical designer; but his great merit lay in landscape-painting in water colours—a branch of the art which has since arrived at great perfection in this country, and of which he may be said to have been the first who successfully practised it. Died, 1817.

HEATH, BENJAMIN, a distinguished lawyer and scholar of the last century, who was recorder of Exeter, and acquired great popularity in his native county by writing against the cider tax. His ablest work is entitled "An Essay towards a Demonstrative Proof of the Divine Existence, Unity, and Attributes, &c." Died, 1762.

HEATH, JAMES, a historical writer during the reigns of Charles I. and II. He wrote "A Chronicle of the late War;" "The Glories and Triumphs of the Restoration of Charles II.;" "Flagellum, or the Life and Death of Oliver Cromwell," &c. Died, 1664.

HEATHCOTE, RALPH, a clergyman of the church of England, to whom the merit is due of being the projector of the General Biographical Dictionary. He was also the author of "The Irenarch, or Justice of the Peace's Manual;" "Sylva, or the Wood;" "A Sketch of Lord Bolingbroke's Philosophy," and other polemical works; which caused his introduction to Dr. Warburton, who nominated him his assistant preacher at Lincoln's Inn. He subsequently obtained higher church preferments; and died in 1795.

HEAVISIDE, JOHN, F.R.S., surgeon to his majesty, &c. was the son of John Heaviside, esq. of Hatfield, Herefordshire. He commenced his professional career as surgeon in the life-guards; an appointment which was the means of bringing his eminent abilities into practice, and led to his subsequent fame. His widely-extended practice, general accomplishments, and social habits, were well known; and he was one of the first who drew to his house (in Hanover-square), a circle of scientific and literary men, who met, at stated periods, for the avowed object of disseminating useful knowledge by means of mutual communication. He died in 1838.

HEBER, REGINALD, D.D., bishop of Calcutta, was born at Malpas, Cheshire, in 1783, and received the first rudiments of his education at Whitchurch, about five miles distant from his native village. He entered a student at Brazen-nose college, Oxford, in 1800, and three years after, carried the English prize for his beautiful poem, "Palestine." In 1808, he took his B.A. degree, and was elected a fellow of All Souls's. He soon after quitted the University, and made a tour through Germany, Russia, and the Crimea. The information he gained in that excursion assisted his classical mind with the perspective of a plan by which to collect and arrange all of ancient and modern literature which could disclose any part, or throw light on, the present state of Scythia, a work which he gave up on entering the service of the church, as likely to interrupt his more important duties. From 1803 to 1822, he spent his time in discharging the duties of a parish priest; during which he published some elegant poems, and the life of Jeremy Taylor. He was then elected preacher at Lincoln's Inn. On the death of Dr. Middleton, the bishopric of Calcutta was offered to Mr. Heber, who, after some hesitation, accepted it; and on the 16th of June, the bishop, with his wife and infant daughter, embarked for India. On the 11th of October he reached his destination, and found constant occupation in the important exercise of his official duties. On the 15th of June, 1824, he left Calcutta, to make a visitation of the upper provinces, on which occasion he traversed the breadth of his diocese, taking in their course, the eastern, northern, and western extremities of British India; every where sowing the seeds of Christian instruction among the Hindoos, and informing himself of the wants of the new congregations. In 1826, he took another journey in the discharge of his episcopal duty, to Trichinopoly, where he arrived on the 1st of April, 1826. The next day he was seized with an apoplectic fit, whilst bathing, which terminated his valuable life. Since his death, a "Narrative of a Journey through the Upper Provinces of India," has appeared, and his widow has also published his biography.

HEBERDEN, WILLIAM, F.R.S. a distinguished medical practitioner, was born in London in 1710, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, in which town he practised as a physician for several years before he settled in the metropolis. He was the projector and a principal contributor to the "Medical Transactions," and author of "Medical Commentaries on the History and Cure of Diseases." Died, 1801.

HEBERT, JAMES RENÉ, commonly called Père Duchêne, (from the title of a Jacobin paper of which he was the editor), was born at Alençon, in 1753. He was one of the most violent advocates for the French revolution, and one of the most unprincipled. Having nothing to lose, he entered with eagerness in the execution of any plot by which the nobility could be plundered; and, taking an active part in those scenes where his infamous employers were not willing to appear, he obtained a guilty notoriety. He was made a member of the commune, for his assistance in the massacres which took place in September, and the cruel murder of the princess de Lamballe. It was Hebert who so grossly insulted the unhappy queen, Marie Antoinette, by the vilest of all accusations; and put questions to the children of Louis XVI. which when reported to Robespierre, called forth reproaches even from his flinty breast. Having from a weak presumptuous dard to oppose his colleagues and masters, they hurried him from his slippery seat, and accomplished his destruction with a promptitude that astonished him. At the place of his execution, contempt and insult were added to the severity of his sufferings, and he died amid the hisses of the populace, on the 24th March, 1794.

HEDELIN, FRANCIS, a French advocate, celebrated for his learning, who was appointed tutor to the two nephews of cardinal Richelieu, and by that minister rewarded with the valuable abbey of Aisnagac and Meinsach. Born, 1604; died, 1678.

HEDERIC, or HEDERICHS, BENJAMIN, a German lexicographer; author of the well-known Greek Lexicon which bears his name, and several other works of a similar nature. Born, 1675; and died, rector of the school of Grossenhayn, in 1748.

HEDLINGER, JOHN CHARLES, the most celebrated die-cutter of his age, was born at Schweitz, in 1691. Many crowned heads, among whom were Charles XII. of Sweden, Peter the Great, and pope Benedict XIII., honoured him with their patronage. He frequently visited Sweden; and on his last voyage from that country, in 1748, he lost the greater part of his property by shipwreck. His works are distinguished by great simplicity, softness, and correctness of design. Died, 1771.

HEDWIG, JOHN, a German botanist and physician, was born in 1730, at Cronstadt, in Transylvania. After studying at Presburg and Zittau, he went to Leipzig, where he assisted professor Bosc as demonstrator of plants in his botanical lectures. He took his doctor's degree in 1759; practised as a physician, first at Chemnitz, and afterwards at Leipzig; and was appointed professor of physic and botany there, and made superintendent of the public garden. His most important work is entitled "Cryptogamia," 4 vols. folio. Died, 1790.

HEEMSKERK, MARTIN VAN, (whose real name was Van Veen, but who derived the name of Heemskerk from his native village), was born in 1498. After studying under some of his most eminent countrymen, he went to Italy, and there formed his taste under Michael Angelo, who was at that time enriching the capital of the Christian world with the productions of his pencil. Heemskerk was a diligent and prolific artist, though his works are now very rare. Died, 1574.

HEIDEGGER, JOHN JAMES, a very extraordinary character, by birth a Swiss, who took up his residence in London, in 1708, and, obtaining a commission in the guards, was known in fashionable society, by the appellation of the Swiss count. He undertook the management of the opera-house, and in his conduct of that establishment, was very fortunate; added to which, by giving concerts, masquerades, &c., under the patronage of the court, he gained a handsome income, which he expended in keeping an hospitable table and relieving the unfortunate. In his person he was extremely ugly, but he was the first to joke upon his own homely features. Being in company, where a debate took place as to which nation in Europe was the most ingenious, Heidegger claimed it for the Swiss, and, when asked for the proof, said, "I was born a Swiss, and came to England without a farthing, where I found the means of gaining five thousand a year, and to spend it. Now I defy any Englishman to do the same in Switzerland." He died in 1749, aged 80.

HEISTER, LAURENCE, a physician, surgeon, and naturalist, was born at Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, in 1683. He was a pupil both of Ruysch and Boerhaave; became physician-general to the Dutch military hospital; and, in 1710, was professor of anatomy and surgery at Altorf. From thence he removed to Helmstadt; where he died in 1758. He wrote several works on anatomy and surgery, and also distinguished himself in botany as a strenuous opponent of the Linnæan system.

HELENA, Sr., the mother of Constantine, was of obscure birth in Bithynia. Constantus Chlorus fell in love with her, and married her, while in that country; but, when he became associated in the empire, he divorced Helena, and married Theodora, daughter of Maximilian Hercules. Constantine, at his accession, paid due honours to his mother, and conferred on her the title of Augusta, which she merited by her conduct. At the age of eighty she went to Palestine, where, it is said, she assisted at the discovery of the holy cross; soon after which she died. Her body was conveyed to Rome, and deposited in the tomb of the emperors, while her native village was raised to the rank of a city by the name of Helenopolis.

HELIODORUS, a native of Emesa, in Phœnicia, and who lived near the end of the fourth century, was bishop of Tricea, in Thessaly, but deposed towards the close of his life. His youthful work "Ethiopia," or, the Loves of Theagenes and Chariclea, in poetical prose, is distinguished, by its strict morality, from the other Greek romances. It is said, that the alternative of burning his romance, or resigning his bishopric, being given him, he preferred the latter; but the story is too improbable to deserve our credence.

HEINECCIUS, JOHN GOTTLIEB, a celebrated civilian of the eighteenth century, born at Ersenburg, in Altenburg, in 1681. After having studied at Goslar and Leipzig, he became professor of philosophy at Halle, 1710; and in 1711 he was made professor of civil law, with the title of counsellor of the court. His great reputation induced the states of Friesland to invite him to Fraenker, in 1724; but in 1727, the king of Prussia prevailed on him to accept of a professorship of law at Frankfurt on the Oder, where he distinguished himself till 1753. Becoming again professor at Halle, he remained there till his death in 1741, though invited to Marburg, Denmark, and Holland. He wrote many works, all of them much esteemed.

HEINECKEN, CHRISTIAN HENRY, an extraordinary child, born at Lubeck, in 1721. So astounding is the account which is related of this mental phenomenon, that notwithstanding it is supported by the most powerful evidence, it still exceeds credibility. He spoke fluently at ten months old: at twelve he could recite the principal facts in the Pentateuch; in two months more he was master of the entire history of the Old and New Testaments; at two years and a half, he answered the principal questions in geography, and in ancient and modern history; and he spoke Latin and French with great facility before he had reached his fourth year. His constitution was so delicate, that he was not weaned till a few months before his death. M. Martini, of Lubeck, published a pamphlet in 1730, in which he endeavoured to give natural reasons for the extraordinary capacity of this child. He died in his fifth year, and on his death-bed displayed the utmost firmness and resignation.

HEINSIUS, DANIEL, professor of politics and history at Leyden, and librarian to the university, was born at Ghent, in 1580. He became a pupil of Joseph Scaliger at Leyden, and was greatly indebted to him for the eminence to which he attained in literature. He distinguished himself as a critic by his labours on many classical authors; and was highly honoured at home and abroad. Gustavus Adolphus gave him a place among his counsellors of state; the republic of Venice made him a knight of the order of St. Mark; and pope Urban VIII., invited him to come, as he expressed it, to rescue Rome from barbarism! He died in 1666, leaving several works both in poetry and prose.

HEINSIUS, NICHOLAS, the son of Daniel, was born at Leyden; and became as great a Latin poet as his father, and a still greater critic. Died, 1681.

HEINSIUS, ANTHONY, a distinguished Dutch statesman, who for forty years filled the high station of grand pensionary; and whose prudence, skill, and probity, gained him the confidence and regard of William III., Marlborough, and prince Eugene. Born, 1641; died, 1720.

HELIOGABALUS, M. AURELIUS ANTONINUS, a Roman emperor, was the son of Varius Marcellus, and derived his name from having been a priest of the sun in Phœnicia. He was raised to the throne by the soldiery, in 218, when he was under fifteen years of age; and though he began his reign with professions of moderation and virtue, he soon abandoned himself to every species of vice, and Rome displayed a scene of unparalleled folly, cruelty, and debauchery. He raised his horse to the honours of the consulship, and obliged his subjects to pay adoration to a large black stone, which he called Hellogabalus, raising temples to its honour, &c. At length his licentiousness and rapacity drew upon him the vengeance of the people; and before he had reigned four years, he was put to death by the Prætorian guards, his body thrown into the Tiber, and his memory declared infamous. To show the kind of luxury in which this youthful monster indulged, it is enough to state, that his halls were covered with carpets of gold and silver tissue, and his mats made of the down of hares and the soft feathers found under the wings of partridges! He was succeeded by Alexander Severus.

HELL, MAXIMILIAN, a learned astronomer, born at Chemnitz, in Hungary, in 1720. He was astronomer and director of the observatory at Vienna; published annually, the Ephemerides; and rendered other essential services to the science of astronomy. Died, 1792.

HELMERS, JOHN FREDERIC, a Dutch poet, was born at Amsterdam in 1707; author of a popular national poem, entitled "Holland," in six cantos, and numerous pieces of lyric, dramatic, and epic poetry. Died, 1812.

HELMONT, JOHN BAPTIST VAN, a celebrated chemist, was born at Brussels, in 1577; studied at Louvain, and made such rapid progress in natural history and medical science, that he delivered public lectures at seventeen years of age. He then travelled through various countries for ten years, and acquired a great knowledge of chemistry, to which science he afterwards constantly devoted himself, and in which he made some valuable discoveries. His first literary production was a treatise on the Spa waters, which is remarkable on account of the author having used the German word geist, answering to the English ghost, or spirit, to denote the air on which the properties of the Spa water depend, and from which is derived the modern word gas, now so extensively used. In 1600, he settled at Vilvorden, where he practised medicine gratuitously, and is said to have performed some very wonderful cures. He professed to disregard all book-learning on the healing art; and had he lived at the present day, would have been styled an impudent quack; but though his works abound with crude and visionary dogmas, they contain also many observations on the Galenic system, which are shrewd and pertinent. Died, 1644.

HELMONT, FRANCIS MERCURY, baron VAN, son of the preceding, was born at Vilvorden, in 1618, and there practised as a physician and experimental chemist. If the father be charged with eccentricity or quackery, the son had a tenfold right to both qualities; yet that he was a man of talent none have denied. His acts speak for themselves: he travelled over a part of Europe with a caravan of Bohemians (a gang of gipsies), to learn their language and opinions; pretended to have discovered the original language of man; and had the impudence to affirm that a child born deaf and dumb, would be able to articulate the characters at first sight. He professed to believe in the doctrine of transmigration, in the existence of the philosopher's stone, and other theories no less wild and visionary. Died, 1690.

HELOISE, or ELOISE, celebrated for her beauty and wit, but still more on account of her love for Abelard, was born at Paris, in 1101, and died in 1164. Cruelly separated from her illustrious lover, she first became prioress of the convent of Argenteuil, and afterwards entered the oratory of Paraclete, where she founded a new convent, and lived in exemplary piety.—For a further account, see ABELARD.

HELIST, BARTHOLOMEW VAN DER, an admirable Dutch painter, excelling in portraits, but also great in landscapes and historical subjects. Born at Haarlem, 1613; died, 1670.

HELVETIUS, ADRIAN, a Dutch physician, who being at Paris while the dysentery was raging in that city, successfully arrested its progress by administering a remedy. Being ordered by Louis XIV. to make it public, he declared it to be specimen, and was rewarded with 1000 louis-d'ors, and made inspector of the military hospitals. Born, 1656; died, 1731.

HELVETIUS, JOHN CLAUDE, son of the preceding, was also a physician, and a man of great skill in his profession. He cured Louis XV. of a dangerous disorder in his infancy, and became first physician to the queen, and counsellor of state. He was the author of several able works, and was a member of the academy of sciences, F.R.S. Lond. &c. Died, 1756.

HELVETIUS, CLAUDE ADRIEN, son of the last mentioned, was born at Paris, in 1715, and, at the age of twenty-three, obtained the honourable and lucrative post of a farmer-general, but resigned it, and afterwards purchased the place of maitre d'hôtel to the queen. In 1758, he published "De l'Esprit," the materialism of which drew upon him many attacks, and it was condemned by the parliament of Paris, as derogatory to the nature of man, by confining his faculties to animal sensibility, and destroying the distinctions between vice and virtue. The book, however, obtained a rapid celebrity; though its author found it necessary to ensure his personal safety by withdrawing for a time, first to England, and afterwards to Prussia. He at length returned to France, and led a retired and domestic life on his estate at Vore, till his death, which happened in 1771. A posthumous work, entitled "De l'Homme," is a continuation of the former treatise, and contains a fuller development of the doctrines laid down in it; but, at the same time, many new ones, particularly such as relate to the science of education.

HELWIG, GEORGE ANDREW, a Prussian botanist and mineralogist; author of "Lithographia Angerburgica," a work on fossils, besides other productions on lithology and botany. Born, 1686; died, 1748.

HELWIG, JOHN OTTO, first physician and counsellor to the elector palatine. He travelled through many countries, employing himself in making collections of natural curiosities; and while in England he was created a baronet, by Charles II. Died, 1696.

HELWIG, AMELIA VON, a distinguished female poet of Germany, born at Weimar, in 1776. Her father travelled in France, England, and Holland; and at a very early age, she discovered a remarkable aptitude in learning, not only the modern languages, but Greek; while her poetical talents were at the same time successfully cultivated. Among a host of literary characters, whose friendship she obtained, and from whom she derived much valuable instruction, were Schiller and Goethe. Died, 1822.

HELVICUS, CHRISTOPHER, professor of the Greek and Oriental languages at Glesesen, was born in 1581; and died in 1617. He wrote several Latin poems, besides various lexicographical and chronological works.

HEMANS, FELICIA DOROTHEA, an amiable and highly accomplished poetess, was born at Liverpool of respectable parents of the name of Browne, who subsequently took up their residence near St. Asaph, Wales. She married young; but her marriage was infelicitous; and, after the birth of five children, her husband estranged himself from her society, and a permanent separation ensued. From childhood she had an ardent thirst for knowledge, and her reading was extensive and varied. She was well acquainted with classical literature, and in her works she has bequeathed to posterity ample proofs of innate genius devoted to the noblest object—the improvement of the heart. It has been truly said that of all the sex, “few have written so much and so well as Felicia Hemans;” although her writings possess an energy equal to their high-toned beauty, yet are they so pure and so refined, that not a line of them could feeling spare, or delicacy blot from her pages. Her imagination was rich, chaste, and glowing; and though some of her earlier poems may be deemed rather monotonous, her “Records of Woman,” and “Forest Sanctuary,” stand unrivalled. In her social intercourse she was no less amiable than vivacious, as is proved by her epistolary correspondence; yet, her most serious thoughts were ever placed in the certainty of “another and a better world.” After her establishment at St. Asaph was broken up, she retired to Wavertree, near Liverpool, but remained about three years only, when she settled in Dublin, where she died on the 16th of May, 1835, in the forty-first year of her age; leaving five sons to bewail her loss. Besides the two works before-mentioned, Mrs. Hemans wrote “Wallace,” “Dartmoor,” “Dramatic Scenes,” “Welsh Melodies,” “The Siege of Valencia,” “Songs of the Affections,” “National Lyrics and Songs for Music,” “Scenes and Hymns of Life,” “The Vespers of Palermo,” a tragedy, and a variety of scattered lyrics in the New Monthly and Blackwood’s Magazines.

HEMELAR, JOHN, a learned Dutchman, who was a divine of the Roman Church, and highly esteemed by Clement VIII. He published Commentaries on the Medals of the Roman Emperors, and wrote Latin poems, particularly one in honour of Grotius. Died, 1640.

HEMMINGFORD, WALTER DE, an English chronicler of the 14th century, and canon of Gisborough-abbey, in Yorkshire, who flourished in the reign of Edward III. He compiled a history of England, from the Conquest to 1308.

HEMMLING, or HEMMLINK, HANS, an eminent Flemish painter, of the 15th century.

HEMSTERHUY, or HEMSTERHUYSIUS, TIBERIUS, a celebrated Dutch philologist, was the son of a physician, and born at Groningen, in 1685. At the age of fourteen he was entered a student of the university of his native place, from whence he removed to Leyden, where he was held in great esteem. In 1705 he became professor of mathematics and philosophy at Amsterdam, where he applied himself so zealously to the Greek authors, that he may justly be said to have been the most profound Hellenist of the age. Unlike many of his countrymen who have attained to great classical learning, Hemsterhuys had no taint of pride or dogmatism, but was remarkable for his modesty and mildness of character. Died, 1756.—His son FRANCIS inherited his classical acquirements, and was, moreover, an acute philosopher, and a critical judge of the fine arts. Born, 1720; died, 1790.

HENAULT, CHARLES JOHN FRANCIS, an eminent French writer, was president of the parliament of Paris, where he was born in 1685. He became president of the first chamber of Inquests in 1710, which led him to make the Roman law his study; though he still amused himself with poetry; and, in 1713, produced his tragedy of “Cornelia,” which, however, had no success on the stage. Near sixty years afterwards he gave the manuscript to Mr. Horace Walpole, who printed it at the Strawberry-hill press. In 1723 he obtained a place in the French academy; after which he set himself to digest into a chronological order the history of France. This work appeared in 1744, and has been translated into most European languages. He also wrote three comedies, and after his death appeared a work of his, entitled “Histoire Critique de l’Etablissement des François dans les Gaules,” 2 vols. 8vo. He was intimately connected with Madame du Deffand, and from his rank, as well as his talents, he held a distinguished station among the literati of Paris. Died, 1770.

HENAULT, JOHN D’, a French poet, was born at Paris. After travelling into several countries, he returned to France, and was patronized by Fouquet. His works were printed at Paris, in a small volume, in 1670; besides which he translated part of Lucretius, but was persuaded by his confessor, when at the point of death, to throw it into the fire.

HENDERSON, JOHN, a first-rate actor, was born in London, in 1747. He acquired great celebrity at Drury-lane theatre in Shakspeare’s characters, where he performed Falstaff, Richard III., &c. with unbounded applause. Died, 1785.

HENKEL, or HENCKEL, JOHN FREDERIC, a Saxon chemist and mineralogist of considerable celebrity, was born at Friburg, in 1679. Augustus II. of Poland made him counsellor of mines; an office which he discharged with much advantage to his country. It was under his direction also that the porcelain manufactory was established at Meissen. He wrote “Pyritologia,” and other scientific works. Died, 1744.

HENGIST, the first Saxon king of Kent, who, with his brother Horsa, landed an army at the mouth of the Thames, and eventually subjugated the Britons. The kingdom of Kent, founded by Hengist, embraced that tract which is now known as the counties of Kent, Middlesex, Essex, and part of Surrey. He established his residence at Canterbury, and died about the year 488, leaving his kingdom to his posterity.

tel, and first professor of theology at Helmstadt, was born in 1752. His "Ecclesiastical History" contains a vast fund of historical learning; and his work on dogmatism is written in classical Latin, displaying at the same time his intimate acquaintance with theological lore. Died, 1808.

HENLEY, JOHN, familiarly known by the appellation of Orator Henley, was born at Melton Mowbray, Leicestershire, in 1692. He was educated at Cambridge, and entered into holy orders; but being dissatisfied with his prospects of church preferment, he commenced public orator. Having opened a chapel in London, he gave lectures on theological subjects on Sundays, and on other subjects every Wednesday. Novely procured him a multitude of hearers; but he was too imprudent to gain any permanent advantage by it; he became the butt of wits and caricaturists, and he gradually sunk into obscurity. Died, 1756.

HENLEY, SAMUEL, a divine of the church of England, and professor of moral philosophy in the college of Williamsburgh, in Virginia, before the separation of the United States from Great Britain. He afterwards came to England; obtained a curacy, and was a teacher in Harrow school; and in 1805 he was placed at the head of the East India college, at Hertford, when he procured the diploma of D.D. He died in 1813, at Rendlesham, Suffolk, of which place he was rector. He was the author of some treatises, both theological and archaeological.

HENLEY, ANTHONY, an ingenious writer, contemporary with Steele and Addison, and who contributed to The Tatler and other works. He was born at the Grange, in Hampshire, the seat of his father, Sir Robert Henley; became M.P. for Andover; and died in 1711.

HENRIETTA, ANNA, of England, duchess of Orleans, the daughter of king Charles I., was born at Exeter, in 1644, amid the turbulent scenes of the civil war. Her unhappy mother fled with her to France when the infant was scarcely three weeks old; and after the death of the king she repaired to the convent of Chailloit, and there devoted herself to the education of her daughter. She united with great sweetness of character the charm of beauty, and was married to Philip, duke of Orleans. Their marriage was, however, rendered an unhappy one by the jealousy of the duke, who feared that his brother, Louis XIV. had supplanted him in his wife's affections; and when the latter afterwards employed her mediation in some difficult diplomatic affairs, with her brother Charles II., the duke no longer doubted that which he had before suspected. Louis wished to detach the king of England from the triple alliance with Holland and Sweden. She went, therefore, in 1670, with the court to Flanders, and, under pretence of visiting her brother, passed over to Dover, where Charles was awaiting her arrival. Mademoiselle de Kerouai, a native of Brittany, (afterwards mistress of Charles II. under the title of duchess of Portsmouth) accompanied her. Nor was their mission in vain; for in ten days the persuasions of the sister, aided by the fascinations of her companion, gained over to the French interest the profligate and unprincipled monarch. Soon after her return to France, the duchess of Orleans was suddenly seized with violent pains, which terminated her life; and though a post mortem examination took place, which was declared to be satisfactory, there is little doubt that she fell, in the prime of life and beauty, the victim of a base revenge. The sweetness of her manners made this unfortunate princess an object of general regret, and caused her to be compared with her still more unfortunate ancestor, Mary, queen of Scots. She died at St. Cloud, in 1680.

HENRY I. of Germany, surnamed the Fowler, was the son of Otho the Illustrious, duke of Saxony and Thuringia, and born in 976. When he was elected sovereign of Germany, in 919, he had to contend with anarchy at home and enemies abroad, but his activity and prudence overcame them all. He improved the art of war among the Germans: surrounded the cities which, before his time, were, for the most part, nothing but a collection of log and mud huts, with walls and moats; and, as he compelled part of the nobility and freemen to reside in these cities, and insisted on all meetings for the discussion of public affairs to be held in them, their progressive civilization and the encouragement given to commerce and manufactures, were the almost immediate consequences. After a fortunate and glorious reign of sixteen years, he died at Quedlinburg, in 936.

HENRY III. of Germany, son of the emperor Conrad II. succeeded his father in the imperial dignity, 1039. Nature had given him the talents, and education the character suitable for an able ruler. In every thing he undertook, he displayed a steady and persevering spirit: the clergy were compelled to acknowledge their dependence on him, and the temporal lords he held in actual subjection. He deposed three popes, and placed Clement II. on the vacant chair; and such was his despotic character, that the whole empire was at length changed into a monarchy entirely dependent upon his sovereign will. Born, 1017; died, 1056.

HENRY IV., son of the preceding, was born in 1050, and at the death of his father was only five years old. His disputes with pope Gregory VII. who had been elevated to the papal chair without the consent of the imperial court, embroiled him in a series of wars, and caused him to be excommunicated. His eldest son, Conrad, rebelled against him, but was overcome, and died at Florence in 1101, deserted by his partisans. He then caused his second son, Henry, to be elected his successor, and crowned; but the latter also rebelled, and making himself master of his father's person in 1105, by stratagem, compelled him to abdicate the throne. Henry IV. ended his life and sorrows, in neglect, at Liege, in 1106; and, as he died under sentence of excommunication, was not buried till five years after, when the sentence was taken off, and his remains were interred at Spire.

HENRY V. emperor of Germany, the son and successor of the preceding, and who had made himself disgracefully notorious by his conspiracy against his father, was born in 1061. In 1111 he married Matilda, the daughter of Henry I. king of England; and the rich dowry he received with this princess, gave him the means of undertaking an expedition over the Alps, in order to demand the imperial crown from the pope in Rome. Finding that Pascal refused to do so, Henry determined to put an end to the dispute by an act of violence. He caused the pope to be conveyed away from the altar, while at mass; and cut down, in the streets of Rome, all who opposed him. At length the pope yielded, and Henry was crowned without making any new concessions; receiving from the proud prelate permission to inter, in consecrated ground, the remains of his unhappy father. During his reign, the vassals and feudal tenants of the crown made themselves independent princes, and the political and national division of Germany was, as it were, sanctioned for posterity. Died, 1135.

HENRY VII. was the first German emperor who was chosen solely by the electors, without the interference of the other states of the empire. He undertook an expedition to Italy, and compelled the Milanese to crown him king of Lombardy. He then suppressed by force a revolt which had broken out in Upper Italy; took several cities by storm; and, having captured Rome, he was crowned Roman emperor by two cardinals, while in the streets the work of murder and pillage was still going on. Died, 1513.

HENRY, THE LION, the most remarkable prince of Germany in the 12th century, was born in 1129, and assumed the government of Saxony in 1146. He demanded restitution of Bavaria, which had been taken from his father. This being refused by the emperor, a war ensued, which in the sequel gave him Bavaria; his possessions extending from the Baltic and the North sea to the Adriatic. In 1166 he went on an expedition to the Holy Land, and during his absence, his enemies, and even the emperor, made encroachments on his dominions. This was the fruitful source of quarrels; and the proud and high-minded Henry having been driven to the humiliation of asking pardon of the emperor on his knees, was allowed to retain possession of his hereditary dominions, and he died in peace at Brunswick, in 1195. He was pious, bore up manfully against misfortune, and protected the interests of commerce, science, and the arts.

HENRY, DE Blois, bishop of Winchester, nephew of William Rufus, and brother of king Stephen, was an active prelate and a bold, ambitious and enterprising statesman. When England was invaded by the partisans of the empress Matilda, he at first joined her standard, but subsequently deserted it, and became her most determined enemy. The empress queen and her followers having taken refuge in the castle of Winchester, he laid siege to it, set the city on fire, and consumed twenty churches, a number of religious houses, and many other buildings; so little respect did he pay for the capital of his diocese when he had an ulterior object in view. Yet after this he formed a project for erecting it into an archbishopric, and had actually arranged the business with pope Lucius II., but the sudden death of the pontiff prevented its completion. He is now remembered chiefly as the founder of the hospital of St. Cross, near Winchester, the church of which is regarded by many antiquaries as furnishing the model of the distinguishing features of the Gothic or pointed style of architecture. Died, 1171.

HENLEY, Right Hon. MORTON EDEN, Baron, G.C.B., and F.R.S. commenced his public career at the age of 34 years, as Minister Plenipotentiary to the Elector. (since Royal) Court of Bavaria; and continued to fill similar important diplomatic missions until 1799, when he retired on an annual pension of 2,000*l*. Died, 1830.

HELLINS, Rev. John, B.D. and F.R.S., a celebrated mathematician, and a contributor of scientific articles to the British Critic from 1795 to 1814. Died, 1837.

HENRY, the NAVIGATOR, the fourth son of John I. king of Portugal, was born in 1394. He gave early proofs of brilliant courage; but his love of arms was surpassed by his love of the sciences, particularly mathematics, astronomy, and navigation. While vigorously prosecuting a war against the Moors in Africa, he neglected no opportunity to obtain from them a knowledge of the regions bordering on Egypt and Arabia, and to inquire into the probability of a passage to the treasures of India by a voyage round the western coast of Africa. He conversed with men of learning; and, finding their testimony agreeable to the reports he had collected, he resolved to execute his designs. He was the first who applied the compass to navigation; and to him also a principal part is ascribed in the invention of the astrolabe. Various expeditions were undertaken, and discoveries made, under his patronage and at his expense; but, at length, companies were formed of enterprising men, who were tempted with the prospect of obtaining gold dust, and the whole people became animated with the love of discovery. In 1446 Nunno Tristan doubled Cape Verde; and two years later, Gonzalo Vallo discovered three of the Azores islands, about 1000 miles from the continent. Henry continued these efforts till his death, in 1463, and thus secured for himself an undying name as the patron and friend of navigation.

HENRY IV. called THE GREAT, king of France and Navarre, was born in 1553, at Pau, in Béarn. His father, Anthony of Bourbon, was descended from a son of Louis IX.; his mother was Jeanne d'Albret, daughter of Henry, king of Navarre. He was brought up in the simple and hardy manner of the peasantry of Béarn, and this laid the foundation of a vigorous constitution and temperate habits. He was placed under the tuition of Florent Chretien, a learned man and zealous protestant. In 1580 he accompanied his mother to Rochelle, and learned the art of war under admiral Coligny. When the perfidious design of destroying the Huguenot chiefs, by a massacre, was formed by Charles and his mother Catharine, one of the means to lull their suspicions was, to propose to queen Jeanne a marriage between Henry and Margaret of Valois, the king's youngest sister. While preparations were making for the marriage festival, Henry's mother died at Paris, not without strong suspicions of poison. Having assumed the title of king of Navarre, his marriage took place, Aug. 18th, 1572. Then followed the horrible scenes of St. Bartholomew's, Aug. 24th. Henry was obliged to make profession of the Catholic faith to save his life; but Catharine of Medici endeavoured to dissolve the marriage just celebrated. As she was unsuccessful in this, she adopted the plan of corrupting the noble youth by the pleasures of a licentious court; and he did not escape the snare. In 1576, however, he took advantage of a hunting excursion to quit the court, and professed himself again of the Prote-tant church. Catharine, who, after the decease of Charles IX., administered the government in the name of his successor, Henry III., now thought it advisable to conclude a treaty of peace with the Huguenots (1576), securing to them religious freedom. Exasperated by this event, the jealous Catholics, in 1585, formed the celebrated league, which the king was obliged to confirm; and when called, by right of birth, to the French throne, he found insurmountable difficulties in establishing his claims. His Protestant religion was brought forward to prejudice the Catholics against him. After a protracted and obstinate struggle, convinced that he should never enjoy quiet possession of the French throne without professing the Catholic faith, Henry at length yielded to the wishes of his friends, was instructed in the doctrines of the Roman church, and professed the Catholic faith, July 25th, 1593, in the church of St. Denis. He happily escaped an attempt to assassinate him; was solemnly anointed king at Chartres, in 1594; and entered the capital amid the acclamations of the people. He made use of the tranquillity which followed, to restore the internal prosperity of his kingdom, and particularly the wasted finances; and in this design he was highly successful, with the aid of his prime minister Sully. To his former brothers in faith and in arms, the Protestants, he granted entire religious freedom and political security, by the edict of Nantes, in 1598. In 1610, while riding through the streets of Paris, his coach was obstructed in the street de la Feronnierie, by two waggons. A fanatic, named Ravallac, took advantage of this moment to perpetrate a long-meditated deed; and he received a fatal stab from the hand of this assassin, in the 52d year of his age, and twenty-second of his reign. His character is thus summed up by Henault:—"he united to extreme frankness the most dextrous policy; to the most elevated sentiments a charming simplicity of manners; to a soldier's courage an inexhaustible fund of humanity."

HENRY I. king of England, called, on account of his learning, Beauclerc, was the youngest son of William the Conqueror, born in 1068, and succeeded his brother Rufus in 1100. He restored the university of Cambridge, forgave all debts owing to the crown prior to his accession, reformed the court, and conquered Wales. He died in Normandy, in 1135. He abolished the curfew-bell, established a standard for weights and measures, and signed the charter which proved the origin of the English liberties.

HENRY II. king of England, the son of Geoffery Plantagenet and Maud, empress of Germany, was born in Normandy, in 1133, and succeeded Stephen in 1154. He added the provinces of Anjou, Touraine, Maine, Poitou, Saintonge, Guienne, and Gascony, to the English crown. His reign was troubled by disputes between him and Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, who being murdered in 1171, the pope obliged the king to undergo penance for it at Becket's tomb at Canterbury. In 1170 he caused his eldest son Henry to be crowned king of England. In 1172 he conquered Ireland; and the year following his sons rebelled against him. Henry checked the prevailing licentiousness by severe laws, partitioned England into four judiciary districts, and appointed itinerant justices to make regular excursions through them. He revived trial by jury, discouraged that by combat, and demolished all the newly-erected castles, as shelters of violence and anarchy. He was manly in person, gifted with ready elocution, possessed warm affections, and was a real lover of justice. He died in 1189.

HENRY III. king of England, surnamed of Winchester, on account of his having been born in that city, succeeded his father, John, in 1216. He was obliged to relinquish Normandy, Anjou, Poitou, Touraine, and Maine, to the king of France; after which a civil war broke out in England, and the king was taken prisoner by the barons, at the head of whom was Simon de Montfort, earl of Leicester. The tide of affairs turning in his favour, he deprived several of these lords of their estates, and gave them to his friends. Born 1207; died 1272.

HENRY IV., king of England, surnamed Bolingbroke, was born in 1367. He was the son of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, the third son of Edward III. In the reign of Richard II. he was made earl of Derby and duke of Hereford. Having accused the duke of Norfolk of treason, the latter challenged him to single combat; but on the appearance of the two champions, at the appointed time and place, Richard would not suffer them to proceed. Both were banished the kingdom—Norfolk for life, and Hereford for a term of years. On the death of his father he succeeded to the dukedom of Lancaster; and, returning before the stated time, for the avowed object of claiming his duchy, and having been joined by the earls of Northumberland and Westmoreland, soon found himself at the head of 60,000 men. Richard was defeated, taken prisoner, and deposed; and the duke was unanimously declared king, under the title of Henry IV. This usurpation gave rise to the civil war between the houses of York and Lancaster. Henry died in 1413, and was succeeded by his son.

HENRY V. king of England, called, after his birth-place, of Monmouth, was born in 1388. His dissipated habits while a prince gave his father great uneasiness; but he frequently displayed noble traits of character, and on ascending the throne he cast off his former companions, and justified the best expectations. France being at the time torn asunder by the opposing factions of the dukes of Orleans and Burgundy, Henry took the favourable opportunity of reviving the claims of his predecessors upon that country, and he landed an army at Harfleur, Aug. 14, 1415. With 15,000 men he gained the battle of Agincourt, though the French amounted to 52,000. He then returned to England; but three years afterwards he went again to France, espoused the princess Catharine, on condition that the French crown should go to Henry and his heirs on the death of the king of France, and be inseparably united to the crown of England. While all his great projects appeared to be rapidly advancing towards a successful issue, a painful disease arrested his progress, and he died in 1422, aged 34, and in the tenth year of his reign. The career of Henry V. was more showy than useful; for while his successes entailed great misery on France, they did more harm than good to the true interests of England.

HENRY VI. king of England, son of the preceding, was born at Windsor, in 1421, and was but ten months old at the death of his father. His grandfather Charles, king of France, died soon after; and the duke of Orleans, encouraged by the minority of Henry, assumed the title of king, by the name of Charles VII. When only nine years old, Henry was crowned at Paris, and the great duke of Bedford, his uncle and guardian, obtained several important victories. But the raising of the siege of Orleans by Joan of Arc gave a new turn to affairs, and the English interest declined. The death of the duke of Bedford was a fatal blow to the cause of Henry; and at length the English were deprived of all their possessions in France, except the town of Calais. The insurrection of Cade followed. To add to his misfortunes, the York party in England prevailed, and Henry was sent to the Tower, where, according to the prevailing opinion, he was slain by Richard, duke of Gloucester, in 1471. He was gentle, pious, and well-intentioned, but too weak to act for himself. Eton college, and King's college, Cambridge, owe their origin to him.

HENRY VII. king of England, first sovereign of the race of Tudor, was born in 1457. He was the son of Edmund, earl of Richmond, and of Margaret of the house of Lancaster. By the assistance of the duke of Brittany he landed in Wales and laid claim to the crown in 1485. The people, disgusted at the cruelties of Richard III., joined him in such numbers that he was enabled to give the usurper battle at Bosworth field, where Richard was slain, and Henry crowned on the spot. He reigned 34 years, and died in 1509. During this reign the feudal aristocracy was considerably depressed, while the middle ranks were proportionably raised; and many highly salutary laws were enacted.

HENRY VIII. king of England, was born in 1491, and succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, at the age of eighteen. The emperor Maximilian and the pope Julius II. having league against France, persuaded Henry to join them, and he in consequence invaded that kingdom, where he made some conquests. About the same time James IV. king of Scotland, invaded England, but was defeated and slain at Flodden-field. When Luther commenced the Reformation in Germany, Henry wrote a book against him, for which he was complimented by the pope with the title of defender of the faith. Having conceived an affection for Anne Boleyn, he determined to divorce his wife Catharine of Arragon, to whom he had been married eighteen years. But on the divorce being refused by the pope, Henry assumed the title of supreme head of the English church, put down the monasteries, and alienated their possessions to secular purposes. His marriage with Anne Boleyn followed; but afterwards he brought her to the scaffold, and married lady Jane Seymour, who died in child-bed. He next married Anne of Cleves; but she not proving agreeable to his expectations, he put her away, and caused Cromwell, earl of Essex, the projector of the match, to be beheaded. His next wife was Catharine Howard, who was beheaded for adultery; after which he espoused Catharine Parr, who survived him. Henry died in 1546. His love of power was indomitable, and led to frequent acts of tyrannical ferocity, while his excessive pride, impatience, and intolerance, extinguished every sentiment of humanity within his breast; so that it has been truly said of him, "that he never spared man in his anger, nor woman in his lust."

HENRY, of Huntingdon, an English historian, who wrote a History of England to the year 1154, published in 1576, by Savile. Died, 1168.

HENRY, MATTHEW, a non-conformist divine, was born in 1662. He was educated by his father, Philip Henry, an eminent Presbyterian divine; studied the law in Gray's Inn, but renounced it for the ministry, and settled at Hackney. His chief work is an "Exposition of the Bible," in 5 vols. folio; besides which he wrote a "Method of Prayer;" a "Discourse on the Lord's Supper;" and other esteemed books of practical divinity. Died, 1714.

HENRY, Dr. ROWART, minister of one of the churches in Edinburgh, and author of "The History of Great Britain," in 6 vols. 4to. was born at St. Ninian's, near Stirling, in 1718, and died in 1790.

HENRY, JOHN, admiral of the red, who for some time before his death was considered the oldest veteran in the British navy, died in 1829, at the age of 98. This venerable officer entered the service in 1744, was in the whole of the American war, and also in the war with France from its beginning in 1793 to its termination.

HENRY, CHARLES, M.D. a gentleman distinguished for his chemical knowledge and scientific pursuits, was the son of an eminent manufacturing chemist at Manchester, and born in 1775. He finished his education in the university of Edinburgh, where he attended the lectures of Dr. Black, and was the associate and friend of Brougham, Jeffrey, and Mackintosh. Though intended for the medical profession, he relinquished it for the sake of co-operating in his father's lucrative pursuits, which he afterwards carried on.

FAN-FETCHED ATTEMPTS AT SUBIMITY OF COMPOSITION, DESTROY THE BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF LANGUAGE.

He began his public career by delivering in Manchester, several courses of lectures on chemistry, which, with notes, &c. have passed through several editions, and are remarkable for the precision of their information and the elegance of their style. The same observation may be applied to his characters of Priestley, Davy, and Wollaston; and, in short, to his various contributions in the Transactions of the Royal Society of London, the memoirs of the Literary Philosophical Society of Manchester, and other periodical works. There were few subjects connected with popular science which he could not illustrate or embellish: his conversation was peculiarly attractive, and he was capable of imparting his varied stores of knowledge in the most alluring manner, speaking for the edification and amusement of others, and not for personal display. Blest with a handsome competence, he was never backward in patronizing those aspirants who appeared to deserve it; nor slow in promoting the cause of general science. He had just returned from the meeting of the British Scientific Association at Bristol, where he was appointed one of the secretaries for the next year's meeting at Liverpool: but he had been for sometime observed to labour under great nervous irritability, and to have suffered an almost total privation of sleep, which at length overpowered his faculties, and he put a period to his existence with a pistol, Aug. 30, 1836.

HENRYSON, ROBERT, a Scotch poet in the sixteenth century, was schoolmaster at Dumfermline, and a monk of the Benedictine order. His "Fables" were printed at Edinburgh in 1621; and his "Testament of Faure Crescende" in 1593. He wrote a number of other pieces, which are to be found in the collections of Hailes, Pinkerton, &c.

HEPBURN, JAMES BONAVENTURA, one of the most eminent philologists, was born at Hamstocks, in Huntingdonshire, in 1573. He was bred in the protestant religion by his father, who was a presbyterian minister; but, after studying at St. Andrew's, he embraced the Romish faith, and went to Italy. He next travelled through Turkey, Persia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Ethiopia, and most of the countries of the east; and it is asserted, that he became master of so many languages, that there was scarcely a region of the globe with whose inhabitants he could not have conversed in their own tongue. On his return he entered into the order of Minims; but the fame of his acquisitions having reached the ears of pope Paul V., he invited him to quit his retirement, and gave him the wardship and inspection of all the Oriental books and manuscripts in the Vatican library. He is supposed to have died at Venice, about 1620. He published "A Hebrew and Chaldaic Dictionary, and an Arabic Grammar," in one vol. 4to.

HEPBURN, ROBERT, a miscellaneous writer, was born in Scotland, in 1690. At the age of twenty-one, he published, in thirty numbers, a series of essays, entitled, "The Tatler, by Hector Macstaff, of the North." He studied the civil law in Holland, and became a member of the faculty of advocates at Edinburgh, where he died in 1712. Some of his manuscripts are in the advocates' library.

HEPBURN, Major-general FRANCIS, a meritorious British officer. He served in the peninsular war, where he was severely wounded; and fought afterwards at Waterloo, although his wound had never been healed, nor the ball extracted. Died, 1835.

HERACLITUS, the founder of a philosophical sect, was born at Ephesus, and flourished in the 69th Olympiad, about 500 B.C. He incorporated the mysteries of the Pythagorean system into his own, which was exceedingly severe and obscure. Being of a misanthropic turn, whence he is said to have wept at the follies of mankind, he retired to a mountainous region, where he lived upon roots and herbs; but being attacked by a fatal disease, was obliged to return to the city, and soon afterwards died, in the sixtieth year of his age. From the little of his philosophy that has come down to us, it appears that he considered fire as the element of all things.

HERALDUS, DESIDERIUS, or, properly, DIDIER HERAULT, was a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, and died in 1649. He wrote "Adversaria," Notes on Tertullian, Martial, &c. His son became a clergyman of the church of England, and had a prebend in the cathedral of Canterbury. He wrote a piece against the regicides, and some other works.

HERAULT DE SEHELLES, MARIE JEAN, advocate-general in the parliament of Paris under the old regime, and afterwards a member of the national convention, was born at Paris, in 1760. Though he conducted himself before the revolution as an able and upright magistrate, he subsequently advocated vindictive measures against the royalists, and even charged Louis XVI. with an uninterrupted series of treasons, without mentioning what they were, and recommended his condemnation. But he chiefly distinguished himself in the contest between the Mountain and Gironde parties, and he powerfully co-operated in the destruction of the latter; but all his services to the terrorists did not save him from the scaffold: he was executed, with Danton, in 1795.

HERBELOT, BARTHOLOMEW D', a learned orientalist, was born at Paris, in 1625. After travelling twice into Italy, in search of eastern manuscripts, and to converse with oriental travellers, with a view to the elucidation of the Hebrew Scriptures, he was appointed regius professor of Syriac in the French capital, and granted a pension. He was the author of "The Oriental Library," and other able works. He died in 1695, not less regretted for his virtues, than admired for his learning.

HERBERT, EDWARD, lord of CHERBURY, was born in 1581, at Montgomery castle; was sent when only twelve years old, to University college, Oxford; was made a knight of the Bath, soon after the accession of James I.; and shortly after travelled on the continent, where his elegant manners and chivalric accomplishments attracted the greatest notice. He served in the Netherlands in 1610 and 1614, distinguishing himself by his romantic bravery; was twice ambassador to France; and on his return, in 1823, was created an Irish peer, and afterwards an English baron. He espoused the parliamentary cause during the civil wars, but quitted it, and died in 1816. His principal work is entitled "De Veritate," the object of which was to assert the sufficiency and perfection of natural religion, with a view to prove the uselessness of revelation. He also wrote "De Religione Laici," his own "Memoirs," a "Life of Henry VIII." &c.

HERBERT, GEORGE, a brother of the preceding, was distinguished as a poet and a divine. He was born in 1593; educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; and became rector of Bemerton, Wilts; where he died in 1633. He was a man of exemplary piety and benevolence; and a poet of no mean rank.

HERBERT, WILLIAM, earl of Pembroke, a poet and the patron of learned men, was born in 1580, at Wilton-house, the family seat. He was educated at New college, Oxford; and in 1626 was elected chancellor of that university, to which he was a liberal benefactor through life, and bequeathed to it at his death a valuable collection of manuscripts. Died, 1633.

HERBERT, SIR THOMAS, a descendant of one of the branches of the Pembroke family, was the son of an alderman at York. After receiving his education at Oxford, he travelled for four years in Asia and Africa, of which he published an account. On the breaking out of the civil wars he sided with the parliament; but having been appointed to attend upon Charles in his captivity, he became warmly attached to him, and proved himself a zealous and incorruptible servant to him up to the hour of his execution. He survived his royal master twenty years, devoting his life principally to literary pursuits. He assisted Dugdale in his "Monasticon Anglicanum," and published an account of the last two years of the life of king Charles, under the title of "Threnodia Carolina." He was created a baronet at the Restoration, and died in 1692.

HERBIN, AUGUSTUS FRANCIS JULIAN, a Frenchman, distinguished as an oriental scholar, was born in 1783. He composed an Arabic grammar; also a treatise on Ancient Music; and an account of Hafiz, the Persian poet, with specimens of his works. Died, 1806.

HERDER, JOHN GODFREY VON, a classical German writer, and a moral philosopher of the new school, was born in 1744, of poor parents, at Mohrungen, in Prussia; was educated for the church, and became court preacher, ecclesiastical counsellor, and vice-president of the consistory to the duke of Saxe Weimar; and died in 1803. At the moment when he expired he was writing a hymn to the Deity, and the pen was found on the unfinished line. He was greatly esteemed by all who knew him, and looked upon as the Fenelon of Germany. His unrelaxing zeal and diligence penetrated the most various branches of science, theory, philosophy, philology, natural and civil history, and politics. His works form 26 vols. 8vo.

HERISSANT, LOUIS ANTHONY PROSPER,

a French physician and naturalist of the 18th century, was a native of Paris, where he died in 1769, at the early age of twenty-four. He wrote "L'Eloge de Gouthier d'Audernach;" for which he received a prize from the faculty of medicine. He was also the author of an eulogy upon Du Cange; a poem on printing; "Bibliothèque Physique de la France," &c.

HERITIER DE BRUTELLE, CHARLES LOUIS L', a French botanist, was born at Paris, in 1748. In 1766, Dombey having brought from Peru and Chili an inestimable collection of plants, L'Heritier published a description of them in London, under the title of the Flora of Peru. On his return to Paris he published a work with the singular title of "Flore de la Place Vendôme." This ingenious man was assassinated in 1801.

HERITIER DE VILLANDON, NICHOLAS L', a French poet of the 17th century, was originally in the guards; but being disabled for service by a wound, he became historiographer of France, and died in 1689. He wrote two tragedies; "Hercule Fureux," and "Clovis;" together with a few poems. His daughter, Marie Jeanne L'Heritier, was born at Paris in 1684, and died in 1734. She published a translation of Ovid's Epistles, and some novels.

HERMANN, JAMES, an eminent mathematician, was born at Basil, in 1678. He became professor of mathematics at Padua; and afterwards went to Russia with Daniel Bernoulli; but returned at last to his own country, and was appointed professor of morality and natural law at Basil, where he died in 1732. Besides several pieces in the Memoirs of different academies, he wrote "De Phoronomia, or two Books on the Forces and Motions of solid and fluid Bodies."

HERMANN, JOHN, a physician and naturalist, was born at Barr, near Strasburg, in 1738. He acquired a taste for the sciences from his father, who was a Protestant clergyman; and after going through his studies at Strasburg, he took his doctor's degree. In 1768 he was chosen professor of medicine; in 1778 professor of philosophy; in 1783 that of pathology; and in 1784, he obtained the chair of botany, chemistry, and the materia medica. He greatly extended the boundaries of science, both by his lectures and the great number of treatises which he published, and devoted all his property to the formation of a cabinet of natural history. Died, 1800.

HERMANN, PAUL, a botanist, was born at Halle, in Saxony. He resided some time in the East Indies, particularly at Ceylon, where he acted as physician to the Dutch settlement. On his return he published various botanical works, and died in 1803.

HERMAS, an ancient father of the Christian church, surnamed Pastor, or the Shepherd, who is said to be the same mentioned by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans. He is supposed to have died at Rome about the year 61. A piece of his, entitled "The Shepherd," is still extant, and was translated into English by archbishop Wake.

HERMELIN, SAMUEL GUSTAVUS, baron, a Swedish mineralogist, was born in 1744, REAL DELICACY CAN NEVER BE TOO MUCH INCULCATED; FALSE DELICACY CAN NEVER BE SUFFICIENTLY REPRIMENDED.

at Stockholm. After having travelled extensively, and paid particular attention to the statistics and geology of the countries which he visited, he settled in his native land, and for more than fifty years held the most eminent situations in the management of the Swedish mines. Hermelin wrote various works relative to the mineralogy, metallurgy, and resources of Sweden; and spent fifteen years in perfecting the Swedish Atlas, a geographical undertaking of vast magnitude. Indeed, few men have possessed so great a degree of patient perseverance, united with talents adequate for the accomplishment of so many useful designs. He died in 1820.

HERMES, TRISMEGISTUS, an Egyptian priest and philosopher, who, according to Diodorus, was the friend and counsellor of the great Osiris, and is said to have been the first lawgiver, and the founder of religious ceremonies among the Egyptians. He instructed his countrymen in the cultivation of the olive, the measurement of lands, and the knowledge of hieroglyphics, and to him are attributed all the mystic sciences of the Alexandrian school. But every thing relating to him is so uncertain and obscure, that even the time when, and the place where he lived, cannot be assigned with any certainty.

HERMILLY, VAQUETTE D', a French historian, was born at Amiens in 1707, and died at Paris in 1778. He wrote the history of Majorca and Minorca; and translated Ferrara's History of Spain, and the Critical Theatre of Father Feijoo.

HERMOGENES, a rhetorician, born at Tarsus, in Cilicia, lived about the middle of the second century, and is celebrated for the precocity and rapid extinction of his talents. At the age of fifteen he was famous for his powers of oratory; at seventeen, he published his rhetoric; and, soon after, various treatises on oratory, which ranked him high among writers upon that subject; but in his twenty-fifth year, he wholly lost his memory, and sank into a state of mental imbecility. The precise date of his death is not known.

HERO, a philosopher and mathematician of Alexandria, who distinguished himself by his skill in the construction of warlike machines, and who wrote some able works on the art. The time of his death is not recorded.

HERODIAN, a Greek historian, flourished in the third century, and held several public offices at Rome. His history is written in Greek, and comprises the period from the death of Marcus Aurelius to the year 238.

HERODOTUS, called by Cicero the "Father of History," was born at Halicarnassus, in Caria, B.C. 484, and is the most ancient of the Greek historians whose works are extant. Egypt, so celebrated for the wisdom of its institutions, seems to have been one of the most constant subjects of his attention; and his description of it is so consonant with the accounts of the most intelligent travellers, that we cannot for a moment believe it founded on the relations of others. We are also indebted to him alone for the history of the origin and growth of the Persian monarchy, and of those of the earlier Medes and Assyrians; for the origin of the kingdom of Lydia; its destruction by Cyrus, and the different expeditions of that celebrated conqueror; the conquest of Egypt by Cambyzes, and the most minute and exact description of that country and its inhabitants; the constant wars of the successors of Cyrus; and, particularly, the expedition of Darius against the Scythians. The value of his history has been the subject of much discussion and controversy; and it is generally believed that his narration of events, which happened during his own life, is extremely faithful, while in the traditional accounts which he gives of remote times and countries, sufficient care has not been shown to distinguish fact from fable. He went into voluntary exile when his country was oppressed by Lygdamis, but afterwards returned and expelled the tyrant.

HERON, ROBERT, a miscellaneous writer, was a native of Scotland, and having received a clerical education, became assistant preacher at the High church, Edinburgh. While in that situation he translated Niebuhr's travels in Arabia; and being disappointed in regard to preferment in the Scottish kirk, he turned his attention wholly to the press—composing, translating, and compiling for the booksellers. Died, 1807.

HERRERA TORDESILLAS, ANTONIO DE, a Spanish historian, who wrote a "General History of India," in 4 vols. folio, which is a curious work. He also wrote a "General History of Spain," in 3 vols. folio. Born, 1565; died, 1625.

HERRICK, ROBERT, an English poet of the 17th century. He received his education, first at St John's college, and next at Trinity-hall, Cambridge; after which he entered into orders, and obtained, in 1629, the vicarage of Dean Prior, in Devonshire. He was deprived of this living during Cromwell's usurpation, but recovered it at the Restoration, and died not long afterwards. A complete edition of his poetical works, in 2 vols. 8vo. was published at Edinburgh, in 1823.

HERRING, THOMAS, archbishop of Canterbury, a distinguished English prelate, was the son of a clergyman in Norfolk, and born in 1093. In the rebellion of 1145 he exerted himself with great zeal in defence of the government, for which he was in 1147 advanced to the see of Canterbury. He died in 1177, and was buried at Croydon.

HERSCHELL, SIR WILLIAM, one of the most distinguished astronomers of modern times, was born at Hanover, in 1738. His father, who was a musician, brought him up to his own profession, and at the age of fourteen, he was placed in the band of the Hanoverian foot-guards. Towards the close of the seven years' war, when the French armies entered Hanover, young Herschell resolved to visit England, but not being able to obtain employment in London, he accepted a situation in the band of the Durham militia. When the regiment came to Doncaster, Mr. Herschell formed an acquaintance with Dr. Miller, an eminent composer and organist of that town. It happened about this time that an organist was also wanted at Halifax, and by the advice of the doctor, his young friend offered himself as a candidate for the place, and was successful. In 1766, he removed from Yorkshire to Bath, where he was chosen organist at the Octagon chapel, and leader of the orchestra at the public rooms. Although enthusiastically fond of music, he had for some time devoted his leisure hours to the study of mathematics and astronomy; and, in 1779, having constructed a telescope, and begun a regular survey of the heavens, star by star, he discovered, March 13th, 1781, a new primary planet, which he named the Georgium Sidus, in honour of George the Third. The same year he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and had the gold medal awarded him for his discovery. His majesty now called Mr. Herschell from Bath, and gave him a house at Slough, with a pension to enable him to prosecute his favourite pursuits. After a long series of arduous and valuable labours, in 1803 he laid before the Royal Society a catalogue of 5000 new nebulae, nebulous stars, planetary nebulae, and clusters of stars, which he had discovered, and, in consequence of the important additions made by him to the stock of astronomical knowledge, received from the university of Oxford the honorary degree of doctor of laws—an honour which was followed up, in 1816, by the Guelphic order of knighthood from the king. He continued his astronomical observations till within a few years of his death, which took place in 1822. His highly-gifted son, the present Sir John Herschell, pursues his father's scientific course with ardour and success.

HERSENT, CHARLES, a French divine, who distinguished himself by a satire which he wrote against cardinal Richelieu, under the fictitious name of "Optatus Gallus." Died, 1680.

HERTZBERG, EWALD FREDERIC, count von, a Prussian minister of state, whose name is intimately connected with the history of Frederic the Great, was born in 1726. He manifested his talents at an early age by the publication of a "Dissertation on History," was patronized by the king; and gradually rose to the highest offices in the state. Died, 1795.

HERVEY, JAMES, an English divine of exemplary virtue and piety, was born in 1714, at Hardington, near Northampton; received his education at Lincoln college, Oxford; and eventually succeeded his father, as rector of Weston Favell and Collingtree. His chief writings are, "Meditations and Contemplations;" "Remarks on Lord Bolingbroke's Letters on the Study and Use of History;" and "Theron and Aspasia; or, a Series of Dialogues and Letters on the most important Subjects." Died, 1784.

HESIOD, a very ancient Greek poet, but whether contemporary with, or older or younger than Homer, is not agreed among the learned. The "Theogony" and "Works and Days" are the only undoubted pieces of this poet now extant.

HESSE, WILLIAM, prince of, immortalized his name as an encourager of learning. He was a skilful astronomer, and built an observatory at Cassel. His "Observations" were printed at Leyden in 1618. Died, 1807.

HESSE-CASSEL, the Landgrave CHARLES of, was a Danish field-marshal, and governor of the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein; and the oldest prince in Europe, having been born in 1744. He was the grandson of George II. king of Great Britain, having married the princess Louisa of Denmark, third daughter of Frederic V. by the princess Louisa of England, youngest daughter of George II.; and to whom he had been married 65 years. Mr. Rae Wilson, in his "Travels in Norway," thus speaks of him:—"He was a most devout and humble Christian, of a highly cultivated mind, held in great estimation, and was truly a blessing to, and the praise of all around." He died Aug. 17, 1836, in the 92nd year of his age.

HESYCHIUS, a grammarian of Alexandria, who has left a valuable lexicon of Greek words, first published by Aldus Manutius in 1513.

HEVELIUS, JOHN, an astronomer, was born at Dantzic, in 1611. He built an observatory in that city, made some excellent telescopes, and published the result of his observations, in a work entitled, "Selenographia, sive Lunæ descriptio." His "Cometographia" caused a dispute between him and Dr. Hooke, respecting the pre-eminence of plain and telescopic sights; Hevelius defending the former, and Hooke the latter. To adjust the difference, Halley went to Dantzic, and, on his return, gave a report very favourable to Hevelius. Several other astronomical works were produced by him; particularly "Machina Cœlestis," "Annus Climactericus," &c. Died, 1687.

HEYNE, CHRISTIAN GOTTLIEB, a distinguished scholar, was a native of Chemnitz, in Saxony, whither his father, a poor linen weaver, had fled from Gravenhurst, in Silesia, on account of religious persecution. Though destitute and obscure, he acquired a remarkable acquaintance with the ancient languages, and succeeded Gesner as professor of eloquence at Göttingen, where he was soon after appointed first librarian and counsellor. By his editions and commentaries on classic authors, Heyne has deserved the reputation of being one of the most distinguished luminaries of the literary world. His particular merit consists in having raised the knowledge of antiquity and classical literature from the dust of the schools, and introduced it into the circle of the polished world. It is not, however, merely the fame of his great learning, but the propriety and delicacy of his conduct, that procured him the acquaintance and regard of the most accomplished and eminent men of his time, and rendered his memory dear to them. He died in 1812, aged 82.

HEWSON, WILLIAM, a celebrated anatomist and physiologist, was the son of a surgeon at Hexham, in Northumberland, where he was born in 1730. After studying his profession under his father, he resided for some time at Newcastle, London, Edinburgh, and Paris; and he subsequently became a pupil of Dr. Hunter, whom he also assisted in his lectures. In 1771 he obtained the Copleyan medal from the Royal Society,

NOTHING CAN POISON THE CONTENTMENT OF A MAN WHO CHEERFULLY LIVES BY HIS LABOUR, BUT TO MAKE HIM RICH.

THE LUTULESS DEPTH OF DIVINE MYSTERIES CANNOT BE SOUNDLED WITH THE PLUMMET OF OUR SHORT-LIVED REASON.

for his discoveries of the lymphatic system in birds and fishes, and was elected a fellow of that learned body. He also published "Experimental Inquiries into the Properties of the Blood." Died, 1774.

HEYLIN, PETER, D.D., an English divine, was born at Burford, in Oxfordshire, in 1609. He became a student of Hart-hall, Oxford, but afterwards obtained a fellowship in Magdalen college, which he resigned in 1639, on being appointed chaplain to Charles I. In 1631 he published his "History of St. George," for which the king gave him the rectory of Hemmelford, in Huntingdonshire, and a prebend of Westminster, to which was added the living of Houghton, in the bishopric of Durham. Other church preferment followed; but, becoming obnoxious to the parliamentarians, he was soon ejected from it, and his private property was also sequestrated. After this he went to Oxford, and published a weekly paper, called "Mercurius Aulicus." His other productions are "Cosmography," "A Help to English History," the "Life of Charles I.," a "History of the Reformation," &c. He died in 1683; having shortly before been reinstated in all his former appointments by Charles II.

HEYWOOD, JOHN, one of the earliest of the English dramatic poets, was born at North Nibley, in Hertfordshire, and educated at Oxford; after which he became, through Sir Thomas More, a great favorite with Henry VIII. He also continued in the court of Edward VI., and was much in the confidence of queen Mary, on whose death, being a Roman Catholic, he went abroad; and died at Mechlin, in Brabant, in 1563. He wrote "The Parable of the Spider and Fly," a voluminous poem, in 4to. His other works are a "Dialogue of Proverbs," and several plays.—He left two sons, ELLIS and JASPER, both of whom possessed talents very similar to those of their father; but being Catholics, they quitted England and spent the remainder of their lives in Italy.

HEYWOOD, THOMAS, a dramatic writer and actor in the reigns of Elizabeth, James I. and Charles I. He is said to have been a most voluminous author, having written no less than two hundred and twenty plays, of which only twenty-four are extant. He also wrote "The Actor's Vindication," "The Hierarchy of the Angels," a "Life of Merlin," "a Life of Queen Elizabeth," "Lives of the Nine Worthies," &c. Neither the date of his birth nor that of his death are on record.

HICETAS, a philosopher of Syracuse, who maintained that the heavens, sun, and stars were all immovable; while the earth revolved on its axis. This is the account of Cicero, from which Copernicus took the idea of his system.

HICKERINGILL, EDMUND, a clergyman of eccentric character, was born in Essex, in 1630. He received his education at Cambridge; after which he became a lieutenant in the army, and went to Jamaica, of which island he published a description. On entering into orders, he obtained the vicarage of Boxted, in Essex, and afterwards the rectory of All Saints, in Colchester, where, after leading an irregular and turbulent life, he died, in 1708.

HICKES, GEORGE, an eminent divine and learned antiquary of the 17th century, was born at Newham, in Yorkshire, in 1642, and educated at Oxford. In 1661 he was appointed one of the king's chaplains, and soon after made dean of Worcester: The death of Charles II. prevented him from obtaining the bishopric of Bristol, and put a stop to his farther promotion. At the Revolution he refused to take the oaths to William III., and was deprived of all his benefices. In 1693 he was sent by the non-juring clergy to St. Germaine, to concert measures with the exiled king, for the appointment of bishops, in the English church, from their party. He returned from this dangerous mission in the following year; and was himself shortly after consecrated bishop of Thetford. Dr. Hickes was a profound scholar, particularly in Saxon lore; but in theological matters the violence of his prejudices sometimes obscured his judgment. His greatest work is entitled, "Thesaurus Grammatico-Criticus et Archaeologicus Linguarum veterum Septentrionalium." Died, 1718.

HICKES, JOHN, brother of the preceding, was a non-conformist minister, and as remarkable for his zeal in advocating those principles, as Dr. James Hickes was in defending the high church party. Hearing it was the intention of government to apprehend him as a state criminal, he procured an introduction to Charles II., and not only obtained indemnity for himself, but also the promise of protection for the Devonshire non-conformists. In the ensuing reign, Hickes joined the duke of Monmouth, was taken prisoner, and executed as a traitor, in 1686.

HIDALGO Y COSTILLA, DON MIGUEL, a Spanish priest, who distinguished himself in promoting the war of independence in Mexico, which commenced in 1809. He was at that time curate of Dolores, and possessed great influence over the Indians and Creoles. After raising the standard of independence, he was joined by Allende and a considerable body of insurgents: upon which he threw off his clerical robes, and assumed the uniform and rank of generalissimo. At first he obtained great success; but he ultimately fell into the hands of the royalists, and was executed in July, 1811.

HIGHMORE, JOSEPH, a portrait and historical painter, born in London, 1692. He was intended for the legal profession, but, on the expiration of his clerkship, he abandoned the law, resolved to trust in future to his talents as an artist alone for fame and fortune. He possessed the extraordinary faculty of taking a likeness by memory as well as by sitting. Among his best paintings are, Hagar and Ishmael, in the Foundling Hospital. He distinguished himself also as an author. Died, 1780.

HIGGONS, BRVIL, a dramatic poet and historian. His principal works are, a tragedy called "The Generous Conqueror," and a "Short View of the English History." He accompanied James II. to France, where he died in 1735.

anatomist, was born at Fordingbridge, in Hampshire. He wrote "Corporis humani Disquisitio Anatomica," and other medical works. The cavity called the Antrum Highmerianum, in the superior maxilla, takes its name from him. Born, 1613; died, 1684.

HILL, AARON, an English poet, was a native of Westminster, at the school of which city he received his education. Being left fatherless, when only fifteen years of age he undertook a voyage to Constantinople, to visit his relation, Lord Paget, who was the British ambassador there; and by his lordship he was sent to travel in the Levant. On his return, he occupied himself much in literary pursuits, and was at one time manager of Drury-lane theatre; but though he indulged in poetry, and attained some eminence as a dramatic writer, he did not confine himself to the world of letters. He spent much of his time in active mercantile schemes, and, among others, in the formation of a colony in Georgia. Died, 1750.

HILL, SIR JOHN, a voluminous writer, was born in 1716, at Peterborough. He was brought up as an apothecary, and practised as a physician; wrote numerous books, with great rapidity; and was the inventor of several lucrative quack medicines. Under the auspices of the earl of Bute he published a "System of Botany," in 17 vols. folio; and on presenting a copy of it to the king of Sweden, was invested with an order of knighthood. He also published a Supplement to Chambers's Cyclopaedia; "Essays on Natural History and Philosophy;" conducted a periodical called "The Inspector;" and wrote several novels, farces, &c. He was a constant attendant on every place of public amusement; and, being a satirical "busy-body," was often involved in quarrels with the wits of the day. On one of these occasions he was characteristically hit off by Garrick in the following epigrammatic couplet:—

"For physic and farces his rival there scarce is;

His farces are physic, his physic a farce is."

HILL, ROBERT, a self-taught genius of extraordinary merit, was born in Hertfordshire, in 1699, and bred a tailor and stay-maker. By indefatigable application he acquired a sufficient knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, to be able to teach them. He died at Buckingham, in 1777. He wrote "Remarks on the Essay on Spirit;" "The Character of a Jew;" and "Criticisms on Job."

HILL, SIR RICHARD, bart., born in 1733, was the son of Sir Rowland Hill, of Hawkstone, Shropshire. He was educated at Westminster-school; graduated at Oxford; and, on his return from the tour of Europe, he distinguished himself by his attachment to the Calvinistic methodists—first, by defending the conduct of six young men who were expelled from the university in 1768, for alleged fanatical conduct, and next by engaging in a polemical controversy with John Wesley and other leaders of the Arminian Methodists. He succeeded his father as M.P. for the county of Salop; and became so noted in the House for his frequent quaint application of facts and language from the Bible, that he was called the Scriptural Killigrew. He died in 1808, when his title passed to Sir John Hill, the father of Lord Hill.

HILL, ROWLAND, the venerable minister of Surrey chapel, was a younger brother of the preceding, and born at Hawkstone, near Shrewsbury, in 1744. In the grammar school of that town he commenced his education, then went to Eton for a few years, and finished his studies at St. John's college, Cambridge. At the time he quitted the university the celebrated George Whitfield was in the zenith of his popularity; and so congenial to his nature was that extraordinary preacher's manner and doctrine, that he quickly adopted both, and became his zealous disciple; prosecuting his favourite plan of itinerancy, preaching in the streets of Bristol, on the quays, or among the colliers at Kingswood; wherever, in fact, he could gain an audience; but resuming, at stated periods, the services of the London and Bristol tabernacles. In 1783 the building of Surrey chapel was completed; and from that time to the period of his death, an interval of 50 years, he continued to pass his winters in town for the purpose of officiating there; his place being supplied during the summer months by a succession of popular ministers from the country. The numerous tales that are told of his eccentricities should be received with caution; though it is certain he occasionally illustrated the most solemn truths by observations which avowed more of the ludicrous than the pathetic—more of the grotesque than the serious; yet his intentions were pure and sincere, and he was no less indefatigable in his calling as a preacher than he was benevolent as a man. His writings are very numerous, the principal of which is entitled "Village Dialogues;" but he was not sparing of wit, humour, or sarcasm, whenever he could make either subservient to his purpose, as was strikingly seen in a satirical pamphlet against the ministers of the established church, which he published anonymously, under the title of "Spiritual Characteristics," by an Old Observer." He died, in 1833, aged 88.

HILL, WILLIAM, a critical and philological writer, was a native of Cudworth, Warwickshire. He was educated at Oxford, and became a fellow of Merton college; for some time held the mastership of Sutton Coldfield free-school; was afterwards a medical practitioner in London; and next removed to Dublin, where he received the degree of D.D., and was appointed master of St Patrick's school, but was expelled from it at the Restoration of Charles II. Died, 1667.

HILL, SIR THOMAS NOEL, a younger brother of lord Hill, the commander-in-chief, was born in 1784, and entered the army in 1801, at the age of seventeen, as a cornet in the 10th hussars. In 1805, he purchased a troop in the same regiment, and in 1806 he exchanged to the 33rd foot. After doing duty for some time in England and Ireland, as aid-de-camp, he accompanied his brother to Portugal in that capacity, in 1808; and was present at the battle of Vimiera, and throughout the retreat of Sir John Moore's army, to the battle of Corunna. He was afterwards appointed to the command of the 1st Portuguese regiment; and in every action or affair in which his regiment was engaged, from the commencement of those arduous campaigns until the close of the war, in 1814, lieutenant-colonel Hill was invariably present, and honourably distinguished. He had now attained the rank of colonel in the Portuguese army; and his services being no longer required there, he was promoted to a company in the 1st regiment of Guards, and created K.C.B. For his services at the battle of Waterloo, he was still further rewarded; and he retained his appointment on the staff until the return of the army of occupation, in 1818. In consequence of ill-health in 1824, he retired for a time to the half-pay. In 1825 he was promoted to the rank of colonel; and, in 1827, his health being perfectly restored, he was appointed adjutant-general in the Canadas, where he remained till 1830; when, by the promotion of Col. Sir John Brown to the rank of a major-general, the command of the cavalry depot at Maidstone became vacant, and Sir Noel Hill was selected as an officer eminently qualified to fill the situation. Died, 1832.

HILLEL, the Elder, surnamed HAMA-KEN, was a celebrated Jewish doctor, or rabbin, who lived in the century preceding the Christian era, and was a native of Babylon. At the age of forty he removed to Jerusalem, where he studied the law with such diligence as to become master of the chief school of that city. He formed a new digest of the traditional law, from which the "Mischna," or earliest part of the Talmud, is derived. Shammal, one of his disciples, dissented from his master, and set up a new college, which produced violent contests among the Jews; but the party of Hillel proved victorious. He lived to the great age of 120 years; and while president of the Sanhedrim, he discharged the duties of his office with unexampled wisdom and justice.

HILLEL, the Younger, who obtained the title of NABI, or Prince of the Captivity, presided over the Jewish church in the third and fourth centuries, and distinguished himself by his great astronomical learning, reforming the Jewish calendar, regulating the period of the equinoxes, &c. He was also one of the doctors to whom is ascribed that portion of the Talmud called "Gemara."

HILLIARD, NICHOLAS, a portrait painter, was born in 1547, at Exeter. He imitated the style of Hans Holbein, and became goldsmith, carver, and painter, to queen Elizabeth. Among his best works are the portraits of Elizabeth, and her sister Mary, queen of Scots. Died, 1619.

HILTON, WALTER, a Carthusian monk of the monastery of Sheen, in the fifteenth century; author of "The Scale, or Ladder of Perfection;" and to whom also has been erroneously attributed the celebrated book "De Imitatione Christi," written by Thomas à Kempis.

HILTZ, JOHN, a German architect of the fifteenth century. He succeeded Steinbach, builder of the cathedral of Strasburg, the tower of which celebrated edifice, 370 feet high, was erected by Hiltz, and is considered a masterpiece of architecture.

HIMERIUS, a Greek grammarian, who flourished in the fourth century. He was a native of Prusias, in Bithynia, and became master of a school of rhetoric at Athens.

HINCHCLIFFE, JOHN, bishop of Peterborough, was born in 1731, in Swallow-street, St. James's, where his father kept a livery-stable. He was educated at Westminster-school, of which he subsequently became head-master, and, through the patronage of the Grafton family, he obtained successive church preferment till he reached the mitre. Died, 1794.

HIPPARCHUS, the most eminent among the ancient astronomers, was a native of Nicæa, in Bithynia, and flourished about a century and a half before the Christian era. He resided some time in the island of Rhodes, whence he has derived the appellation of Rhædus, but he afterwards went to Alexandria, at that time the great school of science. He has been styled the patriarch of astronomy, and was certainly the first who treated the sublime science in a philosophic manner. He discovered the precession of the equinoxes; calculated the eclipses; determined the revolutions and mean motions of the planets; invented the stereographical method of projection; numbered and catalogued the fixed stars; and, in short, by his labours were laid the solid foundations of geographical and trigonometrical science.

HIPPIAS, prince of Athens, was the son of Pisistratus, at whose death he assumed the government, in conjunction with his brother Hipparchus; but the latter being assassinated by a band of conspirators, while conducting a solemn procession to the temple of Minerva, Hippias immediately seized the reins of government, and revenged the death of his brother by putting to death all of whom he entertained the least suspicion. His tyranny at last became so obnoxious to the citizens, that they bribed the priests of the Delphic oracle to command the Spartans to break off their alliance with him; and, being obliged to yield to the united attack of his foreign and domestic enemies, he was expelled from the city, B.C. 510. He afterwards found means to induce Darius to apply to the Athenians in his favour; and their decisive refusal kindled the first war of the Persians against the European Greeks. The fate of Hippias was at length decided on the field of Marathon, where, with the Persian army, he fell on that memorable day, fighting against his countrymen, B.C. 490.

HIPPISLEY, Sir JOHN COKE, bart., was born at Yatton, Somersetshire, in 1763. After having graduated at Hertford college, Oxford, he became a bencher of the Middle Temple, and was appointed in 1780, through the interest of Lord North, to an office of trust and importance in India, which he held during the wars with Hyder Ally and Tippoo Saib. In 1790, he was elected M.P. for Sudbury, of which borough he became recorder, and represented it in five parliaments. Sir John was an active magistrate, and a warm supporter of many agricultural and other useful institutions. He was rewarded with a baronetcy in 1796, for his services in the negotiations for the marriage of the princess royal of England with the duke of Wirtemberg. Died, 1825.

HIPPOCRATES, the most eminent of the Greek physicians, and deservedly styled the father of medical science, was born in the Isle of Cos, B. C. 460, and died A. C. 361. His memory is still venerated in his native island, and the inhabitants show with pride a house in which they say he resided. He died, in the 99th year of his age, at Larissa, in Thessaly, and the highest honours were paid to his memory. Several of his works are extant; and an edition of them was printed at Leipzig so lately as 1825.

HIPPOCRATES, of Chios, a celebrated geometrician, who lived about 500 years B. C., and discovered the quadrature of the lunula, which bears his name.

HIPPOLYTUS, St., a Christian bishop, who suffered in the persecution of Alexander Severus, A. D. 230. His works in Greek and Latin were printed by Fabricius, in 2 vols. folio, 1716.

HIPPONAX, a satiric poet, of Ephesus, who lived about 540 years B. C., and was contemporary with Anacreon.

HIRE, PHILIP DE LA, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer, was born at Paris in 1640, and died in 1718. He became so distinguished by his knowledge of the mathematics, that Colbert employed him and Picard in making the observations for constructing a new map of France. He was also engaged by the Academy of Sciences, of which society he was a member, in taking the levels for the aqueducts proposed to be made by Louis XIV.

HOADLY, BENJAMIN, a celebrated prelate, was born at Westerham, in Kent, in 1676. He soon distinguished himself as a champion of freedom, in his controversy with Calamy and Atterbury; and was recommended by the House of Commons to queen Anne, who promised him preferment, but which he did not obtain from her. On the accession of George I. he was made bishop of Bangor; and soon afterwards translated to Hereford. In 1723 he obtained the bishopric of Salisbury, and in 1734 he became bishop of Winchester. Throughout life he was an active and able controversialist, and his opponents, who were of the high church party, never ceased to charge him with attempting to undermine that establishment of which he was a prelate. Died, 1761.

HOADLY, BENJAMIN, eldest son of the preceding, was physician to George II., and Frederick, prince of Wales. He published some medical and philosophical pieces; but he is best known as the author of "The Suspicious Husband," a comedy. Born, 1706; died, 1757.

HOADLY, JOHN, LL.D. the younger son of bishop Hoadly, was born in London, in 1711; received his education at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge, and studied the law; after which he entered into orders, and obtained some valuable preferments in the church and diocese of Winchester, among which were the mastership of St. Cross hospital, and the chancellorship of the diocese. He wrote poems, two or three comedies, and an oratorio. Died, 1776.

HOARE, WILLIAM, an English artist, was born about 1707, at Eye, in Suffolk. He studied under Grisoni, an Italian painter in London; after which he went to Rome, where he became a pupil of Francesco Imperiale. He remained in Italy many years, and on his return painted some good altar-pieces and portraits, which last were chiefly in crayons. Died, 1792.

HOARE, PRINCE, F. S. A., a dramatic author, and secretary to the Royal Academy, was a native of Bath. He wrote several farces, which were successful, and published some works on art. He died in 1834, aged 80.

HOBBS, THOMAS, a celebrated philosopher and political writer, was born, in 1588, at Malmesbury, Wilts; was educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford; and in 1606 became tutor to a son of the earl of Devonshire. On the death of his patron and pupil he became travelling tutor to a young gentleman; but the countess dowager of Devonshire recalled him into her family, to take upon him the education of the young earl. In 1628, he attended the earl on his travels, and at Pisa contracted an intimacy with Galileo. In 1642 he printed his book, "De Cive," which procured many enemies, by its dangerous principles. Soon after this he was appointed mathematical tutor to the prince of Wales. In 1650 appeared in English, his work on "Human Nature;" and one, "De Corpore Politico," or the "Elements of Law." The next year he published his still more famous and obnoxious book, entitled "Leviathan." At the Restoration he received a pension; but in 1663 the parliament passed a censure on his writings, which greatly alarmed him. Besides the works which we have enumerated above, he published "De Mirabilibus Pecci, or the Wonders of the Peak," a poem; a translation of Homer; "Elements of Philosophy;" a "Letter on Liberty and Necessity;" "Six Lessons to the Professors of the Mathematics," &c. The latter years of his life were spent at Chatsworth, the seat of the earl of Devonshire, where he died, in 1679. Hobbs has been branded with the epithets of infidel and atheist, by those who thought that his speculations might weaken the confidence of mankind in the general principles of morals and theology; and though there is evidence of his having practised the duties of religion as a member of the church of England, yet a candid review of his written opinions induces us to pronounce them as highly pernicious, both in a religious and political view.

HOBBIMA, MINDERHOUT, an eminent Dutch landscape painter, born at Antwerp, in 1611. His pieces are remarkable for the grace and beauty of their execution, and, being rare, are now very valuable.

HOCHE, LAZARUS, an eminent French general, was born, in 1768, at Montreuil, near Versailles, where, his father being an ostler, he began life in the humble capacity of a stable-boy. In 1785 he entered the army; was made a corporal of grenadiers, and having passed with applause through the intermediate gradations of rank, frequently distinguishing himself by acts of bravery, he was raised, in 1793, to the command of the army of the Moselle, where he had to contend with the duke of Brunswick, and was several times beaten. He however, succeeded better when engaged with the Austrians, whom he drove out of Alsace. In 1795 he was placed at the head of the republican army in La Vendée. In this important and difficult station he acquitted himself well, and succeeded in defeating the emigrants at Quiberon, and in inducing the royalists to yield obedience to the government. After having been sent, in the winter of 1796, as commander of the troops in the expedition to Ireland, and from which he returned in disgrace, he was appointed to the command of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, and had already gained considerable advantages when his career was stopped by the armistice between prince Charles and Buonaparte. He died at Wetzlar, in 1797.

HODY, HUMPHREY, a learned divine, was born at Odcombe in Somersetshire, in 1659. When young he published a "Dissertation against Aristæus's History of the Seventy-two Interpreters," which was received by the learned with great applause. It was, however, attacked by Isaac Vossius, and defended by the author in an unanswerable manner. In 1698 he was appointed Greek professor at Oxford; and in 1701 he published his "History of English Councils and Convocations." He died in 1706, and by his will founded ten scholarships in Wadham college.

HOFER, ANDREW, a patriotic leader of the Tyrolese, was born in 1765, at Passayer; and when he grew up, he kept an inn there, and dealt in corn, wine, and cattle. By the treaty of Presburg, the Tyrol was transferred to the king of Bavaria; but the war being rekindled in 1809, the inhabitants rose in a mass to drive out the Bavarians, and again place themselves under the dominion of Austria. The riches and influence of Hofer, his athletic form and decided character, all combined to induce the insurgents to elect him for their chief. Every thing prospered under his direction. Almost the whole country was conquered, and eight thousand of the best troops of Bavaria were made prisoners by the peasants. Hofer now appeared upon the Brenner; and became the idol of the Tyrolese. He was preparing to restore to the closely-blockaded and suffering Tyrol a communication with the interior of the imperial states, when the battle of Wagram was succeeded by the armistice of Znaim, the terms of which required that the Austrians should abandon Tyrol and Vorarlberg to the vengeance of the enemy. The gallant Hofer concealed himself in a cave, but soon issued from his retreat, and drove the French invaders out of the country. At length, however, the tide of victory turned; and although they maintained a glorious struggle, and gained many splendid victories, the Tyrolese were subjugated, and Hofer being discovered, he was tried by a court-martial at Mantua, and shot, Feb. 20, 1810. After his death he was revered by his countrymen as a martyr; his family were indemnified for the loss of their property by the emperor of Austria, and his son was ennobled by him.

HOFFMAN, or HOFFMANN. There were several Germans of this name distinguished for their medical knowledge. — MAURICE, an anatomist, botanist, and physician; born in 1621, at Furstenwalde, in Brandenburg; settled at Altorf, where he held the professorships of anatomy, botany, and physic; was the discoverer of the pancreatic duct; and died in 1698. He, as well as his son, JOHN MAURICE, wrote several works on various medical subjects. — FREDERICK HOFFMANN, the most celebrated of the name, was born in 1663, at Halle, in Saxony, where his father was also an eminent physician. He studied and lectured at Jena; and afterwards practised at Minden. In 1684 he visited England, and formed an acquaintance with Boyle and other men of science. On the establishment of the university of Halle, he was appointed primary professor of medicine and natural philosophy; and thrice held the situation of rector. His reputation being now fully established, and his fame widely spread, he was elected a member of various scientific associations in London, Berlin, and Petersburg; and appointed physician to the king of Prussia, who gave him the title of arch-later and aulic counsellor, with a liberal salary. His works are very numerous; the most important being his "Systema Medicinæ Rationalis," and "Medicina Consultatoria." It has been remarked of him, that as a theorist his suggestions were of great value, and contributed to introduce that revolution in the science of pathology, which subsequent observation has extended and confirmed. Died, 1742. — CASPAR HOFFMANN, another German physician, was a native of Gotha; wrote several medical works; became professor of the theory of medicine at Altorf; and died there in 1648.

— CHRISTOPHER LEWIS HOFFMAN, also a physician, was born, in 1721, at Rheda, in Westphalia. He distinguished himself as a professional writer, and formed a new system of medicine, by combining the humoral and nervous pathology; assuming, as the basis of his system, the sensibility and irritability of the solids, and the corruption of the humours as the principle of irritation. He was successively physician to the bishop of Munster, and the electors of Cologne and Mentz. Died, 1807.

HOFFMAN, DANIEL, a German divine of the Lutheran persuasion, who, about the end of the 16th century, rendered himself notorious as the head of a party whose object it was to depreciate philosophy as inconsistent with theology. He entered into violent controversies in endeavouring to maintain, that what was true in philosophy was false in theology, and gained many proselytes; but, at the instance of the duke of Brunswick, he retracted his invectives against philosophy, and made a public confession of his errors in 1601. Died, 1611.

HOFFMAN, JOHN JAMES, professor of Greek at Basil, where he was born in 1638, and died in 1706. He is principally known by a work of great labour and value, entitled "Lexicon Universale."

HOFFMAN, HENRY, a French dramatic writer, poet, and critic, was born at Nancy, in 1700. He began his literary labours in Paris, by publishing, in 1785, a volume of poems, and subsequently wrote many dramas and operatic pieces; but during the latter portion of his life he was known principally as an acute and impartial critic of the writings of others. Died, 1828.

HOFFMANN, ERNEST THEODORE WILLIAM, a German of varied talents, was born at Königsberg, in 1776. He studied the law, and held various judicial appointments in Prussia; till his legal career was interrupted by the invasion of Warsaw by the French, in 1806, in the government of which city he had been appointed councillor. Having devoted his leisure hours to the study of music, and being at the same time a romance writer and an artist, he applied himself to these pursuits in order to obtain a livelihood. He possessed much imagination and talent; but he was an intemperate liver, and suffered much from hypochondriasm. Among his works are "The Devil's Elixir," "The Entail," "The Adversary," &c.; all displaying a singularly wild and romantic imagination. In 1816 he was reinstated as councillor in the court of judicature in Berlin, and died in 1822.

HOGARTH, WILLIAM, a truly great and original painter of life and manners, was born in London, in 1698, and bound apprentice to an engraver of arms on silver plate. About 1720 he set up for himself, and his first employment was to engrave coats of arms and shop bills. He next undertook to execute plates for booksellers, the chief of which are the prints to Hudibras. His first performance as a painter was a representation of Wanstead Assembly, the portraits being taken from life. In 1730 he married a daughter of Sir James Thornhill; shortly after which he embellished the gardens of Vauxhall with some excellent paintings, for which the proprietor complimented him with a perpetual ticket of admission. In 1733 appeared his "Harlot's Progress," prints which stamped his reputation, and were followed by other moral histories and satirical representations of vice and folly, such as "The Rake's Progress," "Marriage-a-la-Mode," "Industry and Idleness," &c. all admirably executed. Soon after the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle he went to France, and while at Calais began to sketch a drawing of the gate of the town, for which he was taken up, but was soon released. On his return he commemorated the affair in his excellent print, "O the Roast Beef of Old England." In 1753 he published his "Analysis of Beauty," in which he was assisted by Dr. Hoadly. In 1757 he became sergeant-painter to the king; but though he had arrived at wealth and eminence, yet, from being destitute of the advantages of a liberal education, he was inordinately vain of his talents, and affected to despise every kind of knowledge which he did not possess. He was also remarkably absent, of which the following is an instance:—On setting up his carriage he paid a visit to the Lord Mayor, and having protracted his stay till a heavy shower came on, he was let out by a different door from that by which he entered, and unmindful of his carriage, he set off on foot, got home wet to the skin, and when asked where he had left the carriage, said that he had forgotten it. He died in 1762, and was interred in the church-yard of Chiswick. The works of Hogarth have been frequently published, and even at the moment of our writing this notice of the painter's life, there are different editions of them in the course of publication.

HOGG, JAMES, (the Ettrick Shepherd), a native of Scotland, was born Jan. 25, 1782, the anniversary of the natal day of Burns. His humble occupation, like that of his ancestors "time out of mind," was that of a shepherd; nor had he, as he avers, even been more than half a year at school. At the age of eighteen, however, he began to amuse himself in stringing rustic rhymes together; and he continued to tend his sheep, and to write verses, until it was his good fortune to be noticed by Sir Walter Scott (who had seen some of his poetical efforts), which induced him to attempt something of a more decided character. He produced an "Essay on Sheep," which won for him the premium given by the Highland Society; and which, added to the success of a volume of ballads he had shortly before published, under the title of "The Mountain Bard," led him to hope for future fame and profit. He soon afterwards produced his "Forest Minstrel," which gained him but little in either sense; and it was owing to the kindness of Scott and Grieve, that his pecuniary difficulties were relieved. It was not until the publication of the "Queen's Wake" that his fame was established; but from that time he was considered as a somewhat popular author. His publications are numerous; and he contributed to some of the Edinburgh periodicals of the highest literary character. In fact, it was from the repeated mention of "the Shepherd" in the "Noctes" of Blackwood, that his name attained its chief celebrity. He continued the friend and companion of Sir Walter Scott until the decease of the latter. James Hogg died in November, 1835, at Altrive Lake, on the Yarrow, leaving his widow and five children wholly unprovided for.

HOHENLOHE KIRCHBERG, prince of, a general of artillery in the Austrian service, who greatly distinguished himself in the early campaigns against revolutionary France. He died in 1796, when in command of the army of the Rhine.

HOHENLOHE ILGENFINGEN, FREDERIC LOUIS, prince of, was born in 1746; and after having fought with distinction in various battles at the commencement of the French revolution, was, in 1804, made governor of the principality of Franconia, and commandant of Breslau. After the battle of Jena, Oct. 14, 1806, he directed the retreat, and led the remnants of the great Prussian army; but being destitute of cavalry, and his infantry exhausted by fatigue, he surrendered, with 17,000 men, at Prenzlau, Oct. 28. He died in 1818.

HOLBEIN, HANS, or JOHN, an eminent painter, was born at Basil, in 1486, and learned the elements of his art from his father, whom he soon excelled. His talents procured him the friendship of Erasmus, for whose "Praise of Folly" he drew several whimsical designs. At the recommendation of Erasmus he came to England, and was employed first by Sir Thomas More, who introduced him to Henry VIII. He now rose to the zenith of fortune in that monarch's court, and painted a vast number of portraits, which are still considered masterpieces of art. Some of his earlier productions, especially his "Dance of Death," are also very celebrated; and he was no mean proficient in the art of wood-engraving, many of his historical paintings having been executed by him in a highly graphic style. He died of the plague in 1554.

HOLBERG, LOUIS, baron of, a popular Danish writer, was born at Bergen, in Norway, in 1684. His father had raised himself, by a bold achievement, from the ranks to the office of colonel, but took little care in forming the mind and character of his son, who struggled with great difficulties in acquiring learning. By reading the accounts of travellers, he became desirous of visiting other countries; and though straitened in circumstances, he travelled in England, Holland, France, and Italy; and, on his return to his native country, raised himself to fame, fortune, and rank, by his literary talents. He laid the foundation of his fame by a comic-heroic poem, or national satire, called "Peder Paars." He also wrote numerous dramas, romances, fables, and epigrams, all of which abound with wit, humour, and originality. His other works consist of "The Subterraneous Travels of Nicholas Klimm," an "Universal History," "Parallel Lives of Illustrations Men and Women," a "History of Denmark," &c. Died, 1754.

HOLCROFT, THOMAS, a dramatist, novelist, and miscellaneous writer, was the son of a London tradesman, and born in 1774. He at first followed his father's trade, (that of a shoemaker), then became an actor, and finally directed his talents to literary pursuits. It was as a dramatist that he first essayed his powers; and, between 1778 and 1806, he produced more than thirty pieces, several of which were successful, and some still retain possession of the stage, among which is the "Road to Ruin." On the breaking out of the French revolution, Holcroft rendered himself obnoxious as a strenuous supporter of liberal principles, and was accused of high treason in 1794; on which he surrendered himself; but, owing to his companions, Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall, being acquitted, he was not brought to trial. Among his productions are, "A Tour in Germany and France;" several novels, and numerous translations from the German and French. Died, 1809.

HOLDER, WILLIAM, a clergyman of the church of England, noted as the inventor or improver of a mode of instructing the deaf and dumb. He was a canon of St. Paul's, and sub-dean of the chapel-royal. Died, 1806.

HOLDSWORTH EDWARD, an elegant writer, was born in 1688, at North Stoneham, in Hampshire, of which parish his father was rector. He was the author of "Mucipula," a Latin poem, written with classical purity; also of a Dissertation, entitled "Pharusia and Philippi, or the two Philippi in Virgil's Georgics explained." Died, 1746.

HOLDSWORTH, or OLDISWORTH, RICHARD, a divine, was born in 1800 at New-castle-upon-Tyne, where his father was a celebrated preacher. About 1825 he became rector of St. Peter-le-Poor, London; and in 1829 was elected Gresham professor of divinity. After this he was made prebendary of Lincoln, and archdeacon of Huntingdon. In 1837 he was chosen master of Emanuel college, and created doctor in divinity; but when the civil wars commenced, he lost his church preferences, and was thrown into prison. In 1847 he attended the king at Hampton-court; and died in 1849.

HOLE, RICHARD, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was born at Exeter, and received his education at Exeter college, Oxford. He was the author of a poetical romance, called "Arthar, or the Northern Enchantment;" translated into heroic verse Ossian's "Fingal;" and published several original works. He died in 1803, rector of Farrington.

HOLINSHEAD, or HOLINGSHEAD, RAFAEL, an English chronicler, of the Elizabethan age. He is said to have been descended from a respectable family in Cheshire; and from his own will it appears that in the latter part of his life he was a steward to Thomas Burdet, esq. of Bromcote, Warwickshire. The "Chronicles of Holinshead" were first published in 1577; and prefixed to them is one of the most curious and interesting memorials existing of the manners and domestic history of the English in the 16th century. Died, 1582.

HOLKAR, JESWUNT RAO, a Mahratta chief, who for a long time was a formidable enemy to the English in India, and was able to bring into the field an army of 100,000 men, half of whom were cavalry. Being, however, engaged in frequent contests with other native princes, as well as with the English, his power was very much reduced, and his territories diminished. In 1803 he surrendered all his maritime provinces; but the insurrection of the Pindarrees in 1807, induced him again to make war on the English; when the defection of his ally, the Peishaw, deranged his operations, and he was ultimately deprived of two-thirds of his dominions. Died, 1823.

HOLLAND, Sir NATHANIEL, an English painter, more known for his wealth and eccentricity, than for his professional skill. He was the son of Mr. George Dance, architect and surveyor to the city of London; but having married a wealthy heiress, he changed his name, obtained a baronetcy, was chosen member of parliament, and being desirous of obliterating all traces of his professional career, he endeavoured to buy up all his pictures, in order to destroy them. He died, in 1811, at his seat near Winchester.

HOLLAND, PHILEMON, an industrious writer of the 17th century; the translator of various classic authors, and of Camden's Britannia.

HOLLAR, WENCESLAUS, an eminent Bohemian engraver, was born, in 1617, at Prague. He was brought to England, in 1636, by the earl of Arundel, on his return from the embassy to Vienna; and, in 1640, he was appointed drawing-master to the prince of Wales and the duke of York. The prospects of Hollar, however, were utterly destroyed by the civil war, and he was imprisoned; but he contrived to escape to Antwerp, and again attached himself to his noble friend, the earl of Arundel, then living there in exile. In 1652 he returned to England, and applied assiduously to his art; but though he was so much employed, that he is said to have executed two thousand four hundred plates, he died so poor that an execution for debt was in his house at the moment of his death, which happened in 1677. His "Ornatus Mulieris Anglicanus" is held in high estimation, as portraying with great correctness the appearance of the fair sex, of all classes, in the 17th century.

HOLLES, DENZIL, lord, one of the five members of the long parliament who were demanded by king Charles I. when he went to the House of Commons. At the Restoration he was advanced to the peerage; in 1663 he was sent ambassador to France, and in 1667 was one of the English plenipotentiaries at Breda. Notwithstanding these employments he remained a zealous friend to liberty; and when the politics of the reign tended to make the king absolute, lord Holles was a conspicuous leader of the opposition. He died, with a high character for honour, integrity, and patriotism, in 1680, aged 62.

HOLLIS, THOMAS, was born in London, in 1720. After a private education among the dissenters, he went to Amsterdam to learn the French and Dutch languages; and on his return completed his studies under Dr. Ward, the Gresham professor. He then went on his travels; and having a handsome fortune, employed it in collecting curiosities and books. He contributed largely to Harvard college, in America; the public library at Berne; and other foreign institutions; was a fellow of the royal, antiquarian, and other learned societies; and made many valuable presents to the British Museum. He was a great friend to democratic government; was gentle and polite in his manners; and seems to have united much of the ancient stoic to the modern partisan of freedom and general philanthropist. Died, 1774.

HOLMAN, JOSEPH GEORGE, a dramatist and actor, was a native of London, and intended for the church; but in 1784 he made his debut at Covent-garden theatre. He afterwards went to America, and became manager of Charlestown theatre. Among his dramatic productions are the "Votary of Wealth," a comedy; "Red Cross Knights," "Abroad and at Home," &c. His death was remarkable and melancholy, taking place together with his second wife, two days after their marriage, by the yellow fever, in 1817.

HOLMES, ROBERT, a divine and poet, born in 1749; he was educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford; appointed professor of poetry on the death of Mr. Warton, in 1790; and in 1804 was made dean of Winchester, having previously been made canon of Salisbury and Christ church. He published various short poems, sermons, &c.; but he is best known by his collated edition of the Septuagint. Died, 1808.

HOLROYD, JOHN BAKER, Lord SHEFFIELD, a political writer, soldier, and statesman, was descended from an ancient family in Yorkshire, and born in 1741. He first served in the army under the marquis of Granby; and in the American war he raised at his own expense a regiment of dragoons, of which he had the command, and was usually called colonel Holroyd till his elevation to the peerage. He wrote several political tracts; but he is best known as the friend of Gibbon, the historian, whose posthumous works and correspondence he edited. Died, 1831.

HOLROYD, SIR GEORGE BOWLEY, an English judge, who, after a long course of successful practice at the bar, was appointed to his seat on the bench in 1816, and received the honour of knighthood. Though he was never eminent for his forensic oratory, his legal knowledge was universally admitted, and his opinions carried great weight. He was impartial, attentive, and deliberate in the exercise of his judicial functions; bore a high character for independence, and was universally esteemed for his private virtues. He resigned his judicial office in 1839; and died in 1831.

HOLT, SIR JOHN, an eminent English judge, celebrated for firmness, integrity, and great legal knowledge, was born at Thame, Oxfordshire, in 1645; studied at Oriel college, Oxford; and became a member of Gray's Inn. He filled the office of Recorder of London for about a year and a half, when his uncompromising opposition to the abolition of the Test Act, caused him to lose his situation. Becoming a member of the lower house, he distinguished himself so much by his exertions and talents in what is called the "convention parliament," that on king William's accession he was made lord chief justice of the King's Bench. On the removal of Lord Somers, in 1700, he was offered the chancellorship; but he refused it, and continued to discharge the important duties of his high judicial authority with a resolute uprightness that gained him popularity while living, and rendered his memory dear to posterity. Died, 1709.

HOLTY, LOUIS HENRY CHRISTOPHER, a German poet, excelling particularly in lyrical and elegiac compositions, was born at Mariensee, Hanover, in 1748. He was of a mild and pensive disposition, pursued his studies beyond his natural strength, and prematurely died, at Göttingen, in 1778.

HOLWELL, JOHN ZEPHANIAH, an ingenious English gentleman, who was governor of Bengal, and one of the persons confined in the Black-hole at Calcutta in 1780, of which he published a narrative. He wrote several pieces on Indian affairs, and died in 1798.

HOLYDAY, BARTEN, a learned divine, was born at Oxford in 1693, and died in 1641. He wrote several sermons, and translated the Satires of Juvenal into English.

HOLYOAKE, FRANCIS, a learned lexicographer, was born in Warwickshire about 1567, and died in 1633. His "Etymological Dictionary of Latin Words" was first printed in 1606.—His son THOMAS was doctor in divinity, and died in 1675. During the civil wars he commanded a troop of horse in the king's service, although in holy orders; and on the failure of the royal cause, he practised medicine for a subsistence; but at the Restoration he resumed his ecclesiastical functions, and obtained church preferment. He enlarged his father's Dictionary, which was published in 1677.

HOLYOKE, EDWARD AUGUSTUS, an American physician, born in Essex county, Massachusetts, in 1728. He graduated at Harvard college, and in 1749 began to practise at Salem; was upwards of a hundred years old when he died, yet it is said he was never in his life so far as fifty miles from the spot where he was born. He was temperate, cheerful, and active; always took "a due proportion of sleep;" and, in the practice of his profession, did not indulge in riding, till he was eighty years of age. Even after he had attained his hundredth year he took interest in the investigation of medical subjects, and wrote letters which show that his understanding was still clear and strong. Dr. Holyoke was a good anatomist; was versed in natural philosophy and astronomy; and regularly recorded his meteorological observations daily for eighty years. Died, 1829.

HOLYWOOD, JOHN, or according to his Latinized appellation ON SACROBOCO, was an English mathematician and divine, born at Halifax in Yorkshire. After receiving his education at Oxford, he went to Paris, where he taught the mathematics, and died in 1264. He wrote "De Sphæra Mundi;" "De Anni Ratione;" & "De Algorismo."

HOME, DAVID, a Scotch divine, who was employed by James I. to bring the protestants of Europe into one confession. He wrote "Apologia Basilica," seu Machiavellicum Ingenium Examinatum;" "L'Assassinat du Roi, ou Maximes du Vieux de la Montagne pratiquées en la Personne de défunt Henri le Grand."

HOME, HENRY, Lord KAIMES, a Scottish judge, and eminent writer, born in the year 1696. He was instructed in the ancient and modern languages by a private tutor; and afterwards studied the civil and Scots' law in the university of Edinburgh. Mr. Home's success at the bar was not great, till his abilities were known by the publication of his "Remarkable Decisions of the Court of Session, from 1716 to 1718," which happened in 1728. From that period he practised, with much respectability and success, till the year 1753, when he was called to the bench. Eleven years afterwards he was appointed one of the lords of justiciary. Independent of various judicial works, he wrote "Essays concerning British Antiquities;" "Essays on the Principles of Morality and Natural Religion;" "An Introduction to the Art of Thinking;" and

"Elements of Criticism," in which, discarding all arbitrary rules of literary composition, he endeavours to establish a new theory on the principles of human nature. Nothing farther came from his pen till 1772, when "The Gentleman Farmer" made its appearance; and the following year "Sketches of the History of Man," in two volumes, &c. The last work he published was "Loose Hints upon Education, chiefly concerning the Culture of the Heart." It was published in the year 1781, when the venerable author was in the 85th year of his age. Lord Kaimes was remarkable for public spirit, to which he conjoined activity and great exertion. Died, 1782.

HOME, JOHN, the author of the popular tragedy of "Douglas," was born near Ancrum, Roxburghshire, in 1734, and educated for the church; but, in the rebellion of 1745, he entered into the royal army, and was taken prisoner at the battle of Falkirk. He contrived, however, to make his escape, and, in 1750, was ordained as minister of Athelstanford, in East Lothian. His tragedy of "Douglas" was performed at Edinburgh in 1756, and gave such offence to the presbytery, that the author, to avoid ecclesiastical censure, resigned his living, and ever after appeared and acted as a layman. He obtained some trifling government appointments, and wrote four other plays, which, however, failed to attract; his "History of the Rebellion of 1745-6," also disappointed the public expectation. Died, aged 55, in 1800.

HOME, Sir EVERARD, bart., an eminent surgeon, was the son of Robert Home, esq. of Greenlaw Castle, in the county of Berwick; and was brought up to the profession under his brother-in-law, the celebrated John Hunter. For a period of more than forty years he practised with great success in London; and during that time he produced numerous medical works, which are held in high repute. He was sergeant-surgeon to the king, surgeon to Chelsea hospital, vice-president of the Royal Society, president of the Royal College of Surgeons; was created a baronet in 1813, and died in 1832. Among his works are, "Lectures on Comparative Anatomy," 7 vols. 4to., and "Practical Observations" on a variety of diseases, consisting of several volumes; besides numerous valuable contributions to the Philosophical Transactions, &c. Born, 1716; died, 1832.

HOMER, the father of poetry. Of the birth of this immortal bard, and of the circumstances of his death—of his parentage and descent, nay, even of his actual existence—all is involved in doubt and fable. Seven cities disputed for the honour of being his birth-place: Smyrna, Colophon, Chios, Argos, Athens, Rhodes, and Salamis; the probability is, that he was an Asiatic Greek, and flourished in the ninth century before Christ. According to the account ascribed to Herodotus, (which, though traditional, we are bound to receive, in the absence of contemporaneous information), a native of Magnesia, called Menalippus, went to live at Cumæ, where he married the daughter of Homyrus, and had by her a child, called Critheis, who was left an orphan in the care of Cleonax. This man betrayed his trust, and seduced his ward, who, going to a festival on the banks of the river Meles, near Smyrna, was delivered of a male infant, to whom she gave the name of Melesigenes. Being without any means of support, Crithis went to spin wool for a school-master named Phemius, who married her, and adopted her son. On the death of Phemius, this youth conducted the school; but he afterwards accompanied Mentes, a master of a ship, in several voyages, and by him was left at Ithaca, where he gathered many particulars respecting Ulysses, which laid the foundation of the Odyssey. At length Mentes returned, and took him on board again, but at Colophon he had the misfortune to lose his sight. He then became a strolling bard, and obtained the name of Homer, which signifies a blind man. It is further added, that being at Phocæa, a school-master, named Thestorides, offered to maintain him, provided he would suffer him to transcribe his verses, which he agreed to from necessity. The schoolmaster then went to Chios, where he acquired great wealth by Homer's poems, while the poet himself could scarcely get bread by reciting them. Homer on this proceeded to Chios; and Thestorides, hearing of his arrival, fled before him. Here the poet opened a school of poetry, married, and had two daughters. Pausanias also declares that Homer was blind, and such is the commonly received opinion; but to represent him as a blind beggar, obliged to sing his songs before the doors of the rich for bread, is inconsistent with all we know of the ancient Greek bards, and their manner of life. Though neither rich nor powerful, they were highly esteemed; and were equally welcome in the assemblies of citizens, in the palaces of princes, and at public sacrifices. Herder, the German critic, speaking of the writings of Homer, says, "The truth and wisdom with which he unites all the subjects of this world in a living picture, the firmness of every stroke in all the personages of this immortal picture, the divine freedom with which he contemplates the characters, and paints their virtues and vices, their successes and disasters—this is what renders Homer unique, and worthy of immortality."

HOMER, HENRY, a classical scholar; the son of a clergyman, rector of Birdingbury, in Warwickshire; editor, in conjunction with Dr. Coombe, of a variorum edition of Horace; also editor of the works of Cæsar, Livy, Tacitus, &c. Born, 1732; died, 1791.

HOMILIUS, GODFREY AUGUSTUS, music director in the three principal churches at Dresden, and one of the greatest organists and composers of church music of his time. Born, 1714; died, 1785.

HOMMEL, FERDINAND AUGUSTUS, a member of the supreme court of Leipzig, born in 1697. His works show great legal erudition and a truly philosophical mind. Died, 1768.

HOMMEL, CHARLES FERDINAND, son of the preceding, was not only one of the greatest jurists of his age, but was well versed in many other branches of science; wrote several academical works; and contributed to introduce a better and purer language in the German courts. Born, 1723; died, 1781.

HOMPESCH, BARON, grand master of the island of Malta, which in 1798 he surrendered to the French. He is noticed here not on account of any merit; but to record the pusillanimity and servile adulation he displayed in his correspondence with Bonaparte. He afterwards came to England, where for a time he amused the public by the peculiarity of his costume and manners; then went to the continent; and died at Montpellier, in France, in 1803.

HONDEKOETER, GILES; GYBRECHT, his son; and MELCHIOR, his grandson; three Flemish artists of the 16th and 17th centuries. The first excelled in landscape painting; the second, in delineating birds; and the last, who was by far the most celebrated of the three, combined the powers of the former two, and painted with great elegance and accuracy.

HONDIUS, ABRAHAM, a Dutch artist, of considerable ability, particularly in his hunting pieces: he also painted "The Destruction of Troy," in a manner which has obtained for him the highest praise. He came to England, and died in 1691.

HONE, GEORGE PAUL, an eminent lawyer, of Nuremberg, born in 1662. He became counsellor to the duke of Saxe-Meiningen, and died in 1747.

HONE, NATHANIEL, a celebrated painter in enamel, was a native of Dublin, but came to London early in life, and was one of the first members of the Royal Academy. Died, 1784.

HONORIUS, FLAVIUS, emperor of the West, the son of Theodosius, was born at Constantinople, in 384; succeeded to the throne, in conjunction with his brother Arcadius, in 395; and died at Ravenna, after an inglorious reign, in the 30th year of his age, A.D. 423.

HONORIUS III. was raised to the papal chair on the death of Innocent III. in 1216. Immediately on his election, he wrote to the king of Jerusalem to assure him of his support; to the bishops of France, to encourage pilgrims; and to the emperor of Constantinople, to promise him assistance against the schismatics. He also obliged Louis of France to renounce his pretensions to the English throne, and reconciled the barons with Henry III. Died, 1227; and was succeeded by Gregory IX.

HONTAN, BARON DE LA, a native of Gascony. He was a common soldier in Canada, and rose to the rank of royal lieutenant of Newfoundland, but was disgraced, and died in the service of Denmark. His "Travels" in North America, contain some curious accounts of the aboriginal inhabitants, but cannot be implicitly relied on.

HONTHEIM, JOHN NICOLAS DE, suffragan to the archbishop of Treves, where he was born in 1701, and died in 1780. He wrote a "History of Treves" in Latin, which procured him much reputation; and another work, "On the Condition of the Church and the lawful Power of the Pope," in which, though he was an ardent catholic, he attacked the usurpations of the Romish see with so much boldness, that he was persecuted, and the work condemned. Died, 1790.

HONTHORST, GERARD, a celebrated painter, called also GERARDO DALLE NOTTI, from his subjects, was born at Utrecht in 1592, and was a pupil of Abraham Bloemart, but finished his studies at Rome, where he was employed by prince Justiniani, and other persons of high rank. He painted night-scenes, and pieces illuminated by torch, or candle-light. On his return from Italy he visited England, and obtained the favour of Charles I. by many able performances; and on his return to Holland, he was much employed by the prince of Orange. Among his numerous pictures, that of Jesus Christ before the Tribunal of Pilate, is the most celebrated. Died, 1660.

HOOD, ROBIN, a celebrated English outlaw, in the 12th century,—whose personal courage, skill in archery, boldness of enterprise, and generous disposition, have rendered his name famous in the legendary history of our country,—lived in Sherwood forest, in Nottinghamshire. The heads of his story, as collected by Stow, are briefly these:—"In this time (about the year 1190, in the reign of Richard I.) were many robbers and outlaws, among whom Robin Hood and Little John, renowned thieves, continued in the woods, despoiling and robbing the goods of the rich. They killed none but such as would invade them, or by resistance for their own defence. The said Robin entertained an hundred tall men and good archers, with such spoils and thefts as he got, upon whom four hundred (were they ever so strong) durst not give the onset. He suffered no woman to be oppressed, violated, or otherwise molested; poor men's goods he spared, abundantly relieving them with that which by theft he got from abbays and the houses of rich old carles." He died in 1247.

HOOD, SAMUEL, lord viscount, the son of a clergyman at Thorncombe, in Devonshire, was born there in 1724, and entered the royal navy at the age of sixteen. By his bravery in the capture of a 50-gun ship, in 1759, he acquired the rank of post-captain; and he was present, as rear-admiral, at the famous defeat of De Grasse, by Rodney, April 12th, 1782, when his services on that occasion were rewarded with an Irish peerage. In 1784 he was elected into parliament for Westminster; but in 1788 he vacated his seat on being named one of the lords of the admiralty. In 1793 he signalized himself by the taking of Toulon, and afterwards Corsica; in reward of which achievements he was made a viscount, and governor of Greenwich hospital. Died, 1816.

HOOFT, PETER CORNELIUS VAN, a Dutch historian and poet, born in 1581, at Amsterdam; author of a "Life of Henry IV." in Latin; a "History of the Low Countries," and many other works. Died, 1647.

HOOGSTRAEN, DAVID VAN, a Dutch poet and critic, born at Rotterdam, in 1658; became professor of the belles lettres at Amsterdam; wrote several good poems, in the Latin language; and otherwise displayed considerable classical attainments. Died, 1724.

HOOGVLIET, ARNOLD, a Dutch poet, born in 1687. His chief fame rests on a poem in twelve books, entitled "Abraham the Patriarch," which is admired for the beauty of its style and imagery. Died, 1763.

HOOK, JAMES, a musical composer, of great industry and talent, was born at Norwich, in 1746. His operatic and melodramatic productions amount to more than one hundred and forty complete works, many of which were highly successful; he also set to music upwards of 2000 songs! Died, 1827. He was the father of the Rev. Dr. Hook, dean of Worcester, and of Theodore Hook, esq. the celebrated novelist, &c.

HOOK, Dr. JAMES, dean of Worcester, son of the preceding, was an accomplished scholar, and an able dignitary of the church. He was educated at Westminster-school, and St. Mary-hall, Oxford; in 1802 he was made chaplain to George IV.; held the livings of Hertingfordbury and St. Andrew's, in Hertfordshire, which he afterwards exchanged for that of Whippingham, in the Isle of Wight; obtained a prebendal stall in Winchester cathedral, in 1807; succeeded Dr. Middleton, as archdeacon of Huntingdon, in 1814; and accepted the deanery of Worcester, in 1825. Besides some dramas, which he wrote early in life, he published, in 1802, "Angulus in Herba; a Sketch of the true Character of the Church of England and her Clergy," which he inscribed to "The sober sense of his country." Few writers, indeed, surpassed Dr. Hook as a polemical or a political pamphleteer. At all times and on all occasions he was the unflinching castigator of those who upheld doctrines of a revolutionary tendency; and some of the most effective pamphlets that appeared during the war, in support of sound monarchical principles, owed their origin to him. Died, 1828.

HOOKE, NATHANIEL. Of this gentleman, whose chief celebrity arose from his writing a "History of Rome, from the Earliest Period, to the Accession of Octavius," very little is known. It appears that he was a zealous Catholic, and has been censured for taking a priest to confess Pope, the poet, on his death-bed. Besides his Roman History, which is unquestionably a work of great critical acumen and accuracy, he wrote "Observations on the Roman Senate;" translated Ramsay's Travels of Cyrus; and received 5000*l.* from Sarah, duchess of Marlborough, for assisting her in the Memoirs of her Life. Died, 1763.

HOOKE, ROBERT, an English mathematician and natural philosopher, was born at Freshwater, in the Isle of Wight, in 1635. He was educated at Westminster and Oxford; and early displayed a mechanical genius and an extraordinary talent for drawing. In 1664 he became professor of mechanics to the Royal Society, and Gresham professor of geometry. In 1663 appeared his "Micographia;" and in 1666 he produced a plan for rebuilding London, which, though approved, was not adopted. Hooke, however, was appointed one of the city surveyors; by which he realized a handsome fortune. His scientific and mechanical inventions and discoveries were numerous and valuable; but he was a man of an unamiable disposition, and continually engaged in acrimonious controversies with his fellow-philosophers. He had a violent dispute with Hevelius, upon the preference of the telescopic to plain sights; he had afterwards a contention with Oldenburg, on the invention of pendulum watches; and he endeavoured also to set up a claim to Newton's theory of gravitation. Died, 1703.

HOOKER, JOHN, a learned antiquary, was born at Exeter, in 1524. He wrote a "Description of Exeter;" and some part of Hollingshed's Chronicle; besides other pieces. Died, 1601.

HOOKER, RICHARD, an eminent English divine, author of an excellent work, entitled "The Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, in eight Books," was born at Heavitree, near Exeter, in 1553; and died at Bishop's Bourne, Kent, of which place he was rector, in 1600. It is recorded that, in speaking of Hooker and his great work, Pope Clement VIII. said, "This man, indeed, deserves the name of an author. His books will get reverence by age; for there he in them such seeds of eternity, that they shall continue till the last fire shall devour all learning."

HOOLE, JOHN, a dramatic poet and translator, was born in 1727. He was a clerk in the India-house, but devoted his leisure hours to literary pursuits, particularly the study of the Italian language, of which he acquired a great knowledge, as appears by his excellent translations of "Ariosto's Orlando Furioso," and "Tasso's Jerusalem," into English. He also published two volumes of the dramas of Metastasio; and was the author of three tragedies, viz. "Cyrus," "Timotheus," and "Cleoneice." Died, 1803.

HOOPER, JOHN, a pious English prelate and martyr, was born in Somersetshire, in 1495, and educated at Merton college, Oxford. At the accession of Edward VI. he was made bishop of Gloucester, to which was added that of Worcester in commendam. Here he laboured with great zeal till the restoration of popery under Mary, when, continuing firm in the faith he had chosen, he was condemned to the flames, as an obstinate and irreclaimable heretic; and suffered the perils of martyrdom, with undaunted constancy, at Gloucester, in 1555. He was the author of some sermons and controversial treatises.

HOOPER, GEORGE, an eminent English prelate, was born at Grimsley, in Worcestershire, about 1640. In 1691 he was appointed dean of Canterbury; and on the accession of queen Anne, bishop of St. Asaph, from whence he was translated to Bath and Wells, which diocese he presided over twenty-four years, and died in 1727.

HOPE, Sir THOMAS, a Scotch lawyer, who in 1627 became king's advocate, and, though secretly attached to the covenanters, was created a baronet by Charles. Died, 1646.

HOPE, JOHN, a physician and naturalist, born at Edinburgh, in 1725; was professor of botany and the materia medica in his native city, and in 1761 was appointed botanist to the king, and superintendent of the botanic garden. Died, 1786.

HOPE, THOMAS, an English gentleman of large fortune, distinguished by his talents and patronage of the fine arts, was the nephew of a rich merchant of Amsterdam. In 1805 he first appeared as an author, by publishing a work, entitled "Household Furniture and Internal Decorations;" this was followed by two elegant publications, "The Costumes of the Ancients," and "Designs of Modern Costume;" but his great performance was "Anastasis, or Memoirs of a Modern Greek," which appeared anonymously in 1819, and was for some time very generally ascribed to Lord Byron. In this romance, which holds a distinguished rank among modern English works of fiction, he has presented a most accurate and interesting picture of the customs, manners, and countries of the Turks and Greeks, which evinces at once the general knowledge and genius of its author. Another work, of a metaphysical nature, has been published since his death, entitled "On the Origin and Prospects of Man." He died in 1831.

HOPE, Lieut.-general Sir JOHN, G.C.H., colonel of the 72d Highlanders, was born in Scotland, in 1765, and entered the army in 1778 as a cadet in general Houston's regiment of the Scots brigade, then serving in Holland. In 1787 he obtained a company in the 60th foot; the following year he was appointed to a troop in the 13th light dragoons, and in 1792 was made aide-de-camp to general Sir W. Erskine, whom he accompanied to Flanders, and was present at all the actions in which the cavalry were engaged. On his return he was promoted to a majority in the 28th light dragoons; was soon after made lieutenant-colonel, embarked with his regiment for the Cape, and, on his return in 1799, was appointed to the 37th foot, which regiment he joined at St. Vincent's, in the West Indies. In 1805 he received the rank of colonel; was next appointed deputy-adjutant-general to the Baltic expedition, and was present at the siege and capture of Copenhagen. In 1810 he was made a major-general, and placed on the staff of the Severn district; from whence, in 1812, he was removed to that of the army under lord Wellington in the Peninsula. In 1819 he arrived at the rank of lieutenant-general; and died in 1836.

HOPITAL, MICHAEL DE L', was an eminent chancellor of France, to which high station he rose through the zeal, ability, and integrity, he displayed in the various offices he before filled. He was born in 1505; studied jurisprudence in the most celebrated universities of France and Italy; rose rapidly in his profession, and was sent by Henry II. as ambassador to the council of Trent. In 1554 he was made superintendent of the royal finances, when by his good management, and his inflexible disregard of those rapacious favourites of the court who batted on the public purse, he restored the exhausted treasury. He was a sincere friend to religious toleration, and the principal author of the edict of 1562, which allowed freedom of worship to Protestants. This brought on him the hatred of the court of Rome; his seals of office were taken from him; and he retired to his country-house, in the full conviction that a life of lettered ease, and the conversation of a few friends, were of far greater value to his personal happiness than the retention of place or power at the sacrifice of principle. When the atrocious massacre of the Protestants on Bartholomew's day, 1572, was at its height, and his friends thought he would be made one of its victims, he not only refused to take measures for his own safety, but when a party of horsemen advanced towards his house, he refused to close his gates. They were, in fact, dispatched by the queen with express orders to save him. On this occasion, he was told that the persons who made the list of proscription pardoned him; upon which he coolly observed, "I did not know that I had done anything to deserve either death or pardon." The whole course of this great man's life was productive of benefit to his country, and did honour to his nature. He survived this execrable event a few months only, dying in 1573.

HOPITAL, WILLIAM FRANCIS ANTHONY DE L', marquis de St. Mesme, a celebrated French mathematician, was the son of a general in the army, and born in 1661. Such was his reputation for mathematical science, that the profound Huygens did not disdain to apply to him for information. He wrote several works on Conic Sections, Equations, &c. Died, 1704.

HOPKINS, EZEKIEL, bishop of Londonderry, was a native of Devonshire, and born in 1633. Having married a daughter of the earl of Truro, and that nobleman being appointed lord-lieutenant of Ireland, he obtained the bishopric of Raphoe, and was subsequently translated to that of Londonderry. His works consist of Expositions of the Decalogue and the Lord's Prayer, with Sermons. Died, 1690.

HOPKINS, CHARLES, son of the preceding, was born at Exeter in 1664. During the Revolution he distinguished himself much in favour of the Orange party; was the friend and associate of Dryden, lord Dorset, Congreve, and other literary men; wrote the tragedies of "Pyrrhus," "The Female Warrior," and "Boadicea;" and translated Ovid's Tristia and the Art of Love. His death, which was hastened by intemperance, took place in 1699.—His brother JOHN, born in 1673, also possessed poetical talents, and published "Amasia," and other poems, in 3 vols.

HOPKINS, WILLIAM, D.D., an English divine, born at Evesham, Worcestershire, in 1647, was a celebrated antiquary. He assisted bishop Gibson in his edition of the Saxon Chronicle, and was the translator of the article "Worcestershire," in Camden's Britannia. In 1675 he was promoted to a prebend in Worcester cathedral; held the mastership of St. Oswald's hospital; and died, in 1700.—Another WILLIAM HOPKINS, was the author of "An Appeal to Common Sense;" and, though openly professing Arian principles, held the rectory of Bolney, in Sussex, till his death, in 1786.

HOPKINS, LEMUEL, an American physician and author, born at Waterbury, Connecticut, in 1750. He introduced the anti-phlogistic regimen and practice in febrile diseases, and was not less assiduous than he was skilful, as a practitioner; while as a literary man he successfully distinguished himself by various political tracts and satires, written with a view to give a tone to the public feeling in favour of the administration of Washington. Died, 1801.

HOPKINS, SAMUEL, D.D., founder of the sect called Hopkinsians, was born at Waterbury, in the United States, in 1721. He was a pious and zealous man, with considerable talents, and almost incredible powers of application; but his theological opinions have given rise to much controversy. He published numerous sermons, a "Treatise on the Millennium," &c.; and earnestly advocated the abolition of slavery in the American States. From the year 1769 he presided over a congregation at Newport, Rhode Island, where he died in 1803.

HOPKINS, STEPHEN, an American statesman, and one of those who signed the declaration of independence, was born in 1707, in that part of Providence which now forms the town of Scituate. In 1732 he was elected a representative to the general assembly from Scituate, and was chosen speaker of that body in 1741. In 1751 he was appointed chief justice of the superior court of Rhode Island; and, in 1756, was elected its governor. After this he was several times chosen a member of congress, and died in 1785. He was a clear and convincing speaker; a good mathematician; and though he had received but a very limited education, his knowledge of literature, science, and political economy was varied and extensive.

HOPKINSON, FRANCIS, an eminent American author, and one of the signers of the American independence, was born at Philadelphia, in 1738. His father was the intimate friend and scientific coadjutor of Franklin. After graduating at the college of Philadelphia, and making the law his study, Francis visited England, the country of his parents' birth; and in a few years after his return, entered congress as a delegate from New Jersey. He produced many satires and ironical pieces, such as the "Prophecy," the "Political Catechism," &c. tending to ridicule the old country; while, at the same time, he directed his efforts against the ribaldry of the newspapers, and the exaggerations and prejudices with which the federal constitution was at first assailed. After his retirement from congress, he was appointed judge of the admiralty for Pennsylvania; and died in 1791. Among his works, the greater part of which are of a political character, there are many sound essays and scientific papers, acute and learned judicial decisions, and a variety of songs possessing much sweetness and delicacy, which were rendered still more popular by the airs he composed for them.

HOPPNER, JOHN, an ingenious portrait and landscape-painter, chiefly excelling in females and children, was born in 1759, and died in 1810. As the author of a metrical translation of Oriental Tales, and in other literary performances, he also distinguished himself.

son of Sir Arthur Hopton, was born in Somersetshire, and educated at Lincoln college, Oxford; after which he became a student of the Temple, where he lived on terms of intimacy with Seklen, but died in 1614, aged 26. He wrote "A Treatise on the Geometrical Staff;" "The Topographical Glass;" "A Concordance of Years," &c.

HORAPOLLO, or HORUS APOLLO, a grammarian, of Panopolis, in Egypt, in the 4th century, who taught first at Alexandria, and next at Constantinople. There are extant, under his name, two books concerning the hieroglyphics of the Egyptians, printed in Greek by Aldus, in 1505, but their authenticity is questionable.

HORATIUS FLACCUS, QUINTUS, or HORACE, one of the most eminent, and certainly the most popular and elegant of the Roman poets, was born at Venusium, a city lying on the borders of Lucania and Apulia, B.C. 65. His father, although following the calling of a tax-gatherer, was a man of elevated and liberal sentiments, and took the greatest pains in providing for his education. At the age of twenty years he went to Athens to complete his studies; and while there, Marcus Brutus passing through the city on his way to Macedonia, Horace, accompanied by other Roman youths, joined the army; became a legionary tribune; fought in the last battle for the freedom of Rome at Philippi, and saved himself by flight. Though he saved his life, he forfeited his estate, and was reduced to great want, till Virgil introduced him to Mæcenas, by whose interest he recovered his patrimony. Augustus now became his friend, and offered to make him his secretary, which Horace declined. When Mæcenas was sent to Brundisium to conclude a treaty between Augustus and Anthony, he took with him Horace, Virgil, and other literary friends; and, not long after, his munificent patron presented him with the Sabine villa; to which, having witnessed such striking examples of the instability of fortune, he withdrew from the tumult at Rome, preferring retirement to a more brilliant life. His Odes are models of that kind of composition, and his Epistles and Satires abound with acute and vivacious observations on life and manners; while his "Ars Poetica," so often quoted, evinces great taste, and is remarkable for a species of graceful negligence. This is not the place, even if our brief limits permitted it, to dwell on the peculiar merits of a classical poet; but we may safely say, with a more competent authority, that "the easy, agreeable manner in which he philosophises without appearing to do it, the salt with which he seasons his thoughts, and the delicacy and ease with which he expresses himself, afford the most agreeable entertainment. His descriptions are still applicable and interesting, and the poet will therefore ever remain the favourite of those whose morality does not exclude the refinements of life." Horace died suddenly, in the year of Rome 786, and 9 B.C., aged 36.

HORNE, GEOFFREY, a learned and pious English prelate of the 18th century, was born in 1730, at Otham, Kent; and was educated at Maidstone grammar school, and at University college, Oxford. He took orders in 1753, and his graceful elocution and excellent style, rendered him a popular preacher. He was successively chaplain to the king, vice-chancellor of the University, and dean of Canterbury; and in 1790 he was raised to the see of Norwich. He was distinguished for his biblical knowledge, and in early life was a strenuous Hutchinsonian. In 1751 he opposed the Newtonian philosophy, as inconsistent with the Bible; in 1754 he wrote against Dr. Shuckford's account of the creation and fall of man; and in 1756 he became involved in a controversy with Dr. Kennicott, the supposed author of "A Word to the Hutchinsonians." But among his numerous works, which are too numerous for specifying here, the principal is "A Commentary on the Book of Psalms," an elaborate performance, on the composition of which he bestowed nearly twenty years. Died, 1792.

HORNECK, ANTHONY, an eminent divine, and learned orientalist, was born at Haecarsch, in Germany, in 1641; came to England, and completed his education at Queen's college, Oxford; and obtained a prebend in Westminster abbey, and a chaplainship to the king. He wrote many admirable works on theology and church history; and was an excellent Hebrew scholar. Died, 1695.

HORNECK, OTTOCAR of, one of the oldest historians in the German language, was a native of Stiria, and lived in the 13th and 14th centuries. About the year 1280, he composed a work on the great empires of the earth, which concluded with the death of the emperor Frederic II., and is still extant in manuscript at Vienna. He also wrote a chronicle of the events of his own time, consisting of more than 32,000 verses, and which is said to be rich in portraying the characters of eminent men, and in the description of festivals, tournaments, and battles, at part of which he was himself present.

HORNEMANN, FREDERIC CONRAD, a celebrated German traveller, born at Hildesheim, in 1772. At the instance of Blumenbach, the famous naturalist, he was, in 1797, employed by the African Association, in London, to explore the interior of Africa. After having visited Cyprus, Alexandria, and Cairo, he crossed the Libyan desert, reached Mourzouk, the capital of Fezzan, and soon afterwards proceeded on an excursion to Tripoli. From this place he set out with the intention of penetrating into Central Africa, and is believed to have died on his return to Fezzan, of a fever, caused by drinking cold water, after being exposed to great fatigue. His Journal, which was sent by him from Tripoli, was published in 1803 by the African Society.

HORNER, FRANCIS, barrister-at-law, was born at Edinburgh, in 1776; and educated at the High school and university of his native city. He entered parliament in 1800, and distinguished himself as chairman of the bullion committee; but his severe application to that intricate subject injured his health, which was naturally delicate; and he died, in 1817, at Pisa, whither he had gone for its restoration. Mr. Horner's literary talents were of a high order, and he was one of the earliest and most able writers in the Edinburgh Review.

HORROX, JEREMIAN, an English astronomer, was born at Toxteth, in Lancashire, about 1619. He was the first who observed the transit of Venus over the sun's disk, his account of which was published by Hevelius at Danzig, in 1661, under the title of "Venus in Sole visus, anno 1639 Nov. 24;" and he formed a theory of lunar motion, which Newton did not disdain to adopt. His premature death, which was a real loss to science, took place soon after he had attained the age of 31 years. Dr. Wallis published his posthumous works in 1673.

HORSLEY, JOHN, a learned antiquary, who died in 1731. His work, entitled "Britannia Romana," folio, gives a copious and exact account of the remains of the Romans in Britain.

HORSLEY, SAMUEL, a celebrated English prelate and mathematician, was born in London in 1733; was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge; and held several livings, in succession, till he arrived at the episcopal dignity. But while he was rapidly rising in the church, and opposing Dr. Priestley, the great champion of Unitarianism, by his theological arguments, he was not neglectful of science. In 1775 he published an edition of Newton's works, in 5 vols. 4to.; and from 1773, till the election of Sir Joseph Banks, he was secretary of the Royal Society; when, deeming the dignity of the society lessened by the choice of a man, who was ignorant of the higher sciences, he resigned his office. He was the uncompromising and strenuous advocate of the cause he espoused; an open and sincere enemy to all innovation in church and state; profoundly learned, and an eloquent preacher. His writings were numerous and important, in theology, in science, and in classical literature.

HORTENSIVS, QUINTUS, a celebrated Roman orator, who, till his great rival Cicero bore away the palm, eclipsed all others by the grace and splendour of his eloquence. He was elegant in his style, acute in the conception and distribution of his matter, and succeeded by sudden effect. He held many civil and military offices; was made consul 70 B.C.; was Cicero's colleague as augur; and died immensely rich, B.C. 49. His works are unfortunately lost to posterity.—His daughter Hortensia inherited his eloquence, and when the Roman women were required to render on oath an account of their property, she pleaded the cause of her sex with such force, that the decree was annulled.

HOSTE, PAUL, a celebrated French mathematician; born, 1633; died, 1700. He accompanied the marshals d'Estrees and de Tourville during twelve years in all their expeditions; and produced, besides other works, "L'Art des Armees Navales," a treatise which is equally historical and authentic, and for which Louis XIV. liberally rewarded him.

HOSTE, JOHN, a learned French mathematician of the 16th century. He was appointed superintendent of fortifications and counsellor of war; fortified the town of Nancy; and wrote several works on astronomy, geometry, &c. Died, 1631.

HOTTINGER, JOHN HENRY, a learned oriental scholar, born at Zurich, in 1630. He displayed such a propensity for, and made such progress in the ancient languages, that he was sent to foreign universities at the public expense. He went to Geneva, Gottingen, and Leyden; visited England; and returned to his native country, enriched with vast stores of knowledge. In 1642 he was appointed professor of ecclesiastical history in his native city; and by his teaching and writings contributed greatly to promote the study of oriental literature. He endeavoured, especially, to obtain accurate information concerning the state of the Eastern churches; and by his knowledge of oriental history and archaeology, he was enabled to throw considerable light on the history of the Jews, Mohammedans, &c. In 1658 he accompanied his patron, the elector of Heidelberg, to the diet at Frankfort, where he formed an acquaintance with the famous orientalist, Job Ludolph; and in 1661 he finally returned to Zurich, laden with honours. In 1667, while preparing for a visit to the university of Leyden, in compliance with repeated invitations, he was accidentally drowned, with three of his children, by the upsetting of a boat, in the neighbourhood of Zurich. His works are all of the most erudite character.

HOTTINGER, JOHN JAMES, son of the preceding, was born at Zurich, in 1632; at which place he became professor of theology; and died in 1735. His principal work is an "Ecclesiastical History of Switzerland."—Another professor at Zurich, of the same name, known by his editions of the classics, was born in 1780, and died in 1819. He was an acute critic and elegant scholar; among his best works is an "Essay towards a Comparison of the German with the Greek and Roman Poets."

HOTZE, General, an officer in the Austrian service, was by birth a Swiss. In 1793 he served in the army as a colonel of cuirassiers; was promoted to the rank of a major-general in the following year; and continued to serve in the army of the Rhine for several succeeding years. In 1798 he was made a lieutenant-field-marshal; in August, 1796, he assisted in gaining the battle of Neumarch; and a few days afterwards displayed great talents and activity in the field of Warburg. In 1799 he had the command of the left wing of the archduke Charles's army; and by effecting the passage of the Rhine above the lake of Constance, and by his obstinate contests with the French, he greatly contributed to the future success of the archduke. He was killed near Kaltenbrunn, Sept. 25, 1799.

HOUDAR, DAVID, a French advocate and juridical writer, was born at Dieppe, in 1725. He laboured with great diligence in clearing the ancient laws of France from their obscurity; and he thereby threw much light upon the history of that country. He was a member of the Academy of Inscriptions, and an associate of the National Institute. Died, 1803.

learned French ecclesiastic, who produced a Latin translation of the Old Testament, in 8 vols; and an excellent edition of the Hebrew Bible, with a Latin version and notes, in 4 vols. folio, &c. He died at the advanced age of 94, in 1803.

HOUGHARD, JEAN NICOLAS, a French republican general, who from being at first a private in a regiment of cavalry, rapidly arrived at the rank of a general, and displayed great boldness and activity in repeated engagements when opposed to the Prussians on the Rhine, and afterwards against the English and their allies before Dunkirk, &c. Neither his bravery nor his successes, however, could save him from the guillotine; for, having been denounced by his colleague, general Hoche, as a conspirator against the republic, he was arrested, and shortly after executed. 1793.

HOUEL, J. P. L. L., a French painter and engraver, born at Rouen, in 1735. He is the author as well as artist of "Le Voyage Pittoresque de Sicile," &c. in 4 folio volumes, with 264 plates. Died, 1813.

HOUGH, JOHN, an English prelate, memorable for the noble stand he made against the arbitrary conduct of James II., was a native of Middlesex, and born in 1631. He was educated at Magdalen college, Oxford; became chaplain to the duke of Ormond; and in 1685 was made a prebendary of Worcester. In 1687 the presidency of Magdalen college becoming vacant, the king sent mandatory letters to the fellows, requiring them to elect one Anthony Farmer, who did not belong to that society, and was a man of bad character. The fellows upon this, seeing their privileges attacked, applied by petition for leave to proceed to a free election, according to their statutes. No answer being returned, they chose Mr. Hough, who was confirmed by the visitor, the bishop of Winchester; and the new president having taken his doctor's degree, was installed. The infatuated monarch, instead of letting the matter rest, now thought proper to send another mandate, ordering the society to elect Dr. Parker, bishop of Oxford, for their president; which they refused, and were all expelled, except two. Thus the business stood till September, 1688, when the king, finding that his affairs grew desperate, began to be alarmed, and commissioned the bishop of Winchester to settle the society of Magdalen college regularly and statutely. Dr. Hough and the fellows were accordingly restored; and in 1690 he was made bishop of Oxford, from whence he removed to Lichfield, and next to Worcester, where, in 1743, he died, honoured for his patriotism, piety, and munificence.

HOUSTON, WILLIAM, an English physician and botanist. He went to the West Indies as surgeon, and on his return took his degrees at Leyden under Boerhaave; while there he instituted a set of experiments on brutes, in concert with Van Swieten. He was elected fellow of the Royal Society on his return from Holland, and went soon after to the West Indies, where he died in 1733. He left a manuscript catalogue of plants, which was published by Sir Joseph Banks.

HOUTEVILLE, CLAUDE FRANCIS, a French ecclesiastic; was born at Paris in 1688, and died in 1742, aged 54. His principal work is entitled, "The Truth of the Christian Religion proved by Facts," 3 vols.

HOVEDEN, ROBERT, an English historian, who flourished in the reign of Henry II. He wrote Annals in Latin, commencing at 731, the period at which Bede finished, and bringing down affairs to the third year of John, 1201. His style is defective, but he is highly esteemed for diligence and fidelity.

HOWARD, THOMAS, earl of Surrey, and duke of Norfolk, an eminent statesman and warrior in the reign of Henry VIII. He served with his brother, Sir Edward, against Sir Andrew Barton, a Scotch pirate, who infested the English coast, in 1511, but was killed and his ships taken. He next accompanied the marquis of Dorset in his expedition to Calais, which ended in the conquest of Navarre by Ferdinand. The victory of Flodden-field, in which the king of Scotland was slain, was chiefly owing to his bravery. On the breaking out of the disturbances in Ireland, he was appointed lieutenant of that kingdom, where he suppressed the rebellion. Notwithstanding his great services, Henry, at the close of life, caused the duke to be sent to the Tower, on a charge of treason, and his son to be beheaded in his presence. The death of the tyrant only saved the duke's life. He died in 1554, aged 66.

HOWARD, EDWARD, younger brother of the above, entered early on the maritime service, and about 1494 was knighted. In 1512 he was sent as lord high admiral of England with a large fleet against France, the coasts of which he ravaged. He also defeated the enemy's fleet off Brest; but the year following he was slain in boarding the French admiral's ship, and his body thrown into the sea.

HOWARD, HENRY, earl of Surrey, an accomplished nobleman, a brave soldier, and the best English poet of his age, was born in 1530. He served under his father, the duke of Norfolk, as lieutenant-general of the army sent against Scotland, and performed various other military exploits, of eminence and value. He had quartered on his escutcheon the royal arms of Edward the Confessor, to which he had an hereditary right; and he is said to have aspired to the hand of the princess Mary. On these and other less substantial charges he suffered decapitation, on Tower Hill, Jan. 19, 1546, by the jealous and arbitrary mandate of Henry VIII. His works consist of "Songs and Sonnets," &c., which deserve a high degree of commendation, for the period at which they were composed. Dr. Heylin, in his Church History, thus speaks of his great popularity: "He was held in general by the English as the chief ornament of the nation, highly esteemed for his chivalry, his affability, his learning, and whatsoever other graces might either make him amiable in the eyes of the people, or formidable in the sight of a jealous, impotent, and wayward prince."

mander in chief at the defeat of the Spanish Armada. Born, 1530; died, 1624.

HOWARD, Sir ROBERT, an English poet and historian, was the son of Thomas, earl of Berkshire. He was a zealous friend of the revolution of 1688. He wrote several plays; the "History of the reigns of Edward and Richard II.;" "the History of Religion," &c. Died, 1698.

HOWARD, THOMAS, earl of Arundel, a nobleman distinguished by his patronage of the fine arts, was earl marshal in the early part of the reign of Charles I., and was employed in several foreign embassies by that prince and his father. He sent agents into Greece and Italy, to collect for him, at a vast expense, whatever was curious and valuable of the works of ancient artists, which had escaped destruction. His unrivalled museum of antiquities was divided at his death; and Henry, the sixth duke of Norfolk, about the year 1659, presented to the university of Oxford, a considerable part of his moiety, including the celebrated Pantheon Chronicle, which with the other ancient inscribed stones accompanying it, are now termed the Arundelian marbles. His lordship died at Padua, in 1646.

HOWARD, FREDERIC, earl of Carlisle, eldest son of Henry the fourth earl, by Isabella, daughter of William, lord Byron, was born in 1748, and succeeded to the family titles and estates in 1758. As soon as he attained his majority he took his seat in the house of peers, and was afterwards selected as one of the commissioners sent to America in 1778, with a view of healing the breach between the mother country and her colonies. In 1780 he was appointed viceroy of Ireland, which office he retained two years; and on his return, till the breaking out of the French revolution, he joined the antiministerialists. He, however, after that event, gave his decided support to the government, and continued till his decease to take a prominent part in the politics of the day. His leisure hours were devoted to literature, and he was a liberal patron of the fine arts. In 1773 he published a quarto volume, containing miscellaneous pieces, original and translated; and in 1801 appeared a complete edition of "The Tragedies and Poems of Frederic earl of Carlisle, K.G., &c." Died, 1835.

HOWARD, JOHN, the celebrated philanthropist, was born at Hackney, in 1726. He was apprenticed to a grocer, but his constitution being delicate, and having an aversion to trade, he purchased his indentures and went abroad. On his return he lodged with a widow lady, whom he afterwards married. After the decease of Mrs. Howard, who lived only about three years, he, in 1756, embarked for Lisbon, in order to view the effects of the recent earthquake, but on the passage the ship was taken and carried to France. The hardships he suffered and witnessed during his imprisonment, first roused his attention to the subject of his future labours. On being released Mr. Howard retired to a villa in the New Forest; and in 1758 he married a second wife, who died in childbirth in 1763, leaving him one son. He at this time resided at Cardington, near Bedford; where he indulged the benevolence of his disposition by continually assisting and ameliorating the condition of the poor. In 1773 he served the office of sheriff, which, as he declared, "brought the distress of the prisoners more immediately under his notice," and led him to form the design of visiting the gaols through England, in order to devise means for alleviating the miseries of the prisoners. Having done so, he laid the result of his inquiries before the House of Commons, for which he received a vote of thanks. He next made a tour through the principal parts of Europe, and published his "State of the Prisons," with a view to render them both more humane and more efficacious. A new subject now engaged his attention, namely, the management of lazarettos, and the means of preventing the communication of the plague and other contagious diseases. In this he encountered every danger that can be conceived; and having become personally acquainted with the subject, in 1789 he published "An Account of the principal Lazarettos in Europe, with Papers relative to the Plague," &c. Actively pursuing this salutary and benevolent object, Mr. Howard took up his residence at the town of Cherson, a Russian settlement on the Black Sea. A malignant fever prevailed there, and having been prompted by humanity to visit one of the sufferers, he caught the infection, and died, Jan. 20, 1790. His body was there interred, and every respect was shown to his memory by the Russian authorities.—Edmund Burke, adverting to the merits of this great philanthropist in a speech previous to the election at Bristol, in 1780, thus eulogises him:—"He has visited all Europe, not to survey the sumptuousness of palaces, or the stateliness of temples; not to make accurate measurements of the remains of ancient grandeur, nor to form a scale of the curiosity of modern art; not to collect medals or to collate manuscripts; but to dive into the depths of dungeons; to plunge into the infection of hospitals; to survey the mansions of sorrow and pain; to take the gauge and dimensions of misery, depression, and contempt; to remember the forgotten, to attend to the neglected, to visit the forsaken, and to compare and collate the distresses of all men in all countries. His plan is original; and it is as full of genius as it is of humanity. It was a voyage of discovery; a circumnavigation of charity." His statue, in a Roman garb, is erected to his memory in St. Paul's cathedral.

HOWE, JOHN, an eminent nonconformist clergyman of the 17th century, born in 1630, at Loughborough; was ejected from his living at Torrington, Devon, and for many years officiated as the minister of a Presbyterian congregation in London; afterwards retired to the Netherlands; came again to England upon James's proclamation of liberty of conscience; and died in 1705.

reign he was made a privy councillor and paymaster of the forces; but retired on the accession of George I., and was succeeded in his office by Walpole. Died, 1739.

HOWE, JOSEPH, an English divine in the reign of Charles I., whose cause he espoused with ardour, and was consequently ejected from his fellowship at Trinity college, Oxford; but surviving the restoration of monarchy, once more became possessed of his preferment. He was the author of some poems, &c. Died, 1701.

HOWE, RICHARD, earl, a celebrated English admiral, was the third son of Emanuel, Viscount Howe, and was born in 1723. After having received the rudiments of a liberal education at Eton, he was placed, at the age of fourteen, as a midshipman on board the Severn, in which ship he sailed with Anson for the Pacific, and continued going through the usual gradations of the service under that admiral, till 1745, when, though only twenty years of age, he obtained the command of the Baltimore sloop of war, and was made post-captain for gallantly defeating two French ships bearing succours to the Pretender. Having greatly distinguished himself on many occasions, he sailed, as commander-in-chief, to the Mediterranean, in 1770, with the rank of rear-admiral, and in a few years rose to be vice-admiral of the blue. On the breaking out of the war with France, Lord Howe sailed for the coast of America, with a squadron destined to act against D'Estaing, and on his return in 1782, he was created an English viscount. In the course of the same year, he sailed to the relief of Gibraltar, which he effected in spite of the combined fleets of the enemy. In 1783 he accepted the post of first lord of the admiralty; and in 1788 he was created an earl of Great Britain. In 1793, on the breaking out of the war with France, he took the command of the British fleet, and bringing the enemy to an action on the first of June, 1794, obtained over them a decisive and most important victory. The rank of general of marines, and the vacant garter, were both conferred on this successful commander in the course of the next year, which, with a visit from the king on board his ship, who presented him with a valuable sword, were the consummation of his honours. In 1797 Lord Howe exerted himself with great success to quell the mutiny among the seamen at Portsmouth; and died in 1799.

HOWE, SIR WILLIAM, brother of the preceding, succeeded general Gage in the chief command of the British forces in America, having landed at Boston with generals Clinton and Burgoyne, in May, 1776. General Howe commanded at the attack on Bunker's Hill, was besieged in Boston during the next winter, evacuated that town in the ensuing spring, and retired to Halifax. In June, 1778, he arrived at Staten Island, where he was joined by his brother Lord Howe. Here the brothers informed congress that they had received full power to grant pardon to all the rebels who should return to their obedience; but the commissioners appointed by that body considered both the form and substance of the propositions too objectionable to deserve attention. In August he defeated the Americans on Long Island, and took possession of New York in September. After the campaign of the Jerseys, he set sail from New York and entered Chesapeake bay. Having previously secured the command of the Schuylkill, he crossed it with his army, and repelled the attack of the Americans at Germantown. In May, 1778, he was succeeded in the command by general Clinton. Died, 1814.

HOWELL, the Good, or HYWEL DDA, a Cambrian prince and legislator, of the 10th century, who went to Rome to obtain information preparatory to a compilation of a code of laws for the Welsh; which code, founded on the laws of Dunwallo Molmutius, an ancient British sovereign, was constitutionally established throughout Wales, and are still extant.

HOWELL, JAMES, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1685, at Abernethy, in Caermarthenshire; and after receiving his education at Oxford, travelled on the continent as agent to procure workmen, &c. for a glass manufactory, then for the first time established in England. He was subsequently a member of parliament, secretary to the British ambassador in Denmark, and clerk of the council. For some offence to the parliamentarians he was imprisoned in the Fleet, but obtained his liberty by applying to Cromwell; became historiographer to Charles II., and died in 1666. He wrote many books; but the one by which he will be longest remembered is, "Epistolæ Ho Elianæ, or Familiar Letters, domestic and foreign."

HOWELL, WILLIAM, an English historical writer of the 17th century; author of a "History of the World, from the earliest Times to the Ruin of the Roman Empire," 3 vols. folio; and "Majulia Historiæ Anglicanæ." Died, 1683.

HOZIER, PETER D', a French herald and genealogist, was born at Marseilles in 1492, and died in 1660. He was the author of a "History of Bretagne," and of several genealogical tables.—CHARLES, his son, born in 1640, obtained the cross of St. Maurice from the duke of Savoy. He was also a judge of arms; and died in 1732. His nephew, who succeeded him in his office, compiled "L'Armorial, ou Registres de la Noblesse de France," 10 vols. folio; and died in 1767.

HUARTE, JOHN, a Spanish philosopher and author in the seventeenth century, who gained celebrity by a work, entitled "Examen de ingenios para las Ciencias," &c., or an Examination of such geniuses as are fit for acquiring the sciences. This book, which is full of practical wisdom, has been translated into English, under the title of "The Trial of Wits," and into German by Lessing, as "Prüfung der Köpfe." Though he wrote in Spanish, and is supposed to have been born of Spanish parents, Huarte was a native of Navarre.

HUBALD, a monk of St. Amand in Flanders; author of a treatise on music, entitled "Enchiridion Musicon." He also wrote a Latin poem, addressed to the emperor Charles the Bald, in praise of badness; in which every word begins with the letter C. He died, aged 80, in 830.

HUBER, JOHN JAMES, a celebrated anatomist, was born at Basle, in 1707. He studied under Haller, at Berne, and next at Strasburgh; after which he took his doctor's degree at his native place. He assisted Haller in his great work on the Plants of Switzerland. He obtained the rank of court physician and counsellor of state; published a work on the spinal marrow and other parts of the nervous system, entitled "Commentatio de Medulla Spinali;" and died in 1778. There were also several other writers and artists of this name.—ULRIC HUBER, a native of Friesland; author of "De Jure Civitatis." Died, 1694.—MARY HUBER, a deistical writer; author of "Lettres sur la Religion de l'Homme," and many other works. Born, at Geneva, 1694; died, 1759.—JOHN JAMES HUBER, a painter, called by Fuseli the Swiss Titorelto. Born, 1666; died, 1748.—JOHN HUBER, a Genevese artist, born in 1722. He was a good painter, but devoted much of his attention to the art of cutting profiles, in which he acquired an extraordinary degree of dexterity. He is described as being an eccentric character; and among other fanciful schemes, formed a project for guiding the course of air balloons by the flight of large birds; on which he published a tract, illustrated with plates. Died, 1790.—MICHAEL HUBER, a native of Bavaria, professor of French in Leipsic, and the translator of several German works into French. Born, 1727; died, 1804.—LOUIS FERDINAND HUBER, son of the preceding; editor of several journals. Born at Paris, 1764; died, 1804.—THERESA HUBER, daughter of the celebrated philologist Heyne, and wife of the preceding; a popular German novelist, many of whose works appeared under her husband's name.—FRANCIS HUBER, a naturalist, born in 1750, at Geneva; author of "Nouvelles Observations sur les Abeilles," in which he explains the manner of the queen-bee's impregnation, &c. Having lost his way in a winter night, the effect of the cold produced total blindness; but the lady to whom he had been betrothed afterwards married him, and became his constant amanuensis.

HUDSON, HENRY, a distinguished navigator, whose early history is unknown. After making three voyages to find a north-east or north-west passage to China, in the second of which he discovered the river Hudson, he set sail a fourth time, April 17th, 1610, in a bark named the Discovery, and proceeding westward, reached, in latitude 60°, the strait bearing his name. Through this he advanced along the coast of Labrador, until it issued into the vast bay, which is also called after him. Here, with his son, and seven infirm sailors, he was turned adrift by a mutinous crew, and is supposed to have perished.

HUDSON, DR. JOHN, a learned divine and philological writer, was born in 1602, near Cockermouth, Cumberland; obtained a fellowship in University college, Oxford, in 1666; and was made principal of St. Mary's hall in 1712. He enjoyed a high reputation as a classical scholar, and published elegant editions of Velleius Paterculus, Thucydides, Geographie Veteris Scriptores Græci Minores, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Longinus, Æsop, &c. After his death appeared his beautiful edition of Josephus, 3 vols. folio.

HUERTA, VINCENT GARCIA DE LA, a Spanish poet and critic; born in 1729, at Zafrá, in Extremadura. He acquired considerable fame among his countrymen, and zealously defended Spanish literature from the censures of Voltaire and other French writers. He published various poems and dramas, and edited "Teatro Espanol," in 17 vols.

HUET, PETER DANIEL, a celebrated French critic and classical scholar, born at Caen, in Normandy, in 1630. He was educated in the Jesuit's college; accompanied Bochart to Sweden, and was in vain persuaded to settle there by queen Christina. In 1670 he was appointed preceptor to the dauphin; and while he filled that situation, he wrote an erudite work in defence of Christianity, entitled "Demonstratio Evangelica;" he also published the Latin classics, in 63 vols. with those ample illustrations which have made what are called the Delphin editions so generally known and esteemed. In 1680 he was made bishop of Avranches, but resigned that see in 1690, and spent the remainder of his days in literary retirement, producing many works of great merit. He died, at Paris, in 1721.

HUE, FRANCIS, first valet-de-chambre to the dauphin of France, and who afterwards filled the same situation under Louis XVIII., distinguished himself by his inviolable fidelity to the royal family under the most trying circumstances. He was the author of a work, entitled "Dernières Années du Règne et de la Vie de Louis XVI."

HUFNAGEL, GEORGE, a Flemish painter, was born at Antwerp, in 1545, and died in 1600. He was also a tolerable poet in Latin and German.

HUGH-CAPET, the first of the third race of French monarchs, was count of Paris and Orleans. He was proclaimed king of France at Noyon, in 987, and died in 996, aged 49.

HUGH DE CLUNY, a Romish saint, was born in Burgundy, in 1023. When young he embraced the monastic life at Cluny, where he became prior, and at last abbot, of his order, which he greatly reformed and extended. Died, 1109.

HUGH DE FLEURY, a monk of the abbey of Fleury, in the 11th century. His works are held in great esteem: they consist of "De la Puissance Royale, et de la Dignité Sacerdotale;" and "A Chronicle, or History, from the Creation to 840."

HUGH DE St. CHER, or HUGO DE SANCTO CARO, a French cardinal of the 13th century, distinguished as a Scripture commentator, and who was also employed on various important missions by the papal court.

HUGHES, JOHN, an English poet, dramatic author, and essayist; born, 1677; died, 1737. His last work was, the "Siege of Damascus," a tragedy, which still continues on the stage. Several papers in the Tatler, Spectator, and Guardian, were written by him.

Latin poet, was born at Brussels in 1682, and died of the plague at Rhinberg, in 1629.

HUGO, CHARLES LOUIS, a French historical and theological writer, was abbot of Evdval, and titular bishop of Ptolemais. Died, 1735.

HUGTENBURGH, JOHN VAN, a Dutch painter, who painted the victories of the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene. Died, 1733.

HULL, THOMAS, a dramatic writer and actor, born in 1728. He was contemporary with Garrick, and lived to be father of the British stage, but never rose to any great eminence in his profession. He was the author of a deservedly popular poem, entitled "Richard Plantagenet," besides some novels, tales, and dramas.

HULSE, the Right Hon. Sir SAMUEL, G.C.H., a British field-marshal, and the governor of Chelsea hospital. This gallant veteran was 90 years of age, and had been upwards of three quarters of a century in the military service of his country, having entered the 1st foot guards as an ensign in 1761. In 1782 he attained the brevet of colonel; and commanded the 1st battalion of his regiment in Holland and at the siege of Valenciennes. In 1798 he received the rank of lieutenant-general, and was in Ireland for a time during the period of the rebellion. He was next engaged in the expedition to the Helder; and in 1803 he obtained the rank of general. In 1806 he was appointed lieutenant-governor of Chelsea hospital; in 1820 he became governor; and in 1830 he was promoted to the rank of field-marshal. He also held various offices in the royal household, and was a member of the privy-council. Died, Jan. 1, 1837.

HUME, DAVID, a celebrated historian, philosopher, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Edinburgh in 1711. He was designed for the law, but having no inclination to that profession, he applied to mercantile pursuits, and became, in 1734, clerk in an eminent house at Bristol. He did not, however, continue long in that line; for, having a strong propensity to literature, he went to France, where he wrote his "Treatise of Human Nature," which he published at London in 1738. This metaphysical work, however, met with an indifferent reception; nor were his "Moral Essays," which appeared in 1742, more successful. He soon after became secretary to general Sinclair, whom he accompanied in his military embassy to the courts of Vienna and Turin. While at the latter city, he republished his first work, under a new title of "An Inquiry concerning Human Understanding;" and, in 1752, appeared at Edinburgh his "Political Discourses;" which were followed the same year by his "Inquiry concerning the Principles of Morals." In 1754 he published the first volume of his "History of England," which he did not complete till 1761. While this work was in progress he printed a piece, with the extraordinary title of "The Natural History of Religion;" which was attacked with just severity by Warburton, in an anonymous tract, ascribed, at the time, to Dr. Hurd. His great work, the "History of England," had now acquired considerable celebrity, and the writer gained largely by its popularity, for besides the profits it brought him, he obtained a pension through Lord Bute. In 1763 he accompanied the earl of Hertford on his embassy to Paris, where, in 1765, he remained as charge d'affaires. The year following he returned home, and became under-secretary of state to Mr. Conway. In 1769 he retired to his native country on an independent income of a thousand pounds per annum; and died in 1776. Hume doubtless takes the lead among modern philosophical sceptics; and whatever we may see to condemn, we are bound to acknowledge that he upheld his doctrines with distinguished ability.

HUMPHREY, LAURENCE, a learned divine, was born at Newport Pagnel, in Buckinghamshire, about the year 1527. He was successively dean of Gloucester and Winchester, and might have been a bishop but for his puritanical principles. He died in 1590; leaving behind him many able classical works, a "Life of Bishop Jewel," &c.

HUMPHREYS, JAMES, an eminent lawyer and juridical writer; author of "Observations on the English Law of Real Property," &c. He was a native of Montgomeryshire, Wales; and died in 1830.

HUMPHRY, OZIAS, an eminent miniature painter, born at Houlton, Devon, in 1743. He first settled at Bath; then came to London, by the advice of his friend, Sir Joshua Reynolds, and was made a royal academical. In 1780 he went to India, where he was held in high esteem by Sir W. Jones, and Warren Hastings, and was chosen one of the first members of the Asiatic Society. Died, in London, in 1810.

HUNAU, FRANCIS JOSEPH, a French anatomist and physician, born in 1701. He accompanied the duke de Richelieu on an embassy to Vienna; became anatomical professor at the Jardin du Roi; visited Holland and England; was elected F.R.S., and died in 1742.

HUNNADES, JOHN CORVINUS, valvode of Transylvania, and general of the armies of Ladislaus, king of Hungary, was born in the beginning of the 15th century. He fought against the Turks heroically, and for many years rendered himself so formidable to them, that they surnamed him the Devil. The sultans Amurath and Mahomed II. were each compelled to retire from the siege of Belgrade, owing to his energetic defence of it. He died in 1456, the acknowledged hero of the Christian cause.

HUNNIS, WILLIAM, chapel-master to queen Elizabeth, and a voluminous writer of moral and religious poetry. He is said, by a cotemporary poet, to have "depainted sweetets sweete." His sonnets, however, have been engulfed in the oblivion of time; but, certainly, the author who could entitle a metrical version of the book of Genesis, "A Hive full of Honey," or describe a volume of psalms and hymns as "A Handful of Honey-suckles," ought to have the power of rendering his "sonnets," deliciously nectareous.

HUNNIUS, a Lutheran divine, who filled the professor's chair at Wirtzburg, and wrote against Calvin with great asperity. Died, 1603.

HUNT, THOMAS, a learned Hebraist and oriental scholar, born in 1696; was elected to the Arabic professorship in Oxford university, in 1738, and afterwards obtained the regius professorship of Hebrew, with a canonry of Christchurch annexed. He was the author of his valuable "Observations on the Book of Proverbs," "Sermons," &c. Died, 1774.

HUNT, HENRY, M.P., was born at Up-haven, Wilts, about the year 1773, where he was well known as an opulent farmer, and one who was a regular attendant at the Devizes market. When Mr. Hunt was a young man, he was a decided loyalist; and, in 1801, when the whole country was apprehensive of an invasion, he voluntarily tendered his entire stock, worth 20,000*l.*, to the government, for its use, if it were needed; besides which, he engaged to enter, with three of his servants, all well mounted and equipped, and at his own cost, as volunteers into any regiment of horse that might make the first charge upon the enemy; and for this proffered service he received the thanks of the lord-lieutenant of the county. Mr. Hunt joined the Marlborough troop of cavalry; but, owing to some misunderstanding between lord Bruce, its commander, and himself, he challenged his lordship; for which he was indicted in the court of King's Bench, found guilty, fined 100*l.*, and imprisoned six weeks. Owing to this, or some other cause, Mr. Hunt became a "radical reformer," associated with the most disaffected, and was looked up to by many of them as the fearless champion of their party. He long tried for a seat in parliament, but was unsuccessful at Bristol, Westminster, and for the county of Somerset. He was, however, twice elected for Preston, in 1830-1; but, the year after his second return, his constituents declined his future services. As "lord of the manor of Glastonbury" he acted fairly at his court-leet; and, as a mob orator, he obtained notoriety; but a radical meeting at Manchester, where he presided and declaimed, having ended with loss of life and limb to many of the assembled multitude, he was indicted as the ringleader of an unlawful assembly of the people, tried, found guilty, and sentenced to three years' imprisonment in lichester gaol. But, though in confinement, he was not idle: he discovered and made known to the public some flagrant mal-practices going on at the gaol, which, through his means, were afterwards corrected. He was seized with paralysis while alighting from his phaeton at Alresford, Hants, where he died, Feb. 12, 1835.

HUNTER, CHRISTOPHER, a physician, who distinguished himself by his writings relative to the history and antiquities of the county of Durham, of which he was a native.

HUNTER, HENRY, a Scotch Presbyterian divine, was born at Culross, in Perthshire, in 1741; was educated at the university of Edinburgh, and became tutor to the sons of lord Dundonald. He was subsequently pastor of the Scottish church, London Wall, and was elected secretary to the corresponding board of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge in the Highlands. He was the author of "Sacred Biography," 7 vols. 8vo.; a translation of Lavater's Physiognomy, with splendid plates, 4to.; two volumes of Sermons; "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c. He also translated Sonnini's Travels, St. Pierre's Studies of Nature, and other French works. Died, 1802.

HUNTER, ROBERT, an English gentleman, who wrote the famous letter on Enthusiasm, which has been ascribed both to Swift and Shaftesbury. He was governor of New York and the Jerseys several years, and afterwards of Jamaica, where he died in 1734.

HUNTER, WILLIAM, a celebrated anatomist and physician, was born at Kilbride, in Lanarkshire, in 1718. His father was a farmer, and designed him for the church; but an acquaintance with Dr. Cullen inclining him to the study of physic, he resided with the doctor three years. In 1740 he removed to Edinburgh, where he followed his studies with intense application, and the year following visited London, soon after which he was taken by Dr. James Douglas into his house as a dissector, and also tutor to his son. In 1746 he succeeded Mr. Samuel Sharpe as lecturer to a society of surgeons in Covent-garden, and commenced a series of lectures on anatomy and surgery. He soon rose into extensive practice in surgery and midwifery, but confined himself to the latter, and in 1764 was appointed physician extraordinary to the queen. He was elected F.R.S.; became physician to the British Lying-in-hospital; and on the foundation of the royal academy, the king appointed him professor of anatomy. In 1770 Dr. Hunter completed his house in Great Windmill-street, to which were attached a theatre, apartments for lectures and dissections, and a magnificent room as a museum. His valuable museum is now in the university of Glasgow. He wrote several able works on medical subjects, the most elaborate of which is "The Anatomy of the Gravid Uterus." Died, 1783.

HUNTER, JOHN, younger brother of the preceding, was born in 1728, and apprenticed to a cabinet-maker; but, hearing of William's success in London, he offered his services to him as an anatomical assistant. In a few months he had attained such a knowledge of anatomy as to be capable of demonstrating to the pupils in the dissecting-room. In 1753 he entered as a gentleman commoner of St. Mary's hall, Oxford; but he could not have pursued his academical studies with much advantage, as in the following year he became a surgeon's pupil at St. George's hospital. He made astonishing progress, but his health being impaired by intense study, he went abroad in 1760, as staff-surgeon, and served at Belleisle and in Portugal. On his return to London, he pursued his enquiries into comparative anatomy, and erected a menagerie for that purpose, at Brompton. In 1767 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and, the next year, he was elected one of the surgeons of St. George's hospital. In 1776 he was appointed surgeon-extraordinary to the king; and, subsequently, inspector-general of hospitals, and surgeon-general. He died suddenly, having been seized with a spasmodic affection of the heart, in St. George's hospital, Oct. 16, 1793. He wrote several professional treatises, besides recording the results of many of his valuable discoveries in the Philosophical Transactions. His perfect acquaintance with anatomy rendered him a bold and skilful operator; but his great fame rests on his researches concerning comparative anatomy, and the structure of the various classes of organized beings. His anatomical museum was purchased by government for 15,000*l.*, and transferred to the Royal College of Surgeons, for the use of the public.

HUNTER, ANNE, wife of the preceding, and sister of Sir Everard Home, was the author of many lyrical poems possessing much sweetness and beauty. Some of these were set to music by Haydn. Born, 1742; died, 1821.

HUNTER, JOHN, LL.D. an eminent classical scholar, was born at Closeburn, Dumfriesshire, in 1747. He was principal of the united college of St. Salvador and St. Leonard; and for more than half a century previous to his obtaining that appointment, he was professor of humanity in the university of St. Andrew's. He was one of the most learned men of his time, and is well known by his editions of Virgil, Livy, Horace, and other Latin authors. Died, 1837.

HUNTINGDON, HENRY of, an ancient English historian, who flourished in the 11th and 12th centuries. He composed a general history of England from the earliest accounts to the death of king Stephen, in 1154, in eight books; and towards the conclusion, the author honestly acknowledges that it is only an abridgment, observing that to compose a complete history of England, many books were necessary which he could not procure.

HUNTINGDON, SELINA, countess of, the second daughter of Washington, earl Ferrers, was born in 1707, and married in 1728 to Theophilus, earl of Huntingdon. After she became a widow, she espoused the principles of the Calvinistic Methodists, and patronised the famous George Whitefield, whom she constituted her chaplain; by the influence of her rank and fortune, appeared at the head of a sect; and, after the death of Whitefield, his followers were designated as the people of Lady Huntingdon. She founded schools and colleges for preachers, and expended annually large sums not only in their support, but in private charity. Died, 1791.

HUNTINGDON, WILLIAM; a religious enthusiast, who attained more notoriety than credit, was born in 1744. He was the son of a farmer's labourer in Kent, and the early part of his life was passed in menial service, and other humble occupations. After indulging in vice and dissipation for several years, according to his own account, he was converted, and became a preacher among the Calvinistic Methodists.

He soon engaged in religious controversies, published a vast number of tracts, and was regarded as the head of a peculiar sect. His publications are very numerous, and some of them contain curious details relative to his personal history and religious experience. After the death of his first wife, he married the wealthy relict of Sir James Sanderson, a London alderman, and passed the latter part of his life in affluence.

HUNTINGFORD, GEORGE ISAAC, a distinguished classical scholar, and an amiable dignitary of the church, was born at Winchester, in 1748; received his education there, and at New college, Oxford; and subsequently became an assistant under Dr. Joseph Warton, in the seminary in which he had been educated, and over which he afterwards presided as warden for a period of forty years. Through the patronage of lord Sidmouth, who had been his pupil at Winchester, he obtained the see of Gloucester in 1802, and that of Hereford in 1815. This venerable prelate was the author of "Greek Monstrophics;" "A Call for Union with the Established Church;" "Thoughts on the Trinity," &c. With a profound knowledge of Grecian literature and a truly poetical taste, he possessed the more desirable qualities of Christian piety and humility, united with an independent mind, actuated by the spirit of pure benevolence. Died, 1832.

HUPAZOLI, FRANCIS; one of the few individuals who have lived in three centuries. He was born in 1587, at Casal, in Sardinia, and died in 1702. At first he was a clergyman, and afterwards became a merchant at Scio; and, in his 23d year, he was appointed Venetian consul at Smyrna. By his fifth wife, whom he married at the age of ninety-eight years, he had four children. His drink was water; he never smoked, and ate little (principally game and fruit). He drank a good deal of the juice of the scorzonera root, ate but very little at night, went to bed and rose early, then heard mass, and walked and laboured the whole day to the last. He wrote down every thing remarkable which he had witnessed, in twenty-two volumes. He never had a fever, was never bled, and never took any medicine. At the age of 100, his gray hair again became black: When 109 years old, he lost his teeth and lived on soup; and four years later he had two large new teeth, and began again to eat meat.

HURD, RICHARD, an eminent English prelate and philologist, was born in 1730, at Congreve, in Staffordshire; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, and obtained a fellowship there in 1742. In 1749 he published "Horatii Ars Poetica," with an English commentary. In 1750 he published a commentary on the Epistle of Horace to Augustus; and also a satirical attack on Doctor Jortin, in defence of Warburton, in an essay on the "Delicacy of Friendship," which he afterwards endeavoured to suppress. In 1757 appeared his "Remarks on David Hume's Essay on the Natural History of Religion." His "Dialogues, moral and political," with "Letters on Chivalry and Romance," appeared, at different times, from 1758 to 1764, and were republished collectively, in 1765 (3 vols. 8vo). None of his works attracted so much notice as the Dialogues, which were translated into German by Holtz. In 1767 he was made archdeacon of Gloucester, and, in 1768, commenced a series of sermons on the prophecies, preached at the lecture founded by his friend Warburton at Lincoln's Inn. In 1775 he was raised to the bishopric of Litchfield and Coventry; and, not long after, was made preceptor to the late king and his brother the duke of York. He was translated to the see of Worcester in 1781; and the king was desirous to elevate him to the primacy, but the prelate modestly declined the intended honour. Dr. Hurd's latest literary performances were a biographical sketch of his friend Dr. Warburton, his Correspondence, and an edition of his works. Died, 1808.

HURE, CHARLES, a French divine of the Jansenist persuasion, was born in 1639, and died in 1717. His works are; a "Dictionary of the Bible," 2 vols. folio; a "Translation of the New Testament into French, with notes;" a "Sacred Grammar," &c.

HUSKISSON, the Right Hon. WILLIAM, an English statesman, possessing considerable financial knowledge, was born in 1770. His father becoming a widower, and marrying again, the son was placed under the care of Dr. Gem, who took his nephew with him to France, for the purpose of studying medical science at the Parisian schools of anatomy. The Revolution broke out directly after, and young Huskisson became one of its warmest disciples: it is said, indeed, that he was present at the taking of the Bastille. In 1790 he obtained an introduction to Lord Gower, the English ambassador at Paris, who made him his private secretary; and on his return to England he was introduced to Mr. Pitt, and made himself agreeable to that minister by his ability and eloquence. He was soon after placed at the head of the Alien Office; and in 1795 became under-secretary in the war and colonial department. He was brought into parliament for Morpeth, by government interest, in 1797: from which time he connected himself on terms of friendship with Mr. Canning, and supported all the measures of the Pitt administration. He retired with his patron, as did Mr. Canning, during the Addington ministry, and claimed a pension of £2000. per annum. He subsequently lost his seat for Morpeth; offered for Dover; failed, and was returned for Liskeard on Pitt's restoration to power, and the renewal of the continental war. During the Whig administration of 1806, Mr. Huskisson was an active member of the opposition; but on its dissolution he returned to office, and remained till the premiership of the duke of Wellington, with the short exception of an interval in 1809, when the quarrel took place between Mr. Canning and Lord Castlereagh, and he sided with the former in withdrawing from the government. When Mr. Canning was appointed to the government of India, Mr. Huskisson succeeded him as member of parliament for Liverpool; was successively treasurer of the navy, joint secretary of the treasury, vice-president and president of the board of trade, and was colonial secretary during the Liverpool and Canning administrations. It was during this latter period that he brought forward his celebrated free-trade measures, which caused such diversities of opinion throughout the country at the time, and concerning which the most opposite opinions are still entertained. Mr. Huskisson died at Manchester, Sept. 15, 1830, in consequence of one of his legs being crushed, and other severe injuries sustained, by the wheels of a locomotive steam-engine coming in contact with him, while present at the celebration of the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester railway.

HUSS, JOHN, a celebrated Bohemian reformer and martyr, born at Hussienitz, about 1376. He was the first opposer of the doctrine of transubstantiation, and the defender of Wickliffe; for which he was burnt alive by order of the council of Constance, in 1415.

HUSSEY, GILES, an English painter, born at Marnhull, in Dorsetshire, in 1710. He studied in France and Italy; possessed considerable talents, and painted some good pictures; but he was somewhat eccentric, and met with little encouragement in proportion to his merits. Died, 1788.

HUTCHESON, FRANCIS, LL.D., a metaphysical writer, was the son of a dissenting minister in Ireland. He was born in 1694; studied at Glasgow; and, on his return to Ireland, officiated to a dissenting congregation, for some time, in the northern part of that kingdom; but, in 1729, he was elected professor of moral philosophy at Glasgow. He was the author of "An Inquiry into the Ideas of Beauty and Virtue," and a "Treatise on the Passions." In 1755 his son, Dr. FRANCIS HUTCHESON, a physician of Glasgow, printed from his father's papers, "A System of Moral Philosophy," 2 vols. 4to.; to which is prefixed an account of the author. Died, 1747.

HUTCHINS, JOHN, an English divine and topographer, was born in Dorsetshire, in 1696; and died in 1773. He was the author of the "History and Antiquities of the county of Dorset," 2 vols.

HUTCHINSON, JOHN, an English philosophical and critical author, celebrated as the opponent of Dr. Woodward in natural history, and of Sir Isaac Newton in philosophy. Born, 1674; died, 1737.

HUTCHINSON, JOHN HELY, an Irish statesman and lawyer, was born in 1715. He became secretary of state, and accumulated a number of lucrative employments. So great indeed was his avidity for office and emolument, that Lord North said, "If England and Ireland were given to this man, he would solicit the Isle of Man for a potato garden." He possessed great talents and eloquence; and died in 1794.

HUTCHINSON, JOHN HELY, earl of Donoughmore, born in 1757, was the second son of the preceding. He entered the army in 1774 as a cornet in the 18th dragoons, and rose regularly till he obtained a lieutenant-colonelcy in the 77th, in 1783. At the commencement of the French revolution he found means for gaining access to the French camp, at a very interesting period, and saw Lafayette compelled to leave those troops of which he had been the favourite, and seek safety in flight. When war was declared against France in 1793, he raised a regiment, and obtained the rank of colonel. He served in Flanders as aid-de-camp to Sir Ralph Abercromby, and subsequently in Ireland during the rebellion. In 1796 he was made a major-general, and in 1799 he was wounded at the Heider, while leading on his brigade in a gallant style. In the expedition to Egypt, in 1801, he was second in command to Sir Ralph Abercromby; and when that gallant officer fell at the battle of Alexandria, the chief command devolved on major-general Hutchinson; who, receiving reinforcements, advanced upon the enemy, and having pursued them to Cairo, a capitulation took place, and the expedition terminated in an agreement for the French to evacuate Egypt. For his able services in this campaign he was raised to the peerage as baron Hutchinson of Alexandria, and of Knocklofty, in the county of Tipperary, with a pension of 3000*l.* per annum. In 1806 he was sent on an extraordinary mission to the Prussian and Russian armies; afterwards to the court of St. Petersburg; and at a later period, to meet queen Caroline at St. Omer's, as the personal friend of the king. In 1813 he became a full general; and in 1825 he succeeded his brother as earl of Donoughmore, &c. Died, 1832.

HUTCHINS, THOMAS, geographer-general to the United States of America, was born in New Jersey, about 1730. He had served in the army against the Indians in Florida; was imprisoned in England, in 1779, on the charge of having corresponded with Dr. Franklin, then American agent in France; afterwards joined the army of general Greene; and died at Pittsburgh, in 1780. He published several topographical and historical works of considerable interest.

HUTCHINSON, THOMAS, lord chief justice, and afterwards lieutenant-governor of the colony of Massachusetts, was born at Boston, in 1711. He had been greatly respected in his province for his able and irreproachable conduct on the judicial bench; but having covertly taken part with Great Britain against the American colonies, and given the English ministers advice relative to the enforcement of the duty on tea, it was found necessary to remove him and place general Gage in his situation. He accordingly came to England, lived in a retired manner at Brompton, and died there in 1780. Governor Hutchinson was the author of a "History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay," &c.

HUTCHINSON, ANN, a religious enthusiast in America, who instituted meetings for women, in which, pretending to enjoy immediate revelations, she taught Antinomian and other sentiments. By these means, great dissensions were caused in the churches of New England, and in 1637 an ecclesiastical synod assembled and condemned her errors. Not long after, she was banished from the colony, where, in 1643, she, and her family, consisting of fifteen persons, were captured by the Indians, and all except a daughter killed.

HUTTEN, JACOB, a native of Silesia, who, in the sixteenth century, founded a sect called the Bohemian or Moravian brethren. These were the descendants of the Hussites, and appear to have given rise to the anabaptists. Hutten is supposed to have been burnt as a heretic at Insprack.

HUTTEN, ULRIC VON, a German soldier, poet, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Steckelberg, in Franconia, in 1488. He was the most violent of all the early Reformers; and his writings against the church of Rome were so severe, that the pope sent orders to the inquisitor to seize him; but he fled into Switzerland; and died, near Zurich, in 1523. His letters and poems are very classical. Hutten was one of the boldest and most free-spirited men of his time; injustice, falsehood, hypocrisy, and tyranny filled him with indignation, and he unmasked them with a spirit that knew no fear.

HUTTER, ELIAS and LEONARD, two contemporary protestant divines, born at Ulm, about the middle of the 16th century. The former is remarkable for having published a Hebrew Bible, containing no less than thirty versions of the 117th Psalm in various languages. He also published a Polyglot Bible in four languages, Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and German; and he afterwards added to it the Italian, French, Slavonic, and Saxon. Died, 1600.—LEONARD, who distinguished himself as a staunch supporter of the reformed church, published a variety of polemical treatises; obtained the divinity-professor's chair at the university of Wittenberg; and died in 1616.

HUTTON, MATTHEW, an English prelate, was born of poor parents in Lancashire, in 1529, and sent to Cambridge in 1546. He became fellow of Trinity college; obtained a prebend in the cathedral of St. Paul, and was elected master of Pembroke hall. In 1567 he was preferred to the deanery of York, from whence he was removed in 1589 to the bishopric of Durham, and in 1594 translated to the archbishopric of York. Died, 1606.

HUTTON, JAMES, a celebrated geologist and natural philosopher, was born at Edinburgh, in 1726. After finishing his education at the university, he was apprenticed to a writer to the signet, but quitted the legal profession for that of medicine, as being the nearest allied to chemistry, which was his favourite study. He in consequence went to the universities of Paris and Leyden, at the latter of which he took his degree in 1749; but on his return, being desirous of making himself conversant with agriculture, he settled upon a farm of his own in Berwickshire. In 1768 he went to Edinburgh, and from that time he devoted himself entirely to scientific pursuits, publishing numerous works, and investigating various subjects of natural philosophy. Dr. Hutton is chiefly distinguished as the author of a system or theory of geology, termed the Plutonism, by which the structure of the solid parts of the earth are accounted for by the action of subterraneous fire. This theory excited a warm controversy among men of science, and met with many fierce opponents; but the late professor Playfair advocated it in his "Illustrations of the Huttonian Theory of the Earth," and it has since been gradually rising into repute. Among the chief works of Hutton are, "The Progress of Reason from Sense to Science and Philosophy," 2 vols. 4to.; and a "Theory of the Earth, with Proofs and Illustrations," 2 vols. 8vo. Died, 1797.

HUTTON, CHARLES, LL.D., an eminent mathematician, was born at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in 1737. Having made great progress in his mathematical studies, and distinguished himself by the production of a small work on the principles of bridges, he was appointed professor at the royal military college, Woolwich, elected F.R.S., and received the degree of LL.D. from the university of Edinburgh. He produced, in 1796, his "Mathematical and Philosophical Dictionary," 2 vols. 4to.; and in 1798 he gave to the world the first edition of his "Course of Mathematics." He was afterwards engaged with Dr. Pearson and Dr. Shaw in an abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions, published in 18 vols.; for his labour in which work, it is said, he received 6000*l*. He retired from his appointment at Woolwich in 1807, with a pension of 500*l*.; and died in 1823.

HUTTON WILLIAM, an ingenious and self-educated writer, born at Derby, in 1723. He was apprenticed to a stocking-weaver; and at the expiration of his time he employed his leisure hours in book-binding. In 1750 he opened a shop for the sale of old books, to which he added a circulating library, at Birmingham; where he succeeded so well as to embark in the paper business; and by frugality and industry he arrived at opulence. In 1791 his house at Birmingham, and villa near that town, were destroyed by the rioters; for which he obtained an inadequate compensation from the county. He wrote several ingenious works, among which were "Histories of "Birmingham," "Derby," "Blackport," and the "Battle of Bosworth Field;" "Tour to Scarborough;" "Remarks on North Wales;" "Poems," &c. He died in 1815, aged 92.

HUXHAM, JOHN, a physician of considerable celebrity in the west of England, was born at Halberton, in Devonshire. He took his doctor's degree at Leyden, under Boerhaave, and, on his return to England, settled at Plymouth, where he continued for thirty years to practise with success. He was a great humorist, and particularly attached to the bottle, port wine being with him an universal remedy, either with bark or without. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, in whose Transactions are many of his papers. He also published various medical works; and his well-known "tincture of bark" still holds its place in the Pharmacopœia. Died, 1788.

HUYGENS, CHRISTIAN, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, was born at the Hague, in 1629. He was the son of Constantine Huygens, lord of Zuylichem, a nobleman of great scientific abilities, who initiated his son in the principles of general science and classical learning, and sent him to the university of Leyden. He soon distinguished himself by the publication of several learned works, both astronomical and mathematical: he also invented the pendulum, improved the air-pump, ascertained the laws of collision of elastic bodies, and discovered the ring and one of the satellites of Saturn, of which he gave an account in his "Systema Saturninum." He visited both France and England for scientific purposes; was made a fellow of the Royal Society in 1661; and shortly after, at the invitation of Colbert, he settled in France, where he received a handsome pension, and remained till 1681, when he returned to his native country, and died in 1694.

HUYSUM, JOHN VAN, a celebrated painter, was born in 1622, at Amsterdam, where his father, Justus van Huisum, was a respectable artist. John was the most distinguished flower and fruit painter of modern times, and his pictures fetched enormous prices: his landscapes were also highly esteemed. He died in 1749.—He had two brothers, JUSTUS and JACOB; the former painted battles, and died in his twenty-second year; the latter copied the works of John with great exactness, and died in London, in 1740.

HYDE, THOMAS, D.D., a learned divine and orientalist, was born in 1626, at Billingsley, in Shropshire, and studied at King's college, Cambridge. While there, before he was eighteen, he assisted Walton in his great polyglot Bible. In 1658 he went to Oxford, and became successively Hebrew reader, and keeper of the Bodleian Library. He was next promoted to a prebend in Salisbury cathedral, and afterwards appointed regius professor of Hebrew, and canon of Christchurch, Oxford. Died, 1703. His "Veterum Persarum et Medorum Historia" is regarded as a highly valuable work.

HYDER ALI, or HYDER ALLY KHAN, a celebrated Indian prince, who during the latter part of the 18th century was a formidable enemy to the English in Hindostan, was the son of a petty chief in the Mysore. He introduced the European discipline among his troops, became general-in-chief of the forces of Cinoas, who then reigned at Seringapatam as a vassal of the Great Mogul; and having quarrelled with the grand vizier, got him into his power, and eventually assumed the sovereignty himself. He made important conquests from the Mahrattas, twice invaded the East India Company's territories, and at one time caused the greatest apprehension for the safety of the British power in the East. A treaty was concluded in 1769, which was broken in 1780, and the war renewed with vigour; but the skill of Sir Eyre Coote proved superior to Hyder, who left the military operations to his son Tipoo Saib. He died in 1782.

HYGINUS, CAIUS JULIUS, a Roman writer, a freedman of Augustus, and keeper of the Palatine library. Though there is only one book of his extant, which is entitled "Poeticon Astronomicum," he also wrote the lives of illustrious men, referred to by Aulus Gellius, and a copious treatise on the cities of Italy.

eclectic sect, was the daughter of Theon, a celebrated mathematician, who governed the Platonic school in Alexandria, in the fourth century. She early exhibited proofs of extraordinary genius and judgment; and being educated by her father in all he knew, she became a preceptress in the school in which Hierocles and other celebrated philosophers had presided. Her ready elocution, her beauty, and graceful address, united with deep erudition and sound judgment, procured her the admiration of all her hearers; and her house became the resort of all the learned and eminent persons in Alexandria, among whom was Orestes the governor. This roused the jealousy of Cyril, a haughty and intolerant prelate, at that time the patriarch of Alexandria; and such was the blind bigotry and resentment of his monkish partisans, that they conspired against Hypatia's life, and a furious band of assassins seizing her as she was returning home from the schools, they dragged her through the streets, murdered her in the most barbarous manner, and threw her mangled limbs into the flames, A.D. 415.

HYPERIDES, an Athenian orator, was a disciple of Plato and Isocrates, and the contemporary of Demosthenes; against whom he brought that accusation of bribery which procured his banishment. They were afterwards reconciled, and met their tragic fate about the same time, Hyperides being seized in the temple of Ceres, and delivered up to Antipater, who caused him to be put to death, B.C. 322.

HYPERIUS, GERARD ANDREW, a Lutheran divine, born at Ypres, in Flanders, in 1511. After studying at Paris and Louvain, he visited England, and became travelling tutor to the son of lord Mountjoy, who settled a pension on him. He then went to reside at Marburg, where he filled the divinity chair till his death in 1564. His works, on theological and mathematical subjects, form 7 vols.

HYPSICLES, a mathematician of Alexandria, known as the author of a treatise, entitled "Anaphoricus," which is still extant. He lived in the second century, in the reigns of Marcus Aurelius and Verus.

I.

IBARRA, JOACHIM, a celebrated Spanish printer, was born at Saragossa, in 1736; exercised his art in Madrid, where he was king's printer; and died there in 1785. He raised the art of typography to an excellence before unequalled in Spain; and from his press were issued magnificent editions of the Bible, the Mozarabic Missal, &c.

IBAS, a bishop of Edessa, in Mesopotamia, in the fifth century, who is noted in ecclesiastical history, on account of the opposite decisions of different councils, relative to the orthodoxy or heterodoxy of his opinions. He was deposed and re-instated, condemned and acquitted, several times, on the charge of favouring the heresy of Nestorius.

IBBETSON, JULIUS CESAR, an ingenious landscape painter, was a native of Scarborough, in Yorkshire; who so successfully imitated the style of Berghem, that he was termed by West, the Berghem of England. Died, 1817.

IBBETSON, AGNES, a lady distinguished for her researches in natural history and other sciences, was the daughter of A. Thompson, Esq. of London, and was married to Mr. Ibbetson, a barrister, by whom she was left a widow. She devoted her attention to the study of astronomy, geology, and botany, and more especially to that department of the latter which treats of the physiology of plants. Many of her microscopical experiments on the structure of vegetables, were highly interesting, and were published in the Annals of Philosophy and other scientific journals. Died, at Exmouth, Devon, in 1823.

IBBOT, BENJAMIN, an English divine, was born at Beachamwell, in Norfolk, in 1680, and educated at Clare-hall, Cambridge. Archbishop Tension appointed him treasurer of the cathedral of Wells, and gave him the united livings of St. Vedast, Fosterlane, and St. Michael le Querne. George I. made him one of his chaplains; and when that monarch visited Cambridge, Mr. Ibbot was created D.D. by the royal command. He was the Boylean lecturer in 1715 and 1714; was installed prebendary of Westminster, in 1734; and died the year following.

IBN DORIED, or DOREIDI, an Arabian poet of the ninth century, was born at Basora, and died at Bagdad in 933. Doreidi is reckoned among the principal poets of Arabia, and his works comprise every species of poetical composition.

IBN EL ALAM, ALI BEN AL HASSAN, a famous Arabian astronomer; the author of an astronomical table, containing the result of numerous observations made at Bagdad, in the reign of Adadodawla, which unfortunately is lost. Died, 985.

IBN KHILCAN, a distinguished Arabian historian, and grand cadi of Damascus; author of a biographical work, entitled "The Decree of Eminent Personages, and the Lives of Contemporaries." Died, 1262.

IBRAHIM EFFENDI, a Turk, belonging to the body of Ulema, or lawyers, who, from a careful perusal of the Scriptures, was converted to Christianity, in the 17th century, and baptized at Pera. He afterwards assumed the habit of St. Dominic, and the name of Paul Anthony Effendi. Died, 1697.

who was raised to the first dignities in the Ottoman empire. He established the first printing-press in Turkey in 1736; the count de Boissier furnishing him with the characters. The first work which he produced was on the military art; he afterwards published the "Account of an expedition against the Afghans;" a "Turkish Grammar;" and a "History of Turkey."

IBRAHIM MANSOUR EFFENDI, an adventurer, whose real name was Cerbere, was the son of a Jew at Strasburg. He had served in the republican hussars; but became so violent a royalist, that he was imprisoned. In 1803 he went to Constantinople, embraced the Mahometan faith, and instructed the Turkish troops in the European discipline. He afterwards travelled through the north of Europe, and, under the assumed name of Medelsheim, held a government office in Westphalia; afterwards was engineer to Ali Pacha, and on quitting that employ, travelled to various parts of Asia, Africa, and America. At length, being in a state of absolute destitution, he shot himself at Paris, in 1826. He was the author of a "Memoir of Greece and Albania during the Government of Ali Pacha."

IBYCUS, a Greek lyric poet, was a native of Rhegium, and flourished about 540 B.C. He was murdered by robbers, and in the moment of dying he observed a flight of cranes passing, whom he implored to be his avengers. Sometime after, as these murderers were walking in Rhegium, one of them, seeing some cranes in the air, said to his companions, "Here are the avengers of Ibycus," which exciting the suspicion of a person who overheard them, the wretches were apprehended, and being tortured, confessed their crime.

ICTINUS, an Athenian architect, who lived in the fourth century B.C., and was employed by Pericles in the erection of the Parthenon. He also built the temple of Ceres, and Proserpine at Eleusis; and the temple of Apollo Epicurius, in Arcadia.

IDACIUS, a Spanish bishop of the fifth century, who wrote a chronicle, commencing with the first year of the reign of Theodosius, and ending with the 11th of that of Leo. The Consular Fasti are also attributed to him.

IETZELER, CHRISTOPHER, a Swiss architect, born at Schaffhausen, in 1734. He studied under the celebrated Euler, at Berlin, and travelled in several parts of Europe. He filled the mathematical chair at his native place with great distinction; and died in 1791.

IFFLAND, AUGUSTUS, a celebrated German actor and dramatic writer, was born at Hanover, in 1736. In 1796, he was invited to Berlin, to take the direction of the theatre there, and, in 1811, was appointed general director of all the royal plays. He died in 1814. His works comprise forty-seven plays, memoirs, and reflections on the theory of his art. So greatly was he admired by many, that he has been termed the Moliere of Germany; and Madame de Stael said of him, that there was not an accent or a gesture for which Iffland could not account as a philosopher and an artist.

IGNARRA, NICHOLAS, a learned Neapolitan antiquary, born in 1726. He became principal professor of sacred literature in the college of Urbano, at Naples; was director of the royal printing-office; tutor to the hereditary prince Francis of Bourbon; and published a learned work, entitled "De Palmetra Neapolitana Commentarium." Died, 1806.

IGNATIUS, St., surnamed Theophorus, an eminent father of the church and a martyr, was a native of Syria, and a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, by whom he was made bishop of Antioch, A.D. 68. He continued there till 107, when Trajan entered the city in triumph, after having conquered the Scythians and Dacians. A persecution of the Christians followed, and Ignatius, after a long conference with the emperor, was sent to Rome, where he was doomed to suffer the dreadful death of being exposed to the fury of wild beasts in the amphitheatre. Seven of his genuine epistles remain, and were published by Usher, at Oxford, in 1646.

IGNATIUS, patriarch of Constantinople, was the son of the emperor Michael Carpalata, and of Procopia, daughter of the emperor Nicephorus. He died in 878.

IHRE, JOHN, a learned Swede, was born at Upsal, in 1707. His grandfather was archbishop of Upsal, where the subject of this article had his education; after which he travelled into various parts of Europe, and on his return became a member of the academy of sciences. In 1748 he was made professor of rhetoric and politics, an office the duties of which he discharged with great ability for forty years; and died in 1780. His chief works are "Lexicon Dialectorum;" "Glossarium Sueco-Gothicum;" 3 vols. folio; and "De Runicorum Antiquitate, Patria, Origine, et Occasu."

IIVE, JACOB, an English printer and letter-founder, who published some strange pieces, as a pretended translation of the book of Jasher, an oration proving that this world is hell, that men are fallen spirits, and that the fire to destroy them at the day of judgment will be immaterial, &c. He died in 1766.

IMBERT, BARTHOLOMEW, a French poet, was born at Nismes in 1747. His poem on the Judgment of Paris has been much admired. He also published a volume of fables; was the author of an agreeable novel, entitled "Les Egaremens de l'Amour," and some other pieces. Died, 1790.

IMBERT, JOSEPH GABRIEL, a painter of considerable merit, who studied under Le Brun and Vander Meulen, was born at Marseilles, in 1634. At the age of thirty-four he entered into the Carthusian order; but was permitted by his brethren to exercise his pencil on religious subjects. Died, 1749, aged 93.

IMHOFF, JOHN WILLIAM, a lawyer and senator of Nuremberg, who devoted himself to the study of history and the descent and alliances of all the great families of Europe; hence he became an eminent genealogist, and produced many able works illustrative of his science. Born, 1651; died, 1728.

brated cardinal, born of an illustrious Genoese family, in 1631. He was employed by different popes in the most important affairs; and in the conclave of 1730 was within one vote of being elected pope himself. For probity, liberality, and a love of literature, few excelled him. Died, 1737.

INA, king of the West Saxons, a valiant prince and an able legislator, succeeded Cenwalla, in 689. Having obtained advantages over the people of Kent, in 694, he wrested Somersetshire and other parts of the west of England from the Britons. He afterwards made war upon the Mercians; but the latter part of his reign was spent in works of peace, and he ended his days in a monastery, having resigned his crown in 726. The laws of Ina served as the foundation of the code formed by Alfred; and some of them are still extant.

INCHBALD, ELIZABETH, a novelist and dramatic writer of great talent, was born at Stanningfield, near Bury, Suffolk, in 1736. Having lost her father at the age of sixteen, she went to London with the view of obtaining an engagement for the stage, where, after escaping many dangers in her rash adventure, she married Mr. Inchbald, an actor of some celebrity, and accompanied him on several provincial tours. He died in 1779, and Mrs. Inchbald obtained an engagement at Covent-garden in 1780, where she continued eight years, and was deservedly popular. After her retirement from the stage in 1789, she depended upon her literary labours. She wrote nineteen dramas, several of which were decidedly successful, and among them may be noticed "Such Things Are," "Every one has his Fault," "Lover's Vows," &c., besides two novels, "The Simple Story," and "Nature and Art." Mrs. Inchbald also edited "The British Theatre," in 25 vols.; a similar collection of popular farces, in 7 vols.; and "The Modern Theatre," in 10 vols. She died in 1821; having passed a life attended with many difficulties and temptations, with unspotted reputation, and displaying the noble and self-denying character of her nature, as may be seen from her Life and Correspondence, published by Boaden, in 2 vols. 8vo.

INCHOFER, MELCHIOR, a German Jesuit, was born at Vienna, in 1584. He wrote a book, entitled, "The Virgin Mary's Letter to the people of Messina proved to be genuine," which gave great offence to his brethren, whom he found great difficulty in appeasing. He also wrote a satire against them, which was printed after his death under the title of "Monarchia Solipsorum." He also wrote the "Ecclesiastical History of Hungary," &c. Died at Milan, in 1648.

INCLEDON, BENJAMIN CHARLES, a celebrated English singer, was born at St. Keveran, in Cornwall, in 1764, where his father practised as a surgeon. When only eight years old, the astonishing fine tones of his voice induced his parents to article him to Jackson of Exeter, under whose tuition he remained, as a chorister in Exeter cathedral, until he was fifteen. Not liking the restraints to which he was necessarily subject, he abruptly quitted his situation in 1779, and entered as a common sailor on board the Formidable, of 98 guns, and remained in the royal navy five years, during which time he went to the West Indies, and saw some service. His vocal abilities having, however, attracted the notice of his officers, he was advised to try his fortune on the stage. He accordingly joined Collins's company at Southampton, in 1783, and next year accepted an engagement at Bath, where the manager introduced him to the acquaintance of Rauzzini, who did much towards perfecting him in the vocal art. In 1790 he made his debut at Covent-garden Theatre, with great success, as Dermot, in "The Poor Soldier," and rose at once into a degree of popularity, which attended him till the infirmities consequent upon advancing years, and an irregular mode of life, compelled him to quit the stage. His voice combined uncommon power, sweetness, and flexibility, both in the natural tones and the falsetto, and his intonation was singularly correct: indeed, those who have heard him in "The Storm," "Black-eyed Susan," or any of the better sort of the old English ballads and hunting songs, will not easily forget a style of singing, which, we believe, has seldom, if ever, had its equal. Died, 1826.

INGENHOUSZ, JOHN, an eminent physician and chemist, was born at Breda, in 1730. He came early to England, and having learnt the Sutorian method of inoculation, went to Vienna, in order to inoculate the daughter of the emperor; for which he was made imperial physician, and obtained a pension. He was the author of several treatises on subjects of natural history; was elected a fellow of the royal society; and died in 1790.

INGLIS, Sir JAMES, was descended from an ancient family in Fife-shire, where he was born in the reign of James IV. He joined the French faction against the English, and in some skirmishes preceding the battle of Pinkie, so distinguished himself, that he was knighted on the field. In 1648 he published at St. Andrews his poem "Complaint of Scotland." He died at Culross, in 1654.

INGLIS, Sir WILLIAM, K.C.B., a lieutenant-general, colonel of the 57th foot, and governor of Cork. From the time Sir William first entered the army, as an ensign in the 57th, to the date of his death, fifty-seven years had elapsed—his career being thus identified with the achievements of a regiment who obtained during the Peninsular war the appellation of the "die-hards." His campaigns commenced in America, where his regiment was on duty from 1761 to 1791. It afterwards formed part of the army in Flanders, under the duke of York; and returned to England in 1795, when the subject of this memoir attained the rank of major. He next served under Sir John Moore in the West Indies; distinguished himself on several occasions; and returned from Trinidad with his shattered regiment in 1802. Having formed a second battalion of the 57th in 1803, he rejoined the first battalion, and embarked with it for Guernsey, when in 1805, he succeeded to its command, and proceeded with it to Gibraltar. In 1809 the 57th joined the second brigade of major-general Hill's division, in the Peninsula. In the battle of Albuera it suffered a tremendous loss, 413 being killed and wounded out of 579, the number of which it consisted at the commencement of the action. On this occasion colonel Inglis's horse was shot under him; and he was wounded in the neck by a grape-shot. In consequence of this severe wound he went to England; but, after a very short stay, he returned to Lisbon; and, on account of his health, he remained for a time as president of a general court-martial. In 1813 he attained the rank of a major-general; and at the battles of Pampeluna, Nivelle, Orthes, Albuera, &c. he signaled himself by his skill and bravery, and his name was repeatedly included in the votes of thanks from parliament. He attained the rank of lieutenant-general in 1825, and in 1829 was made governor of Cork. Died, at Ramsgate, aged 73, Nov. 29, 1835.

INGLIS, HENRY DAVID, a writer of some distinction, whose earliest works were published in the name of Derwent Conway, was a native of Scotland, and born in 1795. An ardent desire to visit foreign countries, and a not less ardent love of literature, led him to indulge both propensities by visiting the Continent and recording his observations. His first work was entitled "The Tales of Ardennes," which was followed by "Solitary Walks through many Lands;" after which appeared his "Travels in Norway and Sweden," "Spain in 1830," "The New Gil Blas," &c. After his return from Spain he made a tour through Ireland, the result of which was an admirable work, entitled "Ireland in 1834." His constitution at length sunk under his literary exertions; he was seized with a disease of the brain, and died in 1835.

INGULPHUS, abbot of Croyland, and author of a history of that abbey, was born in London about 1030. William, duke of Normandy, while a visitor at the court of Edward the Confessor, made Ingulphus, then of the age of twenty-one, his secretary. He afterwards went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and, upon his return, entered into the order of the Benedictines, at the abbey of Fontenelle, in Normandy, of which he became prior. On the acquirement of the crown of England by William, Ingulphus was created abbot of the rich monastery of Croyland, which he was enabled to rebuild; and, by the favour of the king and archbishop Lanfranc, he obtained for it many privileges. The history of this monastery commences with the year 664, is brought down to 1091, and is interspersed with many particulars of the English kings. Died, 1109.

INGHIRAMI, TOMASO FEDRA, an eminent Italian scholar, who, under the patronage of Lorenzo de Medici, obtained an excellent education, and ultimately became librarian of the Vatican. He wrote a "Defence of Cicero," a "History of Rome," &c. Born, 1740; died, 1516.

INGRAM, ROBERT, an English clergyman, born at Beverley, Yorkshire, in 1727; author of several learned and ingenious treatises on scriptural subjects; among which is "An Account of the Ten Tribes of Israel being in America, originally written by Manasseh Ben Israel, with Observations." Died, 1804.

INGRASSIAS, JOHN PHILIP, an eminent Sicilian physician, born in 1510. He filled the chair of medicine and anatomy at Naples with great credit; and when the plague raged at Palermo, he adopted such salutary regulations as put a stop to the calamity. He wrote several medical and anatomical works, in one of which he ably defended the rules and practice of Galen. Ingrassias ranks among the improvers of anatomy, by his discovery of the bone, called stapes, in the ear, and by that of the seminal vesicles. Died, 1580.

INNOCENT. There have been thirteen popes of this name, of whom the following deserve a niche in our work:—

INNOCENT I. ST., was a native of Albano, and succeeded Anastasius I. as bishop of Rome, in 402. He supported St. Chrysostom, and renounced communion with the Eastern churches, on account of their treatment of that eminent man. In 409 he endeavoured to obtain terms of peace with Alaric, but was unsuccessful, and during the following year Rome was taken and pillaged. Died, 417.

INNOCENT II., a Roman of noble birth, elected, in 1130, by a part of the cardinals, whilst others chose Peter of Leon, who took the name of Anacletus. This contest for the papal chair continued until the death of the latter in 1138, although the monarchs of England, France, and Germany, espoused the cause of Innocent. The whole period of his pontificate was one continued struggle for pre-eminence, either with rival popes or unbending kings. Died, 1143.

INNOCENT III., one of the most eminent of the popes, was descended from the counts of Segni, and born at Anagni, in 1161. He was raised to the papacy in 1195; and being endowed by nature with all the talents of a ruler, possessed of great erudition, and favoured by circumstances, he was better qualified than any of his predecessors to elevate the papal power. His first care was to unite the Christian princes in a crusade for the recovery of Palestine, and in order to succeed he began by a cruel persecution of the Albigenses. He put France under an interdict, because Philip Augustus divorced his queen; and he was still more arbitrary in his treatment of John, king of England, for refusing to confirm the election of Stephen Langton, as archbishop of Canterbury. Innocent laid the kingdom under an interdict, and, in 1212, formally deposed him, and instigated the king of France to attack England. John was finally obliged to submit; resigned his territories to Rome; and received them, as a papal fief, from Innocent, from whom he was unable to obtain absolution until he had paid large sums of money. Almost all Christendom was now subject to the pope; two crusades were undertaken at his order, and his influence extended even to Constantinople. Under his rule, in fact, the temporal power of the papal see was built upon a solid foundation. He reigned from sea to sea, and the Roman republic, in her first four centuries, did not possess a more extended territory. Yet it must be admitted, that he acted in accordance with the principles laid down in his writings; he enforced purity of morals in the clergy, and was himself irreproachable in private life; but the cruel persecution of the Albigenses in the south of France, which he encouraged, and the inquisitorial tribunals established by him in 1198, from which the inquisition itself originated, are stains on his pontificate, but partially effaced by a consideration of the spirit of the times and the disordered state of the Christian world. In 1215 he convoked the fourth general council of the Lateran, consisting of more than 1300 archbishops, bishops, prelates, and ambassadors of European princes, by which transubstantiation in the Lord's Supper and auricular confession were established as dogmas; and it was at this famous council that the celebrated orders of St. Dominic and St. Francis were confirmed. Died, 1216.

INNOCENT XI. (BENEDICT ODESCALCHI), born in 1611, was the son of a banker at Como, in the Milanese. In his youth he served as a soldier in Germany and Poland; quitted the camp to take orders, and rose, through the intermediate dignities to the pontificate in 1676, on the death of Clement X. He was eminent for his probity and austerity, restraining luxury and excess, and even prohibiting women from learning music. Nor was he less distinguished for the enmity he bore to France, or rather its sovereign, Louis XIV.; his dispute with whom was highly favourable to the English revolution, as it induced the pope, in 1689, to unite with the allies against James II., in order to lower the influence of Louis. His conduct in this respect has led many Catholics to assert, that he sacrificed their religion to his personal resentment; but Bayle judiciously observes, that the extreme preponderance of any great Catholic sovereign is injurious to the interests of the papacy, and mentions the similar conduct of Sixtus V., in relation to Philip II. of Spain, and queen Elizabeth of England. He died in 1689, aged 78.

IPHITUS, king of Elis, in Greece, memorable as the institutor of the famous Olympic games, in the eighth century B.C. These games, at first consisting only of athletic exercises, but afterwards including horse and chariot racing, and even the trials of skill among rival candidates in music, poetry, eloquence, &c. were celebrated every fourth year, in the month of July, near Olympia, a city of Elis.

IPHICRATES, a famous Athenian military commander, during the fourth century B.C., who raised himself to eminence, by courage and talents, early in life. In the war of Corinth, 395 B.C., he successfully opposed Agesilaus, the warlike king of Sparta. He afterwards commanded a body of auxiliary troops, in the service of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, in an expedition to Egypt; and, in 368 B.C., he relieved Sparta, when invaded by the Theban general Epaminondas. In the social war, he was one of the commanders of the fleet fitted out by the Athenians, for the recovery of Byzantium; when, being accused of treachery by one of his colleagues, he defended himself with such spirit, that he was acquitted; but though he lived to a great age, he did not again engage in the military operations of Athens.

IRELAND, JOHN, an ingenious writer on works of art, was born near Wem, in Shropshire, and brought up to the watch-making business. He afterwards became a dealer in paintings and prints; and died, near Birmingham, in 1768. He is the author of "Hogarth Illustrated," 3 vols.; and the "Life and Letters of John Henderson," the actor.

IRELAND, SAMUEL, was originally a silk manufacturer in Spitalfields; but having a taste for the arts, he became a speculator in scarce books, prints, &c., and published many embellished tours. In 1796 his character sustained a deep injury in consequence of the part he took in the publication of an impudent forgery, fabricated by his son, which made a great noise at the time, and was entitled "Miscellaneous Papers and Legal Instruments, under the hand and seal of William Shakespeare, &c." His son, however, acquitted him of wilful participation in this gross literary fraud, in what he termed an "Authentic Account of the Shakespeare Manuscripts." Besides a variety of "Picturesque Tours" above alluded to, Samuel Ireland published a work in one volume, entitled "Graphic Illustrations of Hogarth."

IRENEUS, Sr., a Christian martyr in the second century, was bishop of Lyons. He was a man of considerable learning, and animated with an ardent zeal for Christianity; in which cause he suffered during the fifth persecution under Septimius Severus, in 202, and is honoured as a saint.

IRENE, an empress of Constantinople, like famous for her talents, her beauty, and her crimes, was by birth an Athenian, and married Leo IV., after whose death, in 769, she raised herself and her son Constantine VI., who was then but nine years old, to the imperial throne. Charlemagne at that time menaced the Eastern empire. Irene at first delayed him by promises; and at length went so far as to oppose him, arms in hand; but he totally defeated her army, in the year 788. When Constantine had arrived at manhood, he refused to permit her to participate longer in the government, and actually reigned alone seven years; but the inhuman and unnatural empress caused him to be deprived of his sight, and assumed the sovereignty. Her entrance into Constantinople on a triumphal car of gold and precious stones, her liberality to the people, the freedom which she bestowed on all prisoners, and other artifices employed by her, were not sufficient to secure her from the consequences of her criminal accession. Nicephorus, who was placed on the imperial throne, exiled her to the isle of Lesbos, where she died, in 803.

IRETON, HENRY, a soldier, statesman, and regicide, was born at Atterton, in Nottinghamshire, in 1610; studied at Trinity college, Oxford, and the Middle Temple; and on the breaking out of the Rebellion, joined the parliamentarians, the left wing of whose army he commanded at the battle of Naseby. Having married a daughter of Oliver Cromwell, he soon rose to preferments; but in judgment upon the king, whom he had previously betrayed; and was appointed commander-in-chief in Ireland; where he died, in 1651. His body was brought to England, and buried in Westminster abbey, till the Restoration, when it was taken up, suspended at the gallows, and then thrown into a pit with those of Cromwell and Bradshaw.

IRVING, the Rev. EDWARD, M. A., a native of Annan, Scotland, was born in 1792. He received the first rudiments of classical education of the village schoolmaster, which he completed at the university of Edinburgh. When a mere child he is said to have been singular in his way of thinking, habits, and amusements; and, before he had reached the seventeenth year of his age, he was recommended as a teacher of the mathematics by professor Leslie, to an academy at Haddington. That situation he left, in order to fill a similar one at Kirkcaldy, where he remained seven years, and during which time he became enamoured of Miss Isabella Martin, whom he afterwards married. In 1810 he went to Edinburgh, with a determination of becoming a preacher of the gospel; and on Dr. Chalmers hearing him in the pulpit he appointed him to be his colleague at St. John's church, Glasgow. In 1822 he was appointed to preach at the Caledonian Asylum, in Cross-street, Hatton-garden, and introduced to the public as the late assistant of Dr. Chalmers. The force, eloquence, and it may be added, the novelty of style and manner of Mr. Irving, drew each large congregations to the Caledonian Asylum, that those only were admitted who could procure tickets—even for "standing room;" while these were chiefly distributed among the noble, wealthy, and liberal of both sexes; in short, it became "quite the fashion" to attend Mr. Irving, whose grotesque appearance, violent gesticulation, peculiar phraseology, and general attack upon all professors whose opinions were opposed to his own, had created so ardent a curiosity to hear him, that, from about fifty seats being previously occupied in the chapel, applications were made to the amount of fifteen hundred. He occasionally preached at different chapels for charities, bible societies, &c. He published many of his sermons and opinions; and on becoming acquainted with Mr. Drummond, joined "the prophets," as they were called, of Albany Park, the seat of the latter. These "prophets" were twenty or thirty persons assembled together at the above-named seat for the express object of studying, or elucidating "the sublime science of sacred prophecy," accounts of which were published in 1827. In the course of this and the following year the change in Mr. Irving's doctrine became evident to his former admirers; and in 1830 he was charged with "heresy" by the Scotch church in London. Proceedings of the presbytery were carried on against him; and the judgment of that body being approved by the trustees of the National Scotch Church, which had been erected for him in Regent-square, he was dismissed therefrom, and afterwards deposed by the presbytery of Annan. With fanaticism generally, the greater the absurdity the stronger is the attachment to it; and some of Mr. Irving's warmest friends resolved on providing him with a chapel, wherein he might preach uncontrolled. The picture-gallery of the late Mr. West, in Newman-street, was fitted up for that purpose, and there the novelty of what he termed "manifestations of the spirit," as evinced by the screams and ravings in "unknown tongues" of the deluded or the artful, ensured him full audiences. About this time he felt it necessary to return to Scotland in the hope of recruiting his health; but, on arriving at Glasgow, he rapidly became worse, and he died on the 6th of December, 1834, with all the external symptoms of old age, though only in his 42d year.

IRWIN, EYLM, was born at Calcutta, of Irish parents, in 1746, and received his education in England. In 1767 he returned to the east in a civil capacity; but was suspended, in 1777, for his attachment to lord Pigot; on which he came to Europe over land to seek redress; obtained it, and was restored to his former station at Madras, whither he again repaired. In 1785 he returned again to England; but in 1792 he went to China to superintend the Company's affairs; after which he revisited England, where he died in 1817. His works are "Adventures during a Voyage up the Red Sea, and a Journey across the Desert;" "Eastern Eclogues;" an "Epistle to Mr. Hayley;" "Ode on the Death of Hyder Ally;" "An Inquiry into the feasibility of Buonaparte's Expedition into the East," "Napoleon, or the Vanity of Human Wishes," &c.

ISABELLA OF CASTILE, the celebrated queen of Spain, daughter of John II., was born in 1451, and married, in 1469, Ferdinand V., king of Arragon. After the death of her brother, Henry IV., in 1474, she ascended the throne of Castile, to the exclusion of her eldest sister, Joanna, who had the rightful claim to the crown. After the kingdoms of Arragon and Castile were united, Ferdinand and Isabella together assumed the royal title of Spain. She was haughty and ambitious; but with the graces and charms of her sex, Isabella united the courage of a hero, and the sagacity of a statesman and legislator: she was always present at the transaction of state affairs, and her name was placed beside that of her husband in public ordinances. Private warfare, which had formerly prevailed to the destruction of public tranquillity, she checked, and introduced a vigorous administration of justice. Died, 1504.

ISAAC, KARO, a rabbi, who was forced to quit Spain in consequence of the edict of Ferdinand and Isabella in 1499, which compelled the Jews to leave that country within four months, or become Christians. He first went to Portugal, and from thence to Jerusalem, but was so unfortunate as to lose all his children on their journey, as well as his library. He then passed the remainder of his life in solitude, occupying himself in writing a Commentary on the Pentateuch.

ISAACSON, HENRY, the author of a valuable system of chronology, was the son of Richard Imacson, sheriff of London, Born, 1581; died, 1654.

ISEUS, an Athenian orator, the pupil of Lyias and Isocrates. He lived in the first half of the fourth century B.C.; was wholly unconnected with public affairs, and devoted himself to the task of instructing others. Eleven of his orations are still extant.

ISCANUS, JOSEPHUS, or Joseph of Exeter, was a distinguished writer of Latin poetry, who accompanied Richard Cœur de Lion to Palestine. He was the author of an epic poem, entitled "Antiochus," or the deeds of Richard which the poet had himself witnessed. This is unfortunately lost; but another, on the Trojan war, is still extant. Warton styles Iscanus "the miracle of his age in classical composition." Died, 1224.

ISELIN, JAMES CHRISTOPHER, an able German divine and philologist, was born at Basil, in 1691. He became professor of history and antiquities at Marburg; but was recalled to his native place, where he was promoted to the chair of divinity, and finally became rector of the university. He was also librarian of Basil, and a member of the Academy of Inscriptions. His writings are very numerous, and display his learning and abilities to much advantage on divinity, philology, &c. Died, 1737.

ISELIN, ISAAC, a German philosopher, and an ingenious writer, born at Basil, in 1728; of the grand council of which city he became secretary in 1736. His principal work is entitled "The History of Mankind," 2 vols. 8vo.; but many others came from his pen; and he carried on an extensive correspondence with the literati of his own and other countries. Died, 1782.

ISEMBERT of XAINTEs, a French architect of the 12th century, whose skill in building the bridges of Xaintes and Rochelle induced John, king of England, to recommend him to the citizens of London, in 1201, as an engineer or architect, who might be useful to them in completing the bridge over the Thames then building. This structure (old London bridge) has of late years been removed, and its place supplied by a noble erection, which, for architectural beauty and solid masonry, has never been equalled. The old bridge was commenced under the direction of a priest called Peter of Colechurch, in 1176; and it was finished in 1209, probably by Isembert; but the style in which it was executed, says but little for the state of architectural science in England during the 12th century.

ISIDORE of MILETUS, a Greek architect of the sixth century, who, together with Anthemius, was employed by the emperor Justinian to erect the church of St. Sophia, at Constantinople. It is now used as a mosque.

ISIDORE of PELUSIUM, a saint in the Romish calendar, and so called from his retiring to a solitude near the town which bears that name, was a celebrated disciple of St. Chrysostom, and flourished in the fifth century. He wrote three thousand epistles on theological questions and ecclesiastical discipline.

ISIDORE of SEVILLE, another Romish saint, was born at Carthage, of which city his father was governor. Isidore succeeded his brother in the bishopric of Seville in 601, and died in 636. His works are numerous, and among them is a chronicle, ending at the year 636. The editions of his Missal and Breviary are very scarce.

ISLA, JOSEPH FRANCIS DE, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Segovia, in 1714; and after the expulsion of his order from Spain, retired to Italy, and died at Bologna, in 1783. His principal work, "The Life of Friar Gerard," is a bitter satire upon the absurdity, fanaticism, and ignorance of the monks, and upon the prevailing faults of pulpit eloquence. He possessed much of that kind of humour for which his countryman Cervantes is so justly famed, and was well calculated to effect a reform in the manners of those whom he satirized, if, indeed, the shafts of satire could possibly reach such a race of drones and bigots.

ISOCRATES, one of the greatest orators of Greece, was born at Athens, B.C. 436, and was the son of a musical instrument-maker. His principal teachers were Gorgias, Prodicus, and Tharamenes. On account of his weak voice and natural timidity, he took but little share himself in public speaking; but he applied himself with the greatest ardour to instruction in the art of eloquence, and preparing orations for others. He was particularly distinguished for a polished style, and a harmonious construction of his sentences; his subjects were the most important points of morals and politics; and it is recorded to his honour, that he never, by writing or accusation, injured a single individual. He was warmly attached to the liberties of his country, and such was his grief on hearing of the fatal battle of Cheronea, that he took no food for four days, and literally died of starvation, in the 96th year of his age.

ITTIGIUS, THOMAS, a Lutheran divine, and theological writer, born at Leipzig, in 1644. He became professor of philosophy at his native place, and afterwards licentiate and professor in divinity. Died, 1710.

ITURBIDE, AUGUSTIN, emperor of Mexico, was born at Valladolid, in New Spain, in 1784, and entered the military service at the age of seventeen. In 1810 he was a lieutenant in the provincial regiment of his native city, but his military skill and valour were conspicuous, and led to his further promotion; so that in 1816 he had risen to the command of the northern army, which occupied the provinces of Guanajuato and Valladolid. About this time he was suspected and accused of want of fidelity to the royal cause; but, though acquitted of the imputation, the disgust which he felt in consequence of this charge led him to retire for a while from active service. Subsequent events opened a new career for his ambition. He was invited to take the command of an army destined to the South, and he marched to Acapulco, in the latter part of 1819. There he matured a plan, the professed object of which was the emancipation of Mexico from the yoke of Spain, the independence of the country, the protection of religion, and the union of the Spaniards and Mexicans. On the strength of this plan Iturbide continued his march to Queretaro, and was soon joined by Victoria, the most devoted of the friends of liberty. The road to power was now entirely open before Iturbide. He took possession of the capital in the name of the nation, and established a regency, consisting of members nominated by himself, and wholly under his control. Finding that the republicans saw through his intentions, and were opposed to his domination, he resolved to preserve his authority by boldly usurping the crown; and, accordingly, through the subserviency of his troops, and the concurrence of a portion of the deputies, he was proclaimed emperor, May 18, 1822. It was decreed that the crown should be hereditary in the family of Iturbide, and that a million and a half of dollars should be his yearly allowance; at the same time conferring the title of princes on his sons, and establishing an order of knighthood and other accessories of a monarchy. The friends of liberal institutions, overawed and held at bay by the power of the usurper, fled to their wonted retreats, or temporized until a fitting season should arrive for acting with union and efficiency. But they could not acquiesce in a state of things so adverse to their feelings. Iturbide was driven by his necessities to exasperate the minds of the people, already disgusted with successive usurpations. Defection now became general among the officers of the army, and in all the provinces, so that Iturbide saw plainly that his cause was hopeless, and hastily assembled at Mexico the dispersed members of Congress, and tendered to them his abdication of the crown, March 20th, 1823. Congress agreed to grant Iturbide a large yearly pension, on condition of his leaving the Mexican territory for ever, and residing somewhere in Italy, making suitable provision for his family in case of his death. He proceeded to the coast, under escort of general Bravo, and embarked, May 11th, 1823, for Leghorn. He might have continued to live happily in one of the charming villas of Tuscany, had he not been impelled by an insane ambition to attempt the recovery of his lost empire. With this object, he left Italy for England, and embarked for Mexico, May 11th, 1824, precisely a year after his departure from it, and arrived in sight of the port of Soto la Marina, July 14th. During the year that had elapsed, the Mexicans had adopted a republican constitution, and Iturbide had no party nor friends in the nation. The government had been apprised of his leaving Italy, and suspected his design. A decree was passed, bearing date April 26th, 1824, declaring him to be proscribed as a traitor, and requiring that, in case he landed in the country, the mere fact should render him a public enemy. Wholly deceived in regard to the fate which awaited him, Iturbide landed at Soto la Marina, accompanied only by Beneski, his secretary, and was almost immediately arrested by order of La Garza, commander of the province of New Santander, to whom he had applied for passports, pretending that they were for persons who had visited Mexico on a mining speculation. La Garza lost no time in conducting his prisoner to Padilla, the capital of the province, demanding instructions how to act, of the provincial legislature. His fate was but for a short time delayed; sentence of immediate death was pronounced; and while preparations for executing the sentence were making, Iturbide addressed the assembled people, protesting his innocence of any treasonable purpose, and exhorting them to observe the duties of patriotism, religion, and civil subordination. He is allowed to have possessed great military talents, and considerable strength of character: and had he been led to use his influence in the establishment of a free government, he might have realized the expectations of those who gave him credit for intending to follow the example of Washington. He was shot, July 19, 1824.

IVANOF, FEODOR FEODOROVITSCH, a Russian dramatist, was born in 1777. He first served in the army, from which he was removed to the commissariat department; was the author of several comedies, and a tragedy called "Martha, or the Conquest of Novogorod." Died, 1816.

IVES, or YVES, bishop of Chartres, was born in 1035, and raised to that see in 1093. He distinguished himself by his zeal against Philip I. of France, who had put away his wife, Bertha of Holland, and taken Bertrade, the wife of Fouques de Requin, count of Anjou. Died, 1115.

IVES, JOHN, an English antiquary, was born at Yarmouth, in 1751. He became Suffolk-herald extraordinary; and published three numbers of select papers on subjects of English antiquities; also "Remarks on the Garianomum of the Romans," "Remarks on English Coins," &c. Died, 1776.

IVETAUX, NICHOLAS VAUQUELIN, Seigneur de, a French poet and man of letters, born in 1539. He succeeded his father as lieutenant-governor of Caen, in Normandy; but being of a gay disposition he quitted it for the metropolis, and was selected by the "Fair Gabrielle" to fill the situation of tutor to her son, the young duke of Vendome. He afterwards became tutor to the dauphin, but his licentious course of life occasioned his dismissal. He, however, received a pension, and lived till he was 90 years of age. He wrote a clever poem, entitled "Institution d'un Prince," and a variety of other pieces. Died, 1619.

IZAACKE, RICHARD; author of "The Antiquities, or Memorials of the City of Exeter," was born there; filled the offices of town-clerk and chamberlain; and died in 1700.

IZIICALT II. the fourth king of Mexico, ascended the throne in 1433, and died in 1445. During his reign all the warlike nations on the borders of the lake of Mexico were reduced to subjection. He also conquered the Tepeacans; fortified and embellished his capital; formed a body of laws for his subjects; and may be regarded as the real founder of the Mexican empire.

J.

JAAPHAR EBN TOPHAIL, a learned Arabian of the twelfth century; author of a philosophical romance, entitled the "History of Hai Ebn Yordkan," the object of which is to prove that the light of nature is sufficient of itself to lead mankind to a knowledge of the Deity. Died, 1198.

JABLONOWSKY, JOSEPH ALEXANDER VON, a Polish prince, born in 1712. Preferring a life of literary ease, he resigned his dignity when the troubles broke out in his country, and went to live at Leipzig, where he distinguished himself as the patron of science, founded a society, called by his name, which still exists. He wrote "The Lives of twelve Generals;" a "Treatise on Slavonic Poetry;" and other works. Died, 1777.

JABLONSKI, DANIEL ERNEST, a native of Dantzig, born in 1660, who after studying at several universities, among which was Oxford, eventually became an ecclesiastical counsellor at Berlin and president of the academy. He was an able divine, and laboured earnestly, though without success, in endeavouring to promote a union between the Lutherans and Calvinists. He wrote several theological works, and translated Bentley's Boylean Lectures into Latin. Died, 1741.

JABLONSKI, THEODORE, brother of the preceding, was born at Dantzig in 1654, and became counsellor to the king of Prussia. He cultivated a taste for philosophy and general literature with great success, and was the author of a "Course of Ethics," and several other works of merit. Died, 1731.

JABLONSKI, PAUL ERNEST, nephew to the preceding, and son of Daniel Ernest, was the author of a very erudite treatise on the mythology of ancient Egypt, in 3 vols. and other able works, theological and antiquarian. Died, 1757.

JACKSON, THOMAS, dean of Peterborough, a learned divine of the 17th century, was a native of the county of Durham; born in 1579, and died in 1640. He wrote many excellent devotional tracts, but his principal work consists of a "Commentary on the Apostles' Creed," a performance combining great learning and research.

JACKSON, JOHN, a learned Hebraist and controversial writer, was born at Lensy, in Yorkshire, in 1686. The corporation of Doncaster gave him the living of Rodington, but the pertinacity with which he supported his Arian principles prevented his farther rise in the church. He was the author of "Chronological Antiquities;" and left behind him the character of a learned and sincere writer, though strongly tinged with the faults of a violent polemic. Died, 1763.

JACKSON, WILLIAM, a musical composer and author, was born in 1730, at Exeter, and received the rudiments of a classical education, with a view to his following one of the liberal professions. His taste for music displayed itself, however, so decidedly while he was yet a youth, that his friends were induced to place him under Travers, the organist of the cathedral belonging to his native city. Having passed two years in the metropolis, he returned to Exeter in 1750, and, succeeding eventually to the situation of organist, there passed the remainder of his life. He published several books of songs, canonets, hymns, and sonatas of his composition, which are still held in esteem for their chasteness of conception and truth of expression: he was also the author of a treatise "On the present State of Music," "The Four Ages," &c. Mr. Jackson was likewise a landscape painter of no mean powers. Died, 1804.

JACKSON, WILLIAM, a Protestant clergyman, by birth an Irishman, who earned a disgraceful notoriety by carrying on a treasonable correspondence with the French in 1794, and recommending the invasion of Ireland. Being convicted of this offence, and while his counsel were about to move for an arrest of judgment, he expired in court, and on examination it appeared he had taken poison.

JACKSON, JOHN, an eminent English portrait painter, was born at Lastingham, in Yorkshire, in 1778, and apprenticed to his father, who was a tailor; but discovering a decided talent for the art in which he afterwards excelled, his abilities procured him the protection of Sir George Beaumont, through whose means he removed to London, and studied at the Royal Academy. At the time he entered the great theatre of art, Lawrence, Opie, Beechey, and other eminent masters pre-occupied the particular branch he had chosen, and for a time he contented himself with painting portraits in water-colours, in which he was very successful. He was, however, determined to take a high stand, if possible, as a portrait painter in oil; and the tact with which he copied the works of the old masters surprised his contemporaries. He was elected royal academican in 1817; and when, in 1819, he travelled through Italy, and visited Rome with Mr. Chantrey, he was chosen a member of the academy of St. Luke. Jackson "had an uncommon readiness and skill of hand, a rapid felicity of finish, which enabled him to dash off at a few sittings, whatever he undertook; his colouring was deep, clear, and splendid; and in this he more resembled Reynolds than any artist since his day." Died, 1831.

JACKSON, DR. CYRIL, an eminent divine, was born in 1744, at Stamford, where his father was a medical practitioner. He received his education at Westminster-school, from whence he removed to Christ-church, Oxford, and obtained the degree of D.D. in 1781. He became sub-preceptor to his late majesty, for which he was made canon of Christ-church, and on the elevation of Dr. Bagot to a bishopric, he succeeded him in the deanery, which he resigned in 1809. Dr. Jackson was an excellent governor of his college and an elegant scholar, but he as studiously avoided the press as he did the mitre, though the primacy of Ireland was offered him, as well as an English bishopric. Died, 1849.

JACKSON, DR. WILLIAM, bishop of Oxford, was a brother of the preceding, and born at Stamford, in 1780. He became a prebendary of York, regius professor of Greek at Oxford, preacher to the society of Lincoln's-inn, canon of Christ-church, and in 1811, bishop of Oxford. He translated a tract on the Slave of Erastosthenes into Latin, published some sermons, and was a sound mathematician. Died, 1815.

JACKSON, ROSSAT, M.D. was an inspector of military hospitals, and many years chief of the medical department of the army in the West Indies. He served as a regimental surgeon in North America in 1778; and on returning to England he settled as a physician at Stockton. On hostilities with France taking place in 1793, he again engaged in the army service, and was employed for many years on the continent and in the West Indies. Among his works are a treatise "On the Fevers of Jamaica, with Observations on the Intermittents of America;" "Remarks on the Constitution of the Medical Department of the British Army," &c. He died at Thurstrey, near Carlisle, in 1827.

JACOB, OLGA, an industrious English lawyer, who published, among a great variety of works, a "Law Dictionary," and the "Lives and Characters of English Poets." He died in 1744, aged 54.

JACOB, BEN NAPHTHALI, a learned Jew of the 5th century. The invention of the Masoretic points and accents is ascribed to him and Ben Aser.

JACOB, BEN HAJIM, a rabbi of the sixteenth century, who published the Masora at Venice, in 1625, in 4 vols. folio, with the text of the Bible, the Chaldee Paraphrase, and the Rabbinical Commentaries. This work is greatly esteemed by the Jews.

JACOB, HENRY, pastor of the first congregation of Independents in England, was a native of Kent. After graduating at Oxford, he was preferred to the benefice of Chertton, near Hythe; but having published a polemical tract, in which he avowed his separation from the church on conscientious grounds, he found it necessary to withdraw from England for a time. He at length, however, returned, and established a separate congregation on independent principles; but in 1624 he went to America, and there died.—His son, of the same name, studied under Erpenius, at Leyden, and was distinguished for his knowledge in oriental literature. He afterwards obtained a fellowship at Merton college, Oxford, and graduated both in arts and physic; but he was ejected from his fellowship by the parliamentary commissioners, and died at Canterbury, in 1652. He wrote many learned works.

JACOB, JOHN, (noticed here as an instance of longevity) was a native of Franche Comté, who, having attained the age of 120, was sold by his grand-daughter to a mountebank for one hundred crowns. Dragged from town to town, and exhibited as a public show, the old man sunk under the fatigue, and shortly after died, 1790.

JACOBÆUS, OLSON, a Danish physician, was born in the Isle of Jutland in 1650. He became professor of philosophy and physic at Copenhagen, where he died in 1701. He wrote, "Compendium Institutionum Medicarum;" "De Manis et Laceratis Dissertatio;" "Museum Regium;" and some Latin poems.

JACORI, JOHN GEORGE, a German poet, was born in 1740, at Dusseldorf; studied at Göttingen; was professor of philosophy and eloquence at Halle; and, subsequently, of the Belles Lettres at Friburg, which he retained during his life. The style of Jacori was formed on that of the lighter French poets, and possesses much ease and gaiety. Died, 1814.

JACOBS, LUCAS, commonly called LUCAS VAN LEYDEN, was born at Leyden, in 1494. He studied under his father, Hugh Jacobs, and next under Cornelius Engelbrecht. Many of his pictures in oil and distemper are to be found on the continent; but he is now best known by his engravings. Died, 1533.

JACOBS, JURIEU, was a native of Switzerland, born in 1610. He studied under Snyder, and is celebrated for the fidelity and spirit with which he painted the animals in his hunting pieces.

JACOBS, FREDERIC CHRISTIAN WILLIAM, a celebrated philological writer, was born at Gotha, in Saxony, in 1764. In 1788 he became a teacher in the gymnasium of his native city, where he published a number of excellent works, of which, independent of those of a critical or philological character, may be noticed his "School for Women," 7 vols., and "Tales," 5 vols.

JACOPONE, DA TODI, so called on account of his birth-place, was an Italian poet, whose real name was JACOPO DA BENEDETTI. On being left a widower he distributed his property among the poor, and entered into the order of Minorites as a servitor. He composed Sacred Canticles, Latin poems, and the famous "Stabat Mater," since so celebrated by the compositions of Haydn, Pergolesi, &c. Died, 1300.

JACQUELOT, ISAAC, a learned French protestant, was the son of a minister at Vauzy. He wrote Dissertations "On the Existence of God;" and "On the Messiah;" a "Treatise on the Inspiration of the Scriptures," &c. Born, 1647; died, 1708.

JACQUET, LOUIS, a French ecclesiastic; author of "A Parallel between the Greek and French Tragic Writers." He was both an admirer and an imitator of Rousseau. Died, 1793.

JACQUET DROZ, PIERRE, a celebrated mechanic, the inventor of curious automatic machines, was born in 1721, at Chaux de Fond, in Neuchâtel. He first found out a method of adapting to a common clock, chimes, and also wind-instruments; and among other wonderful automata was the writing figure, which, by means of internal machinery, formed regular and connected characters. Died, 1790.

JACQUET DROZ, HENRY LOUIS, son of the preceding, was born in 1732, and at an early age displayed his predilection for those mechanical operations in which his father had been so skilful. When he was about twenty-one, he took with him to Paris several specimens of his workmanship, among which were an automaton draughtsman, and a female figure which played on the harpsichord. He also constructed two artificial hands, for the convenience of a person who had been deprived of those members. The famous Vaucanson, on seeing these pieces of mechanism, was struck with astonishment, and exclaimed to the inventor, "Young man, you have commenced your inventions where I would have terminated mine." Died, 1791.

JACQUIN, NICHOLAS JOSEPH, a celebrated botanist, was born, in 1737, at Leyden, and studied medicine at Antwerp and Louvain. Being induced by his countryman, Van Swieten, to visit Vienna, the emperor Francis I. sent him to the West Indies to collect plants for the botanical gardens of Vienna and Schoenbrunn; and after an absence of six years, he returned with a superb collection. Two years after, appeared his catalogue of plants growing in the neighbourhood of Vienna; and in 1773, a magnificent work, entitled "Floræ Austriacæ," with 500 coloured engravings. He was appointed to various offices, created a baron in 1806, and died in 1817.

JAGO, RICHARD, one of the minor English poets in the last century, was born at Beaudesert, in Warwickshire, in 1716, and in 1771 presented to the rectory of Kimcote, in Leicestershire. His principal poem is entitled "Edge Hill." Died, 1781.

JAHN, JOHN, a learned orientalist, who after having been professor of biblical archaeology and theology in the university of Vienna, obtained the chair of oriental literature, which, in 1806, he was obliged to relinquish on account of his heterodoxy. He published a "Hebrew Bible," 4 vols.; "Biblical Archaeology," 3 vols.; "Enchiridion Hermeneuticæ generalis Tabularum veteris et novi Foderis," &c.; and his works on the philology of the sacred writings are said to be the most valuable extant. Died, 1817.

JAILLOT, ALEXIS HUBERT, geographer to the king of France, was at first a sculptor, but on marrying the daughter of a map-colourer, he turned his attention to geography. He engraved many of the maps of the Saisons, and died in 1780. His work, entitled, "Recherches critiques, historiques, et topographiques, sur la Ville de Paris," 5 vols. 8vo., is a curious book.

JAMBLICHUS, a philosopher, who flourished at the beginning of the fourth century, and was a native of Chalcis in Cæloxyria. He was the disciple of Anatolius and Porphyry, from whom he learnt the mysteries of the Plotinian system of philosophy, which he taught with great reputation. Among the philosophical works of Jamblichus now extant, are "The Life of Pythagoras;" "An Exhortation to the Study of Philosophy;" and a "Treatise on the Mysteries of the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Assyrians."

JAMES I. king of Scotland, of the house of Stuart, born in 1394, was the son of Robert III. by Annabella Drummond. In 1465 he was taken by the English on his passage to France, and kept in confinement eighteen years. In 1484 he obtained his liberty, and severely punished those who had governed his country in his absence; for which, and some strong measures which he took to curb a lawless nobility, he fell a victim to assassins, who gained admission to his apartment, and murdered him in his bed, in 1487.

JAMES V. of Scotland, succeeded, in 1513, at the death of his father, James IV., though only eighteen months old. At the age of seventeen he assumed the government, and assisted Francis I. of France against Charles V., for which that prince gave him his daughter Margaret in marriage. On her decease he married Mary of Lorraine, daughter of Claude, duke of Guise. James died in 1543, leaving his crown to Mary Stuart, his infant daughter, then only eight days old.

JAMES I. of England, and VI. of Scotland, was the son of Mary, queen of Scotland, by Henry Stuart, lord Darnley, and was born in 1566. In the following year, queen Mary being forced to resign the crown, he was solemnly crowned at Stirling, and all public acts ran in his name. When it became apparent that the life of his mother was in danger from queen Elizabeth, he wrote a menacing letter to her, appealed to other courts for assistance, and assembled his nobles, who promised to prevent or revenge that queen's injustice. The dreaded catastrophe, however, took place; and though he prepared for hostilities, the inadequacy of his resources prevented him from engaging in actual war. In 1603, on the death of Elizabeth, James succeeded to the crown of England, and proceeded to London. Although James had behaved with great lenity to the Roman Catholics in Scotland, those in England were so disappointed in their expectations of favour, that in the year after his accession, it was devised by some of their most desperate adherents, to destroy the king, the prince, and parliament, by means of the celebrated gunpowder plot. In 1606 he established episcopacy in Scotland, and made peace with Spain. In 1612 his son, prince Henry, by Anne of Denmark, died, and the same year his daughter was married to Frederic the elector-palatine. One of the greatest blots of his reign was the execution of Sir Walter Raleigh. The close of the life of James was marked by violent contests with his parliament, which prepared dreadful consequences for his successor; and his reign, although not unprosperous to his subjects, was inglorious in character. He received during his lifetime a deal of adulation for his literary abilities; but though he was the author of some few books, they display more pedantry than learning. He died in 1625, aged 58.

was born in 1633, and immediately declared duke of York. After the capture of Oxford by the parliamentary army, he escaped, and was conducted to his sister, the princess of Orange. At that time he was fifteen years of age. He soon after joined his mother at Paris, and, when he had reached his twentieth year, served in the French army under Turenne, and subsequently entered the Spanish army in Flanders, under Don John of Austria and the prince of Condé. At the Restoration he returned to England, and married secretly Anne Hyde, daughter of the earl of Clarendon, by whom he had two daughters, who afterwards became queens of England, viz. Mary and Anne. In the Dutch war, he signalled himself as commander of the English fleet, and showed great skill and bravery. On the death of Charles II., in 1685, the duke succeeded, under the title of James II., and, from the time of his ascending the throne, seems to have acted with a steady determination to render himself absolute, and to restore the Roman Catholic religion. After disgusting the great majority of his subjects, by attending mass with all the ensigns of his dignity, he proceeded to levy the customs and excise without the authority of parliament. He even sent an agent to Rome, to pave the way for a solemn re-admission of England into the bosom of that church, and received advice on the score of moderation from the pope himself. By virtue of his assumed dispensing power, he rendered tests of no avail, and filled his army and council with Roman Catholics; while by a declaration in favour of liberty of conscience, he also sought to gain the favour of the dissenters, who were, however, too conscious of his ultimate object to be deluded by this show of liberality. Thus he proceeded by every direct and indirect attack to overthrow the established church; but these innovations, in regard both to the religion and government, gradually united opposing interests, and a large body of the nobility and gentry concurred in an application to the prince of Orange, who had been secretly preparing a fleet and an army for the invasion of the country. James, who was long kept in ignorance of these transactions, when informed of them by his minister at the Hague, was struck with terror equal to his former infatuation; and, immediately repealing all his obnoxious acts, he practised every method to gain popularity. All confidence was, however, destroyed between the king and the people. William arrived with his fleet in Torbay, Nov. 4th, 1688; and being speedily joined by several men of rank, his ranks swelled, while the army of James began to desert by entire regiments. Incapable of any vigorous resolution, and finding his overtures of accommodation disregarded, James resolved to quit the country. He repaired to St. Germain, where he was received with great kindness and hospitality by Louis XIV. In the mean time, the throne of Great Britain was declared to be abdicated; and William and his consort Mary (the daughter of James) were unanimously called to fill it conjointly. Assisted by Louis XIV., James was enabled, in March, 1690, to make an attempt for the recovery of Ireland. The battle of Boyne, fought June, 1690, compelled him to return to France. All succeeding projects for his restoration proved equally abortive, and he spent the last years of his life in acts of ascetic devotion, dying at St. Germain, Sept. 16, 1701, aged 68. To sum up the character of James in a few words, we may truly say, that his prejudices were strong, his understanding narrow, and his temper cold and ungenerous.

JAMES, ROBERT, an English physician, was born at Kinverstone, in Staffordshire, in 1703. In 1743 he published his "Medical Dictionary," in 3 vols. folio, in which he was assisted by Dr. Johnson, who was his early friend. He also wrote the "Practice of Physic," 3 vols.; an excellent "Commentary on the Pentateuch," &c.; but he is best known by a valuable anatomical preparation, universally celebrated under the name of James's powder. Died, 1776.

JAMES THOMAS, a learned divine, was born at St. Neot's, in Huntingdonshire, and educated at Eton. In 1776 he became master of Rugby school, but resigned in 1793. For his great services he was preferred to a prebend in Worcester cathedral, and the living of Harrington in the same county. Died, 1804.

JAMES THOMAS, an English navigator, in the 17th century, who, in 1631 and 1632, attempted to discover a north-west passage. He wintered on Charlton Island, in Hudson's Bay, and next summer proceeded on his voyage, but was unable to penetrate farther than 66 degrees and a half north. He made some discoveries on the coast of Hudson's Bay; to the country on the western side of which he gave the name of New South Wales. On his return to England he published an account of his expedition, entitled, "The strange and dangerous Voyage of Captain Thomas James, for the Discovery of a North-west Passage to the South Sea."

JAMES, JOHN THOMAS, D.D., bishop of Calcutta, born in 1786; was educated at Rugby school, and the Charterhouse; and in 1804, entered at Christchurch college, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and for a time acted as a college tutor. In 1813 he left the university to make the tour of the north of Europe with Sir James Riddell, and on his return published an account of his travels, with illustrative sketches of scenery, engraved and coloured by himself. In 1816 he visited Italy, to study the works of art in that country; and the result of his observations appeared in an account of the Italian school of painting, which was followed by another on the French, Dutch, and German schools. Soon after his return from Italy he entered into holy orders; and in 1826 he published a tract, entitled "The Semi-Sceptic, or the Common Sense of Religion considered." At this time he only held the small vicarage of Flitton, in Bedfordshire; but on the death of bishop Heber he was raised to the see of Calcutta, received the degree of D.D., and embarked for India in 1827. The insalubrity of the climate, and the fatigues of his episcopal duties, however, proved too much for his constitution, and he died in 1829.

JAMES, WILLIAM, the author of a valuable national work, entitled "The Naval History of Great Britain, from the Declaration of War by France, in 1793, to the Accession of George IV." &c. Every accessible source of authentic information was made use of by Mr. James in writing this history; and his industry and research deserve the highest praise. Died, 1827.

JAMES, WILLIAM, a land agent and surveyor, was a native of Henley-in-Arden, Warwickshire. He was the original projector of the Manchester and Liverpool railway; and may with truth be regarded as the father of the railway system, having surveyed numerous lines at his own expense, and been an active promoter of these undertakings, at a time when they were considered to be mere speculative innovations. Died, aged 66, at Bodmin, Cornwall, March 11, 1837.

JAMES DE VITRI, a cardinal in the 12th century, was born at Vitry, near Paris. He attended the crusades, and was made bishop of Ptolemais; after which Gregory IX. raised him to the purple, and employed him as legate. He wrote an "Eastern and Western History;" and died in 1244.

JAMES DI VORAGINE, so called from the place of his birth in the state of Genoa, was born about 1230. After becoming a Dominican, and being provincial of his order, he was made archbishop of Genoa. He wrote "A Chronicle of Genoa;" the "Golden Legend," &c. Died, 1298.

JAMESON, GEORGE, an eminent painter, justly termed the Vandyke of Scotland, was born at Aberdeen, in 1586, and died in 1644.

JAMI, or DJAMY, AND ABRAHAM, a Persian poet, born in 1414, who is said to have eclipsed the greatest geniuses of his time. He lived in high favour at the court of sultan Abu Said. He was one of the most fruitful of the Persian authors, leaving more than forty works, among which are the tales of "Yuseph and Zuleika," and "Mejnoun and Leila." Died, 1494.

JAMIN DE BERMUY, JEAN BAPTISTE APOUSTE MARIE, a French cavalry officer of distinguished merit. He was born in 1772; became a sub-lieutenant of cavalry in 1790; and, after passing through subordinate stations, he was in 1795 aid-de-camp of Nansouty, and in 1802 commanded the eighth squadron of cuirassiers. During the peninsular war he served with great distinction at the head of the royal guards of light cavalry, gave proofs of his skill and valour on many great occasions, and was nominated general of brigade on his return to France in 1813. He fell at the battle of Waterloo.

JANEWAY, JAMES, a non-conformist divine, was born in Hertfordshire, and educated at Christchurch college, Oxford. Being expelled after the Restoration, he opened a meeting-house at Rotherhithe, when the act of indulgence was passed, and died there in 1674. Among his works are, "Heaven upon Earth;" "A Token for Children," which has gone through numerous editions; "The Saint's Encouragement to Diligence;" and "A Legacy to my Friends."

JANICON, FRANCIS MICHAEL, a French protestant writer, was born at Paris, in 1674, and died at the Hague in 1780. His articles in the Dutch gazettes discovered him to possess great political knowledge. He was also the author of "The present State of the Republic of the United Provinces and their Dependencies," 2 vols.

JARCHI, SOLOMON BEN ISAAC, a learned rabbi, born at Troyes, in 1104; travelled over a considerable portion of Europe and Asia; and, on his return to France, wrote Annotations on various parts of the Bible, and also on the Talmud, which were thought so highly of, that he was universally called "the prince of commentators." Died, 1180.

JANSEN, or JANSENIUS, CORNELIUS, D. D., bishop of Ypres, and professor of divinity in the universities of Louvain and Douay, was one of the most learned divines of the 17th century, and founder of the sect of Jansenists. He was born in 1585, at Akay, near Leerdam, in Holland; and studied at Louvain. Being sent into Spain to transact some business of consequence relating to the university, the Catholic king, viewing with a jealous eye the intriguing policy of France, engaged with him to write a book against the French, for having formed an alliance with Protestant states; and rewarded him for it with the see of Ypres, in 1635. He had, among other writings before this, maintained a controversy against the Protestants upon the subject of grace and predestination; but his "Augustinus," respecting which a furious and almost interminable contest arose, was the principal labour of his life. Died, 1638.

JANSENIUS, CORNELIUS, bishop of Ghent, was born at Halst, in Flanders, in 1510. He distinguished himself at the council of Trent, by his learning and modesty. He wrote a "Harmony of the Gospels," and other works; and died at Ghent, in 1576.

JANSSENS, ABRAHAM, an historical painter, was born at Antwerp, in 1569. He was contemporary with Rubens, and, in many of the finest parts of the art, was accounted not inferior to him.

JANSSENS, CORNELIUS, called also JOHNSON, an eminent portrait-painter, was born at Amsterdam. He resided in England several years, and was engaged in the service of king James I. His paintings are easily distinguished by their smooth, clear, and delicate tints, and by a strong character of truth and nature. His fame began to be obscured on the arrival of Vandyke in England; and, the civil war breaking out some time after, he returned to his own country, where his paintings were in the highest esteem. Died, 1634.

JANSSENS, VICTOR HONORIUS, a celebrated historical painter, was born at Brussels, in 1664. He associated with Tempesta, the celebrated landscape painter, for several years, and painted the figures in the works of that great master as long as they resided together. For small historical pictures, he was preferable to all the painters of his time.

JARDINS, MARY CATHERINE DUB, ES

ingenious but profligate Frenchwoman, born at Alençon, in Normandy, in 1640. Being obliged to quit her native place, in consequence of an intrigue, she went to Paris, where for a while she trusted to her literary talents for support, and wrote many novels and dramas; her private character, at the same time, continuing most exceptionable. Died, 1683.

JARDYN, KAREL DU, a celebrated painter of landscapes and animals, was born at Amsterdam, in 1640. He studied in Italy, where he acquired great reputation, and died at Venice in 1678.

JARDINE, GEORGE, professor of logic in the university of Glasgow, was born in 1743. Having pursued his studies with great success, he was, in 1774, appointed to the professorial chair; and such were the improvements he introduced into the mode of public teaching, that his class was rendered a model of academical instruction. Died, 1827.

JARRY, LAURENCE JUILLEARD DU, eminent both for his pulpit oratory and his poetry, was born in 1658, and died in 1730. He gained the poetical prize of the French academy in 1679, and again in 1714, on which last occasion he had Voltaire for a competitor. His works consist of theological treatises, sermons, and poems.

JARNOWICK, or GIORNOVICH, GIOVANNA MANZ, a celebrated violinist, was born at Palermo, in 1748, and was the most accomplished pupil of Lulli. For several years he resided in Paris, and was considered at the head of his profession; he afterwards came to England, where he was very popular; but on being invited to settle at Petersburg, he went thither, where he died in 1804. He was as eccentric and irritable as he was clever, and numerous singular anecdotes are recorded of him.

JARS, FRANCIS DE ROCHECHOUART, chevalier de, a French officer, whose boldness and fortitude deserve to be recorded, was a knight of Malta, and commander of Lagry le Sec. He was arrested and confined in the Bastille, at the time of the prosecution of Chateaufort, keeper of the seals, in 1633, for the object of procuring evidence from him relative to the designs of Chateaufort and others; and after eleven months' close confinement, during which he was examined twenty-four times, without incriminating his friends, he was sent to Troyes, and there tried and condemned. He mounted the scaffold, but a reprieve was announced while his head lay on the block; upon which he was conveyed back to prison, where he continued for some time in a state of insensibility.

JARVIS, JOHN, an artist, distinguished by his paintings on glass, was born in Dublin, in 1740; and after practicing his art in that city, removed to London, where he obtained great reputation. His most celebrated performance is the west window of New College, Oxford, from the design of Sir Joshua Reynolds. Died, 1804.

JAUCOURT, the chevalier Louis DE, member of the royal society of London, and of the academies of Berlin and Stockholm, was born in 1704. He devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits; and died at Compeigne in 1780. He furnished the Encyclopédie Française with many valuable articles, and conducted the "Bibliothèque Raisonnée." He also assisted in publishing the "Museum Sebeanum," 4 vols. folio, and composed a "Lexicon Medicum Universale," the MS. of which, in 6 vols. fol. was lost on board of a ship which foundered on her passage to Amsterdam.

JAY, GUI MICHEL LE, an advocate in the parliament of Paris, eminent as a biblical critic, and who rendered himself remarkable by printing, at his own expense, a Polyglott Bible. He refused to suffer it to appear under the name of cardinal Richelieu, though he had neglected his profession, and impoverished himself by the undertaking. He afterwards became an ecclesiastic, and obtained the deanery of Vezelay, and the rank of a counsellor of state. Died, 1678.

JAY, JOHN, an eminent American jurist and statesman, was born at New York, in 1745. After studying at Columbia (then King's) college, he was admitted to the bar, and in 1774 was chosen a delegate to the first American congress, at Philadelphia. In 1778 he was chosen president of congress; in 1777, he was a member of the convention which framed the constitution of New York; and in the following year he was appointed chief-justice of that state. He was next sent as minister plenipotentiary to Spain; and in 1783 he was appointed one of the commissioners to negotiate a peace with Great Britain. The definitive treaty having been signed in September, 1783, he returned to the United States, and in 1784 he was sent as envoy extraordinary to Great Britain, and concluded the treaty which has been called after his name. In 1795 he was elected governor of his native state; this post he continued to occupy till 1801; when he declined a re-election, as well as a re-appointment to the office of chief-justice of the United States; and passed the remainder of his days in retirement. Died, 1829.

JAUREGUIY AGUILAR, JOHN, a Spanish poet of considerable genius, and who also excelled in painting. He was born at Toledo, in 1466, and died in 1480.

JEAN BON ST. ANDRE, baron, a French revolutionary statesman, born at Montauban, in 1749. He commenced life in a mercantile character; then became a minister of the reformed church; and in 1793 was nominated deputy to the National Convention from the department of Lot. He joined the party of the Mountain, and voted for the death of the king; was a commissary on board the fleet, and was wounded in the action with lord Howe, on the 1st of June, 1794; in the following year he was sent by the Directory as consul to Algiers; and on his return was made prefect of Mayence. Died, 1815.

JEURAT, SEBASTIAN, a French mathematician, was born at Paris in 1704, and died in 1803. He founded the observatory at the military school, and wrote a "Treatise on Perspective," "New Tables of Jupiter," &c.

JEBB, JOHN, a divine and physician, was the son of Dr. John Jebb, dean of Cashel, and born in London, in 1736. He studied at Trinity college, Dublin, and Peter-house, Cambridge; obtained church preferment, which, however, he resigned in consequence of objecting to some of its leading doctrines; and then commenced practice as a physician, in which he was very successful. He was a violent partisan in whatever he engaged; and, though conscientious in his religious opinions, their peculiar complexion, and the freedom with which he indulged in the political squabbles of the day, obstructed his professional progress. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, and a contributor to the Philosophical Transactions; and his works, theological, political, and medical, form 3 vols. Died, 1786.

JEFFB, Dr. SAMUEL, an eminent physician and classical scholar, was a native of Nottingham. He studied at Cambridge; and, adopting the principles of the nonjurors, became librarian to the famous Jeremy Collier. While at the university he published the "Dialogue of Justin Martyr with Trypho the Jew," in Greek and Latin. He afterwards married the daughter of an apothecary, procured the degree of M.D., practised as a physician at Stratford, in Essex, and retired to Derbyshire, where he died in 1772. Dr. S. Jeffb was the conductor of a classical journal, entitled "Bibliotheca Literaria," and the editor of Roger Bacon's "Opus Majus."

JEFFERSON, THOMAS, third president of the United States, was born in 1743, at Shadwell, in Virginia, and was brought up to the bar. In 1769 he was elected a member of the provincial legislature, and in 1773 he entered congress, and took a conspicuous and very decided part in opposition to the measures which England had adopted towards her American colonies; and it was he who drew up the famous declaration of Independence. In 1776 he retired from his seat in congress, and was next chosen governor of Virginia, which post he held two years. On the return of Dr. Franklin to America, in 1785, Mr. Jefferson was named his successor at Paris, from which he proceeded, as envoy, to London, in 1786. At the usual presentation, however, to the king and queen, both Mr. Adams and himself were received in the most ungracious manner, and, after a few vague and ineffectual conferences, he returned to Paris. Here he remained, with the exception of a visit to Holland, to Piedmont, and the south of France, until the autumn of 1789, zealously pursuing whatever was beneficial to his country. He subsequently filled the office of secretary of state under Washington, until 1793, when he resigned, and lived in retirement for four years. He was then elected vice-president, and in 1801 chosen president. At the expiration of eight years he again retired to private life; and on the 4th of July, 1826 (the fiftieth anniversary of American Independence) he died. He was the acknowledged head of the republican party, and an acute politician; eloquent and persuasive in conversation, and possessing the faculty of acquiring an ascendancy in his political connexions.

JEFFREYS, lord GEORGE, baron Wem, commonly known by the name of Judge Jeffreys, was born at Acton, in Denbighshire, towards the beginning of the 17th century, and educated at Shrewsbury school. He studied at Westminster and the Inner Temple, and rose through the gradations of recorder of London, a Welsh judge, and chief justice of Chester, till at length, in 1683, he attained the dignity of chief justice of the King's Bench. On the accession of James II., he was one of the advisers and promoters of all the oppressive and arbitrary measures of his reign; and, for his sanguinary and inhuman proceedings against the adherents of Monmouth, was rewarded with the post of lord high chancellor in 1685. His conduct on the bench was, in the highest degree, discreditable at all times, and he indulged in scurrility and abuse of the most degrading description. On the arrival of the prince of Orange, he disguised himself as a seaman, in order to get on board a ship unknown, but was detected in a low public house, at Wapping, by an attorney whom he had insulted in open court. The latter making him known, he was seized by the populace, carried before the council, and committed to the Tower, where he died, April 18, 1689.

JEFFREYS, GEORGE, an English poet, was born at Weldon, Northamptonshire, in 1678. He was a nephew of the eighth lord Chandos, and bred to the bar. He wrote "Miscellanies, in prose and verse;" and two tragedies, "Edwin," and "Merope." Died, 1755.

JEFFRIES, JOHN, M.D. an American physician, was born at Boston, in 1744. Having studied medicine at the university of Cambridge, he went to London, and on his return to Boston practised with great success, until the evacuation of that city by the British garrison. He then accompanied general Howe to Halifax, and was made surgeon-general to the forces in 1776. He subsequently resigned his army appointments, declining even the offer of the lucrative post of surgeon-general to the forces in India, and in 1780 settled in London. He there occupied himself much in scientific research; and in order to ascertain the correctness of certain preconceived hypotheses relative to atmospheric temperature, he undertook two aerial voyages; the second of which was made Jan. 7, 1765, from the cliffs of Dover, across the British Channel, into the forest of Guinnes, in France, and was the only successful attempt that had then been made to cross the sea in a balloon. In 1789 he again returned to Boston, and continued to practise there, with success, till his death, which took place in 1819, aged 76.

JEHAN GHIR, or JEHAN GUIRE, ABUL MUZAFFER NOUREDDIN MOHAMMED, emperor of Hindostan, and son of the famous Akbar, whom he succeeded on the throne of Delhi, in 1605. Unlike the generality of Eastern despots, he was generous, affable, and easy of access to his subjects, and a patron of literature and arts. He wrote memoirs of the first seventeen years of his reign, and added to the historical commentaries of Sultan Baber. Nourjehan his wife, celebrated equally for her beauty and wit, has been the fertile theme of oriental poems and romances.

statesman in the reigns of Anne and George I., was the son of a clergyman in Nottinghamshire. He was a member of parliament, and one of the managers of the trial of Sacheverell; was knighted by George I., who raised him to the office of master of the rolls; and died, aged 74, in 1736.

JEKYLL, JOSEPH, an eminent barrister, was the son of a captain in the navy, and a descendant of the preceding. He was called to the bar in 1778; was returned as M.P. for Calne, in 1787, and retained his seat for several successive parliaments; was appointed solicitor-general to the prince of Wales in 1805; and, at the time of his death, was senior king's counsel, senior bench of the Inner Temple, F.R.S. and F.S.A. He enjoyed a fair portion of forensic fame; but his reputation was chiefly formed by his ready talent in epigram and repartee; his bon-mots often convulsing the bar with laughter, and his ever-sparking wit delighting all who came within his convivial sphere. He died, aged 55, March 8, 1837.

JEMSHID, a Persian sovereign, who reigned about 800 B.C. and is said to have founded the famous city of Isakhhar, called by the Greeks Persepolis. He is also celebrated for instructing his subjects in astronomy, and the mysteries of Sabæism, or the worship of the heavenly bodies. Being unfortunate in war, he was dethroned by Zohak, an Arabian king, and spent the latter part of his life in obscurity.

JENKINS, DAVID, a loyal and intrepid judge, was born at Henol, in Glamorganshire, in 1586. In 1645, when "civil war ran high," he was taken prisoner at Hereford, and sent to the Tower; from whence he was removed to Newgate, impeached of treason, and brought to the bar of the House of Commons, where he refused to kneel, and called the place "a den of thieves." The assembly, in a fit of rage, were about to sentence him to be hanged; upon which he said that he would suffer "with Magna Charta under one arm, and the Bible under the other." A facetious speech from Henry Marten allayed this tempest as regarded his life; but he was fined 1000*l.* for contempt, and recommitted to Newgate, where he remained till 1656. Died, 1687.

JENKINS, SIR LEOLINE, a civilian and statesman, born at Llantrisant, in Glamorganshire, in 1623. He was educated at Jesus' college, Oxford; and on the breaking out of the civil war, took up arms on the side of royalty. He afterwards became tutor to several young gentlemen, and during the protectorate, quitted the kingdom with them; but at the Restoration he returned to college, was created LL.D., and elected principal. He then removed to Doctor's Commons, was admitted an advocate, and in 1665 appointed judge of the court of admiralty. In 1672 he was sent as ambassador to Holland to negotiate a treaty of peace, though without success; but afterwards, in conjunction with Sir William Temple, whom he succeeded as ambassador at the Hague, he effected the treaty of Nimeguen. On his return to England he was sworn a privy councillor, and made secretary of state; which office he resigned in 1684; and died in 1685. His letters and papers were published in 2 vols. folio, 1734.

JENNENS, CHARLES, a literary gentleman of fortune at Gopel, in Leicestershire, who on account of the splendour of his house and equipage, was jocosely styled "Solyman the Magnificent." He selected the words for Handel's oratorios, and particularly those of the Messiah; he also commenced an edition of Shakespeare's plays, on a new plan, but it proved a total failure. Died, 1773.

JENNER, EDWARD, an English physician, celebrated for having nearly eradicated a pestilential disorder from the human race by introducing vaccine inoculation, was born at Berkeley, Gloucestershire, in 1749, and subsequently settled there as a medical practitioner. About the year 1776 his attention was turned to the cow-pox, by the circumstance of his ascertaining that those persons who had been affected with this disease, were thereby rendered free from variolous infection. From that time till 1786 he steadily pursued his investigation of this discovery; and having at length established its general efficacy, amidst all the opposition naturally to be expected in such a case, the practice of vaccination was introduced into the London hospitals, the army and navy, &c. and, finally, extended to every part of the globe. Honours and rewards were now conferred on Dr. Jenner as a public benefactor: a parliamentary grant of 20,000*l.* was voted him; learned societies at home and abroad enrolled him as a member; and when the allied potentates visited England in 1814, the emperor of Russia sought an interview with him, and offered to bestow on him a Russian order of nobility. Dr. Jenner's writings consist merely of "Observations on the Variolæ Vaccinæ," and a paper in the Philosophical Transactions "On the Natural History of the Cuckoo." Died, 1823.

JENNINGS, DAVID, a learned dissenting minister, was born at Kibworth, Leicestershire, in 1691. He was the author of "An Appeal to Reason and Common-sense for the Truth of the Holy Scriptures;" "An Introduction to the Use of the Globes and Orrery;" "Introduction to the Knowledge of Medals;" "Jewish Antiquities," 2 vols. 8vo., &c. Died, 1763.

JENNINGS, HENRY CONSTANTINE, an antiquary and virtuoso, of most eccentric habits and chequered fortune, was born in 1731, and was the only son of a gentleman of considerable property at Ship-lake, in Oxfordshire. He was educated at Westminster school, and at seventeen became an ensign in the foot guards; but resigned his commission, and travelled on the continent, where he collected, while in Italy, a number of statues and other antiques, with which he decorated his seat at Ship-lake. He now led the life of a man of fashion and fortune, indulging in the most expensive follies; the consequence of which was that he soon became an inmate of the King's Bench. He was at length freed from his pecuniary embarrassments, and settled on an estate he had in Essex, where he gave himself up with enthusiasm to the collection of scarce books, pictures, and caricatures. But the current of good fortune did not long run smooth. Having borrowed a sum of money from a person who was indebted to the crown, his museum was hastily sold for a small sum, to satisfy the claim of government under an extent in aid. For many years he was a prisoner in Chelmsford jail; but on regaining his freedom, he resumed his former habits, and settled at Chelsea; where, to use the words of a gentleman who visited him in 1803, and who graphically described his singular appearance, he sat "enthroned in all the majesty of virtue, amidst his books, his pictures, and his shells." In consequence of renewed embarrassments, these precious relics were all sold in 1816, and he was once more a prisoner in the rules of the Bench, where he died in 1819.

JENYNS, SOAMS, a sprightly and entertaining writer, was the only son of Sir Roger Jenyns, born in London, in 1704. Having entered into public life as representative of the county of Cambridge, he began his career by supporting Sir Robert Walpole, and ever after remained a faithful adherent to the minister for the time being. This attachment to ministers was rewarded by his being made a commissioner of the board of trade, an office he held for five-and-twenty years. As a country gentleman and magistrate Mr. Jenyns appeared to much greater advantage than as a politician; but it is as an author, a wit, and a shrewd observer of manners, that he is principally to be regarded. His chief works are "Poems," 2 vols.; "Free Enquiry into the Origin of Evil;" "A View of the Internal Evidence of the Christian Religion;" "Political Tracts;" and some others; all collected into four vols. 12mo. with his life prefixed. Died, 1787.

JEPHSON, RICHARD, a dramatic writer, was a native of Ireland, and born in 1736. He was a captain in the army, and master of the horse to the lord-lieutenant, during twelve administrations. As a dramatist his claims are chiefly founded on his tragedies of "Braganza," and the "Count of Narbonne." He also wrote the "Law of Lombardy," "Julia," and "The Conspiracy," tragedies; and the farce of "Two Strings to your Bow," "Love and War," &c. He was also author of "The Confessions of James Baptiste Conteau, Citizen of France," 3 vols. a severe satire on the "French Revolution," "Roman Portraits," a poem in heroic verse, with historical remarks and illustrations. Died, 1803.

JEREMIAH, patriarch of Constantinople, in 1773. He introduced the reformed calendar of Gregory XIII., for which, and his correspondence with the pope, he was banished; but recovered his seat after being two years in exile.

JERNINGHAM, EDWARD, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was descended from an ancient Roman catholic family, and born in Norfolk, in 1727. He was educated at Douay and Paris; but on his return to England, he joined in communion with the established church. He was the author of the tragedies of "Margaret of Anjou," and "The Siege of Berwick," with other poems and plays, consisting of 4 vols; he also wrote "An Essay on the mild Tenour of Christianity;" "The Dignity of Human Nature, an Essay;" "The Alexandrian School," &c. Died, 1812.

JEROME, or HIERONYMUS, ST., one of the fathers of the church, was born in 332, at Stridon, on the frontiers of Dacia, and studied at Rome, under Donatus the grammarian. He was ordained a presbyter at Antioch, in 378; and soon after went to Constantinople, where he lived with Gregory Nazianzen. In 382 he visited Rome, and was made secretary to pope Damasus; but three years afterwards he returned into the east, accompanied by several monks and female devotees, who wished to lead an ascetic life in the Holy Land; and died in 422, superintendent of a monastery at Bethlehem. His biblical labours are highly valuable, and for the age in which he lived, St. Jerome must be accounted a learned man; but as a theological disputant he was violent and acrimonious in a high degree.

JEROME OF PRAQUE, so called from being a native of the capital of Bohemia, studied in the universities of Oxford, Paris, Prague, &c.; was a disciple of Wickliffe, and boldly followed the great reformer, Huss, in propagating his doctrines. He attacked the worship of images and relics with ardour, trampled them under foot, and caused the monks, who opposed him, to be arrested. He publicly burned, in 1411, the bull of the crusade against Ladislaus of Naples, and the papal indulgences. When Huss was imprisoned at Constance, he hastened to his defence, but on his attempting to return to Prague, the duke of Saxe-bach caused him to be seized, and carried in chains to Constance. He here received, in prison, information of the terrible fate of his friend, and was terrified into a momentary recantation of his principles; but he resumed his courage, and, retracting his recantation, avowed that none of his sins tormented him more than his apostasy; while he vindicated the principles of Huss and Wickliffe, with a boldness, energy, and eloquence, that extorted the admiration of his adversaries. He was, however, condemned to be burnt; which sentence he endured with heroic fortitude, May 30, 1416.

JERUSALEM, JOHN FREDERIC WILLIAM, a Lutheran divine, was born at Osnaburg, in 1709; studied at Leipzig and Leyden; visited England in the pursuit of farther knowledge; and was appointed tutor by the duke of Brunswick Wolfenbittel, to his son, who was afterwards killed at the battle of Jena. His reputation as a preacher was very great, and his educational improvements gave rise to the famous Collegium Carolinum, at Brunswick. His principal work is entitled "Considerations on the most important Truths of Religion," but he wrote several others, and was esteemed throughout Germany, not only as a theologian, but for the purity and beneficence of his character. Died, 1786.

JERVAS, CHARLES, a portrait painter, was born in Ireland, and studied under Sir Godfrey Kneller. By the generosity of a friend he was enabled to visit France and Italy, and at his return became a fashionable artist, was eulogized by Pope, to whom he gave instructions in the art. He also published a translation of Don Quixote; to which Dr. Warburton added an appendix on the Origin of Romances and of Chivalry. Died, 1730.

JERVIS, JOHN, earl of St. Vincent, a gallant English admiral, was the son of Swynfen Jervis, Esq., and of Green-wich hospital, was born in 1734, and at the early age of ten, entered the navy under admiral Hawke. In 1755 he served as lieutenant under Sir C. Saunders, in the expedition against Quebec. In 1760, he was sent to the Mediterranean in the Alarm frigate, and on his return in 1774 was promoted to the Foudroyant, of eighty-four guns. In this ship he fought under admiral Keppel, in the memorable engagement of the 27th of July, 1778, and was the next to the Victory. In 1782, he was with admiral Barrington's squadron, and in a close engagement took the Pegasus of seventy-four guns, for which he was highly praised in the public despatches, and rewarded with the order of the Bath. At the end of the same year, he was with lord Howe at the relief of Gibraltar. In 1794, having accepted the command of a squadron equipped for the West Indies, he took the islands of Guadaloupe, Martinique, and St. Lucie. He was next employed on the Mediterranean station; and on the 14th of February, 1797, he, with fifteen sail of the line, defeated a Spanish force off Cape St. Vincent, consisting of twenty-seven ships, the smallest of which carried seventy-four, and seven others from 113 to 130 guns each. For this service he was elevated to the English peerage, by the titles of baron Jervis and earl St. Vincent, from the scene of his glory. To this was added a pension of 3000*l.* a-year, and the usual votes of thanks. In 1779 he was created admiral; in 1801 he succeeded earl Spencer as first lord of the admiralty, which post he resigned in 1804; in 1814 he was appointed general of marines, and in 1821, admiral of the fleet. Lord St. Vincent possessed a vigorous mind, and was as much distinguished for his stern and unrelaxing attention to naval discipline, as he was eminent for naval skill and gallantry. The whole of his long life was passed in the active duties of the profession; and he died in 1823, aged 88. A statue to his memory was erected in St. Paul's cathedral, by a vote in the House of Commons.

JESSEY, HENRY, a learned non-conformist divine, distinguished for his oriental and biblical knowledge, was born at West Rowton, in Yorkshire. He studied at St. John's college, Cambridge; held the living of St. George's, Southwark, during Cromwell's protectorate, which he lost at the Restoration; and after having been imprisoned on account of his non-conformity, died in 1663. He wrote several theological works, and had made considerable progress in a new translation of the Bible.

JESUA, LEVITA, a Spanish rabbi in the 15th century, who wrote a curious book called "Halichot Olam, or the Ways of Eternity," an edition of which in Hebrew and Latin appeared at Hanover, in 1714.

JEUFFROY, R. V., an eminent gem and medal engraver, was born at Rouen, in 1749. His taste and genius for the art were such, that while he was at Rome, as an assistant to Pickler, his employer was in the habit of selling the productions of the young artist as antiques. On his return to Paris, he was made director of the school of gem engraving, at the institution of the deaf and dumb. Died, 1826.

JEUNE, JOHN L., a French priest of the oratory, who quitted a rich canonry to lead a life of devotion. His sermons were printed in ten vols. 8vo., and were much studied by Massillon. Born, 1593; died, 1672.

JEWELL, JOHN, a learned priest of the church of England, who was bishop of Salisbury in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and a great polemical writer against popery. He was born in 1522 at the village of Buden, near Ilfracombe, Devonshire; studied at Oxford; and in 1546, openly professed the tenets of the reformers. Having obtained the living of Sunningwell, Berks, he distinguished himself by his zeal and assiduity as a parish priest; but at the accession of queen Mary, finding they were about to prosecute him as a heretic, he made his escape to the continent, and became vicar-master of a college at Strasburg. On the death of Mary he returned to England; was received with great favour by her successor; and in 1560 he was raised to the bishopric of Salisbury. His principal work is entitled "An Apology for the Church of England," originally written in elegant Latin, but translated into every European language; and which, it is said, had more effect in promoting the Reformation, than any other book ever published. He died in 1571.

JEZZAR, surnamed the Butcher, but whose real name was AHMED, was the famous pacha of Seide and Acre, who defended the latter place against Buonaparte. In his youth he was purchased by the celebrated Ali Bey, at that time master of Egypt; and from being a common mamluke, Ahmed, in a few years, became governor of Grand Cairo. Through a variety of conflicting events, not necessary to detail here, Jezzar was appointed pacha of Acre and Syria, on the death of Dhabir; and for his zeal in opposing the redoubtable sheik, who had so long defied the power of the grand seignor, he was made a pacha of three tails, with the title of vizier. This advancement gave him an opportunity of extending the boundaries of his government, and in spite of the efforts of the Turkish court to displace him, he retained his authority to the last. After Buonaparte had vanquished the mamlukes he made friendly overtures to Jezzar, but they were indignantly rejected by him, and with the aid of the English squadron, under Sir Sidney Smith, he valiantly defended the city of St. Jean d'Acre against the incessant attempts of the French to take possession of it; so that, after a siege of sixty-one days, the "conqueror of Egypt" was obliged to withdraw his forces, and leave Jezzar in undisputed possession of its brave defenders. He died, at an advanced age, in 1804, possessed of immense treasures; and, it is said, he delighted in the sangui-

JOACHIM, an Italian monk of the 12th century, was abbot of the Cistercians at Corazzo, and afterwards of Flora in Calabria. He became remarkable for his pretended prophecies in 1130; and his errors in regard to the Trinity, contained in a work, entitled "The Everlasting Gospel." Died, 1202.

JOAN of ARC, called also the Maid of Orleans, was one of the most celebrated heroines in history. She was born of low parentage, at Domremi, a village on the borders of Lorraine, in 1412; and became a servant at an inn, where she attended the horses, drove the cattle to pasture, and was employed in other services similar to what a man-servant would perform in England. At this time the affairs of France were in a deplorable state, and the city of Orleans was so closely besieged by the duke of Bedford, that its fall appeared inevitable. In this exigency Joan pretended to have received a divine commission to expel the invaders. On being introduced to the king, Charles VII., she offered to raise the siege of Orleans, and conduct his majesty to Rheims to be crowned and anointed; at the same time demanding for herself a particular sword, which was in the church of St. Catharine. After a little hesitation her request was complied with; and while the French soldiers were elated by having an inspired leader, the English were as much dismayed. From this period, she appears the finest character in the history of the middle ages of France. In a male dress, armed cap à pie, she bore the sword and the sacred banner, as the signal of victory, at the head of the army. Still no feminine cruelty ever stained her conduct. She was wounded several times herself, but never killed any one, or shed any blood with her own hand. The general belief of her elevated mission, of which she herself was piously persuaded, produced the most extraordinary effects. Resolute, chivalrous, pious and brave, looking to one single aim, she was skilfully employed by the generals to animate the army, while they did not implicitly follow her counsels. The first enterprise was successful. With 10,000 men, under the command of St. Severre, Dunois, and La Hire, she marched from Blois, and, on April the 29th, 1429, entered Orleans with supplies. By bold sallies to which she animated the besieged, the English were forced from their intrenchments, and Suffolk abandoned the siege. Joan entered Orleans in triumph, and the coronation at Rheims followed; after which Charles caused a medal to be struck in honour of the heroine, and ennobled her family. The town of Domremi also, where she was born, was exempted from all imposts for ever. After the coronation, Joan declared that her mission was at an end, and that she should now retire to private life; but the French commandant Dunois, who thought she might still prove serviceable, induced her to throw herself into Compiègne, then besieged by the duke of Burgundy, and the earls of Arundel and Suffolk. Here, after performing prodiges of valour, she was taken prisoner in a sally; and, after four months' imprisonment, was cruelly condemned by the English to be burnt alive, on the charge of sorcery. She resolutely defended herself from the absurd accusation, and was carried to the stake, where with dauntless courage she met her disastrous fate, in the 29th year of her age, May 30, 1431.

JOELLE, ETIENNE, an early French poet and dramatist, born at Paris, in 1532. He was the author of the first regular tragedy acted on the French stage; and he is described as having possessed an extraordinary facility and fluency of composition. Though enjoying the favour of Charles IX. and of Henry II. yet he died in great poverty and distress, in 1573.

JOFFRID, abbot of Croyland, in the 12th century. In the continuation of Ingulph's account of Croyland, by Peter de Blois, he says, that abbot Joffrid sent a deputation of three learned French or Norman monks, named Odo, Terrick, and William, to his manor of Cottenham, near Cambridge, to teach the people in that neighbourhood, grammar, logic, and rhetoric; and that these three monks went every day from Cottenham to Cambridge, where they hired a barn, in which they taught those sciences to a great number of scholars, who resorted to them from all the country round. If De Blois can be relied on, Joffrid may therefore be considered as the original founder of the university of Cambridge.

JOHN, king of England, was the youngest son of Henry II. by Eleanor of Guenene, and born in 1166. Ireland being intended for him, he was sent over in 1185, to complete its conquest, but such was his imprudence that it was found necessary to recall him; and on the death of his father he was left without any provision, which procured for him the name of Sans Terre, or Lackland. His brother Richard, on coming to the throne, conferred on him the earldom of Mortaigne, in Normandy, and various large possessions in England, and married him to the rich heiress of the duke of Gloucester. Notwithstanding this kindness, he had the ingratitude to form intrigues against him, in conjunction with the king of France, during his absence in Palestine; but Richard magnanimously pardoned him, and at his death left him his kingdom, in preference to Arthur of Brittany, the son of his elder brother, Geoffry. Some of the French provinces, however, revolted in favour of Arthur; but John ultimately recovered them, and his nephew was captured, and confined in the castle of Falaise, whence he was subsequently removed to Rouen, and never heard of more. Being suspected of the murder of Arthur, the states of Brittany summoned him to answer the charge, before his liege lord, king Philip; and upon his refusal to appear, the latter assumed the execution of the sentence of forfeiture against him; and thus, after its alienation from the French crown for three centuries, the whole of Normandy was recovered. A quarrel with the haughty and able pope Innocent III., who had nominated Stephen Langton to the see of Canterbury, added grievously to the king's discomfort, whom the pope excommunicated, and whose subjects he formally absolved from their allegiance. At length John was induced not only to receive Langton as archbishop of Canterbury, but abjectly to resign his kingdom of England and Ireland to the holy see, in order to receive them again as its vassal. John had by this time rendered himself the object of such universal contempt and hatred, that his nobles determined, if possible, to control his power, and establish their privileges; and though the pope declared his disapprobation of their conduct, the barons assembled in arms at Oxford, where the court then was, and immediately proceeded to warlike operations. They were received without opposition in London, which so intimidated the king, that he consented to whatever terms they chose to dictate. Thus was obtained that basis of English constitutional freedom, known as Magna Charta, which not only protected the nobles against the crown, but secured important privileges to every class of freemen. But while the monarch appeared to be all-complying and passive, he was secretly meditating to disannul the charter. The pope pronounced a sentence of excommunication on all who should attempt to enforce it; and John, having collected an army of mercenaries, carried war and devastation throughout the kingdom. The barons, taken by surprise, now sent a deputation to Philip of France, offering the crown of England to the dauphin Louis; who speedily, with 600 vessels, landed at Sandwich, and proceeded to London, where he was received as lawful sovereign. John was immediately deserted by all his foreign troops, and most of his English adherents; but the report of a scheme of Louis for the extermination of the English nobility, arrested his progress, and induced many to return to their allegiance. While the king's affairs were beginning to assume a better aspect, he was taken ill, and died at Newark, in October, 1216, in the 49th year of his age, and the 17th of his reign.

JOHN OF GAUNT, duke of Lancaster, a renowned general, was born in 1340. He served with great distinction in France with his brother the Black Prince, and on his death had the management of affairs during the life of his father. He died in 1399. John of Gaunt was a man of great valour, prudence, and generosity. His son afterwards became king, by the title of Henry IV.

JOHN OF SALISBURY, bishop of Chartres in France, was born at Salisbury, in Wiltshire, in the beginning of the 12th century. He studied under the most eminent professors on the continent, and acquired considerable fame for his proficiency in rhetoric and general literature. After his return to England, he became the intimate friend and companion of Thomas à Becket, whom he had attended in his exile, and he is said to have been present when he was murdered in Canterbury cathedral. He was one of the first restorers of the Greek and Latin languages in Europe, and an elegant Latin poet.

JOHNES, THOMAS, a gentleman who distinguished himself by his attachment to literary pursuits, was born in 1748, at Ludlow, in Shropshire; studied at Eton, and Jesus college, Oxford; and sat in parliament for Cardigan, and subsequently for Radnorshire. He possessed an estate at Hafod, in Cardiganshire, where he built an elegant mansion, and furnished it with a noble library, and a complete typographical establishment, whence proceeded the works on which his literary reputation is founded. He translated the "Chronicles of Froissart and Monstrelet;" "Joinville's memoirs of Louis;" "Bertrand de la Brocquiere's Travels in Palestine;" and "St. Palay's Life of Froissart." Died, 1816.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, a divine, eminent for his zeal, and for his numerous writings, in the cause of civil liberty, was born in 1649, in the county of Stafford; received his education at St. Paul's school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge; and became minister of Corringham, in Essex. In the reign of Charles II. while lord Russel and his coadjutors were promoting the bill for excluding the duke of York, he published a tract, entitled "Julian the Apostate," for which he was fined and imprisoned. In 1618, when the army was encamped on Hounslow Heath, he drew up a paper, entitled, "An humble and hearty Address to all the English Protestants in the present Army;" for which he was tried, and condemned to stand in the pillory in three places, to pay a fine of 500 marks, to be degraded from the priesthood, and to be publicly whipped from Newgate to Tyburn. He bore all these disgraceful punishments with unshrinking fortitude; and continued to employ his pen in the same cause, until the Revolution, when the king offered him the rich deanery of Durham; but this he refused, as inadequate to his sufferings and services, which he thought merited a bishopric. He finally received a present of 1000*l.*, and a pension of 300*l.* per annum for the life of himself and his son. Died, 1703.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, the celebrated lexicographer, and one of the most distinguished writers of the 18th century, was born in 1709, at Lichfield, where his father was a bookseller. He completed his education at Pembroke college, Oxford; and in 1732 he became under-master of a free-school at Market Bosworth, in Leicestershire, which situation he was soon induced to quit, on account of the haughty treatment he received from the principal; and he next endeavoured to earn a maintenance by literary employment, but was unsuccessful. In 1735 he married Mrs. Porter, the widow of a mercer at Birmingham, with a fortune of about 800*l.*, by which he was enabled to open a boarding-school; but the plan did not succeed, and after a year's trial, he resolved to seek his fortune in London, in company with one of his few pupils, the celebrated David Garrick. In March, 1737, the two adventurers accordingly arrived in the metropolis, Johnson with his unfinished tragedy of "Irene" in his pocket, and with little to depend upon but his slender engagement with Cave, the proprietor of the Gentleman's Magazine. At this time he became acquainted with the reckless and unfortunate Savage, and in some respects his personal conduct was unfavorably affected by the intimacy; but from irregularity of this nature he was soon recovered by his deeply-grounded religious and moral principles. His first literary production, which attracted notice in the metropolis, was his "London," a Poem, in imitation of the third satire of Juvenal. He was soon after led to a new exercise of his literary powers in the composition of parliamentary debates, which, being then deemed a breach of privilege, were published under the fiction of Debates in the Senate of Lilliput. The extraordinary eloquence displayed in these productions was almost exclusively the product of his own invention; but it is probable that he adhered more faithfully to the tenor of the arguments of the real speakers than to their language. In 1747 he printed proposals for an edition of "Shakspeare," and the plan of his "English Dictionary," addressed to lord Chesterfield. The price agreed upon between him and the booksellers for the last work was 175*l*. In 1740 Garrick brought his friend's tragedy on the stage of Drury-lane, but it was unsuccessful. In 1740 he commenced his "Rambler," which was continued till 1752. In this work only five papers were the productions of other writers. Soon after the close of this paper he lost his wife, a circumstance which greatly affected him, as appears from his Meditations, and the sermon which he wrote on her death. In 1758 appeared his Dictionary, and the same year the university of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.A. Lord Chesterfield endeavoured also to assist it by writing two papers in its favour in "The World;" but as he had hitherto neglected the author, Johnson treated him with contempt. The publication of this great work did not relieve him from his embarrassments, for the price of his labour had been consumed in the progress of its compilation. In 1758 he began the "Idler," a periodical paper, which was published in a weekly newspaper. On the death of his mother, in 1759, he wrote the romance of "Rasselas" to defray the expenses of her funeral. In 1762 the king granted him a pension of 300*l*. per annum, without any stipulation with respect to his literary exertions. Johnson had the honour of a conversation with the king in the royal library, in 1765, when his majesty asked if he intended to publish any more works! To this he answered, that he thought he had written enough; on which the king said, "so should I too, if you had not written so well." About this time he instituted the Literary Club, consisting of some of the most celebrated men of the age. It was at this period, too, that his intercourse with the Thrale family began, which, for years, produced him so much social enjoyment. In 1773 he went on a tour with Mr. Boswell to the western islands of Scotland, of which journey he shortly after published a highly interesting account; but which gave offence to many, by the violent attack therein made on the authenticity of the poems attributed to Ossian. In 1775 the university of Oxford sent him the degree of LL.D. by diploma. In 1779 he began his

"Lives of the English Poets," a work which, on the whole, may be regarded as a treasure of sound criticism, and a model of literary biography. After a long illness, during part of which he entertained the most gloomy apprehensions, his mind grew serene, and he died full of that faith which he had so vigorously defended and inculcated by his writings, Dec. 19, 1794. The character of this great man is thus summed up by bishop Gleig:—"Without claiming for him the highest place among his contemporaries, in any single department of literature, we may use one of his own expressions, 'that he brought more mind to every subject, and had a greater variety of knowledge ready for all occasions, than almost any other man.' Though religious to superstition, he was in every other respect so remarkably incredulous, that Hogarth said, while Johnson firmly believed the Bible, he seemed determined to believe nothing else. The same energy which was displayed in his literary productions was exhibited also in his conversation, which was various, striking, and instructive: like the sage in 'Rasselas,' he spoke, and attention watched his lips; he reasoned, and conviction closed his periods; when he pleased, he could be the greatest sophist that ever contended in the lists of declamation; and perhaps no man ever equalled him in nervous and pointed repartees. But he had a roughness in his manner which subdued the saucy, and terrified the meek; it was only, however, in his manner; for no man was more loved than Johnson was, by those who knew him; and his works will be read with veneration for their author, as long as the language in which they are written shall be understood."

JOHNSON, THOMAS, an English botanist, was born at Selby, in Yorkshire. He was bred an apothecary in London, and became, says Wood, the best herbalist of his age. He wrote, "Iter in Agram Cantuariam," and "Ericetum Hamsteadianum," which were the first local catalogues of plants published in England. But his great work was an improved edition of "Gerard's Herbal." In the civil wars he entered into the royal army; at the siege of Basing-house he received a wound, of which he died in 1644.

JOHNSON, CHARLES, a dramatic writer, was originally a member of the law, which profession he quitted for theatrical composition, in which he experienced considerable success. Died, 1744.

JOHNSON, JOHN, a learned divine, was born, in 1622, at Finsbury, Kent; was educated at King's-school, Canterbury, and at Cambridge; and successively obtained the livings of Boughton, St. John's, Margate, Appledore, and Cranbrook. He wrote several religious works; among which are "Holy David;" "The Clergyman's Vade Mecum;" "The Unbloody Sacrifice;" "Miscellaneous Discourses and Sermons," &c. Died, 1723.

JOHNSON, RICHARD, a grammarian, who was head master of the new school at Nottingham, from 1707 to 1720. He published "Notae Nottinghamicæ;" "Grammatical Commentaries;" "Aristarchus Anti-Bentleanes," &c. He had been in a desponding state for some time, and was found drowned in a rivulet, near Nottingham, in 1770.

JOHNSON, MAURICE, an able antiquary, was born at Spalding, in Lincolnshire, and bred to the law in the Inner Temple; after which he settled at his native place, where he formed, in 1717, a literary society, whose object was to cultivate the knowledge of English antiquities. He died in 1733.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, a dramatic writer and performer of eccentric celebrity; author of "Marlotrambo, or the Supernatural," and various other laughable extravaganzas. Died, 1773.

JOHNSON, SAMUEL, first president of King's college, New York, was born at Guilford, Connecticut; educated at the college of Saybrook; first preached at West Haven, then became an episcopalian, and went to England to obtain ordination. On his return he settled at Stratford, where he preached to an episcopalian congregation; received the degree of D.D. from Oxford, in 1743; and was chosen president of the college at New York on its establishment in 1754. He held this situation with much credit, until 1763, when he resigned and returned to his pastoral charge at Stratford, where he continued till his death, in 1771.

JOHNSON, Sir WILLIAM, a British military officer, was a native of Ireland, and entered the army early in life: his uncle, Sir Peter Warren, having taken him when very young to America. He gradually rose to the rank of colonel; and in 1755 he was appointed to the command of an expedition fitted out against Crown Point. He signified himself by defeating a body of Indian Canadian and French troops, commanded by baron Dieskau, whom he took prisoner; for which he was rewarded with a baronetcy, and a gratuity from parliament of 3000*l*. General Johnson settled on the Mohawk river, acquired a considerable estate, and ingratiated himself both with the American settlers and the neighbouring Indians. He concluded a treaty with the Senecas in 1764, and appeared in the capacity of British agent and superintendent of Indian affairs for the northern parts of America, and colonel of the six united nations. Died, 1774.

JOHNSTON, ARTHUR, a physician and poet, was born in 1587, near Aberdeen, and educated at that university; on leaving which he went to Padua, where he took his doctor's degree; and then settled in Paris. After an absence of nearly forty years, chiefly spent in foreign travel, he returned to Aberdeen, of which university he became principal, till archbishop Laud invited him to London, and obtained for him the appointment of physician in ordinary to Charles I. He was the author of a collection of Latin epigrams; an elegant paraphrase of the Psalms in Latin verse; the "Musa Aulice;" and a selection of the works of Scottish writers, entitled "Poetarum Scoticorum Deliciae." Died, 1641.

JOHNSTON, or JOHNSON, CHARLES, a native of Ireland, who was bred to the bar, and came over to England to practise; but being afflicted with deafness, he was compelled to quit that profession. His first literary attempt was the celebrated "Chrysal, or the Adventures of a Gaietea;" a political romance, in which the leading characters were drawn from real life, and from their being generally known, produced a great sensation. This work having so well succeeded, he produced others of a similar class, viz. "The Reverie, or a Flight to the Paradise of Fools," 2 vols.; "The History of Arbaces, Prince of Betulia," 2 vols.; "The Pilgrim, or a Picture of Life," 2 vols.; and the "History of John Juniper, Esq. alias Juniper Jack," 3 vols. In 1782 he went to India, where he engaged in literary and other speculations, and obtained considerable wealth. Died, 1800.

JOHNSTONE, Chevalier de, an adherent of the Pretender, was the son of a merchant of Edinburgh, and born in 1720. At an early age he evinced an inclination for a military life; and being brought up in Jacobite principles, he left Edinburgh privately on the breaking out of the rebellion in 1745, and joined the insurgents. He was appointed aid-de-camp to the unfortunate prince Charles Edward; fought at the battle of Preston Pans; and raised an independent company, with which he served throughout the campaign. After the battle of Culloden, he sought for safety in flight; and, disguised as a pedlar, he passed through England, and at length escaped to the continent. He subsequently entered into the service of France, and acted in the capacity of aid-de-camp in Canada; on the conquest of which by the British he returned to France, and died there at an advanced age. His "Memoirs of the Rebellion in 1745 and 1746," which occupied his latter years, is a very interesting work.

JOHNSTONE, JAMES, a physician and philosophical writer, was born at Annan, in Dumfriesshire, in 1730; studied at Edinburgh, where he took the degree of M.D. in 1750; and settled at Kildermister, where he acquired notoriety by his successful treatment of a malignant fever then raging there, as well as by claiming the merit of having discovered the good effects arising from the use of mineral acids in counteracting contagion. Dr. Johnstone subsequently removed to Worcester, and died in that city, in 1802. He was the author of "Medical Essays and Observations, with Disquisitions relating to the Nervous System," and also several medical papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

JOHNSTONE, Dr. BRYCE, an eminent Scotch divine, born in 1747, was a son of John Johnstone, esq. a highly respectable magistrate of Annan, in Dumfriesshire. He entered the university of Edinburgh in 1762; in 1771 he was appointed minister of Holywood; and in 1786 the degree of D.D. was unanimously conferred on him. He was the author of a "Commentary on the Revelation of St. John the Divine," 2 vols. 8vo.; an "Essay on the Influence of Religion on Civil Society and Civil Government;" and some valuable sermons. He also assisted Sir John Sinclair's patriotic views in drawing up the statistical account of Scotland; and contributed greatly towards the improvement of the agricultural and social condition of his native country. Died, 1805.

JOHNSTONE, JOHN HENRY, a celebrated comic actor and vocalist, was born in 1750, at Tipperary, where his father was a small farmer. At the age of eighteen he enlisted in a regiment of Irish dragoons, and soon attracted the notice of his comrades by his fine voice and good-humoured liveliness. The colonel of the regiment having had proofs of Johnstone's vocal powers, and hearing that he had an inclination for the stage, he generously granted his discharge, and gave him a commendatory letter to Mr. Ryder, then manager of the Dublin theatre, who engaged him for three years, at two guineas per week, which was soon raised to four. His fame as a vocalist increased rapidly; and having married a Miss Pottier, who had acquired a profound knowledge of the science of music, he profited by her instructions, and soon became a finished singer. Macklin, the celebrated actor, advised him to try the London boards, and wrote a letter to Mr. Harris, of Covent-garden, so strongly in his favour, that he engaged Johnstone and his wife, for three years, at a weekly salary of 14*l.*, 16*l.*, and 18*l.* He accordingly made his first appearance at Covent-garden theatre, in October, 1783, in his favourite character of Liouel. There were, however, other aspirants for vocal fame at that time on the stage; and though he continued to sing for several seasons with undiminished success, he saw that a wider field was open for him in the personation of Irish characters. His best efforts were therefore directed to that end; and it was soon found that his native humour, rich brogue, and fine voice, carried him to a height of excellence in the path he had chosen, which left every competitor far behind. In 1803 he quitted Covent-garden for Drury-lane, and in the summer of that year he visited his friends in Dublin, where martial law being then in force, the company performed in the day-time. On his return from Ireland his wife died; and he married Miss Boulton, by whom he had a daughter, Mrs. Wallack. Few public performers have passed a long career with such uninterrupted success and felicity as the veteran Johnstone. As an actor, in his line he stood alone, personating his buoyant and blundering countrymen, both patrician and plebeian, with a degree of fidelity altogether unrivalled; while his habits of prudence, which enabled him to accumulate a good fortune, were not so strict as to interfere with his social enjoyments; for to say the truth, "Jack Johnstone" loved the juice of the grape, and often took "one bottle more" than would have qualified him for any temperance society in Christendom. He died, Dec. 26, 1828, in the 78th year of his age.

JOHNSTONE, JOHN, M.D., an eminent physician of Birmingham, who for upwards of forty years held a distinguished station among his professional brethren, was the son of Dr. James Johnstone, of Worcester, and was educated at Merton college, Oxford. Dr. John Johnstone was considered peculiarly successful in his treatment of fevers, and somewhat remarkable for the sparing use he made of medicinal preparations; but it is not only of his skill and talents as a physician, but as a man of letters that we have to speak of him. He was the intimate friend of Dr. Parr, and his "Life" of that great scholar affords ample evidence of his own literary acquirements and comprehensive mind. Besides these Memoirs of Dr. Parr, which is a fearless and noble specimen of biography, he was the author of several treatises on medical subjects, he was also a fellow of the College of Physicians and the Royal Society; and was held in high estimation for his acquirements and general character by a large circle of friends, eminent for rank and talents. Died, aged 68, Dec. 28, 1836.

JOINVILLE, JOHN, Sieur de, seigneur of Champagne, an eminent French statesman and historian of the 13th century. He accompanied Louis IX. in his first crusade or expedition to Egypt, in 1250, sharing his master's captivity, and rendering him many important services. In the king's second crusade, however, he declined taking a part; and subsequently employed himself in writing the "Life of St. Louis," one of the most interesting documents existing relative to the history of the middle ages. He died in 1316, aged 90.

JOLIVET, JEAN BAPTISTE MOTTE, count de, was, previous to the French revolution, an advocate. While a deputy to the legislative assembly, in 1792, he had the courage to denounce the Jacobin club before the National Convention, and the good fortune to escape from the perils of that stormy period. After the accession of Napoleon he was introduced into the council of state, and charged with the organization of the four new departments on the left bank of the Rhine. On his return he was made a commandant of the legion of honour, and retained the office of counsellor of state till 1814. He wrote several financial and statistical works; and died, aged 64, in 1816.

JOLY, CLAUDE, a French ecclesiastic, who wrote "A Collection of Maxims for the Education of a Prince," which gave great offence, and was burnt by the hangman. The author, however, republished it with an addition, called "Codicilli d'Or," or the Golden Codicilli. He was born at Paris in 1607, and died there in 1700.

JOLY, GUY, the confidential secretary of cardinal de Retz, who wrote "Memoirs of his Times," containing an interesting account of transactions from 1648 to 1666, in which is included the private history of his patron.

JOLY, MARY ELIZABETH, a celebrated French actress, was born at Versailles, in 1761. She commenced her theatrical career in 1781, and soon rose to eminence in her profession, excelling principally as a representative of the soubrettes of the French drama. In 1793 she was imprisoned among other political victims, but recovered her liberty on condition of performing at the theatre of the Republic. Died, 1796.

operas in his own country, and became a popular favourite. He afterwards visited Bologna, Rome, Venice, and other principal cities of Italy, everywhere carrying away the palm from rival musicians. He was the author of thirty-six operas, and many devotional pieces, among which are his celebrated "Requiem" and "Miserere." Died, 1774.

JONAS, ARNORIM, a native of Iceland, distinguished as an antiquary and historian. His works relate chiefly to the history of his own country; but he was also an able astronomer, and had studied the science under Tycho Brahe. He died, aged 95, in 1640.

JONES, IHWIO, a celebrated architect, and the reviver of classical architecture in England, was born in London, about 1672. He was at first an apprentice to a joiner; but his talents for drawing having attracted the notice of the earls of Arundel and Pembroke, the latter supplied him with the means of visiting Italy, for the purpose of studying landscape painting. He went to Venice, where the works of Palladio inspired him with a taste for architecture; and he afterwards devoted all his energies in pursuit of that noble branch of art. He soon acquired fame, and obtained the situation of first architect to Christian IV., king of Denmark, who, visiting his brother-in-law, James I., in 1668, brought Jones with him to England. Being induced to remain, the queen chose him as her architect; and the place of surveyor-general of the board of works was granted to him in reversion. In 1690 he was appointed one of the commissioners for repairing St. Paul's cathedral; but this was not commenced till 1693. In the following reign he was much employed in preparing masques for the entertainment of the court, and in building the Banqueting-house at Whitehall; but while thus engaged he fell under the displeasure of Ben Jonson, who ridiculed him on the stage, and made him the subject of his epigrammatic muse. Jones realized a handsome fortune; but being a Roman catholic, and a partisan of royalty, he suffered severely in the civil war. At length, worn down by sorrow and suffering, he died, July 21, 1652. As an author he is known by a work relative to that curious monument of former ages, Stonehenge, which he pronounced to be a Roman temple, dedicated to Cælus—an opinion which most antiquaries have decried as erroneous and absurd. Many of Inigo Jones's architectural designs have been published by Kent, Ware, and Leoni.

JONES, WILLIAM, a mathematician, was born in 1680, in the island of Anglesey. He became, early in life, a schoolmaster in a ship of war; after which he settled in London, where he published "A Treatise on Navigation;" and another entitled "Synopsis Palmariorum Matheseos, or a new Introduction to the Mathematics." These works procured him the friendship of several men of science, particularly Newton and Halley, and he also obtained a pension from government. Died, 1749.

JONES, WILLIAM, an English divine, eminent for his abilities and public spirit, and a strenuous champion of the Hutchinsonian doctrines, was born in 1736, at Lowick, in Northamptonshire. He was educated at the Charter-house, and University college, Oxford, where he formed an intimate acquaintance with Mr. Horne, afterwards bishop of Norwich. On leaving the university he became curate of Pinedon, Northamptonshire, and next of Wadenhoe, where he wrote his "Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity," which passed through numerous editions. In 1763 he published "An Essay on the first Principles of Natural Philosophy." In 1764 the archbishop of Canterbury gave him the vicarage of Bethersden, in Kent, to which was afterwards added the rectory of Pluckley; and at the time of his death he was perpetual curate of Nayland, and rector of Paston and Hellingbourne. When the French revolution gave birth to seditious movements in this country, Mr. Jones printed "A Letter from Thomas Bull to his brother John," which was widely circulated by the friends of government. He was also concerned in establishing the British Critic; and he published a collection of excellent tracts, under the title of "The Scholar armed against the Errors of the Times." On the death of his friend, bishop Horne, to whom he had been chaplain, he paid an affectionate tribute to his memory in an account of his "Life and Writings." His theological and philosophical works form 12 volumes, 8vo. Died, 1800.

JONES, HENRY, a poet and dramatist, was born at Drogheda. He wrote the tragedy of "The Earl of Essex," and a volume of poems, for which, under the patronage of lord Chesterfield, he procured a large subscription. Want of prudence, however, prevented him from profiting by his connexions, and he died in indigence, 1770.

JONES, OWEN, a Welsh antiquary, and a member of the Gwyneddigion, or Cambrian society, for encouraging the bards, language, and music of Wales; was born in 1740, and died in 1814. He collected and published "The Archæology of Wales;" the "Poems of Dafydd ap Gwilym," and other productions.

JONES, EDWARD, a Welsh musician, who was bard to the prince of Wales. He published "Musical and Poetical Relics of the Welsh Bards;" "Minstrel's Serenades;" "Lyric Airs;" and "Terpsichore's Banquet." Died, 1831.

JONES, PAUL, (whose real name it is said was John Paul), a naval adventurer, was a native of Seikirk, in Scotland, and born in 1736. His first voyage was to America, where he settled early in life; and at the commencement of the struggle between the colonies and the mother country, he offered his services to the former, and was appointed first of the first lieutenants. In 1775 he obtained the command of a ship under commodore Hopkins, and distinguished himself in several engagements, for which he received his commission as captain of the marine. He then sailed to France, and being well acquainted with the Irish coast, and the northern part of England, he conceived the design of effecting a descent. For a long time he kept the northern coast in a constant state of alarm; at length he effected a landing at Whitehaven, and having dismantled a fort, set fire to some shipping in the harbour. From thence he sailed for Scotland, where he landed on the estate of the earl of Selkirk, and plundered his lordship's house of all the plate. He next took the Drake sloop of war, with which he returned to Brest. He afterwards sailed round Ireland to the North Sea, with three ships, the Richard, Pallas, and Vengeance. Having committed great mischief on that coast, he fell in with the Baltic fleet, convoyed by the Serapis frigate, and the Countess of Scarborough armed ship, both which, after a severe action, he captured off Flamborough-head. For these services the king of France conferred on him the order of merit, and gave him a gold-hilted sword. He afterwards was invited into the Russian service, with the rank of rear-admiral, where he was disappointed in not receiving the command of the fleet acting against the Turks in the Black sea. He found fault with the conduct of the prince of Nassau, the admiral; became restless and impatient; was intrigued against at court, and calumniated by his enemies; and had permission, from the empress Catharine, to retire from the service with a pension, which was never paid. He returned to Paris, sunk into poverty, and died in 1792. Jones was a man of decided courage, conducting all his operations with equal boldness and sagacity; to which may be added, that, notwithstanding the absence of instruction in his youth, he wrote with fluency, strength, and clearness, and was able to sustain his part respectably in the polished circles of Paris, where he was a great pretender to ton, and passed for "a poet as well as a hero."

JONES, Sir WILLIAM, an eminent lawyer, poet, and general scholar, was the son of an able mathematician; and was only three years of age when his father died, in 1746. He was educated at Harrow school, from whence, at the age of eighteen, he went to University college, Oxford, where he had been but a few months before he was invited to be private tutor to lord Althorpe, afterwards earl Spencer, with whom he made a tour on the continent. In 1766 he obtained a fellowship, and began his "Commentaries on Asiatic Poetry." Soon after this he was engaged to translate the life of Nadir Shah, from an eastern manuscript brought to England by the king of Denmark. Another tour to the continent, with his pupil and family, followed, which occupied his time until 1770, when, his tutorship ceasing, he entered himself as a law student in the Temple. He did not, however, wholly sacrifice literature to his professional pursuits; but, on the appearance of the life and works of Zoroaster, by Anquetil du Perron, he vindicated the university of Oxford, which had been attacked by that writer, in an able pamphlet in the French language, which he wrote with great elegance. In 1776 he was made a commissioner of bankrupts; about which time his correspondence with his pupil evinced the manly spirit of constitutional freedom by which he was actuated; and to his feelings on the American contest he gave vent in a spirited Latin ode to Liberty.

In 1778 appeared his translation of the "Orations of Isæus," with a prefatory discourse, notes and commentary, which, for elegance of style, and profound critical and historical research, excited much admiration. In the mean time he rapidly advanced in professional reputation, and continued at the same time to give almost daily evidence of the progress he was making in polite literature; at one time translating Arabian poetry; at another, writing odes on liberty; and then discussing, with the genius of a statesman and the fervour of a patriot, some intricate question of foreign or domestic policy. At length, on the accession of the Selburne administration he obtained what had long been the object of his ambition, the appointment of judge in the supreme court of judicature in Bengal. The honour of knighthood was on this occasion conferred on him, and he soon after married Miss Shipley, daughter of the bishop of St. Asaph, with whom he embarked for India in April, 1783. One of his earliest acts in India was the establishment at Calcutta of an institution on the plan of the Royal Society, of which he was chosen the first president. Another was, to take vigorous measures for procuring a digest of the Hindoo and Mahometan laws. He then applied himself with ardour to the study of the Sanscrit, and, his health soon suffering from the climate, he took a journey through the district of Benares, during which cessation of public duties, he composed a "Treatise on the Gods of Greece, Italy, and India." His translation of the celebrated "Ordnances of Menu," the famous Indian legislator, published early in 1794, had scarcely appeared, when he was seized with an inflammation of the liver, which terminated his truly valuable life on the 27th of April, in the 48th year of his age. As a judge he was indefatigable and impartial; his legal knowledge was profound; and he was an enlightened and liberal champion of constitutional monarchy. As a poet, essayist, and translator there were few who excelled him; while as a linguist he stood unrivalled. To this let us add, that in private life his character was unimpeachable. A beautiful monument was erected to his memory in St. Paul's cathedral, and a statue at Bengal, at the expense of the East India Company; but the most honourable and imperishable monument of his fame exists in his works, which were published by his widow, in 6 vols. 4to.

JONES, JOHN, an American physician, who, after studying at the universities of Rheims, Leyden, and Edinburgh, for many years practised with reputation at New York; passed several years in the medical department of the army; and finally settled at Philadelphia. He was the intimate friend of Franklin, whom he attended in his last illness; and was vice-president of the College of Physicians, Philadelphia. Died, 1791, aged 62.

JONES, JOHN, LL.D. a Unitarian minister, and a philological writer, was a native of Carmarthenshire, and received his education at the dissenting college, Hackney. He was pastor to a Unitarian congregation, first at Plymouth-dock, and next at Halifax, in Yorkshire; but he eventually settled in London, and employed himself in literary pursuits and private tuition. He was the author of numerous publications; among which are, "A Development of remarkable Events calculated to restore the Christian Religion to its Original Purity," 2 vols.; "Illustrations of the Four Gospels," &c.; a "Greek and English Lexicon," and many others, both educational and devotional. Died, 1837.

JONES, STEPHEN, a miscellaneous writer and editor, born in London, in 1763. He was educated at St. Paul's school; and brought up to the business of a printer; but his chief occupation was writing and compiling for the press. An enlarged edition of "The Biographia Dramatica," 4 vols. 8vo., and a small "Biographical Dictionary," formed a part of his literary labours; and he was also concerned with newspapers and periodical works, as an editor.

JONSIUS, or JONSENIUS, JOHN, a learned writer, was born in 1624, at Flensburg, in the duchy of Schleswig. After teaching at Konigsberg and Flensburg, he went to Frankfurt, as sub-rector of the university, where he cultivated literature and philosophy with great success. His principal work is entitled "De Scripturis Historicis Philosophicis." Died, 1680.

JONSON, BENJAMIN, a celebrated dramatist, and the contemporary and friend of Shakespeare, was the posthumous son of a clergyman. He was born in Westminster, in 1574; at the grammar-school of which city he was placed, under Camden, at an early age; till his mother marrying again to a person who held the humble occupation of a bricklayer, young Ben, as he was familiarly called, was taken home abruptly by his father-in-law, and employed by him as an assistant in his trade. The ardent spirit of the future poet revolted against his condition; he fled from home and entered the army as a private soldier, in which capacity he served in the English army in Flanders. On his return he resumed his studies, and went to Cambridge; but, from the poverty of his circumstances, he was obliged to leave the university and take to the stage. At first he was not very successful, either as an actor or an author; and having the misfortune to kill another actor in a duel, he was taken up and imprisoned, and narrowly escaped with life. On being released from confinement he married, and recommenced writing for the stage, to which he was encouraged by Shakespeare, who performed in one of his pieces. In 1604 he produced his comedy of "Every Man in his Humour;" which was followed by a new play every year, till the reign of James the First, when he was employed in the masques and entertainments at court. But, regardless of prudence, Ben joined Chapman and Marston in writing the comedy of "Eastward Hoe," which so grossly libelled the Scotch nation, that the authors were committed to prison, and had they not made a timely and humble submission for the offence, they would have lost their noses and ears in the pillory, according to their sentence. By his address, however, he soon contrived to reinstate himself in the favour of a monarch to whose pleasures the effusions of his muse had become necessary; and for the remainder of that reign he continued in high favour as a kind of superintendant of the court revels. In 1617 he was appointed poet laureate, with a salary of 160*l.*, and a butt of Canary wine yearly, from the king's cellars. Want of economy, however, kept him constantly poor; although, in addition to the royal bounty, he had a pension from the city. He died Aug. 16, 1637, and was buried in Westminster-abbey, where a handsome tablet has been erected to his memory in Poet's corner, inscribed, "O Rare Ben Jonson." Dryden, speaking of the great rival dramatists, says, "Shakespeare was the Homer, or father, of our dramatic poets; Jonson was the Virgil, the pattern of elaborate writing; I admire him, but I love Shakespeare."

JORDAENS, JACOB, an eminent historical and portrait painter, was a native of Antwerp. He was the son-in-law of Van Oort, under whom he studied; he also received some instruction from Rubens; and his pictures are executed with correctness and brilliancy. Born, 1594; died, 1678.

JORDAN, CAMILLE, a statesman of revolutionary France, was born at Lyons, in 1771. He opposed the tyranny of the Jacobins; and, as a member of the convention, he had the courage to defend his city when it was denounced as the receptacle of assassins and banditti. For his laudable zeal he was twice compelled to seek safety in exile; and though he returned to France when Buonaparte had subverted the power of the directory, he lived there as a private citizen. After the restoration of the Bourbons, he became a member of the chamber of deputies, and decorated with the legion of honour, and ennobled. Died, 1821.

JORDAN, DOROTHEA, or DOROTHY BLAND, (Jordan being only an assumed name) was born at Waterford, about the year 1761. She made her theatrical debut on the Dublin stage, in 1777, in the part of Phoebe, in "As You Like It." In the following season she appeared at Cork, where she was much admired for her archness and sportive simplicity. In 1782 she came to England; was engaged by Tate Wilkinson, and first appeared at the Leeds theatre as Calista, in "The Fair Penitent;" from Leeds she proceeded to York, where she first played under the name of Mrs. JORDAN, by which, though never married, she was subsequently known. In 1783 she made her first appearance before a London audience, at Drury-lane, as Peggy, in "The Country Girl;" and immediately became such a decided favourite, that her salary was doubled and she was allowed two benefits. At the close of the season, she made a provincial tour, and visited nearly all the large towns in England; everywhere receiving the most enthusiastic welcome from admiring audiences. When the duke of Clarence first made overtures to her, she was the mistress of a Mr. Ford; who refused to make her his wife, through fear of offending his father. Mrs. Jordan then entered into that connexion with the duke, which continued in an almost uninterrupted state of domestic harmony, until it was suddenly broken off in 1811. She was the mother of ten children by his Royal Highness; and it may well be supposed that, when his intention of separating from her was disclosed in a letter which she received from him while performing at Cheltenham, the shock was almost too great for her endurance. "She arrived at the theatre," says her biographer, "dreadfully weakened by a succession of fainting fits. She, however, struggled on with Nell, until Jobson arrived at the passage where he has to accuse the conjuror of making her laughing drunk. When the actress here attempted to laugh, the afflicted woman burst into tears. Here Jobson, with great presence of mind, altered the text, and exclaimed to her—'Why, Nell, the conjuror has not only made thee drunk—he has made thee crying drunk;' thus covering her personal distress, and carrying her through the scene in character." In a letter which she afterwards wrote to a confidential friend upon the subject of the separation (which, as well as the preceding quotation: considering the necessity there is in a work of this nature for being brief, we ought, perhaps, to apologize for inserting) are the following passages:—"We never had for twenty years the semblance of a quarrel! Money, money, my good friend, or the want of it, has, I am convinced, made him the most wretched of men; but having done wrong, he does not like to retract. But with all his excellent qualities, his domestic virtues, and his love for his lovely children, what must he not at this moment suffer! His distresses should have been relieved before; but this is entre nous.—And now, my dear friend, do not hear the D. of C. unfairly abused. He has done wrong, and he is suffering for it. But as far as he has it left in his own power, he is doing every thing kind and noble, even to the distressing himself." It has been alleged that state reasons had great weight in inducing the duke to insist on this separation; but what was the true cause is still a matter of doubt. A yearly allowance of 4000*l.* was settled on her for the maintenance of herself and daughters; with a provision that if Mrs. Jordan should resume her profession, the care of the duke's four daughters, together with 1500*l.* per annum allowed for them, should revert to his royal highness. In a few months afterwards she expressed a wish to return to the stage; and the four children, with the specified allowance for their maintenance, was surrendered to their royal father. Shortly after this she retired to France, under circumstances of great embarrassment: "she found herself involved to a considerable amount, by securities, which, all at once, appeared against her, in the form of bonds and promissory notes, given incautiously by herself, to relieve, as she thought, from trifling difficulties, a near relation, in whom she had placed the greatest confidence." Thus was her long theatrical career unhappily terminated. She gradually sank under the weight of her afflictions; and in a state of extreme mental misery, died at St. Cloud, July 3, 1816. Hazlitt, speaking of her attractions on the stage, says, "Her face, her tones, her manner, were irresistible. Her smile had the effect of sunshine, and her laugh did one good to hear it. Her voice was eloquence itself; it seemed as if her heart was always at her mouth. She was all gaiety, openness, and good nature. She rioted in her fine animal spirits, and gave more pleasure than any other actress, because she had the greatest spirit of enjoyment in herself."

JORDAN, Sir JOSEPH, a gallant English admiral, who by his presence of mind and valour, gained the battle of Solebay, in 1672.

JORDAN, CHARLES STEPHEN, a Prussian writer, originally of a French family, was born at Berlin in 1700, and died in 1746. He wrote, "Travels in France, England, and Holland, with Satirical Anecdotes;" "A Miscellany of Literature, Philosophy, and History;" and the "Life of de la Croze."

JORDAN, THOMAS, a dramatic writer in the reign of Charles I. He wrote two comedies and a masque; and is mentioned by Langbaine with respect.

JORDANO, LUCA, a famous painter, was born at Naples, in 1632; and died there, in 1705.

JORTIN, JOHN, D.D., an eminent scholar and divine, was born in London, in 1698, and educated at Cambridge. Here he acquired so high a character for learning and acuteness, that he was employed by Pope to extract the notes from Eustathius, to print with his translation of the Iliad. He took orders in 1724; and held successively the livings of Swavesey, St. Dunstan's in the East, and Kensington; he was also a prebendary of St. Paul's, and archdeacon of London. His chief works are, "Discourses concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion;" "Miscellaneous Observations upon Authors, ancient and modern;" "Remarks upon Ecclesiastical History;" "Life of Erasmus;" and seven volumes of "Sermons and Charges," which were printed after his death. He was simple in manners, liberal in sentiments, independent in spirit; and as much beloved for his private virtues, as he was admired for his piety and learning. Died, 1770.

JOSE, ANTONIO, a Portuguese dramatist, by birth a Jew, who was burnt alive at the last auto-da-fé in 1745, for having introduced in one of his farces a scene in which a criminal is conversing at the gallows with his confessor, in a style, as may be supposed, not the most edifying.

JOSEPH I., emperor of Germany, the son of Leopold I., was born at Vienna, in 1678; received the crown of Hungary in 1689; and was soon after elected king of the Romans. He began his reign in 1705, which, though short, was troubled by wars in the Netherlands, Germany, Italy, Spain, and Hungary. He revived the imperial chamber; and the protestants enjoyed toleration and some privileges under his reign. Died, 1711.

JOSEPH II., emperor of Germany, was the son of the emperor Leopold and Maria Theresa, queen of Hungary. He was crowned king of the Romans in 1764; the year following he succeeded his father; and in 1780, by the death of the empress-queen, he succeeded to the crown of Hungary and Bohemia. In 1788, a declaration of war was published against the Turks, and the same year the emperor in person reduced Schabatz; but this was followed by a defeat of prince Linschenstein, who fell in the action. Soon after this a bloody battle was fought between the Imperialists and Turks, on the heights of Rohadin, in which neither could claim the victory. Joseph next made an attempt to possess himself of Belgrade, but without success. But marshal Laudohn taking upon him the command of the army, took Durbieza and Novi, and in 1789 reduced Belgrade; soon after which, a peace was concluded, chiefly occasioned by the discontented spirit in Germany at such a waste of men and treasure. In February following the emperor died of a lingering illness; and was succeeded by his brother, Peter Leopold, grand duke of Tuscany. Joseph II. was of a lively disposition, sickle and fond of action: his favourite object was to be sovereign in a peculiar sense, and to manage the great machine of the state entirely himself. Frederic the Great, in a letter to Voltaire, thus spoke of him:—"Joseph is an emperor such as Germany has not had for a long time. Educated in splendour, his habits are simple; grown up amidst flattery, he is still modest; inflamed with a love of glory, he yet sacrifices his ambition to his duty."

JOSEPHINE, empress of France and queen of Italy, was born at Martinique in 1763, and bore the name, from her parents, of ROSE TASCHER DE LA PAGERRIE. While very young, she was taken by her father to France, to be the bride of the viscount de Beauharnois—a marriage having been arranged by the two families when the marquis Beauharnois was governor-general of the Antilles. They were accordingly married; and, in the enjoyment of each other's society, they lived beloved and respected, while Josephine became the mother of two children, Eugene and Hortense. Prompted by filial attachment, she went, in 1787, to Martinique to attend upon her mother in sickness; and having taken her daughter with her, she remained in the island three years. The sudden rising of the colony, however, obliged her to quit it for France, with such haste, as not to allow of her taking leave of her parent. After effecting her escape, and surmounting numerous obstacles, Madame Beauharnois began to experience the horrors of the French revolution; and soon saw her husband, who had used every exertion at the head of the French army on the Rhine, dragged to a prison, and thence to the scaffold. She was also included in the list of proscription; but the death of her husband reduced her to such a state that she could not be removed, and to this circumstance she owed her deliverance. Robespierre at length perished, and the countess was delivered from prison by Tallien; who was never forgotten by her, nor by Eugene, from whom he received a considerable pension till his death. Josephine was indebted to Barras for the restoration of a part of the property of her husband; and at his house, after the 13th Vendemiaire, she met general Buonaparte, who was desirous of seeing her, in consequence of her son Eugene, then fifteen years old, presenting himself before the general, to solicit that the sword which had belonged to his father might be given to him. Buonaparte from the first was favourably impressed towards the widow; and his attachment strengthening at every succeeding interview, he married her, in 1796. From that day it became her practice to encourage him through dangers, and moderate his feelings in the hour of victory. When her husband was raised to the consulate, her beneficent disposition displayed itself in a thousand ways: to her, many emigrants owed their restoration; she encouraged the arts, and rewarded industry; her life, in short, was one continued act of benevolence towards her fellow-creatures; so that Buonaparte frequently observed to her, "I can win battles, but you win hearts." Her great mind looked to the glory of France, and the fame of her husband, as the two most desirable objects. After Napoleon became emperor, a divorce was a subject to which his friends advised him, but which he at first declined. Josephine had been crowned empress of Paris, and queen of Italy at Milan. When Napoleon became desirous of marrying a princess, and she was made acquainted with the wishes of the nation, regarding a successor, she nobly resolved to sacrifice her private feelings on the altar of France; and giving the arch-duchess, Maria Louisa, credit for all the estimable qualities which she knew were requisite to the happiness of Napoleon, she consented to the marriage. She, however, would not follow the wishes of her children, who were anxious that she should quit France; but retired to her beautiful seat of Malmaison, with the title of empress-queen-dowager. After visiting her daughter-in-law, the vice-queen of Italy, she returned to the former seat of her happiness, and pursued her taste for botany. But she was doomed to see the destruction of that throne on which she had once sat; Napoleon's exile to Elba drew from her expressions of the most poignant regret; and it was evident to every one that her health was rapidly declining. The allied sovereigns treated her with the most respectful distinction. The emperor Alexander sent his physician, and visited her often in person; but a sudden inflammation of the throat terminated her life on the 29th of May, 1814.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS, the celebrated historian of the Jews, was born at Jerusalem, A.D. 37. His father, Mattathias, was descended from the ancient high-priests of the Jews, and his mother was of the Macbean race. He was early instructed in Hebrew learning, and became an ornament of the sect of the Pharisees, to which he belonged. When twenty-six years' old he visited Rome, for the purpose of obtaining the release of some prisoners whom Felix had sent to the capital; on which occasion he was introduced to Poppæa, afterwards the wife of Nero; and on his return, was made governor of Galilee. He afterwards obtained the command of the Jewish army, and supported with courage, wisdom, and resolution, a siege of seven weeks, in the fortified town of Jotapata, where he was attacked by Vespasian and Titus. The town was betrayed to the enemy: 40,000 of the inhabitants were cut to pieces, and 1200 were made prisoners. Josephus was discovered in a cave, where he had concealed himself, and given up to the Roman general, who was about to send him to Nero; but his life was spared at the intercession of Titus, who became his patron, and whom he accompanied to the siege of Jerusalem. On arriving before the city he was sent to his countrymen with offers of peace, and he advised them to submit to the Roman power; but they treated him with contumely, and rejected his counsel. At the capture of the city, however, he was enabled to deliver his brother and several of his friends without ransom. He accompanied Titus back to Rome, where he was rewarded with the freedom of the city, and received a pension and other favours from Vespasian and his son; and, as a mark of gratitude, he then assumed their family name of Flavius. His "History of the Jewish War, and the Destruction of Jerusalem," in 7 books, was composed at the command of Vespasian, and is singularly interesting and affecting, as the historian was an eye-witness of all he relates. St. Jerome calls him the Livy of the Greeks. His "Jewish Antiquities," in 20 books, written in Greek, is a very noble work; and his discourse "upon the Martyrdom of the Maccabees," is a master-piece of eloquence. He is supposed to have died about the year 95, but the exact date is uncertain.

JOUBERT, BARTHOLOMEW CATHERINE, a distinguished French general, was born at Pont de Vaux, in 1769. He was destined by his father for the bar; but at the age of fifteen he forsook his studies, and entered the army. His discharge being obtained, he was sent to Lyons to continue his education, and at the beginning of the Revolution he was a student at the university of Dijon. In 1791 he enlisted as a volunteer; and, displaying great courage and activity in various situations, he rose rapidly, till by his admirable conduct under Kellerman, at the battle of Loano, in 1795, he was made general of brigade on the field. In the two following years his bravery and talent were conspicuous on many occasions, particularly in the Tyrol, and he rose to the rank of general of division. He was placed at the head of the French army in Italy in 1799, and fell at the battle of Novi, in that year. He was noted for the boldness, promptitude, and impetuosity of his manoeuvres; and his personal character is said to have been untainted by that rapacity and recklessness which characterized so many of his comrades.

JOUBERT, FRANCIS, a French priest, born at Montpellier, in 1689. He was a zealous Jansenist, for which he suffered imprisonment some time in the Bastille. He wrote "Caractere essentiel aux Prophetes;" "Lettres sur l'Interpretation des Saintes Ecritures;" "Explications of the Prophets, 8 vols. 12mo; and a "History of Joseph." Died, 1763.

JOUBERT, LAURENT, a learned French physician, was born at Valence, in 1329. He became professor of medicine at Montpellier, and chancellor of the university. His Latin works were printed at Lyons in 1582, folio; besides which he wrote some medical treatises in French, particularly one on "Laughter;" and another, entitled "Erreurs Populaires touchant la Médecine," which, owing to its broad humour and a degree of levity that pervaded it, ran through ten editions in six months. Died, 1583.

JOURDAN, JEAN BAPTISTE, count, marshal and peer of France, was born in 1762, at Limoges, where his father practised as a surgeon. He entered the military service in 1778, and fought in America; but during the peace he attended to commercial affairs. In 1791 he commanded a battalion of volunteers in the army of the North; and in 1793 rose to be a general of division. Jourdan received the command of the army of the Moselle, in the place of Hoche, and gained, June, 1794, the victory of Fleurus, by which he became master of Belgium, and drove the allies beyond the Rhine. In 1803, Napoleon made him general-in-chief of the army in Italy; and, in 1804, marshal of France, and grand cross of the legion of honour. After losing the decisive battle of Vittoria, June 21st, 1812, Jourdan lived in retirement at Rouen; but, in 1814, he was appointed commander of the fifteenth division. In this station he declared in favour of Louis XVIII., and ever after continued faithful to the Bourbons. Died, 1833.

JOURDAIN, AMABLE LOUIS MICHEL BRECHILLET, born in 1788, was the son of a celebrated surgeon-dentist who practised with great reputation in Paris, where he died in 1816, leaving behind him some useful professional works. He was designed for the law; but being struck at hearing the splendid eulogies bestowed on Anquetil du Perron, the Orientalist, he determined on cultivating the same branches of learning for which that great scholar had borne distinguished. This he pursued with such success, that the office of adjunct-secretary of the school of Oriental languages was created in his favour, and he held it till his death, in 1818. He was a contributor to the "Biographie Universelle," and other extensive publications; and author of "La Perse, ou Tableau de l'Histoire, du Gouvernement, de la Religion, de la Littérature, &c. de cet Empire;" besides some others. Died, 1818.

JOUSSE, DANIEL, an eminent French lawyer and mathematician, of the 17th century. He was a native of Orleans, and in 1734 he was installed in the office of counsellor of that presidency, which he filled till his death, in 1781. His works are very numerous, including "Nouveau Traité de la Sphere," besides many treatises on the municipal law of France.

JOUCENCY, JOSEPH DE, a learned Jesuit, born at Paris, in 1643. His principal work is a continuation of the "History of the Jesuits." He also wrote a tract, entitled "De Ratione Descendi et Docendi;" and Notes on the principal Latin classics.

JOUVENET, JOHN, an historical painter,

CRAFT IS GENERALLY REPAID WITH CRAFT; AND HE WHO IS BENT ON DECEIVING ANOTHER, IS OFTEN HIMSELF DECEIVED.

AS HE THAT IS STUNG BY AN ASP DIETH SLEEPING, SO SWEETLY DOTH HE CONSUME HIMSELF WHO BORROWS UPON USURY.

born at Rouen, in Normandy, in 1644, and who studied under Poussin. He was employed to adorn the apartments of Versailles and the Trianon; he also painted colossal figures of the twelve apostles in the Hospital of the Invalids at Paris. Died, 1717.

JOVELLANOS, DON GASPAR MELCHIOR DE, one of the most distinguished Spaniards of modern times, was born at Gijon, in Asturias, in 1744, of an ancient and noble family. He was endowed with splendid talents; and not only acquired, while at college, an extensive knowledge of jurisprudence, his more especial object, but also made great progress in archaeology, languages, and the belles lettres. He soon became a member of the criminal branch of the audiencia in Seville; and advancing rapidly in his professional career, he was finally appointed to the dignified station of member of the council of the military orders at Madrid. About the same time he was entrusted with some important affairs, and nominated counsellor of state, by Charles III. When, in 1794, Spain found herself loaded with debt, Jovellanos proposed, for the relief of the national difficulties, a tax on the property of the higher order of clergy; for which he was exiled to the mountains of Asturias; though his project was afterwards carried into execution. In 1799 he was recalled, and made minister of justice for the interior; but before twelve months were past, he was dismissed, and banished to the island of Majorca, where he was confined in the convent of the Carthusians. After the fall of Godoy, the prince of Peace, in 1808, he recovered his liberty, and subsequently became a member of the supreme junta. He was, however, suspected of favouring the French; and at length, being denounced as a traitor for endeavouring to promote their plans for the subjugation of Spain, he was put to death, in 1812, during a popular insurrection. He wrote "Lyric Poems;" "Pelayo," a tragedy; "The Honourable Delinquent," a comedy; several works on subjects connected with political economy; and translated Milton's Paradise Lost.

JOVIANUS, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, a Roman emperor, was born in Pannonia, of a noble family, in 331. He was elected emperor by the Roman soldiers after the death of Julian, but refused the dignity unless they would become Christians, to which they consented. He died, after reigning seven months, owing to the suffocating vapour of burning charcoal in his room, in 364.

JOVINIAN, an Italian monk of the fourth century, who was persecuted for teaching the rational doctrine, that all those who adhered to the vows made at their baptism, and led a life of piety and temperance, were equally entitled to the rewards of futurity, as those who passed their days in monkish celibacy and self-inflicted mortification. He was banished, and died about 415.

JOVIUS, PAUL, or PAOLO GIOVIO, a celebrated Italian historian, was born at Como, in 1483; studied medicine at Pavia and Milan; relinquished that profession for the composition of history; but finally took orders, and was bishop of Nocera at the time of his death, in 1552. Living at the court of the pope, then the capital of Christendom, he became personally acquainted with many individuals of the first importance in history, or other eye-witnesses, from whom he gathered information; still when it is recollected that he used to boast of possessing pens of iron and gold, which he used as occasion required, his writings should be read with great caution. His best work is "Historia sui Temporis."

JOYCE, JEREMIAH, an ingenious and industrious writer, whose profession was that of a dissenting minister, was born in 1764; and first attracted public notice as one of the persons included in the state prosecution with Hardy, Horne Tooke, Thelwall, and others, for treason. He was the coadjutor of Dr. Gregory in the compilation of his "Cyclopaedia," and subsequently produced another on a similar plan, which goes by the name of Nicholson. He was also the author of "Scientific Dialogues;" "Dialogues on Chemistry;" "Letters on Natural Philosophy," &c. Died, 1816.

JUAN, or DON JOHN OF AUSTRIA, a natural son of the emperor Charles V., and the great military hero of his age, was born at Ratibon, in 1546. His mother is said to have been a lady named Barbara Blomberg, but this is doubtful, and a singular veil of mystery hangs over his maternal parentage. He was first employed, in 1570, against the Moors of Grenada, and acquired great fame by their subjugation. He also signalized himself by a memorable victory over the Turks, in 1571, in the gulf of Lepanto; as well as by the conquest of Tunis and other places on the African coast. In 1576 he went to Flanders, took Namur by stratagem, and succeeded in reducing the insurgents to obedience. Died, 1577.

JUAN II., Don, a natural son of Philip IV. of Spain, and of Maria Calderona, an actress, was born in 1629; made grand prior of Castile; commanded the Spanish army in Italy, 1647, and took the city of Naples; subjugated Barcelona in 1652, but being afterwards unsuccessful, was exiled. Under Charles II., he was recalled to Madrid; made prime minister; and died in 1679.

JUAN Y SANTICILIA, DON GEORGE, a learned Spanish mathematician and naval officer, was born at Orihuela, in 1712. His progress in mathematics was so great that, while a student in Carthage, he obtained the appellation of Euclid; and, entering the naval service early, his reputation as a scientific man occasioned his appointment, with Antonio de Ulloa, to accompany Bouguer and La Condamine to Peru, in 1735, to measure a degree of the meridian at the equator. He afterwards directed much of his attention to marine architecture, and his exertions to improve the Spanish navy were highly successful. He published his "Observations on Astronomy and Physics, made in Peru," and treatises on navigation and ship-building. Died, 1774.

JUBA, a king of Numidia and Mauritania, who was an ally of Pompey against Julius Caesar. After the battle of Pharsalia, he joined his forces to those of Scipio; but being totally defeated at Thapsus, he put an end to his own life; and his kingdom became a Roman province.

JUBA II., king of Numidia, son of the preceding, was, when a boy, led as a captive to Rome, to adorn the triumph of Cæsar; but the Roman conqueror bestowed on him an excellent education, and he became one of the most learned men of his time. He gained the hearts of the Romans by the courteousness of his manners, and was in great favour with Augustus, who gave him the daughter of Antony in marriage, and made him king of Gaulis; of which dignity he proved himself worthy, by governing his dominions with justice and lenity. He was also an able and prolific author; as appears by Pliny, Strabo, Plutarch, and other writers, who allude to his histories of the Arabians, Assyrians, and Romans; his treatises on the fine arts; and his natural history: of all which a few fragments only have been preserved. He died, A. D. 21. The Athenians erected a statue to his memory, and the Ethiopians paid him divine honours.

JUDAH, HAKKADOSEH, or "Jehudah the Holy," a famous rabbi, who lived in the reign of Marcus Antoninus, to whom he was preceptor, and by whose command, he compiled the Mischna, or first Talmud, being a digest of the oral law of the Jews.

JUDAH, LEO, a learned protestant divine, was born in Alsace, in 1482. Being sent to Basil to complete his academical studies, he became acquainted with Zuinglius, from whom he imbibed those principles which led to his embracing the reformed faith. He became pastor of the church of St. Peter, at Zurich, where he undertook a translation of the Old Testament, from the Hebrew into Latin, but did not live to complete it. Died, 1542.

JUDAH CHING, a learned Jewish rabbi, was born at Fez, studied among the Arabians, and practised as a physician in 1040. He was the author of several works in the Hebrew language, and was considered by the Jews as the restorer of their language, and styled the "prince of grammarians."

JUDAS LEVITA, or HALLEVI, a Jewish rabbi, was born in Spain, in 1080. He was remarkable for his great learning, and distinguished himself as a poet, grammarian, and philosopher. It is related of him, that when on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, as he approached the holy city, he rent his garments and recited aloud lamentations for the miseries of his people, which so enraged a Mahometan horseman, that he rode over him and trampled him to death.

JUEL, NICHOLAS, a Danish admiral, who learned his profession under Van Tromp and De Ruyter, in the Dutch navy; after which he returned to his native country, and greatly distinguished himself, in 1658, during the siege of Copenhagen. In 1676 and 1677 he took Gothland, and defeated the Swedes in several desperate engagements. He died in 1697; not less respected for his modesty and piety, than honoured for his bravery.

JUGLER, JOHN FREDERIC, an eminent Saxon writer, was born near Naumburg, in 1714. His principal work is entitled "Bibliotheca Historiæ Literariæ selecta." Died, 1791.

JUGURTHA, king of Numidia, was the son of Manastabal. He was endowed by nature with superior talents, and was remarkable for manly strength and personal beauty. Formed for a soldier, his valour and conduct won the esteem of the Roman army, and the friendship of Scipio; but involving himself in intrigues and crimes to obtain the Numidian crown, the Roman senate sent the celebrated Metellus against him, who conquered him in a great battle, and rejected all his bribes. When on the point of signing a shameful peace, and surrendering to the Romans, Jugurtha, through fear that they might inflict vengeance on him for his former crimes, suddenly changed his resolution, and determined once more to abide the worst. The king of Mauritania, his ally, having concluded a peace with the Romans, Sylla persuaded him to draw Jugurtha into his power, and deliver him up to the Romans. He was accordingly seized, and sent in chains, to Marius, at Ciria. Thus the war was ended, and Numidia became a Roman province. Jugurtha, having suffered many insults from the people, was thrown into a dark prison, and starved to death after six days, B.C. 106.

JULIAN, FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, surnamed the Apostate, a Roman emperor, was the youngest son of Constantius, brother of Constantine the Great. He was born in 331; educated in the tenets of Christianity, but apostatized to paganism. In 335 he was declared Cæsar, and sent to Gaul, where he obtained several victories over the Germans; and, in 361, the troops in Gaul revolted from Constantius, and declared for Julian. During the life-time of his cousin, Constantius, he made a profession of the orthodox faith; but, on succeeding to the throne, he threw off all disguise, re-opened the heathen temples, and sought to restore the heathen worship in all its splendour; while he laboured, both by his pen and authority, to destroy Christianity. He took from the Christian churches their riches, which were often very great, and divided them among his soldiers. He sought likewise to induce the Christians, by flattery or by favour, to embrace paganism; but failing in the attempt, he shut up their schools, prohibited the followers of that religion from teaching, and ordered by an edict that the name of Christian should be abolished. His malice was farther evinced, by an extraordinary indulgence to the Jews, and an attempt to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem, that the prophecy of Christ might be falsified; but it is said that flames of fire rose from beneath, and consumed some of the workmen, by which miraculous interposition the design was frustrated. He did not long survive this disappointment, being killed in 363, in his expedition against the Persians. The character of Julian is full of contradictions. He displayed learning, magnanimity, justice, and mercy; yet we find him insincere, superstitious, vain, and ambitious. No wonder, then, that historians have passed such opposite judgments on him,

HE THAT KNOWS MORE TRUTH IS NECESSARY FOR HIM OF ANOTHER, KNOWS LESS THAN HE OUGHT OF HIMSELF.

JULIEN, PIERRE, an eminent French sculptor, many of whose productions adorn the metropolis of France, and whose chef d'œuvre is "The Dying Gladiator." Born, 1731; died, 1804.

JULIEN, SIMON, a Swiss painter, who by his brother artists, was called the Apostle, in allusion to the Roman emperor of the same name, as well as to his abandonment of the French school of painting for the Italian. Born, 1736; died, 1792.

JULIO ROMANO, a celebrated Italian painter and architect, whose real name was Pirri. He was born at Rome, in 1492; studied with great success under Raphael, after whose death he finished many of the works which that great artist had left incomplete; and arrived at great professional reputation both as a painter and an architect. But it is recorded to his shame, that he disgraced his fine talents by making some obscene designs, called Arctine's figures, through which it became necessary for him to make a precipitate flight from Rome, in order to avoid the merited punishment. He afterwards resided in Mantua; and died there, in 1546.

JUNCKER, CHRISTIAN, a learned German writer; the author of "Synoptical Tables of the History of Philosophy and General Literature," and other works of a similar kind. Born, at Dresden, 1648; became rector of the college of Altenburgh; and died in 1714.

JUNGE, or JUNGIUS, JOACHIM, an eminent philosopher of the 17th century, was born at Lubeck, in 1587; and distinguished himself as an able antagonist of the Aristotelian philosophy. Like his great contemporary, lord Bacon, he substituted experiment in the place of idle and antiquated theories; and is ranked by Leibnitz as equal to Copernicus and Galileo, and but little inferior to Descartes. Among his works are "Geometria Empirica;" "Doxocopia. Physica Minores;" and "Isagoge Physicæ;" from which latter work Ray and Linnæus appear to have taken some valuable hints. Died, 1667.

JUNIUS, ADRIAN, an eminent physician and a classical writer, was born at Hoorn, in Holland, in 1512. He studied medicine at Paris, and Bologna; after which he visited England, and became physician to the duke of Norfolk. While here he published a Greek and Latin Lexicon, which the court of Rome condemned, because it was dedicated to Edward VI. On leaving England he went to Copenhagen, as physician to the king of Denmark; but soon quitted that place and settled at Haarlem, where he was made principal of the college. His translations from, and criticisms on, ancient authors, are very numerous; and he was considered inferior only to Erasmus as a scholar. Died, 1575.

JUNIUS, FRANCIS, a learned French protestant divine, was born at Bourges, in 1546. He became minister of the Walloon church at Antwerp, after which he officiated as chaplain in the army of the prince of Orange; and on leaving that service, obtained a professorship at Heidelberg, from whence he removed to Leyden, where he died of the plague, in 1602. He wrote Commentaries on the Scriptures; but is best known by his Latin version of the Bible, jointly with Tremellius.

JUNIUS, FRANCIS, son of the preceding, and eminent as a philologist, was born at Heidelberg, in 1589. After studying at Leyden, he came to England in 1620, and found a patron in the earl of Arundel, with whom he resided thirty years, as librarian; and died in 1677. His principal works are, "Glossarium Gothicum in quatuor evangelia Gothica," "De Pictura Veterum," and "Etymologicum Anglicanum."

JUNOT, ANDOCHÉ, duke of Abrantes, a distinguished French general, was born in 1771, and entered the army, as a volunteer, in 1791. He first attracted the notice of Buonaparte, by his coolness and courage when serving as a lieutenant at the siege of Toulon; and in 1805 he made him colonial-general of humars, and appointed him to the command of Paris. In the following year he was placed at the head of the army in Portugal, where he remained two years, and was honoured with his ducal title; but being defeated at the battle of Vimiera, by Sir Arthur Wellesley (the duke of Wellington) he was compelled to capitulate. He subsequently served in Spain; and was made governor of the Illyrian provinces. Died, 1813.

JURIEU, PETER, a French protestant divine and theologian, was born in 1637. He studied in England, under his maternal uncle, Peter du Moulin; and, while here, was episcopally ordained; but the French protestants disapproving of episcopal ordination, he was re-ordained according to the form of Geneva. He filled the chair of divinity at Sedan with reputation; but, when that university was taken from the protestants, he retired to Holland, and settled at Rotterdam, where he became a violent polemic, and engaged in some fierce contentions with Bayle and others. Finding that his work on the "Accomplishment of the Prophecies" produced many severe replies, and being also greatly chagrined by the decisions of the synods against some of his doctrines, he grew hypochondriacal, and died in 1713. His principal works are, a "Preservative against Popery;" "La Politique du Clergé;" "L'Accomplissement des Prophètes;" "Histoire de Calvinisme et du Papiisme," 3 vols.; and "Histoire des Dogmes et des Cultes," 2 vols. His learning was unquestionably great, but it was obscured by an intolerant and litigious temper.

JURIN, JAMES, an English physician and mathematician, was born in 1684; studied at Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; was afterwards physician to Guy's hospital; was several years secretary to the Royal Society; and died, in 1750, president of the College of Physicians. He published "Physico-Mathematical Dissertations;" an Essay upon distinct and indistinct Vision; and a translation of Varenus's Geography. He also contributed many papers on philosophical and mathematical subjects to the Philosophical Transactions; and was a warm defender of the practice of inoculation, and a zealous advocate for the Newtonian system.

JUSSIÉU, DR; ANTHONY, BERNARD, and JOSEPH; three eminent French botanists and physicians. The first was born at Lyons, in 1666; and died in 1738. He enriched the memoirs of the academy of sciences at Paris with several valuable papers, the result of observations made in his travels, on botany and mineralogy. He also wrote the appendix to Tournefort, and abridged Barrelier's work upon the plants of France, Spain, and Italy; he was likewise the author of a "Discourse on the Progress of Botany."—BERNARD, brother of the preceding, was born at Lyons, in 1692, and died in 1776. He published an edition of Tournefort's History of Plants about Paris, and was the author of a book, entitled "The Friend of Humanity, or the advice of a good Citizen to the Nation." He was botanical demonstrator at the king's garden, and was much esteemed by Louis XV. Carlier calls him "the most modest, and, perhaps, the most profound botanist of the 18th century, who, although he scarcely published any thing, is, nevertheless, the inspiring genius of modern botanists."—The third brother, JOSEPH, was also a member of the academy of sciences at Paris, and accompanied Comandine to Peru, in 1735. He was not only a good naturalist and physician, but an excellent engineer. He published a Journal of his Voyages, and died in 1779.

JUSTEL, CHRISTOPHER, a French statesman and juridical writer of the 17th century, was born in 1580, and died in 1649. He was well acquainted with ecclesiastical antiquities and the canon law, respecting which he published several learned works, and left valuable MSS. collections.—His son HENRY sent his father's MSS. to the university of Oxford, for which he was complimented with the degree of LL.D. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he came to London, and was appointed keeper to the king's library. He published, chiefly from his father's collections, "Bibliotheca Canonici veteris," 2 vols. folio, and also some able works of his own. Born, 1630; died, 1693.

JUSTI, JOHN HENRY GOTTLÖB DE, an eminent German mineralogist, who, after gaining some literary reputation at the university of Jena in 1730, enlisted as a common soldier in the Prussian service. He rose to the rank of lieutenant; was cashiered and imprisoned for insubordination, but made his escape to Leipzig, and maintained himself by writing for the press. In 1755 he became professor of political economy and natural history at Göttingen; but having written too freely on the Prussian government, was arrested, and ended his days a prisoner in the fortress of Custrin, in 1771. He was the author of a "Treatise on Money;" a "Treatise on Mineralogy;" "Miscellanies on Chemistry and Mineralogy;" and "A Complete Treatise on Manufactures."

JUSTIN, ST., a Christian philosopher and martyr in the second century, was a native of Sichein, in Samaria. A persecution breaking out against the Christians, under Antoninus, Justin presented to that emperor an admirable apology in their behalf, which had the desired effect. He afterwards addressed another apology to Marcus Aurelius, in which he defended those of his religion against the calumnies of Crescens, a Cynic philosopher. For this, and his neglect of Pagan worship, he was condemned to be scourged and then beheaded, which sentence was put in execution, A.D. 164, in the 73th year of his age.

JUSTIN, a Latin historian, who probably lived at Rome in the second or third century. He made an epitome of the history of Troguus Pompeius, a native of Gaul, who lived in the time of Augustus, and whose works, in forty-four books, contain a history of the world, from the earliest ages to his own time. Justin has been illustrated by the most able commentators, and particularly by Grevius.

JUSTINIAN I., surnamed the Great, nephew of Justin I., emperor of the East, and celebrated as a lawgiver, was born in 483, of an obscure family. He shared the fortunes of his uncle, who, from a common Thracian peasant, was raised to the imperial throne; and at whose death in 527 he obtained the exclusive sovereignty. He was then in his forty-fifth year, and distinguished for his devotional austerity; but immediately upon his elevation he solemnly espoused Theodora, an actress and courtesan, whose influence over him was unbounded. During the reign of Justinian many conquests were made by his brave general Belisarius. In 523 and 529 he obtained three glorious victories over the Persians; in 534 he destroyed the empire of the Vandals in Africa. Spain and Sicily were reconquered, and the Ostrogoths, who possessed Italy, were vanquished. The principal event, however, which has rendered the reign of Justinian interesting to posterity, was the celebrated reformation of the Roman jurisprudence. He commissioned Tribonian, aided by other learned civilians, to form a new code from his own laws and those of his predecessors. To this code Justinian added the "Pandects," the "Institute," and the "Novelle," since called, collectively, the body of civil law (corpus juris civilis.) He likewise embellished the capital with numerous magnificent churches, among which is the celebrated Sancta Sophia, now subsisting as the principal mosque in Constantinople; bridges, aqueducts, hospitals, fortresses, and other public works, were also undertaken throughout the various provinces of the empire. But towards the end of his life he became avaricious, oppressed the people with taxes, and lent a willing ear to every accusation; and at length, full of cares and disquietudes, he died, in 565, after a reign of thirty-eight years, and in the eighty-third of his age.

JUSTINIAN II. was the elder son of Constantine Pogonatus, whom he succeeded in 685. He recovered several provinces from the Saracens, and made an advantageous peace with them; but his exacting, cruel, and debaucheries, tarnished the glory of his arms. He was slain, with his son Tiberius, in 711, by Philippicus Bardanes, his successor.

JUSTINIANI, ST. LAWRENCE, the first patriarch of Venice, was born there in 1381; died in 1483; and was canonized by pope Alexander VIII. in 1690. He was the author of several devotional works, which were printed in 2 vols. folio, with a life by his nephew.

JUSTINIANI, BERNARD, nephew of the preceding, was born at Venice, in 1406; was employed in several important missions by Callistus III; wrote a history of Venice, which has been considered the first regular attempt of the kind, and the life of his uncle, Lawrence, the patriarch; and died in 1489.

JUSTINIANI, AUGUSTIN, bishop of Nebo, in Corsica, was a prelate of distinguished literary abilities. He was the author of "Annales de Republica Genovai;" a "Psalter in Hebrew, Greek, Arabic, and Chaldee, with Latin notes," &c. being the first of the kind that ever appeared in print. He perished in a voyage from Corsica to Genoa, in 1536.

JUVENAL, DECIUS JUNIUS, a Latin poet, remarkable for the caustic severity of his satires, was born at Aquinum in Campania, about the beginning of the reign of Claudius. He studied rhetoric under the most celebrated masters, and became an eminent pleader at the bar, but satire was his forte. His first essay as a poetical satirist was directed against the player Paris, who was the minion of Domitian; for which he was sent into an honourable kind of exile, by being made commander of a cohort at Pentapolis, on the borders of Egypt. On Domitian's death he returned to Rome, where he died in his eightieth year, A.D. 126. He may be said to have been the last of the Roman poets; and as the bold and unflinching castigations of vice he stands without a rival. Good as are his intentions, however, and forcible as are his denunciations, the moral indelicacy of the age in which he lived, renders the satires of Juvenal too gross in their details for readers of the present day. Able translations have been made by Dryden, Gifford, &c.

JUVENCUS, CAIUS VECTIS AQUILINUS, one of the first Christian poets, was a native of Spain, and lived in the reign of Constantine. His performance is a life of Christ in Latin verse, entitled "Historie Evangelice."

JUXON, WILLIAM, an English prelate, of distinguished learning and piety, was born at Chichester in 1582. He was educated at Merchant Tailors' school, and St. John's college, Oxford; was patronized by Laud, and, through his influence, obtained the bishopric of Hereford in 1633, and of London in the same year. In 1635 he was made lord high treasurer of England, an office which no churchman had held since the reign of Henry VIII. This gave great offence to the puritans; but, on his resignation of the office, after having held it something less than six years, the integrity and ability with which he had discharged its various duties were admitted on all hands. During the whole of the civil war he maintained an unshaken fidelity to the king, whom he attended during his imprisonment in the Isle of Wight, and on the scaffold; on which occasion he received from the hand of Charles, the moment previous to his execution, his diamond George, with directions to forward it to his son. After the king's death, the parliament threw him into confinement for contumacy in refusing to disclose the particulars of his conversation with the king; but he was soon released, and continued to live in privacy until the restoration. He was then raised to the see of Canterbury; but did not long enjoy the honours and emoluments of the primacy; his death occurring about two years after his elevation, in 1663.

K.

KAAB, a celebrated Arabian poet, contemporary with Mahomet, whom he at first strenuously opposed, but afterwards eulogized. As a reward for writing a poem in his favour, the prophet gave him his green mantle, which one of the decaudants of Kaab sold for ten thousand pieces of silver. Died, 662.

KAAS, NICHOLAS, an eminent Danish statesman, was born in 1635, and studied in the universities of Germany. In 1673 he was made chancellor of Denmark; and on the death of king Frederic II. in 1688, he was nominated to fill the situation of first regent during the minority of Christian I. Being attacked with a mortal disease previous to the coronation of that prince, he sent for him as he lay on his death-bed, and, telling him that he had promised his royal father in his last moments, to do all he could to see the crown placed on the head of his son, he gave him the key of the place where the crown and other regalia were kept, saying, "Take it in the name of God, and wear the crown with glory; sway the sceptre with wisdom and clemency; bear the sword with justice; and keep the globe with judgment." Died, 1594.

KABRIS, JOSEPH, a French sailor, who being taken prisoner by the English in the last war, obtained permission to enter on board a South-sea whaler, and being wrecked on the coast of the island of Noukahiwa, in the Pacific ocean, fell into the hands of the cannibal inhabitants. While preparations were making for his intended fate, and his doom appeared inevitable, he was saved by the intercession of the king's daughter, who shortly after became his wife. Being now allied to royalty, he was made chief judge of the island, which office he exercised with reputation, and comparative ease, owing to the simplicity of their legal institutions. Nine years thus passed away, and Kabris lived in the enjoyment of domestic happiness, when he was carried off, as he stated, while asleep, by the Russian navigator, captain Krusenstern. On returning to France in 1817, he exhibited himself to the public at Paris and elsewhere, his face being tattooed in the New Zealand style. His object was to raise money, to enable him to return to his wife and family at Nookahiva; but while travelling for this purpose, he died suddenly at Versailles, in 1822.

KEMPFER, ENGELBRECHT, a celebrated physician, naturalist, and traveller, was born at Lemgo, in Westphalia, in 1681; studied at Danzig, Thorn, and Cracow; performed a journey, in 1683, as secretary to a Swedish embassy, by land through Russia and Persia; after which he visited Arabia, Hindostan, Java, Sumatra, Siam, and Japan, in which last country he resided two years. In 1692 he returned to his native country, took his degree of M.D., at Leyden, and entered upon medical practice. He was the author of a "History of Japan," 2 vols. folio; "Amnities Exoticæ," &c. Died, 1716.

KAESTNER, ABRAHAM GOTTHELF, a mathematician, astronomer, and poet, was born in 1719, at Leipzig; and filled the situation of professor of mathematics at Göttingen, with the highest reputation, for more than forty years. His scientific works are extremely numerous; of which the principal is a "History of Mathematics." Died, 1799.

KAHLER, JOHN, a Lutheran divine, was born at Wolmar, in the landgrate of Hesse Cassel, in 1649; became professor of mathematics, theology, and poetry, at Rinteln; wrote several dissertations on theology and philosophy; and died in 1729.

KAIN, HENRY LOUIS LE, a celebrated French actor, called the Garrick of France, was born at Paris in 1729. He was originally a cutler, but having a great turn for dramatic representation, Voltaire took him under his direction. He made his first appearance on the stage in 1760; amassed a large sum of money by the exercise of his professional talents, obtained a pension, and died in 1778.

KALB, BARON DE, a major-general in the American army, was born in Germany, about the year 1717. He entered into the French service when young, and continued in it forty-two years. In 1757, during the war between Great Britain and France, he was sent by the French government, to the American colonies, in order to see what effect the seeds of discontent against the mother country might be sown among them. While in the performance of this commission he was seized, as a suspected person, but escaped detection. He then went to Canada, where he remained until its conquest by the British, after which he returned to France. During the war of the revolution he offered his services to the congress, which were accepted, and he was soon after made a major-general. On the 18th of August, 1778, when Lord Rawdon defeated general Gates, near Camden, the baron commanded the right wing of the American army, and fell covered with wounds.

KALCKREUTH, FREDERIC ADOLPHUS, count of, a Prussian field-marshal, was born at Eisleben, in 1737; entered the army in 1751; served with distinction in the seven years' war; arrived, step by step, at the rank of general, and was made a count in 1788. His courage and ability were often conspicuously shown in the war with France; he took Mayence, in 1793; had the chief command of the troops in Pomerania, in 1795; was appointed governor of Thorn and Danzig, and made inspector-general of cavalry, in 1806; concluded with Bérthier, at Tilsit, the truce between Prussia and France, in 1807; after which, in conjunction with Goltz, he concluded a peace with Talleyrand. He was then made field-marshal; was appointed governor of Berlin, in 1810; and died in 1816.

KALDI, GEORGE, a learned jesuit, was born in Hungary, about 1572. He was banished from Transylvania with the rest of his order; on which he became professor of theology at Olmutz, and next at Presburgh, where he died in 1634. He translated the Bible from the Vulgate into the Hungarian tongue.

KALE or KALF, WILLIAM, an eminent painter, was born at Amsterdam, in 1630. He had the power of Rembrandt in distributing his light and shade, while in correctness and delicacy he equalled Teniers. Died, 1693.

KALKBRENNER, CHRISTIAN, an eminent musical composer, was born in 1756, at Münden, in Prussia; was a pupil of Emanuel Bach; and having made considerable progress both in theoretical and practical branches of the profession, entered the service of prince Henry of Prussia, and finally settled in Paris, where his reputation obtained him the appointment of singing-master to the academy of music, which he held till his death, in 1806. He was the author of several operas, two musical treatises, &c.

KALM, PETER, a Swedish traveller, and natural philosopher, was born in 1715, in Ostro Bothnia; travelled in North America and Russia, for the purpose of exploring those countries; became professor of botany in the university of Abo; and died in 1779. His works consist of "Travels in America," which have been translated into English; besides numerous dissertations, illustrative of the state of commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, in Sweden.

KANT, EMMANUEL, a celebrated German metaphysician, and the founder of a new philosophical sect, was born at Königsberg, in Prussia Proper, in 1724, and was the son of a saddler. Through the kindness of a rich uncle, he was educated at the Frederician college, on leaving which he accepted the situation of tutor in a clergyman's family. He commenced his literary career in his twenty-third year; but it was not till he was appointed a professor in the university of Königsberg, in 1770, that any traces of his new metaphysical system, which afterwards attracted so much notice, appeared in his works. In 1781 he published his "Critical Inquiry into the Nature of Pure Reason," which contains the system commonly known under the title of the "Critical Philosophy." A second part of it, published in 1783, bore the title of "Prolegomena for future Metaphysics." The principles contained in them he had, however, long been promulgating from his professorial chair. In 1786 he was chosen rector of the university; and, though far advanced in life, he continued to produce works in farther development of his philosophical principles, until 1798, when he retired from his official situations; and died in 1804. Kant was a man of high intellectual endowments; and his critical philosophy for a time superseded every other in the protestant universities of Germany. From the first, however, it had many opponents; and now that the novelty of this system of metaphysics (more remarkable for the obscurity of its phraseology and the subtlety of its reasoning, than for any practical good in morals), is worn off, its advocates are comparatively few. Yet it must be confessed, that his philosophical conceptions flowed from the inexhaustible source of his own reason; that he not only discovered the incongruities of other men's sentiments, and traced, with wonderful precision, their errors to their true origin; but that he had an astonishing faculty of unfolding the most abstruse principles, and digesting single and individual sentiments into a systematic order. His works are far too numerous for insertion here; but they are all, more or less, of a metaphysical character.

KAPNIST, a Russian dramatic poet, whose comedies are among the best in that language, was born in 1758, and died in 1834.

KARAMSIN, NICHOLAS MICHAELOVITCH, imperial Russian historiographer, was born in 1766; educated at Moscow; served for a while in the imperial guards; and travelled for two years, through Middle Europe; after which he devoted himself to literature. His "History of the Russian Empire;" the "Letters of a Russian Traveller;" and "Agila," a collection of tales; are all works of merit, and in much esteem. Died, 1826.

KATE, LAMBERT TEN, a native of Holland, who distinguished himself by an elaborate work on the Dutch language, printed at Amsterdam, in 1723.

KATER, Captain HENRY, F.R.S., was born at Bristol, in 1777. He was intended for the legal profession, and served two years in a pleader's office; though, from his earliest years, he had shown a decided predilection for mathematical studies. On the death of his father, in 1794, he quitted the law, and obtained a commission in the 12th regt. of foot, then stationed in India. Soon after he arrived, he was engaged in the trigonometrical survey of India, a stupendous undertaking; but his unremitting study during seven years in a hot climate greatly injured his health, and rendered it necessary for him to return. He subsequently devoted his whole time to science; and, among other useful inventions, his meritorious labours for constructing standards of weights and measures are universally known and appreciated. Many learned societies enrolled him among their members, and the emperor of Russia not only employed him to construct standards for the weights and measures of his empire, but presented him with the order of St. Anne and a diamond snuff-box. Died, 1835.

KAUFMANN, MARIA ANNA ANGELICA, a distinguished artist, born at Coire, in the Grisons, 1741. She acquired the first principles of drawing and painting from her father, whom she soon excelled. At Milan, Florence, Rome, and Naples, she greatly increased her skill; and when, in 1766, she came to England, and was patronized by royalty, her reputation and success quickly improved her circumstances. She remained here seventeen years; married Zucchi, a Venetian painter; and died at Rome, in 1807. She excelled most in the representation of female characters; and many of her most admired paintings were engraved by Bartolozzi, whose labours much contributed to the growth and perpetuity of her fame.

KAUNITZ, WENCESLAUS ANTHONY, prince, a German statesman, was born at Vienna, in 1711; and though at first destined for the church, he finally engaged in political life. His talents, aided by a favourable exterior, opened a brilliant career to him. In 1744 he was made minister of state for the kingdoms of Hungary and Bohemia; in 1748 he assisted at the congress of Aix-la-Chapelle; was honoured with the order of the golden fleece by Maria Theresa, and employed as ambassador to Paris; returned to Vienna in 1753, and took the office of chancellor of state; concluded the treaty of alliance between Austria and France, in 1756; was made a prince of the German empire, in 1764; and died, aged 53, in 1794.

KAYE, or CAIUS, DR. JOHN, the founder of Caius college, Cambridge, was born at Norwich, in 1510; was educated for the medical profession, first at Glonville-hall, Cambridge, and subsequently at Bologna, where he graduated as M.D. On his return to England he became physician to the court, and held that office during three successive reigns. He was for several years president of the college of physicians; and in 1557, he obtained a royal license to advance Glonville-hall into a college; which he endowed with several considerable estates, and added to it the quadrangle. Dr. Kaye was himself the first master of this increased establishment, now known as Caius college; which he retained till near his death, in 1573. He was the author of various works on medicine, a "History of Cambridge," &c.

KAYE, DR. THOMAS, master of University college, Oxford, was contemporary with the preceding, with whom he carried on a warm controversy respecting the comparative antiquity of these two celebrated seats of learning, in a work, entitled "Assertio Antiquitatis Oxoniensis Academicæ."

KAZWINI, ZACHARIAN BEN MOHAMMED, a learned Arabian geographer and naturalist of the 13th century; of whose labours Bochart, Hyde, Sir W. Ouseley, and other Orientalists have availed themselves. He is supposed to have died in 1263.

KEACH, BENJAMIN, a Baptist minister, born in 1640. In 1664 he was tried, and sentenced to stand in the pillory for the publication of a book, called "The Child's Instructor." After this he was chosen pastor of a congregation in Horsley-down, Southwark, where he died in 1704. His "Travels of True Godliness," and "Travels of Ungodliness," written in the manner of Bunyan, were once very popular; but he is now best known by his "Tropologia, or Key to open Scripture Metaphors," and by his "Exposition of Parables."

KEAN, EDMUND, an eminent English tragedian, was the son of a Miss Carey, (who was the daughter of the well-known George Saville Carey, a dramatic writer and performer), and a scene-carpen-ter of the name of Kean, whose brother, Moses Kean, obtained some notoriety as a mimic and ventriloquist. He was born in Castle-street, Leicester-square, London, in 1787, according to some accounts, and according to others, two or three years later. He trod the stage almost as soon as he could walk alone, being employed in processions, &c. thus imperceptibly acquiring the rudiments of his theatrical education under the eye of that great actor, John Kemble, whose rival he was afterwards destined to become. Miss Tidwell, an actress long known on the metropolitan stage, and said to have been a relation, assisted Kean in his juvenile efforts; and at the age of thirteen, recommended him to a company of players in Yorkshire. He performed there under the name of Carey, and is said to have obtained much applause in the parts of Hamlet, Lord Hastings, and Cato. He also distinguished himself by his talents for recitation; and his delivery of Satan's Address to the Sun, from Milton's Paradise Lost, and the first soliloquy in Shakspeare's Richard III. having been highly applauded, he repeated his recitations at Windsor, before some of the royal family. He had also the good fortune to attract the notice of Dr. Drury, who sent him to Eton, where he remained three years, and is said to have made great progress in classical studies, devoting much of his attention to the precepts and examples of Cicero. On quitting Eton he procured an engagement at Birmingham, where he was seen by the manager of the Edinburgh theatre, who engaged him for twenty nights, on twelve of which he performed Hamlet to crowded houses. He was at this time only sixteen; and we find that his provincial engagements led him, in the course of a few years, to nearly all the principal towns in the south and west of England, playing in tragedy, comedy, opera, and pantomime. In the mean time, Dr. Drury, his old patron, had recommended him to the directing committee of Drury-lane, as fitted to revive that declining theatre. He was, in consequence, engaged there for three years, at a rising salary of eight, ten, and twelve guineas a week for each successive year. His first appearance was on the 26th of January, 1814, in the character of Shylock. The house was comparatively empty; but in order to show the effect he produced on that occasion we will quote the words of a critic, who saw, and thus describes it:—"There came on a small man, with an Italian face and fatal eye, which struck all. Attention soon ripened into enthusiasm; and never, perhaps, did Kean play with such startling effect as on this night to the surprised few! His voice was harsh, his style new, his action abrupt and angular; but there was the decision, the inspiration of genius, in the look, the tone, the bearing;—"that night was the starting-post on the great course on which he was destined to run his splendid race." In Othello, also, and Sir Giles Overreach, he has been unequalled by any contemporary. When he performed Massinger's Jew the first time, the actors, and others of his admirers, presented him with a gold cup, as a token of their esteem. In 1820, he visited the United States, and performed in New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Boston, on the whole, with great success. After his return to England, the extravagance and dissoluteness which had always disgraced his character, involved him in great embarrassments; and a second visit to America, in 1823, was attended with little credit or advantage. He returned again to England, and became manager of the theatre at Richmond, Surrey, where he died, after a protracted illness, May 18, 1833.

KEATE, GEORGE, F.R.S. a miscellaneous writer, was born at Trowbridge, in Wiltshire, in 1729, and educated at Kingdon school; after which he went to Geneva, where he contracted an intimacy with Voltaire; to whom he afterwards dedicated his "Account of the Republic of Geneva." His first literary performance was "Ancient and Modern Rome," a poem, 1660. His publications after this were very numerous; the principal is an "Account of the Pelæu Islands," which he compiled from the papers of Captain Wilson, and his officers, who were shipwrecked there in 1783. Died, 1797.

KEATING, GEOFFREY, an Irish ecclesiastic of the Roman church, who wrote a history of the poets of Ireland, and the genealogies of the principal families. He died in 1650.

KEATS, JOHN, a young English poet, of humble origin, was born in 1796, at a livery-stable kept by his grandfather in Moorfields. He was apprenticed to a surgeon, but gave way to the ambition of becoming a poet. He published "Endymion," a poetical romance, in 1818; and, in 1820, his last and best work, "Lamia," and other poems. Being in feeble health, from a severe pulmonary disease, he was advised to try the fine climate of Italy, where he arrived in November, 1820, accompanied by his friend Mr. Severn, the artist, and died in Rome, on the 27th of December following. He was interred in the English burying-ground, near the monument of Caius Cestius, and not far from the place where soon after were deposited the remains of the poet Shelley. Mr. Leigh Hunt, who was his earliest and warmest patron, describes him as having "a very manly, as well as a delicate spirit," and being gifted with "the two highest qualities of a poet in the highest degree—sensibility and imagination."

whose industry was so remarkable during his whole life, that some account of it is absolutely due to his memory. He was born about 1633; studied at Oxford; and was called to the bar in 1658. Three years afterwards he began to signalize himself by the constant regularity of his appearance in the court of King's Bench, where from that time to the day of his decease, a period of nearly half a century, he occupied himself incessantly as a reporter of the cases which came before the court. Nor was he less persevering while attending the chapel, copies of upwards of 4000 sermons, delivered by various preachers in that place of worship, being found among his papers when he died, in 1710. His publications are numerous, the principal being "A Table to the Statutes;" "Assistance to Justices of the Peace;" "Reports," 3 vols.; and "Essays on Human Nature and Human Actions."

KECKERMAN, BARTHOLOMEW, a learned Calvinistic divine and professor of philosophy, was born at Dantzig, in 1371. He studied at Wirtemberg, Leipzig, and Heidelberg, at which last university he became professor of Hebrew. In 1601 he removed to Dantzig, and there pursued a new method of teaching; but died, aged 38, in 1609. His works were published at Geneva, in 2 vols. folio.

KEENE, EDMUND, bishop of Ely, a munificent, pious, and learned prelate, was born at Lynn, in Norfolk, in 1713. His father was an alderman of that town, and his brother, Sir Benjamin Keene, was many years ambassador at Madrid. He was educated at the Charter-house, and at Caius college, Cambridge. In 1740 he was presented to the rectory of Stanhope, in the bishopric of Durham, and, in 1748, he became master of Peter-house, which he continued to hold when advanced, in 1752, to the bishopric of Chester. In 1770 he was translated to Ely, the revenues of which see he improved by the sale of the old palace in Holborn, to the amount of 5000*l*. per annum, besides building a better episcopal residence in Dover street, Piccadilly. He had previously erected a new palace at Chester, and he also enlarged that at Ely. Died, 1781.

KEILL, JOHN, a learned mathematician, was born at Edinburgh, in 1671. In 1696, he published an Examination of Burnet's Theory of the Earth, to which he subjoined Remarks on Whiston's Theory. The year following he was appointed deputy professor of natural philosophy; and in 1701 he published his "Introductio ad Veram Physicam," as a preparation for the study of Newton's "Principia." In 1708 he defended Newton's claim to the invention of Fluxions, which brought him into a dispute with Leibnitz. In 1709 he was appointed treasurer to the German exiles in the Palatinate, and attended them in that capacity to New England. He next defended Newton's doctrine against the Cartesian; and received his degree of M.D. In 1714 he was chosen Savilian professor of astronomy at Oxford, and the year following appointed decipherer to the queen. Among his works are "An Introduction to true Philosophy;" and "An Introduction to true Astronomy." Died, 1731.

KEILL, JAMES, younger brother of the preceding, was born in Scotland, in 1672, and died in 1719. He wrote on "The Anatomy of the Human Body," and published several physiological tracts and papers in the Philosophical Transactions.

KEISER, REINHARD, an eminent German musician and composer, was born at Leipzig, in 1673. He was the author of one hundred and eighteen operas, of which his "Circé," brought out at Hamburg in 1734, was the last and most beautiful. He possessed a most fertile imagination, and is considered as the father of German melody. Died, 1735.

KEITH, GEORGE, a native of Aberdeen, was a fellow student there with bishop Burnet, and took his degree of M.A.; but quitted the presbyterian church to become a Quaker, and went to Pennsylvania. At length, becoming dissatisfied with the sect, he formed a new one of his own; and subsequently entered into the church of England, took orders, and obtained some preferment. He wrote several books both for and against the Quakers; was a believer in the transmigration of souls, the millennium, &c.; is described as an eloquent speaker, and an acute disputant. Died, about 1715.

KEITH, JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD, a field-marshal in the Prussian service, and a brave and experienced warrior, was the youngest son of William Keith, earl-marshal of Scotland, and was born in 1696. At the breaking out of the rebellion, in 1715, he joined the Pretender, and was wounded at the battle of Sheriffmuir; but made his escape to France, where he applied himself to military studies, and became a member of the Academy of Sciences. From Paris he went to Madrid, and obtained a commission in Ormond's Irish brigade; but on accompanying the Spanish embassy to Russia, he entered into the service of that state, was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-general, and invested with the order of the black eagle. In the Russian service he continued several years, distinguishing himself as well in the field as in the cabinet, during the wars between that country and Turkey and Sweden. He at length left Russia and went to Berlin, where the king of Prussia, to whom his abilities were well known, received him with open arms, and made him field-marshal of his forces and governor of his capital. In the subsequent wars of this monarch, Keith displayed the greatest talents and bravery, till his career was finally closed on the field of battle, at the affair of Hochkirchen, Oct. 4, 1758.

KEITH, THOMAS, a celebrated mathematician, and author of several excellent works, was born in 1739, at Brandaburton, near Beverley, in Yorkshire. His parents dying when he was only fourteen, he engaged himself as tutor in a private family. In 1781 he settled in London, and soon acquired distinction as a mathematician. In 1804 his reputation as an accountant led to his being appointed professor of geography and the sciences to the Princess Charlotte of Wales; and in 1814 the situation of accountant to the British Museum becoming vacant, the archbishop of Canterbury conferred it on Mr. Keith, who held it till his death, in 1894. His principal works are: "The Complete Practical Arithmetician;" "An Introduction to Geography;" "Plane and Spherical Trigonometry;" a "Treatise on the Use of the Globes;" and "Elements of Geometry."

KEITH, GEORGE KEITH ELPHINSTONE, viscount, a gallant British admiral, was the son of Lord Elphinstone, and born in Scotland, in 1747. He entered early into the naval service: in 1773, was made master and commander, and two years after, post-captain. During the revolutionary war in America, he served there with great reputation; and on the commencement of the French war in 1793, he was appointed to the command of the Robuste, in which ship he served under Lord Hood, and bore a distinguished part at the capture as well as at the evacuation of Toulon. He assisted in reducing the Cape of Good Hope, in 1795, and captured a squadron that was sent to its relief, for which he was created a baron; commanded subsequently the Mediterranean and Channel fleets; was created an English viscount in 1814; and died in 1833.

KELLERMANN, FRANCIS CHRISTOPHER, duke of Valmy, peer and marshal of France, &c., was born at Strasburg, in 1738; entered the Condé's legion as a hussar, when seventeen years of age, and rose to the rank of quarter-master-general, in 1768. At the breaking out of the revolution, he distinguished himself by his patriotism and judgment. At the commencement of the war he received the command of the army of the Moselle; formed a junction with the main army under Dumouriez; and sustained Sept. 30th, 1793, the celebrated attack of the duke of Brunswick, at Valmy; which contributed much to the success of the campaign. He was repeatedly denounced to the National Convention by Custine and others; but his trial not taking place till after the reign of terror, he was acquitted. In 1796 he took the command of the army of the Alps and Italy; but he was soon superseded by Buonaparte. In 1798 he was nominated a member of the military board; in 1801 he was president of the conservative senate, and the following year a marshal of the empire. He served under Napoleon in Germany and Prussia; and having, in 1814, voted for the restoration of royalty, was employed under the Bourbons till his death in 1820.

KELLER, JOHN BALTHASAR, an excellent founder in brass, was a native of Zurich. He cast the equestrian statue of Louis XIV., which was set up at Paris in place of Louis the Great. Keller was made inspector of the foundry at the arsenal, and died in 1702.

KELLEY, or TALBOT, EDWARD, a celebrated necromancer and alchemist, was born at Worcester, in 1535, and educated at Gloucester-hall, Oxford; but was obliged to leave the university, for some crime, and, after rambling about the kingdom, was sentenced to lose his ears at Lancaster. He next became an associate with the credulous Dr. Dee, and accompanied him to Prague, where Kelley contrived to live handsomely by his impostures, and was knighted by the emperor Rodolphus; but his tricks being discovered, he was thrown into prison, and in attempting to escape, he fell, and bruised himself to such a degree, that he died soon after, in 1585. He wrote a poem on chemistry, and another on the philosopher's stone; besides several Latin and English discourses printed in Dr. Meric Casaubon's "True and faithful Relation of what passed for many years between Dr. John Dee and some Spirits."

KELLISON, MATTHEW, an English Catholic divine, who as a controversial writer was opposed to Suicille, Montague, and other Protestants, was born in Northamptonshire, about 1560. He was educated at the English colleges at Douay and Rheims; resided seven years at Rome; became chancellor of the university of Rheims; and, after remaining there twelve years, removed to Douay, and was declared president of that college by a patent from Rome. Died, 1611.

KELLY, HUGH, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1739, near the lake of Killarney. He was apprenticed to a staymaker, which trade he quitted when in London, and became clerk to an attorney. Afterwards he turned his attention to authorship with considerable success, writing political pamphlets, plays, &c. His works are "False Delicacy;" "A Word to the Wise;" "The School for Wives;" the "Romance of an Hour," comedies; "Clementina," a tragedy; "Theopis," a poem in the manner of Churchill's Rosciad; "Louisa Mildmay," a novel; and "The Babbler," a collection of essays. Died, 1777.

KELLY, JOHN, a learned English clergyman, was a native of Douglas, in the Isle of Man, and born in 1750. Having paid a particular attention to the vernacular dialect of the Celtic tongue, which was spoken in that island, he was introduced to bishop Hildesley, who employed him in translating the Bible into the Manx language, and ordained him a minister of the episcopal congregation of Ayr, in Scotland. Through the patronage of the duke of Gordon, to whose son, the marquis of Huntly, he was tutor, he obtained the rectory of Copford, in Essex; and having entered at St. John's college, Cambridge, he was there honoured with the degree of LL.D. In 1803 he published "A Practical Grammar of the Ancient Gaelic, or Language of the Isle of Man;" and in 1805 issued proposals for publishing "A Triglot Dictionary of the Celtic Tongue," which was nearly completed when the sheets were destroyed by a fire on the premises of Mr. Nichols, the printer. Dr. Kelly died in 1809.

KELLY, MICHAEL, a composer and singer, was the son of a wine merchant in Dublin, who, for many years, acted as master of the ceremonies at the vice-regal castle. He was born in 1763, and at an early age gave proofs of genius for music, which induced his father to place him under Rauzzini, at that time in Dublin, who prevailed on his friends to send him to Naples, where he arrived when in his sixteenth year. He there found a patron in Sir William Hamilton, the British minister; studied under Finerotti and April; and subsequently performed at most of the Italian theatres, and in Germany. He contracted a close intimacy with Mozart during his stay at Vienna; was, for some time, in the service of the emperor Joseph; and at length returned to London, where he made his first appearance, in 1767, at Drury-lane theatre, in "Lionel and Clarissa," and retained his situation as first singer at that theatre, the musical performances of which he directed till his retirement from the stage. He set to music upwards of sixty pieces, most of which were successful, and amongst these are the once highly-popular compositions in Colman's musical romance of "Bluebeard." A few months previous to his death appeared his "Reminiscences," a very amusing work, replete with anecdotes of his contemporaries and familiar associates. Died, 1836.

KEMBLE, JOHN PHILIP, the most distinguished and accomplished actor on the British stage since the days of Garrick, was the eldest son of Roger Kemble, manager of a company of comedians at Prescott, in Lancashire, where he was born in 1757. Being of Catholic parents, he was sent to the English college at Douay, where he early distinguished himself by his proficiency in elocution, and had Talma for a fellow-student. Finding that his father designed him for the priesthood, he quitted the college clandestinely, returned to England, and, engaging in an itinerant company, performed with great eclat at Liverpool, Edinburgh, York, &c. In 1793 he made his first appearance on the boards of Drury-lane, in the character of Hamlet. His success was complete; and from that time he maintained the character of being the first tragedian of the age. On the secession of Mr. King, he became manager of Drury-lane theatre. In 1802 he took advantage of the peace to visit the continent, in order to study the French and Spanish histrionic establishments, with a view to the improvement of the English. On his return, he became manager of Covent-garden theatre, where he continued till 1809, when that building was destroyed by fire. On the restoration of the edifice, Mr. Kemble was, during the O P riots, as they were called, the object of popular resentment, in consequence of having raised the prices, and made certain obnoxious arrangements in regard to the private boxes. In 1817 he retired from the stage, after a long and honourable career; and, in consequence of ill health, went first to Montpellier, and thence to Lausanne, where he died, Feb. 26, 1823, after a paralytic attack. The learning, elegant manners, and accomplishments of Mr. Kemble, introduced him into the best company, by whom he was at once courted and esteemed. As a tragedian, when personating characters more immediately adapted to his style of excellence, such as Cato, Coriolanus, Hamlet, Penruddock, &c., he was unrivalled. And his managerial duties were marked by the exhibition of much refined and accurate taste, in the rectification of scenic decoration, and the adoption of appropriate costume, adding thereby both to the splendour and illusion of the drama. He was the author of "Belshazzar," a tragedy;

"Lodoiska," an opera; and "The Female Officer," a farce; besides which he altered and modernized many of the old dramas.

KEMBLE, GEORGE STEPHEN, brother of the foregoing, and also an able actor, was born at Kingstown, in Herefordshire; his mother having performed the part of Anne Bullen, in the play of Henry VIII. on the evening of his birth. This gentleman was intended for the medical profession, and was apprenticed to a surgeon in Coventry; but soon quitted it for the stage. He first appeared at Covent-garden theatre in 1763. He was afterwards manager of the theatres of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Liverpool, and Newcastle; and was remarkable for playing the part of Falstaff without stunting. Died, 1822.

KEMP, JOSEPH, an eminent musical composer, was born at Exeter, in 1778; and was a chorister in the cathedral of his native city, where he studied under the celebrated William Jackson. In 1802, having been appointed organist of Bristol cathedral, he removed thither, and in the same year composed one of his best anthems, "I am Alpha and Omega." In 1807 he left Bristol for London, and the year following took the degree of M.B. at Cambridge. In 1809 he proceeded to that of doctor, when his exercise entitled "The Crucifixion" was performed. He now became a lecturer in music at several institutions, and invented a new mode of teaching the science. His principal works are, "A new System of Musical Education, being a Self-Instructor;" "Twenty Psalmical Melodies;" "The Siege of Icha," an opera; with a variety of songs, glees, duets, &c.

KEMPELEN, WOLFGANG, baron, a celebrated mechanician, was born in 1734, at Presburg, in Hungary. Among his inventions was the famous automaton chess-player, which he first exhibited at Paris in 1783, and afterwards in London; but the secret of it was never discovered. He also invented a speaking figure, which he himself described in a work called "The Mechanism of Speech." He was also an author, and wrote "Perseus and Andromeda," a drama; "The Unknown Benefactor," a comedy; and some poems. Died, 1804.

KEMPIS, THOMAS A., a famous writer of the 14th century, was born at a village of that name, in the diocese of Cologne, in 1380; and died in 1471. His treatise "De Imitatione Christi," or, of the Imitation of Christ, some have attributed to Gerson.

KEN, THOMAS, a learned and pious dignitary of the church of England, was born at Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, in 1637. His conscientious propriety of conduct and unyielding morality found favour even with the licentious Charles II., who made him his chaplain, and afterwards preferred him to the bishopric of Bath and Wells. He opposed the endeavours of James to introduce popery, and was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower for resisting that monarch's dispensing power. Dr. Ken was the author of sermons, poems, &c.; which were published, with his life, by his nephew, in 4 vols. Died, 1711.

and in 1647 became rector of Blissland, in Cornwall, from whence he removed to London. He died in 1663. Dr. Kendal wrote a "Vindication of the Doctrine generally received in the Churches concerning God's Intentions of Special Grace and Favour to his Elect in the Death of Christ," folio; the "Doctrine of the Perseverance of the Saints, against John Goodwin," folio, &c.

KENNAWAY, Sir JOHN, bart., was born at Exeter, in 1758; and, after receiving his education in the grammar-school of that city, went out to India, in 1772, as a cadet. In 1780 he received a captain's commission, and served in the Carnatic against Hyder Ali; but on his return to Bengal, his skill in the native languages, and his talents for diplomacy, recommended him to the notice of the marquis Cornwallis, who, soon after, appointed him one of his aid-de-camps, and sent him, in 1788, as envoy to the court of Hyderabad, to demand of the nizam the cession of Guntoor. In this mission he was eminently successful, and he was rewarded with a baronetcy. In 1792 he was again employed in a diplomatic mission, having for its object a treaty of peace with Tippee Sultan. This he also executed most successfully, Tippee ceding half his dominions, and agreeing to pay 3,300,000*l.* for the expenses of the war, and to give two of his sons as hostages for the due performance of the engagement. Sir John's health having suffered much during his residence in India, he returned in 1794, and retired on a pension granted him by the East India Company. Died, January 1, 1836.

KENNEDY, JAMES, bishop of St. Andrew's Scotland, born in 1406, was the founder of the college and church of St. Salvador, and also of the abbey of the Observantines. He filled the office of lord chancellor for a time; and in the minority of James III. was one of the lords of the regency. Died, 1466.

KENNEDY, JOHN, rector of Bradley, in Derbyshire; a good mathematician, and the author of "Scripture Chronology;" "The Doctrine of Commensurability," &c. Died, 1770.

KENNET, WHITE, a learned prelate, notorious for his party zeal, was born at Dover, in 1660. He was educated at Westminster school, and at Edmund hall, Oxford; obtained, successively, the livings of Ambroden, Shotlesbrooke, and St. Botolph's, Aldgate, and was made archdeacon of Huntingdon in 1701. He had originally been a Tory; but he now attached himself to the Whigs, and entered into a controversy with Dr. Atterbury respecting the rights of convocations; and also opposed Sacheverel. He made himself conspicuous by a funeral sermon preached for the first duke of Devonshire in 1707, which gave great offence, as an apology for the sins of the great. The same year he obtained the deanery of Peterborough; but so obnoxious had he now become by the violence of his partisanship, that Welton, the rector of Whitechapel, caused his portrait to be exhibited in the character of Judas, in the altar-piece of that church. This gross act of indecency was properly resented, and the painting removed. In 1718 he was made bishop of Peterborough; and died in 1738. He was an able antiquary, and published various works on theology, antiquities, and ecclesiastical history; besides which he edited the Collection of "English Historians," which bears his name.

KENNET, BASIL, brother of the preceding, was born in 1674, and educated at Corpus Christi college, Oxford. In 1706 he went as chaplain to the English factory at Leghorn, but ran a narrow risk of being sacrificed to the fury of the Inquisition. He returned in 1714, and was admitted to his degree of D.D., but died a few months afterwards. His principal works, besides translations of ancient and modern authors, are, "Romæ Antiquæ Notitiæ;" "Lives of the Grecian Poets;" "Exposition of the Apostle's Creed;" and "Sermons."

KENNICOTT, BENJAMIN, an able divine and biblical critic, was a native of Totnes, Devonshire, of which place his father was parish clerk. He was educated at Wadham college, Oxford; became vicar of Culham, preacher of Whitehall, librarian of the Radcliffe, a prebend of Westminster, and canon of Christchurch. Dr. Kennicott's literary fame mainly rests on his Hebrew Bible, 2 vols. folio: in collating the numerous manuscripts for the text of which he was incessantly occupied during more than ten years. Though some object to this great work, that the author was insufficiently acquainted with the Eastern languages, yet every scholar admits that he rendered great service to the cause of science and religion by opening the way in this department of biblical criticism. He died in 1783.

KENRICK, WILLIAM, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Watford, in Hertfordshire. He was brought up as a rule-maker, but quitted his trade, obtained a doctor's degree at Leyden, and became an industrious author and critic. He established the "London Review," in which many critiques of merit appeared, too often, however, contaminated by vituperative language and unwarrantable personalities. He compiled a "Dictionary of the English Language;" and wrote various works, among which are the comedies of "Falstaff's Wedding," "The Widowed Wife," and "The Duellist;" "Epistles, Philosophical and Moral," and various poems. Died, 1779.

KENT, WILLIAM, an ingenious artist, was born in Yorkshire, in 1685. He was originally a coach-painter, but left that branch to study the principles of design; for which purpose he went to Rome, where he studied under Luti, and found a patron in lord Burlington, who brought him to England and lodged him in his own house, in 1719. As a painter, however, he never attained celebrity; his talent lay more in ornamental architecture. But it is as the inventor of the modern style of landscape gardening that his fame rests: he broke up the old uniformity of straight lines and corresponding parts, and threw wood, water, and ground, into the beautiful shapes presented by nature; rendering that graceful, pleasing, and attractive, which before was stiff and formal. Died, 1748.

and was born Nov. 2, 1787. He received the rudiments of his education in England, but completed it at Göttingen and Hanover. Entering the army at an early age, he became an enthusiastic admirer of military discipline; and having attained the rank of colonel, he served during the years 1790 and 1791, under general O'Hara, at Gibraltar, where he rendered himself so unpopular by his strictness, that his regiment repeatedly mutinied. On quitting Gibraltar, he was sent out as commander of the forces in Canada; after which he received orders to join the expedition under Sir Charles Grey, against the French West India islands. During the campaign that ensued, his impetuous bravery was so conspicuous at the head of the flank division, particularly when storming the strong and important posts in Martinique and Guadeloupe, that "the flank corps" became a standing toast at the admiral's table, as well as at that of the commander-in-chief. In 1803 his royal highness was appointed governor of Gibraltar; but his desire to repress irregularities, and enforce subordination, led to very disagreeable consequences. Having refused a request of the soldiers to celebrate Christmas-eve, as a holiday, and put the deputation who brought it under arrest, the men in the garrison became mutinous, and proposed placing general Barnet in the command. Christmas-day passed in confusion; and on the following night the prince headed his regiment, and marched against the rebellious party. It was some-time before they gave up the contest; at length, after blood had been shed, peace was restored, and the ringleaders were tried by a court-martial; but it was thought prudent to recall the duke, and he accordingly soon after returned to England. On the 20th of May, 1819, the duke of Kent married Victoria Maria Louise, widow of the prince of Leiningen, and sister of Leopold, now king of Belgium. The royal pair soon after arrived in this country, and on the 24th of May, 1819, the duchess gave birth to a daughter, VICTORIA, our present gracious QUEEN. Having accompanied the duchess to Sidmouth, in Devonshire, where she resided during the latter part of the year, with a view to the re-establishment of her health, he caught a violent cold, which being followed by fever and inflammation, the symptoms increased so rapidly as to resist every effort of medicine; and after an illness of one week, his royal highness died, January 23, 1820. His condescending manners, and liberal principles, had rendered him a great favourite with the nation, and his death was generally regretted.

KENYON, LLOYD, lord, a celebrated judge, was born at Gredington, in Flintshire, in 1733, and received his education at Ruthin school, in Denbighshire. After being articled to Mr. Tomlinson, an attorney at Nantwich, in Cheshire, he became a member of the society of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1761; but he does not appear to have made a conspicuous figure till 1780, when he led the defence, with Mr. Erskine, for lord George Gordon. In 1783 he was made attorney-general and chief justice of Chester. He was also returned to parliament for Hindon, in Wiltshire. In 1784 he was appointed master of the tolls; and on the resignation of the earl of Maunsfield, in 1788, he was raised to the office of chief justice of the King's Bench, and created baron Kenyon. Died, 1802.

KEPLER, JOHN, a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, to whom astronomy is indebted for much of its present perfection, was born in 1571, at Wül, in the duchy of Wirtemberg. He was educated at Tübingen, under Mästlinus, and, in 1591, was appointed professor of astronomy at Gratz; soon after which he published his "Mysterium Cosmographicum." In 1599 he was banished the university for professing the reformed religion, but was afterwards recalled, and restored to his office. In 1600, he was invited by Tycho Brahe to join him in Bohemia; and when Tycho died, he became mathematician to the emperor Rodolph, who employed him in completing the Rodolphine tables. To Kepler we are indebted for the discovery of the laws which regulate the movements of the planetary bodies, their ellipticity, &c.; and he accordingly ranks among the first class of astronomers. Among his scientific productions are "The Rodolphine Tables;" "Optical Astronomy;" "Harmony of the World;" "Copernican Astronomy," &c. Died, 1630.

KEPPEL, AUGUSTUS, viscount, a celebrated English admiral, was the second son of William, earl of Albemarle. He accompanied commodore Anson in his voyage round the world, and afterwards passed through all the gradations of the service, till he attained the rank of admiral. In 1778 he commanded the channel fleet, which, on the 12th of July, in that year, fell in with the French, under count d'Orvilliers, off Ushant. A partial action ensued, which the English admiral thought to have renewed in the morning, but the enemy had retired. This affair gave great dissatisfaction to the nation, which was aggravated by Sir Hugh Palliser, second in command, preferring a charge against admiral Keppel; but he was honourably acquitted by a court-martial at Portsmouth. Sir Hugh was then tried and censured. In 1782 admiral Keppel was raised to the peerage; he was also at two separate periods first lord of the admiralty. Died, 1786.

KERALIO, LOUIS FELIX GUINEMENT DE, a French literary character, was born in 1731, at Rennes. After having attained the rank of major in the army, he retired from the service, and was appointed preceptor to the prince of Parma, jointly with Condillac. He afterwards became professor of tactics at the military school at Paris, which he retained till the Revolution, when he was appointed inspector-general of the military schools throughout France, and had the command of a battalion of the national guard. He was the author of two historical works on the wars between the Russians and Turks. Died, 1793.

KERGUELIN TREMAREC, YVES JOSEPH DE, a French navigator, was born at Brest, in 1745. After having been employed on the coast of Iceland, to protect the whale fishery, he was sent, in 1771, on an exploratory voyage to the South Sea; and having returned with a flattering account of a supposed continent towards the south pole, was again sent on a similar expedition in 1773. On his return he was charged with having abandoned a boat's crew on a desert shore; for which he was cashiered and imprisoned; but he was at length liberated. He published accounts of his voyages to the North and South Seas; and died in 1797.

KERKHERDERE, JOHN GERARD, a divine and historian, was born near Maestricht, about 1678; studied at Louvain, where he became professor of history and the belles lettres; was historiographer to the emperor; and died in 1736.

KERR, ROBERT, a surgeon at Edinburgh, who devoted himself principally to the physical sciences, and distinguished himself as an industrious author and translator. Among his works are "A History of Scotland during the reign of Robert Bruce;" a translation of "Lavoisier's Elements of Chemistry;" "Lacépède's History of Quadrupeds and Serpents;" "The Animal Kingdom, or Zoological System of Linnaeus;" Cuvier's "Theory of the Earth;" a "General Collection of Voyages and Travels," in 16 vols., &c. Died, 1814.

KERSAINT, ARMAND GUY SIMON, count de, was a native of Paris, and originally served as an officer in the navy. At the commencement of the French revolution, he published a pamphlet, entitled "Le Bon Sens," in which he attacked the privileged orders; but though he was an active member of the national convention, he espoused the cause of the more moderate party, endeavoured to stem the rage of the terrorists, and on the trial of the king, proposed an appeal to the people. Finding his efforts unavailing, he sent in his resignation; and on being called on to account for his conduct, he defended himself with firmness, and refused to resume his place. For this offence he was put to death, in December, 1793.

KERRICK, THOMAS, principal librarian of the university of Cambridge; author of "Observations on the Gothic Buildings abroad, particularly those in Italy, and on Gothic Architecture in general." Died, 1828.

KERSEY, JOHN, a mathematician, was born at Bodicote, near Banbury, in Oxfordshire, in 1616. His works are "The Elements of Algebra;" "An improved edition of Wingate's Arithmetic;" and "Dictionary Anglo Britannicum; or, a General English Dictionary." Died, 1702.

KESSEL, JOHN VAN, an artist, was born at Antwerp, in 1686, and died about 1690. He painted portraits in the manner of Vandyke; but excelled in the representation of flowers, fruits, and insects.

KETEL, CORNELIUS, a Dutch artist. He came to England in the reign of Elizabeth, whose portrait he painted, as well as the portraits of many of the nobility. On his return to Holland he laid aside the use of pencils, and painted with the tips of his fingers, and even with his toes. Died, 1602.

KETT, WILLIAM, a tanner of Norfolk, who in the reign of Edward VI. excited a revolt against the government. After defeating the marquis of Northampton, he was routed by the earl of Warwick, and Kett with several others was hanged, in 1549.

KETT, HENRY, a divine and an accomplished scholar, was born in 1761, at Norwich; was educated at Trinity college, Oxford; was appointed Bampton lecturer in 1790; and became perpetual curate of Hykeham, in Lincolnshire. He was the author of "History, the Interpreter of Prophecy;" "Elements of General Knowledge;" 2 vols.; "A Tour to the Lakes;" "Emily;" a moral tale, 3 vols. &c. After holding his fellowship many years, he married, and obtained the living of Charlton in Gloucestershire. His death was melancholy, having incautiously ventured out of his depth while bathing, at Stanwell, in 1828.

KETLEWELL, JOHN, a learned and pious English divine; born 1633; died, 1693. His most celebrated work, entitled, "Measures of Christian Obedience," has gained him a lasting reputation.

KEULEN, LUDOLPH VAN, a Dutch geometer, who acquired great celebrity by his calculation of the approximate correspondence between the diameter of a circle and its circumference. He taught mathematics at Breda and Amsterdam. Died, 1610.

KEULEN, JANSSEN VAN, a portrait painter, was born in London, of Dutch parents; and before Vandyke came to England, was in great favour with Charles I. Died, 1663.

KEYSLER, JOHN GEORGE, a German antiquary, was born at Thornau, in 1689, and died in 1743. He wrote an interesting account of his travels, which was translated into English in 1756. He was also the author of a work, entitled "Antiquitates Selecte Septentrionales et Celticae," and a "Dissertation on the Antiquity and Origin of Stonehenge."

KIDDER, RICHARD, a learned English prelate, was a native of Sussex, or, as some say, of Suffolk, and was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge, where he was elected to a fellowship. He was presented to the college living of Stanground, in Huntingdonshire, which he lost for non-conformity in 1662; but becoming less scrupulous, he obtained the rectory of Rayne, in Essex, and afterwards that of St. Mary Outwich. In 1681 he was made prebend of Norwich; and, in 1689, dean of Peterborough, on which occasion he took his doctor's degree. On the deprivation of Dr. Ken he was consecrated bishop of Bath and Wells, and preached the Boyle's lecture in 1693. He and his lady were killed in their bed at Wells, during the night of the great storm, Nov. 26, 1703. Besides several sermons and religious tracts, he published a valuable work, entitled "The Demonstration of the Messiah," 3 vols. 8vo.; a "Commentary on the Pentateuch," 2 vols. 8vo. &c.

KIEN-LONG, emperor of China, distinguished for his love of literature, was born in 1710, and died at the end of the 18th century, aged ninety, having reigned above sixty years, and greatly extended his territories. He wrote some poetical pieces, and when lord Macartney went thither as ambassador, he gave him some of his verses to present to the king.

painter of Utrecht, was born in 1590, and died in 1646.

KIESEWETTER, CHRISTOPHER GOTTFRID, a celebrated musician and performer on the viola, was born at Aspach, and played in the royal chapel there. He came to England in 1821, established his reputation as a solo and concerto player, and was the first who introduced the compositions of Mayseider into this country. Died, 1837.

KILBYE, RICHARD, an English divine, studied at Lincoln college, Oxford, of which he became rector in 1580. He was one of the translators of the present version of the Bible, and died in 1626.

KILLIGREW, WILLIAM, THOMAS, and HENRY, three brothers, distinguished for their talents, wit, and loyalty, in the reigns of Charles I. and II., were the sons of Sir Robert Killigrew, of Hanworth, in Middlesex.—WILLIAM, the eldest, was born in 1605; and after going through the usual course of a university education at St. John's college, Oxford, made the tour of Europe. On his return to England, he obtained a place at court, as one of the gentlemen ushers of the privy chamber to Charles I. During the civil wars, he suffered materially, both in purse and person, in consequence of his adherence to the royal cause; in recompense for which he received, after the restoration, the honour of knighthood, and obtained the post of vice-chamberlain. He composed four plays, which were popular in their day; also two essays, written in the decline of life, on the instability of human happiness; and died in 1693.—THOMAS, the second son, born in 1611, was a page to Charles I., and accompanied the prince of Wales into exile. During his absence from England, he visited France, Italy, and Spain, and, after the restoration, was appointed by the new king (with whom he was a great favourite), one of his grooms of the bedchamber. A vein of lively pleasantry, combined with a certain oddity, both of person and manner, placed him high in the good graces of Charles, who would frequently allow him free access to his person, when characters of the first dignity in the state were refused it; till Killigrew, at length, became almost the inseparable companion of his monarch's familiar hours. This was the Killigrew that obtained the appellation of "King Charles's jester;" but though he was undoubtedly a mirth-creating spirit, his eleven dramatic pieces discover few traces of that facetiousness and whim which one imagines he must have actually possessed. Died, 1662.—HENRY, the youngest of the three, was bred to the church, and obtained a stall in Westminster Abbey. From this he was ejected by the parliamentarians, but at the re-establishment of monarchy, it was restored to him, with other preferment. Died, 1690.—His daughter, Anne Killigrew, born in 1680, had a decided genius for painting and poetry, and was distinguished for her exemplary piety and unblemished virtue—amidst the seductions of a licentious court. She was one of the maids of honour of the duchess of York, of whom, as well as of her husband, she executed portraits. She died, a victim to the small-pox, in 1685; and has been characterized by one of her contemporaries as "a grace for beauty and a muse for wit." Several of her historical paintings are still in existence.

KIMBER, ISAAC, a dissenting minister, born at Wantage, Berks, in 1692; author of a "History of England," in 4 vols.; a "Life of Oliver Cromwell;" some essays, discourses, &c. Died, 1738.—His son, EDWARD KIMBER, followed the same pursuits. His publications were the "Peccages of Scotland and Ireland; the "Baronetage of England;" a "History of England," 10 vols. 8vo.; and "The Adventures of Joe Thompson," a novel, 2 vols.

KIMCHI, DAVID, was a Spanish rabbi in the twelfth century, and is considered the best grammarian of his nation. He resided at Marbonne, and was appointed arbiter of the dispute between the Spanish and French Jews, respecting the books of Maimonides. He was the author of several theological and philological works in Hebrew; lived to an extreme old age; and died in 1240.

KING, Dr. WILLIAM, archbishop of Dublin, was born in 1650, and educated at Trinity college. He was the author of a celebrated treatise, "De Origine Mali," or the Origin of Evil; wherein he undertook to show how all the several kinds of evil with which the world abounds are consistent with the goodness of God, and may be accounted for without the supposition of an evil principle. Died, 1729.

KING, PETER, lord chancellor of England, was born in 1609, at Exeter. He was famous for his ecclesiastical learning, as well as his knowledge in the law. He wrote "A History of the Apostles' Creed; and "An Enquiry into the Constitution of the Primitive Church." Died, 1734.

KING, EDWARD, an ingenious and promising young man, who was drowned about 1633 on his passage from Chester to Ireland, which melancholy event occasioned Milton's beautiful poem of Lycidas. Some of Mr. King's poems are in Nichols' collection of poets.

KING, WILLIAM, a poet and miscellaneous writer, was born in London, in 1663; was educated at Christchurch, Oxford; admitted an advocate at Doctors' Commons; and obtained various preferments in Ireland. His poetical and political works are numerous, and some of them are replete with pleasantry and wit; but his most useful books is "An Historical Account of the Heathen Gods and Heroes." Died, 1712.

KING, WILLIAM, principal of St. Mary Hall, Oxford, and an ingenious theological and political writer. He was the author of various Latin tracts; but the work by which he will be remembered is, "Political and Literary Anecdotes of his own Times." Born, at Stepney, 1643; died, 1763.

KING, EDWARD, an antiquary, was a native of Norwich; studied at Lincoln's Inn; was called to the bar, and became recorder of Lynn. He was F.R.S. and A.S.; and produced an excellent work, entitled "Monumenta Antiqua," 3 vols. folio. Born, 1735; died, 1807.

KING, RICHARD, a clergyman, whose polemical writings attracted some notice, was a native of Bristol, and was educated at New College, Oxford. He held the livings of Steeple Morden, in Cambridgeshire, and Worthing, in Shropshire; and was the author of "Letters from Abraham Plymley to his brother Peter, on the Catholic Question," &c. Died, 1810.

KING, THOMAS, a celebrated actor and dramatic writer, was born in London, in 1730. Having attained great celebrity as a comic actor in provincial companies, he was engaged as Drury-lane theatre in 1759, where he soon became a great favourite with the public, and in 1766 arrived at the height of his professional reputation by his performance of Lord Ogilby. He subsequently became manager and part proprietor of the Bath and Bristol theatres, and also of Sadler's Wells; but these he relinquished, and continued to perform principally at Drury-lane, till he retired from the stage in 1801. His dramatic pieces are, "Love at First Sight;" "Neck or Nothing," a farce; "A Peep behind the Curtain, or the New Rehearsal," a comedy; "Wit's last Stake," a comedy; and "Lovers Quarrels." Died, 1805.

KING, RUPUS, an American statesman and diplomatist, was born in 1755, at Scarborough, in the district of Maine; entered at Harvard college in 1773; studied the law, and was admitted to the bar in 1778; and was elected a member of congress in 1784. When the general convocation met at Philadelphia, in 1787, for the purpose of forming a constitution for the country, Mr. King was sent to it by the legislature of Massachusetts. In 1788 he removed to New York city, and in the following year he was elected a member of the New York legislature. In 1796 he was appointed by president Washington, minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James's, the functions of which office he continued to discharge till 1803, when he returned home. In 1813 he was a third time sent to the senate by the legislature of New York; and his speech on the burning of Washington by the English, was a most eloquent display of senatorial oratory. In 1816 he lost his election; but, in 1820, he was once more re-elected, and continued until the expiration of the term in 1823. He then accepted the appointment of minister plenipotentiary at the court of London; but was taken ill, returned home, and soon after died, aged 72, in 1827.

KINGSTON, ELIZABETH, duchess of, whose singular adventures have been variously recorded, was the daughter of colonel Chudleigh, governor of Chelsea college, and born in 1720. At the recommendation of Mr. Pulteney, she was appointed one of the maids of honour to the princess of Wales, mother to George III. Possessed of talents, wit, and beauty, Miss Chudleigh had numerous admirers, and became the rallying point of the opposition party. Having privately married captain Harvey, afterwards earl of Bristol, she soon conceived a violent dislike towards him, which led to a separation, and induced her to go abroad; but, previous to her departure, she advertised for a gentleman companion, which was answered by a major in the army, and they proceeded together on their tour as far as Berlin, when, finding no sympathy in their tastes and opinions, they separated. After the most flattering reception at the courts of Dresden and Berlin, she returned to England, and resumed her situation as maid of honour to the princess. Desirous of disuniting the nuptial tie with captain Harvey, she went to Laureston, where it had taken place, and having asked for a sight of the marriage register, she adopted the infamous expedient of tearing the leaf out on which her union with Harvey was recorded. A short time after, her husband came into possession of the card; but he was dangerously ill, and the lady thinking there was a chance of her becoming a rich widow, found means to have the perfoliated leaf replaced. Not long after this, the countess inspired the duke of Kingston with a violent passion, and he offered her his hand; but her husband, who had recovered from his illness, at first refused his consent to their divorce, though he afterwards agreed to it; and in 1769, she married the duke of Kingston. He died in 1773, leaving her an ample fortune, upon the condition that she should not marry again. But she did not enjoy her riches undisturbed. The heirs of the duke instituted a suit at law against her for bigamy, as having been divorced by an incompetent tribunal. As soon as she was apprised of this proceeding, she came to England, and attended the sittings in Westminster-hall, dressed in a suit of black, accompanied by two waiting women, her medical attendant, her secretary, and six lawyers. At this extraordinary trial, she was found guilty by the peers, and adjudged to be burnt with an iron on the right hand; but this punishment was remitted on her pleading the privilege of peerage, and she was discharged on paying the fees of office. The duchess spent her latter years in France, and died at her seat near Fontainebleau, in 1786.

KINNAIRD, the Hon. DOUGLAS, was born in 1786, and received his early education at Eton. He afterwards passed some time at Gottingen, where he made himself master of the French and German languages. On leaving Gottingen he went to Cambridge, and there became the associate of the first characters of the day. In 1813, he accompanied Mr. Hobhouse through Sweden, and to Vienna, and was present at the battle of Culm. He became an active partner in the banking-house of Ransom and Morland; and after the old partnership was dissolved, took the principal management of the business. He was a man of considerable abilities, possessed great energy of mind, was a lover of literature, and a liberal patron of the arts.

KIPPIS, ANDREW, a dissenting divine, biographer, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Nottingham, in 1735. He was the pastor of congregations, successively at Boston, Dorking, and Westminster; received a doctor's degree from the university of Edinburgh; and was latterly one of the tutors at the new academy or dissenters' college, Hackney. Dr. Kippis laid the foundation of the "New Annual Register," and devoted his principal attention during the latter years of his life to an improved edition of the "Biographia Britannica."

of which five volumes were printed; but it was conducted on a plan so elaborate as to afford no prospect of its termination. He also published the Lives of Captain Cook, Fringing, Doddridge, and Lardner; "A Vindication of the Dissenters;" a volume of sermons; and "Observations on the late Contents in the Royal Society." Died, 1796.

KIRBY, JOHN JOSEPH, an artist, was born at Parham, in Suffolk, in 1716. Though originally a house-painter, he had a good knowledge of the art; and on settling in London he was introduced by lord Bute to George III., by which he became clerk of the works at Kew, and had the honour of teaching the queen the principles of perspective. He published, at the expense of the king, "The Perspective of Architecture," 2 vols. folio; was F.R.S., and A.S.; and died in 1774. The celebrated Mrs. Trimmer was his daughter.

KIRCH, GODFRAY, an astronomer, was born at Guben, in Lusatia, in 1640, and was educated at Leipzig, where he gained great credit by his almanacks. On the establishment of the academy of sciences at Berlin, he was elected a member, and appointed astronomer in ordinary, with a pension. Died, 1710.

KIRCH, MARY MARGARET WINKELMAN, wife of the preceding, was born in 1670. She was early distinguished by her astronomical talents, and greatly assisted her husband in the calculation of his "Ephemerides," &c. After his death she maintained her family by the construction of almanacks; and many of her astronomical observations and discoveries were published in the memoirs of the French academy of sciences. In 1716 she settled at Berlin, and was appointed astronomer to the academy. She died in 1730.—Her son, CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, was born at Guben, in 1694. He was a member of the academies of Paris and Berlin; and acquired great reputation by his observations. Died, 1740.

KIRCHER, ATHANASIUS, a jesuit, was born in 1601, at Geysen, near Fulda, in Germany, and studied at Wurtzburg and Altdorf; after which he was teacher of mathematics in the college belonging to his order at Rome, where he was professor of Hebrew. His works evince great depth of learning; the principal are,—"Œdipus Ægyptiacus," 4 vols. folio; "Ars Magnæsis;" "Lingua Ægyptiaca restituta;" "Mundus Subterraneus;" "Organon Mathematicum;" "Musurgia Universalis," &c. Died, 1680.

KIRCHMAN, JOHN, a learned German; professor of poetry at Rostock, and rector of the college of Lübeck, his native place. Born, 1675; died, 1643.

KIRCHMAN, N. professor of philosophy at Pterburg, celebrated by the manner of his death. Being engaged in attracting, by his apparatus, the electric fluid from the clouds, a ball of fire struck him on the head, and killed him on the spot, August 6, 1753.

KIRK, Colonel, an English officer who, in 1683, committed the most inhuman barbarities in the west of England. James II. had the means to solicit this butcher to turn Catholic, but Kirk roughly replied, "that when he was at Tangiers he had promised the dey that if he ever changed his religion, he would turn Mahometan." He afterwards served in the army of king William, and died at the close of the 17th century.

KIRKALDY, WILLIAM, a distinguished military character in the reign of Mary, queen of Scots. He early joined the party known by the name of the Lords of the Congregation, but afterwards attached himself to Maitland, who was at the head of the partisans of Mary. He was executed at Edinburgh in 1573.

KIRKLAND, THOMAS, an eminent physician, who settled at Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, where he died in 1798, aged 77. He was the author of "An Enquiry into the State of Medical Surgery," 2 vols. 8vo.; "Observations on Pott's Remarks on Fractures;" "a Treatise on Child-bed Fevers;" "Thoughts on Amputation;" and a "Commentary on Apoplectic and Paralytic Affections."

KIRSTENIUS, PETER, an eminent physician, and professor of medicine at Upsal, in Sweden, was born at Breslaw, in Silesia, in 1577. He was well skilled in Arabic, and understood twenty-five other languages. His works, which are chiefly on the oriental languages, are numerous and erudite. Died, 1640.

KIRKPATRICK, JAMES, a skilful orientalist, was a major-general in the British service, and passed a great part of his life in India. He published a "Description of the Kingdom of Nepal;" a "Biography of Persian Poets;" and the "Letters of Tippoo Saib." Died, 1812.

KIRWAN, WALTER BLAKE, an Irish divine, eminent for his popularity as a preacher. He was born at Galway, in 1734; was educated at St. Omer's and Louvain; took orders as a Catholic priest; and, in 1778, was appointed chaplain to the Neapolitan embassy in London. In 1787 he conformed to the established church, and obtained, successively, the prebendary of Howth, the living of St. Nicholas, in Dublin, and the deanery of Killalea. As a pulpit orator he excelled all his contemporaries; so great, indeed, were his attractions, that we are told, it was often necessary to keep off the crowds, by guards and palisades, from the churches in which he was preaching. No wonder, therefore, that his exertions in favour of charitable institutions were in urgent request, or that he succeeded in an astonishing manner to assist their funds. He died, exhausted by his labours, in 1805; and a volume of his sermons were published after his decease.

KIRWAN, RICHARD, LL.D., a distinguished writer on chemistry, geology, &c. was a native of Galway county, in Ireland. He was educated at the university of Dublin; devoted himself with great ardour to chemical and mineralogical researches; and became a member of the Royal Irish Academy, and also a fellow of the Royal Society. In 1784 appeared his "Elements of Mineralogy," 2 vols. 8vo. He also published "Geological Essays;" a treatise on the "Analysis of Mineral Waters;" an "Essay on Phlogiston and the Constitution of Acids," &c. Died, 1812.

KITCHENER, WILLIAM, a physician and miscellaneous writer, was born about 1775, and was the son of a respectable coal-merchant in London, who left him a large fortune. He was educated at Eton, and settled in London as a physician; but he distinguished himself far more by his precepts on the art of gastronomy, than by the practice of medicine. He was a kind-hearted, social being, with more foibles than faults; one, in fact, who delighted in little eccentricities, and who, rather than not acquire any kind of notoriety, was happy to obtain it by the singularity of his conduct. He accordingly wrote a book, under the title of "The Cook's Oracle," in which the laws of the culinary art, professedly founded on his own practice, were promulgated; and, by appointing a "committee of taste" among his friends, who had regular invitations to his dinner-table, the fame of this epicure spread far and wide, while his evening conversations were the resort of privileged wits, and literary bon vivants. He was a great stickler for punctuality; and, for the regulation of these meetings, a placard was fixed over the chimney-piece, with this inscription, "At seven come, at eleven go," to which the facetious George Colman once added the word "It," making the last sentence, "at eleven go it!" Optics and music were also particular objects of his study; and on these and other subjects he displayed a very commendable degree of solicitude. Besides "The Cook's Oracle," which was his most popular work, he published "The Art of Invigorating and Prolonging Life;" "The Economy of the Eyes;" "The Traveller's Oracle;" "Observations on Vocal Music;" and "The Loyal and National Songs of England." Died, 1837.

KLEBER, JEAN BAPTISTE, a celebrated French general, was born, at Strasburg, in 1754. He was originally an architect, but preferred the military profession, and entered into the Austrian service, where he remained from 1776 to 1783. When the French revolutionary war broke out, he entered as a grenadier into a volunteer regiment of his native department, and rose rapidly into command. He displayed great skill and bravery at the siege of Mayence, after which he was employed in La Vendee, but the sanguinary scenes there so disgusted him that he obtained his recall, and was engaged in the north, where he defeated the Austrians, took Mons, and drove the enemy from Louvain. He also captured Maastricht, and contributed to the splendid successes which distinguished the campaigns of 1795 and 1796 on the Rhine. The directory gave him the command of the army of the Sambre and Meuse, which he resigned to Hoche, and for a time retired from the service. Buonaparte, however, who well knew the value of his talents, prevailed upon him to join the expedition to Egypt. He was wounded at the battle of Alexandria, but he marched into Syria, where he commanded the corps of observation during the siege of Acre, and defeated the Turks in several actions. When Buonaparte left Egypt, he appointed Kleber commander-in-chief of the army; and though, under the then existing circumstances, no situation could be more difficult or disheartening, yet he maintained himself successfully against the enemy, captured the city of Cairo, and made an alliance with Murad Bey; but in the midst of new preparations which he was making for securing possession of the country, he was assassinated by an Arab, June 14, 1800. Of all the military characters that figured during the era of the French revolution, few of them surpassed Kleber for coolness, courage, and activity; while scarcely one was equally distinguished for humanity and integrity.

KLAPROTH, MARTIN HENRY, an eminent chemist and mineralogist, was born at Berlin, in 1743; became chemical professor there; and died in 1817. He was the discoverer of uranium, the strontia, and mellic acid; he also made interesting experiments on copal, and completed the discovery of tellurium and titanium. Among his works are, "A Mineralogical System;" "Chemical Essays;" and, in conjunction with Wolf, a "Dictionary of Chemistry."

KLEIST VON NOLLENDORF, EMILIOUS FREDERIC, count, a distinguished Prussian general, was born at Berlin, in 1763. Having risen by his talents and courage to the rank of general, he commanded corps of Prussians, in 1812, auxiliary to Napoleon's grand army; signalized himself in the battle of Bautzen, May 20, 1813; and was one of the plenipotentiaries who concluded the armistice. After the retreat of the allied troops from Dresden into Bohemia, Kleist gave battle to the army under Vandamme, and by his victory at the village of Nollendorf saved Bohemia, against which Napoleon had directed his best energies. He was afterwards known by the sabb of Nollendorf. Died, 1821.

KLEIST, CHRISTIAN EWALD VON, a German poet, was born at Zeblin, in Pomerania, in 1715. After studying the mathematics, philosophy, and law, at Konigsberg, he entered into the Danish service, and next into that of Prussia, where he rose to the rank of major; and was killed, after displaying almost romantic bravery at the battle of Kunnersdorf, in 1759. His principal poem, entitled "Spring," is beautifully descriptive, and has been compared to the Seasons of Thomson. Kleist also wrote idylls; moral treatises; and a military romance, called "Cissides."

KLINGEMANN, AUGUSTUS, a dramatic writer, and director of the national theatre at Brunswick, was born in that city, in 1777. In 1813 he received the direction of the theatre of his native place, and under his superintendence it became one of the first in Germany. His dramatic works form 12 vols., and among them are "Heinrich der Lowe," "Luther," "Moses," "Faust," &c.

KLINGER, FREDERIC MAXIMILIAN VON, an officer in the Russian service, and a literary character, was born at Frankfort on the Main, in 1753. He commenced as a dramatic writer; but in the war of the Bavarian succession, he entered the military service, and was made a lieutenant in the Austrian army. In 1790 he went to St.

Petersburg, and was appointed an officer and reader to the grand-prince Paul, with whom he afterwards travelled through Poland, Austria, Italy, France, &c., and in the reign of Catherine, he rose to the rank of colonel. By the emperor Paul he was made major-general, and director of the corps of cadets, and when Alexander ascended the throne, he received other offices and further promotion. After having served forty years, he retired; and died in 1831. His works, which are of a peculiar character, and written in an exaggerated style, form 12 volumes.

KLOPSTOCK, FREDERIC THEOPHILUS, one of the most celebrated of the German poets, was born at Quedlinburg, in 1724. After receiving a liberal education at his native place, he was sent to study theology at Jena, where he wrote a great part of his "Messiah," which he published in 1747, at Leipzig. Though this poem underwent the ordeal of severe criticism by some, it was admired by more; and Bodmer, with the Swiss in general, were loud in its praises. Klopstock was invited into that country, and while there, the people regarded him with a kind of veneration. From thence he was called to Copenhagen by the most flattering promises, which were amply fulfilled. In 1771 he went to reside at Hamburgh, as Danish legate, and counsellor from the court of Baden. He died in 1803, and was buried with great pomp and solemnity. As a lyrical writer, Klopstock is, perhaps, amongst the most successful of any age, and may well be called the Pindar of modern poetry. His patriotism is strong and ardent, and his latter odes, called forth by the French revolution, in which at first he took the warmest interest, are distinguished by bold and original terms of expression. His tragedies, though not calculated for the stage, contain beautiful language, and are replete with the loftiest sentiments; but his greatest work, "The Messiah," though possessing much sublimity and feeling, did not fulfil the high expectations of his countrymen, who predicted that it would eclipse the Paradise Lost of Milton. He was twice married. MARGARET, his first wife, whom he married in 1754, and who died in 1758, was a woman of kindred genius and literary accomplishments. Among her productions are "The Death of Abel," a tragedy; and "Letters from the Dead to the Living."

KLOSE, F. J. an ingenious composer and professor of music, who both by his printed works and his skill as an instructor on the piano-forte, attained considerable celebrity in London; of which city he was a native, and where he died, in 1830.

KLOTZ, CHRISTIAN ADOLPHUS, an eminent German scholar and critic, was born in 1738, at Biechowswerden, in Lusatia; studied at Leipzig and Jena; and, in 1762, was appointed professor of philosophy at Gottingen. He afterwards, by the invitation of Frederic the Great, held a similar situation at Halle, where he died in 1771. Klotz distinguished himself chiefly by his Latin poems, his numismatic treatises, his works on the study of antiquity, and on the value and mode of using ancient gems.

KLUIT, ADRIAN, a Dutch historian, was born at Dort, in 1735: studied at Utrecht; and became professor of archaeology and diplomatics at Leyden. His political opinions occasioned his removal from the chair in 1795; but in 1806, under the regal government, he was professor of statistics. His death, which took place in 1807, was owing to the destruction of his house from the explosion of a boat laden with gunpowder, which was moored to the quay near which he resided. His chief work is a history of the political affairs of Holland to 1795, in 5 vols.

KNELLER, SIR GODFREY, an eminent portrait painter, born at Lubeck about 1648, was designed for a military life, and sent to Leyden to study mathematics and fortification, but, showing a decided bent for painting, was placed under Bol and Rembrandt at Amsterdam. Having visited Italy, where he studied with Carlo Maratti and Bernini, he came to England, in 1674; and was much patronized by Charles II., James II., and William III., for the latter of whom he painted the beauties at Hampton court, and several of the portraits in the gallery of admirals. His colouring is lively, true, and harmonious; his drawing correct, and his disposition judicious: he displays, however, a singular want of imagination in his pictures, the attitudes, action, and drapery being tasteless, unvarying, and ungraceful. He has been accused of caring more for money than for lasting fame, and the consequence is, that many of his productions are below mediocrity. He was in habits of intimacy with Pope and most of his eminent contemporaries; and, as he possessed a fund of humour and was of a gay and convivial turn, his acquaintance was eagerly sought after. He continued to practise his art till after he was seventy years of age, amassed a large fortune, and died in 1723.

KNIAJENIN, JAMES BORISSOVITCH, a Russian dramatic writer, was born in 1742, and died in 1791. His works consist of six tragedies, four comedies, five operas, besides odes, fables, &c.

KNIGHT, RICHARD PAYNE, a man of fortune, and a patron of learning and the fine arts, was born in 1748. He devoted a great portion of his time to the cultivation of classical literature, and the elucidation of the domestic manners of the ancients; while his splendid collection of ancient bronzes, medals, pictures, and drawings, in his museum at his house in Soho-square, gave sufficient proofs of his taste for every thing connected with virtù. The whole of this valuable collection, worth 50,000*l*, he bequeathed to the British Museum. As an author he was distinguished for the variety of his knowledge and the depth and force of his critical acumen. Among his works are, "An Account of the Remains of the Worship of Priapus;" an "Analytical Inquiry into the Principles of Taste;" "Prolegomena in Homerum;" "The Landscape," a didactic poem; and "The Progress of Civil Society." Died, 1824.

don, and was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society; but falling into great distress, he made his case known to Dr. Fothergill, who went into his closet, and then returned with a check upon his banker for a thousand guineas, which he put into his friend's hand, and told him to go home, and set his heart at rest. Dr. Knight published "An Attempt to demonstrate that all the Phenomena in Nature may be explained by Attraction and Repulsion."

KNIGHT, SAMUEL, a learned English divine, who wrote the lives of Dr. Colet and Erasmus. Died, 1746.

KNIGHT, THOMAS, an actor and dramatic writer, was a native of Dorsetshire. He was intended for the profession of the law, but having received lessons in oratory from Macklin, he imbibed a taste for the stage, became an actor and was a favourite with the public, particularly in rustic characters and flippant conceits. He wrote "The Honest Thieves;" "The Turnpike Gate;" and several other dramatic pieces. Died, 1820.

KNIGHT, EDWARD, a celebrated comedian, born at Birmingham, in 1774, who was particularly distinguished in comic characters. His Tim in "Wild Oats," was admired as a chaste and natural exhibition. Mr. Knight performed at Drury-lane, and at the Lyceum, till illness compelled him to quit the stage. Died, 1826.

KNIGHTON HENRY, an English historian, was a canon regular of Leicester Abbey, in the reign of Richard II., of whose deposition he wrote an account; also a chronicle from the Conquest to 1493.

KNIGHTON, SIR WILLIAM, bart., a physician and private secretary to George IV., originally entered the medical profession as an apothecary at Tavistock, but soon removed to London, where he first practised as an accoucheur only, but afterwards, having obtained his diploma, as an accoucheur and physician. In 1809 he accompanied the marquis of Wellesley to Spain, and on this nobleman retiring from office, he asked the prince regent to appoint Knighton one of his physicians. Being on terms of intimacy with Sir John Mc Mahon, the latter named him as his executor; and at his death some papers relating to certain private affairs of the prince came into his possession, which, without comment or condition, he immediately placed in the hands of the rightful owner. The regent, pleased with the delicate manner in which this was done, appointed him to an important office in the duchy of Cornwall, and in 1813 raised him to a baronetage. Known as a decided favourite at court, his reputation was now at its zenith, and his business became very extensive; but on being appointed successor to Sir Benjamin Bloomfield, who held the situation of private secretary to the prince regent after the death of Sir John Mc Mahon, he wholly abandoned practice, and became an inmate of the palace. Sir W. Knighton died in October, 1836. He was a man of unquestionable talents, and, in every sense of the word, an accomplished courtier.

KNOLLES, RICHARD, an English historian, who wrote the "History of the Turks;" "The Lives and Conquests of the Ottoman Kings;" a "Discourse on the Greatness of the Turkish Empire;" and a "Compendium of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew Grammar." He was the master of the free school at Sandwich, and died in 1610. His great work, "The History of the Turks," occupied him twelve years, and is executed in such a manner as to have obtained from Dr. Johnson the highest praise.

KNOLLES, SIR ROBERT, an English commander in the reign of Edward III., was of low origin in Cheshire, but being of an enterprising mind, obtained the rank of general, and the order of knighthood. At the close of life he retired to his estate in Kent, and built Rochester bridge. Died, 1407, aged 90.

KNOLLIS, or KNOWLES, SIR FRANCIS, an English statesman, who on the accession of Elizabeth, was employed in several important matters of state. He was one of the commissioners who sat in judgment on Mary queen of Scots; was appointed treasurer of the royal household, and was a knight of the garter. He died in 1596. Sir Francis wrote a "Treatise against the Usurpation of Papal Bishops."

KNORR A ROSENROTH, CHRISTIAN, a learned German writer, was born in 1836. He became chancellor to the count palatine of Sulzbach; and rendered himself celebrated by a curious work, entitled "Kabbala denudata seu Doctrina Hebraeorum transcendentalis et metaphysica atque theologica," 3 vols. 4to. Died, 1700.

KNORR, GEORGE WOLFGANG, a German engraver, who also devoted his attention to the study of natural history, and was the author of "Thesaurus Rei Herbarie Hortensique Universalis;" "Deliciae Naturae Selectae," &c. Born, 1703; died, 1758.

KNOTT, EDWARD, a learned English Jesuit, whose real name was Matthias Wilson. He was the author of several controversial works of great acuteness, among which was one entitled "Infidelity Unmasked," in reply to Chillingworth's "Religion of the Protestants." He was born at Pegaworth, in Northumberland, in 1580; became provincial of his order in England; and died in London, in 1656.

KNOWLES, THOMAS, an able English divine and classical scholar, born at Ely, in 1723; in the cathedral of which place he obtained a stall, with other church preferment. His principal works are, "The Scripture Doctrine of the Existence and Attributes of God, in twelve Sermons;" "Answer to Bishop Clayton's Essay on the Spirit," for which archbishop Secker gave him the degree of D.D.; "Primitive Christianity, in defence of the doctrine of the Trinity;" "Observations on the divine Mission of Moses;" and "Advice to a Young Clergyman."

KNOX, JOHN, styled the great champion of the Scottish reformation, was born in 1505, at Gifford, in East Lothian, and was educated at Haddington and St. Andrews. Having been converted from the Romish faith, he became a zealous preacher of the new doctrines. Notwithstanding the opposition he met with from the clergy, he every day grew bolder in the cause, until the castle of St. Andrew's surrendered to the French in July, 1547, when he was carried with the garrison into France, and remained a prisoner on board the galleys until the latter end of 1549. Being then set at liberty, he passed over to England, and, arriving in London, was licensed either by Crammer or the protector Somerset, and appointed preacher, first at Berwick, and afterwards at Newcastle. In 1552, he was appointed chaplain to Edward VI., and preached before the king at Westminster, who recommended Crammer to give him the living of All-hallows, in London, which Knox declined, not choosing to conform to the English liturgy. On the accession of queen Mary, he went to Geneva, and next to Frankfort, where he took part with the English exiles, who opposed the use of the liturgy; but the other side prevailing, Knox returned to Geneva, and soon after went to Scotland. While engaged in the ministry, he received an invitation to return to Geneva, with which he complied; and in his absence the bishops passed sentence of death upon him for heresy; against which he drew up an energetic appeal. In 1558 he published his treatise, entitled the "First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women," chiefly aimed at the cruel government of queen Mary of England, and at the attempt of the queen regent of Scotland to rule without a parliament. In April, 1559, he would have visited England, but was prevented by the resentment felt by Elizabeth at his late treatise. He therefore proceeded directly to Scotland, where he found a persecution of the protestants just ready to commence at Stirling. He hurried to the scene of action to share the danger, and, mounting a pulpit, inflamed the people by a vehement harangue against idolatry. The violence of his denunciations, aided by the indiscretion of a priest, who, immediately on the conclusion of this discourse, was preparing to celebrate mass, precipitated his hearers into a general attack on the churches of the city, in which the altars were overturned, the paintings and finest works of architecture destroyed, the images broken, and the monasteries almost levelled to the ground. From that time forward, he never ceased to promote by all the means in his power the cause he had espoused. But it is useless to pursue the subject farther, or to comment on his character. Like Luther, he was one of those extraordinary persons, of whom few, if any, are observed to speak with sufficient temper; all is either extravagant encomium or senseless invective. After his death, appeared his "History of the Reformation of Religion within the realm of Scotland," &c. to the 4th edition of which are appended all his other works. He died Nov. 24, 1572, and was buried at Edinburgh, several lords attending; and when he was laid in his grave, the earl of Morton, that day chosen regent, exclaimed, "There lies he who never feared the face of man."

KNOX, VICENTINUS, D.D., an eminent author and an eloquent preacher, was born in 1732; and received his education at Merchant Tailor's school, and St. John's college, Oxford. On the death of his father, he was chosen his successor in the head-mastership of Tunbridge grammar school, over which he presided with great reputation, thirty-three years; and when, in 1812, he retired, he was himself succeeded by his son, the present Dr. Thomas Knox. Few men have better claims on our regard than the subject of this notice. In theological and classical learning he excelled most of his contemporaries; in an acquaintance with polite literature he was surpassed by none; while all who remember his pulpit oratory, are able to bear testimony to the powerful and earnest eloquence with which he expounded the precepts and doctrines of Christianity. He held the living of Ramden, near Billericay, in Essex, and the chapelry of Shipborne in Kent, at which latter place and at Tunbridge he for many years officiated; nor was he unknown to the religious world of London, being frequently solicited to plead the cause of various public charitable institutions in the metropolis. His works consist of "Essays, Moral and Literary," 3 vols.; "Liberal Education," 2 vols.; "Winter Evenings," 3 vols.; "Personal Nobility, or Letters to a young Nobleman on his Studies;" "Sermons on Faith, Hope, and Charity;" "Christian Philosophy," 2 vols.; "Considerations on the Nature and Efficacy of the Lord's Supper;" and a pamphlet "On the National Importance of a Classical Education." Besides these, he published a series of selections from the works of the best English authors, under the titles of "Elegant Extracts," and "Elegant Epistles." He is also regarded as the author of a political work, entitled "The Spirit of Despotism," published anonymously in 1794, and of various anti-belligerent tracts which appeared at the commencement of the French revolution. In all probability, indeed, it was owing to his political sentiments being in opposition to the minister of the day, that he never obtained higher ecclesiastical preferment. He died in 1831.

KNOX, Major-general Sir ALEXANDER, K.C.B., joined the Bengal establishment in 1780; and after an active life spent in the service of the East India Company, during which he was engaged in almost every important action which took place in India (from the campaign against the Maharrattas, in 1781), he died, at Barrackpore, in 1826.

KNOX, HENRY, a major-general in the American army, who distinguished himself at Boston, as commander of the artillery, when that place was besieged by the British troops. In 1785 he was made secretary at war, but resigned the office in 1794, and retired from the duties of a public life. Died, 1806.

KNUTZEN, MATTHIAS, a professed atheist of Holstein, who first broached his impious tenets at Konigsberg, in 1673. His followers were called Conscientiaris, because they would allow of no other divinity than what existed in a man's own mind. They denied the existence of good and evil principles, and of a future state, and maintained that civil government was useless.

KNUTZEN, MARTIN, professor of philosophy, was born at Königsberg, in 1713, and died there in 1781. His principal works are, "Systema Cæsurum efficientium;" "Elementa Philosophiæ Rationalis, Methodo Mathematicæ demonstrata;" "Theoremata de Parabola infinitis;" and "A Defence of the Christian Religion."

KOCH, CHRISTOPHER WILLIAM, an historian and professor of public jurisprudence at Strasburg, was a native of Alsace, and born in 1737. History, genealogy, and the canon law were the pursuits which chiefly engaged his attention; but the progress of the French revolution for a time interrupted his studies; for, having been chosen a member of the legislative assembly, his patriotic opposition to the Jacobins occasioned his imprisonment; but on the fall of Robespierre he was liberated. He was the author of "A View of the Revolutions of Europe," &c. Died, 1813.

KOEHLER, JOHN BERNARD, professor of the Greek and oriental languages, at Königsberg, was distinguished for his classical learning, and published several able works. Died, 1802.

KOEHLER, JOHN DAVID, a most industrious German author, was born in 1684, near Leipzig. He distinguished himself at the universities of Altorf and Göttingen, and published a number of valuable works on history, archæology, &c. So great a respect had the emperor Charles V. for his talents, that he gave him his portrait, suspended from a chain of gold. Died, 1733.

KOENIG. Several persons of this name have in some way or other distinguished themselves.—GEORGE MATTHIAS, born at Altorf, in 1616, was the author of a Latin Biographical Dictionary, of considerable merit. Died, 1699.—JOHANN GERARD, a physician of Courland, in Lithuania, born 1725, was a celebrated botanist, and travelled to the East Indies and other countries in pursuit of his favourite science, keeping up a correspondence at the time with Linnæus, his old preceptor. Died, 1783.—There were also two brothers, natives of Switzerland, named DANIEL and SAMUEL KOENIG. The former was killed, in his 22d year, at Franecker, by the mob, who in a popular commotion fell upon him under the supposition that he was a French spy, as he had been heard to converse in that language. He translated into Latin "Arbuthnot on Ancient Coins."—SAMUEL was a good mathematical scholar, and filled the professor's chair at Franecker, in philosophy and ethics; but afterwards settled at the Hague, having been invited thither by the prince of Orange, who made him his librarian. Died, 1757.

KOERNER, or KORNER, THEODORE, an eminent German poet, was born at Dresden, in 1786; and, after studying at Leipzig, became a dramatist, and secretary to the management of the court theatre of Vienna. Being an enthusiast for the liberty of Germany, he entered as a volunteer into the Prussian army, in 1812; signalized himself equally by his bravery and his martial songs; was promoted for his conduct at the battle of Lützen: was afterwards twice wounded; made a lieutenant; and fell at the battle of Leipzig, Oct. 19, 1813. His works were published after his death, under the title of "The Lyre and the Sword."

KOIALOWICZ, ADALBERT, a native of Poland, born in 1609; author of a "History of Lithuania," written in Latin, and considered by Schloetzer, who translated it into German, as an admirable performance.

KOLBE, or KOLBEN, PETER, a traveller, was born in 1674, at Dorfhar, in the principality of Bayreuth. He studied at Halle, in 1700 soon after which he was sent to the Cape of Good Hope, by the king of Prussia, to make astronomical observations. He remained there ten years, and was afflicted with blindness, but recovered his sight on his return to Europe, and was rector of the Gymnasium of Newstadt. He wrote a "Description of the Cape of Good Hope," and was the first who gave a full and circumstantial account of that colony. Died, 1726.

KOLLMAN, AUGUSTUS FRED. CHARLES, a native of Angelbostel, near Ha-ver, who came to England in 1769, to fill the place of organist and schoolmaster in the royal German chapel, London, which he held 46 years. He was the author of several musical compositions; and died in 1829.

KONIGSMARK, MARIA AURORA, countess of, one of the mistresses of Augustus II., king of Poland, was born about 1678. She was equally celebrated on account of her personal charms and extraordinary talents, and of the part which she performed in politics. While a girl, she wrote and spoke Swedish, German, French, Italian, and English; read the classics in the original; had an extensive knowledge of history and geography; and even composed poems in French and Italian. She played on several instruments, composed music, sang and painted with great skill; all which accomplishments were aided by a refined wit and superior conversational powers. Thus gifted and accomplished, she arrived, in 1694, in Dresden, with her two sisters. The elector fell in love with her at first sight; she yielded, appeared at court as his mistress, and bore him a son, the famous marshal Saxe, to whose improvement she consecrated the remainder of her life. Though the passion of the tickle king cooled, and another favourite supplanted the countess, he always remained on terms of friendship with her; and by his influence she was appointed, by the court of Vienna, superintendent of Quedlinburg, where she chiefly resided until her death, which took place in 1768.

KOLLER, BARON, an Austrian field-marshal-lieutenant, who was one of the commissioners appointed to accompany Napoleon, in 1814, to Elba, after his abdication. Died, 1836.

KOSCIUSKO, THADDEUS, a celebrated Polish general and patriot, was descended from an ancient and noble, though not wealthy family, in Lithuania, and was born in 1746. He was educated at the military school of Warsaw, and completed his studies in France. On his return to Poland he had a commission given him; but being refused promotion, he went to America, where war was then carrying on between Great Britain and her colonies. He was made a colonel of engineers and aide-de-camp to Washington. At the conclusion of the war he returned to his native country, and lived in retirement; but when the Polish army was formed, in 1790, the diet appointed him a major-general. He declared himself for the constitution of May 3d, 1791, and served under prince Joseph Poniatowski. In the campaign of 1792, he distinguished himself against the Russians at Zielonec and Dubienka. At the latter place, under cover of some works which he had thrown up in the course of twenty-four hours, he repulsed, with 4000 men, three successive attacks of 18,000 Russians, who prevailed only after the loss of four thousand men. When king Stanislaus submitted to Catharine, he, with sixteen other officers, left the army, and was, therefore, obliged to retire from Poland. He went to Leipzig; and the legislative assembly of France, at this time, gave him the rights of a French citizen. The Poles becoming impatient under the oppression of Russia, all eyes were turned towards Kosciusko, whom they chose for their leader, and invested with the full powers of generalissimo. Kosciusko then advanced to meet the Russian forces. Without artillery, at the head of only four thousand men, part of whom were armed only with scythes and pikes, he defeated twelve thousand Russians at Raslawice, April 4, 1794. His army soon increased to nine thousand men, the insurrection extended to Warsaw, and in a few days the Russians were driven from that palatinate. But the enemy poured in on all sides, and at length, after having for six months delayed the fall of Poland, he was wounded and taken prisoner, Oct. 4, at the battle of Maciejowice. He was sent to Russia, and confined in a fortress near St. Petersburg, till the accession of the emperor Paul, who set him at liberty. In 1797 he took his departure for the United States of America, but returned to Europe the following year, and settled in France. Buonaparte often endeavoured to engage him in his ambitious schemes for the subjection of Poland; but the disinterested patriot saw through his designs, and rejected his overtures. He died at Soleure, in Switzerland, in 1817.

KOSEGARTEN, LOUIS THEOBALD, a German poet and divine, was born in 1739, in the state of Mecklenburg, and became rector of the university of Griefswald, where he died in 1818. Besides writing numerous legends, idyls, patriotic songs, and romances, he translated Richardson's Clarissa and other novels.

KOSTROW, EMILIIUS IVANOVITCH, the son of a Russian peasant, who obtained celebrity in his native country by an excellent translation of Ovidian's Poems, and by a less perfect one of Homer's Iliad. He was also the author of some original poetry. Died, 1796.

KOTTER, CHRISTOPHER, a religious enthusiast, by birth a Silesian, who fancied himself prophetically inspired, and published his visions. He was banished from the imperial territories in 1627, and died in Saxony, in 1647.

KOTZEBUE, AUGUSTUS FREDERIC FERDINAND VON, a prolific German writer, was born, in 1761, at Weimar. At the age of sixteen years, he entered the university of Jena, where his inclination for the drama was confirmed by his connexion with a private theatre. In 1781 he went to St. Petersburg, at the suggestion of the Prussian minister at that court, and became secretary to the governor-general, Von Bawr, who recommended him to the empress, who became his patroness, and he was finally appointed president of the government of Esthonia. In 1795 he retired to a country place about thirty-five miles from Narva; but soon after went to Weimar, and from thence to Petersburg. He had, however, scarcely arrived on the frontier before he was arrested, and sent to Siberia, without any reason being assigned for the act. A small drama of his, an indirect eulogy of Paul I., was translated into Russian, and laid, in manuscript, before the emperor, who was so delighted with it, that he recalled Kotzebue, and took him into favour. After the death of Paul, he again went to Germany, but, in 1806, revisited Russia, to avoid the French, and never ceased to write against Napoleon. Some subsequent years were spent in travelling, and the remainder of his life in pouring forth his innumerable literary productions. He is said to have written many of the Russian state papers and proclamations. In 1817 he received a salary of 15,000 roubles, with directions to reside in Germany, and to report upon literature and public opinion. This invidious office Kotzebue is said to have filled in a manner hostile to the freedom of his native land, and he was regarded with aversion by the liberals of Germany. His strictures on the conduct of the students of the German universities highly exasperated them; and the feeling was so strong in the case of a young enthusiast named Sand, that he went to Kotzebue's house at Mannheim, and there deliberately murdered him, March 23, 1819, and then immediately gave himself up to justice. He was the author of ninety-eight dramas, and his name appears to about two hundred more, which are either translations, or were written by other persons and retouched by him. Among his other numerous productions are, "A History of the German Empire;" "A History of Ancient Prussia;" and various "Recollections," such as of Paris, Rome, Naples, &c.

KRAFT, GEORGE WOLFGANG, a German philosopher, was educated at Tubingen, and, in 1728, was appointed professor of mathematics at St. Petersburg, and afterwards lecturer on natural philosophy. His great reputation induced the prince of Wirtemberg, of whose dominions he was a native, to invite him to fill the chair of mathematics and natural philosophy at Tubingen, where he presided till his death in 1754. He wrote many valuable and interesting papers in the Transactions of the Academy of St. Petersburg.

KRANTZ, ALBERT, a German historian and philosopher of the 15th century; author of a Latin "Chronicle of the Kingdoms of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway;" a "History of the Ancient Vandals," &c. His reputation as an able and upright diplomatist also was so well established, that in a dispute of a territorial nature, which occurred between the courts of Holstein and Denmark, the contending potentates agreed to abide by his arbitration.

KRASICKI, IONATUS, count of Sietzen, prince-bishop of Warmia, &c. one of the most illustrious of the Polish literati of the 18th century, was born at Dubierko, in 1735. When the first partition of Poland, in 1773, deprived him of his senatorial dignities, he turned his attention to literature, and produced numerous poems, epic, mock-heroic, and satirical. He was much esteemed by Frederic the Great, who took great pleasure in his lively and agreeable conversation; and the following morceau is related of them. The monarch having said, "I hope, Mr. Archbishop, you will carry me under your episcopal cloak to Paradise!" the prelate replied, "No, sire, your majesty has cut it so short, that it will not serve the purpose of concealing contraband goods." Among his writings are, "The War of Chocim," in twelve cantos; "La Monomachie," or the War of the Monks; "La Sourisade;" fables, odes, &c. He died at Berlin, in 1801.

KRAUSS, JOHN BAPTIST, a learned German ecclesiastic, and a most indefatigable writer. He was born at Ratisbon, in 1700; took the monastic habit at an early age; became prince-abbot of the Benedictine monastery of St. Emmeran in 1742; and presided there till his death, in 1782. His works on theology, history, and criticism are very numerous.

KRAY, BARON DE, an Austrian general, embraced the military profession early in life. He first distinguished himself in the war with the Turks; and in the campaigns in the Netherlands, and on the Rhine, from 1793 to 1797, he was one of the most active of the imperial commanders. The brilliant manner in which he opened the campaign of 1799, made way for the future triumphs of Melas and Suwarow, and in 1800 he replaced the archduke Charles in the command of the army of the Rhine. Died, 1801.

KREUTZER, RODOLPH, a celebrated violinist and musical composer, was born at Versailles, in 1797. He travelled in Germany, Holland, and Italy; and having established himself as one of the first performers in Europe, he was placed at the head of the orchestra at the grand opera at Paris. He composed the music for the operas of "Lodovica," "Joan of Arc," "Paul and Virginia," "Charlotte and Werter," and some others. Died, 1831.

KRONECK, JOHN FREDERIC, baron von, a German poet and dramatist, who died at an early age in 1758.

KRUDENER, JULIANA, baroness VALERIE DE, a religious enthusiast, was the daughter of the Russian baron Vlettinghoff, governor of Riga, where she was born, in 1766. At the age of fourteen she married baron Krudener, appointed ambassador by Catherine II. to Berlin, and subsequently to Venice. Here the secretary of legation fell in love with her, and committed suicide; on which event she wrote a romance, entitled "Valerie." For years she resided in France, and was the gayest of the gay in the Parisian circles. At length she became a fanatical devotee; and wandered from state to state, preaching and prophesying.

In 1814, she became acquainted with Alexander, emperor of Russia, who had already for some time shown a disposition to religious contemplations, and on whom her conversations had a great influence. In Paris, she had prayer-meetings, attended by distinguished personages, where she was seen in the background of a suite of rooms, in the dress of a priestess, kneeling in prayer. Her predictions excited much attention; and when the allied sovereigns quitted Paris, she retreated into Switzerland, where she preached the approach of the millennium, and drew around her multitudes of the credulous mountaineers, who listened to, and believed in her mission. At length the states interfered, and she removed to Germany; but wherever she arrived, she was under the surveillance of the police, who ultimately transported her to the Russian frontier. She was, however, ordered not to go to Petersburg or Moscow; she accordingly visited the Crimea, where she died in 1824.

KRUNITZ, JOHN GEORGE, a German physician and natural philosopher, was born at Berlin, in 1728; studied at Göttingen, Halle, and Frankfort on the Oder; devoted his whole life to literary pursuits on his return to his native city; and died in 1796. He produced an extraordinary number of works, the most considerable of which is an "Economico-technological Encyclopædia," which he commenced in 1773. He had completed seventy-three volumes, and had just reached the article "Leiche," a corpse, when his progress was arrested by death. This work was afterwards continued by the brothers Florke and J. W. D. Korth; and we understand it is now nearly finished.

KRUSEMARK, BARON DE, a Prussian general and diplomatist. In 1806 he was sent to attempt a negotiation of peace with Buonaparte; and, not succeeding, he was dispatched to St. Petersburg, where he formed a coalition which led to the treaty of Tilsit. He was afterwards appointed ambassador to France; and at the conclusion of the peace of Paris, in 1814, he was sent envoy extraordinary from the court of Berlin to Vienna, where he died in 1821.

KRUSINSKI, JUDAS THADDEUS, a Polish Jesuit, born about 1677, was sent to Lapaha in his youth to study the oriental languages, and was nominated advocate-general of the missions in Persia in 1770. On his return he wrote a circumstantial account of the overthrow of the dynasty of the Sophis of Persia, and the conquest of that country by the Afghans; also "De Legationibus Polono-Persicis." Died, 1754.

KUH, EPHRAIM MOSES, a German poet, born of Jewish parents, at Breslau, in 1731. His father intended him for the synagogue, but he had no relish for the subtleties of the Talmud, and a commercial life was then designed for him. At his father's death he went to Berlin, and took a financial situation in the counting-house of his uncle, where he soon had an opportunity of forming an acquaintance with Mendelssohn, Ramler, Lessing, and other men of letters. Though possessed of independent property, and having a good salary, his love of lit-nature led him to neglect his commercial interests, and in a few years his means were exhausted; he travelled through Holland, France, Italy, and Switzerland, carrying with him his library; but on his return to Germany, he was attacked with hypochondria, which degenerated into insanity; and it was at this time, in his lucid intervals, that he produced his best poetical pieces. He died in 1790, and is said to have left in manuscript more than five thousand poems.

KUHLMAN, QUIRINUS, a fanatic, and probably a madman, of the 17th century, born at Breslau, in 1651. He pretended to have acquired the faculty of fore-knowledge, and of holding communion with invisible spirits; but while travelling through Russia, where some of his prophecies were distasteful to the government, he was brought to the stake, and suffered with all the tortures of a martyr, in 1690.

KUNCKELL, JOHN, an eminent chemist, born at Hrusum, in Sleswick, in 1630, distinguished himself by several important discoveries, especially by the extraction of phosphorus from urine. He was ennobled by the king of Sweden, and made councillor of mines. Died, 1703.

KUSTER, LUDOLPH, a learned German writer, born at Blomberg, in 1670. He visited the principal libraries in Europe, chiefly with the view of collating the manuscripts of Suidas, and was successful in restoring many portions before unpublished. He was one of the first Greek and Latin scholars of the age, writing each of those languages with singular purity. Died, 1716.

KUTTNER, CHARLES GOTTLÖB, a German traveller, born in Saxony, in 1755; studied at Leipzig and Basel; and travelled, as tutor to young Englishmen, through most of the countries of Europe. He was not merely eminent as a scholar, but possessed an extensive knowledge of the world. His works comprise "Letters on Ireland;" "Letters of a Saxon in Switzerland;" "Travels in Germany, Denmark, &c.," and "Observations on England." Died, 1803.

KUTUSOFF SMOLENSKOI, or KUTUSOW, MICHAEL LAVRIONOVITCH GOLEMITCHOFF, prince of, a celebrated Russian field-marshal, was born in 1745, and educated at Strasburg. He entered the army in 1759; served in Poland from 1764 till 1769; and afterwards against the Turks, under Romanoff. He behaved with great gallantry at the siege of Oczacoff, where he was dangerously wounded; and on his recovery he joined Suwarrow, at the storming and capture of Ismailoff, when he was advanced to the rank of lieutenant-general. In the subsequent Polish war, he was particularly conspicuous during the memorable day of Praga. In 1805, the emperor Alexander gave him the chief command of the first Russian corps against the French, and he headed the allied army at Austerlitz, where he was wounded. In 1810 and 1811 he obtained several advantages over the Turks; and, in 1812, when 70 years of age, the chief command of the Russian army, destined to oppose Napoleon, was bestowed upon him. To commemorate his victories, he received the surname of Smolenskoï. He died in 1813.

KUYP, or CUYP, ALBERT, a celebrated painter, whose father was an able landscape painter, was born at Dort, in 1606. He particularly excelled in the purity and brilliancy of light; and was not surpassed, even by Claude, in an accurate representation of the atmosphere, and of the various effects of sunshine or shade upon the objects delineated. His paintings are all highly finished, and many of them grace the principal collections in Great Britain. Died, 1667.

KYAU, FREDERIC WILLIAM, baron of, a native of Brandenburg, whose witty sayings and blunt honesty attracted the notice and gained the favour of Augustus II. king of Poland, who made him his aid-de-camp, and promoted him to the rank of adjutant-general, and commandant of Konigstein. Born, 1634; died, 1733.

KYNASTON, SIR FRANCIS, an English poet, born at Otley, in Shropshire, in 1597. He was knighted by Charles I.; became regent of a literary institution, called the "Museum Minervæ;" was the translator of Chaucer's "Troilus and Cressida," into Latin, and author of "Leoline and Sydnæa," &c. Died, 1642.

KYRLE, JOHN, celebrated by Pope as the man of Ross, was born at Whitehouse, in Gloucestershire, and possessed an estate of 500*l*. a year at Ross, in Herefordshire, where he died in 1754, aged 90. The good deeds of this estimable man, so highly eulogized by Pope in his "Moral Essays," do not appear to be over-rated. Warton says, Kyrle was the Howard of his age, and that he deserved to be celebrated beyond any of the heroes of Pindar.

L.

LABADIE, JOHN, a French enthusiast, was born in 1610, at Bourg, in Guienne. He was originally a Jesuit; but, from his licentiousness and scandalous practices, he was compelled to quit that society, and seek an asylum among the Protestants. From these he was also driven out, and forced to retire to Middleburg, where he propounded a new doctrine of belief, and by his imposing eloquence obtained many followers. The looseness of his private life, however, lost him many of his sect, and he was at length obliged to retire to Altona, in Holstein, where he died in 1674. He wrote many works, but they, as well as his doctrines, have fallen into deserved oblivion.

LABAT, JEAN BAPTISTE, a Dominican missionary, was born in Paris, in 1663. He possessed great mathematical knowledge; and while in America, where he remained twelve years, he acted as an engineer in

On his return to Europe in 1768, he accurately surveyed the environs and coast of Andalusia; soon after travelled into Italy and other parts; and finally returned to Paris, where he died in 1738. He wrote many works, the chief of which are his "Voyage aux Îles de l'Amérique;" "Travels in Spain and Italy;" a "Description of the Countries of Western Africa," &c.

LABBE, PHILIP, a learned French jesuit, was born at Bourges, in 1607. He taught philosophy, divinity, and languages, with great éclat, and was a most laborious writer, as well as a sound critic. He died at Paris, in 1667. His chief work was a "Collection of Councils," 17 vols. folio.

LABE, LOUISE, called "La belle Cordière," was born at Lyons, about 1526. Her early education having been directed to riding and military exercises, as well as to languages and music, she acquired a taste for military glory, and entered the army in 1543. She soon displayed her strength and courage at the siege of Perpignan, but the French being obliged to abandon it, she renounced the military service, and devoted herself to literature and poetry. A rich rope-maker, named Eunemond Perrin, became enamoured of her, and married her, and from that time her house was the resort of the literati and men of rank and fashion. She was much admired for her talents, accomplishments, and beauty.

LA BÉDOYÈRE, CHARLES ANOELIQUE FRANÇOIS HUCHET, count de, a noted general, born at Paris, in 1786. He served as an officer in the imperial guards at the battle of Eylau, and in 1808 and 1809 was aide-de-camp to Eugene Beauharnois. He was in the retreat from Moscow, and in 1813 distinguished himself at the battles of Lutzen and Bautzen. On the abdication of Napoleon, he was, in 1815, appointed to a regiment stationed at Grenoble; but immediately on the return of the French emperor from Elba, La Bédoyère was the first to bring him a regiment. He was rapidly promoted, and eventually raised to the peerage; but being found in Paris after his occupation by the allied army, he was tried by a court-martial, and suffered death, August, 1815.

LABERIUS, DECIMUS JUNIUS, a Roman knight, who wrote "Mimes, or Short Pieces for the Stage;" one of which Julius Cæsar compelled him to perform, much against his inclination, and for which reason he delivered at the same time a prologue, full of satire against that great man. This piece is extant in Aulus Gellius. The author died B.C. 46.

LABILLARDIERE, JEAN JULIEN, a native of Alençon, who began his career with the study of medicine, and devoted his life to botany. He first visited England, where the late Sir Joseph Banks facilitated his access to every curious collection in that country. After his return to France he made a tour of the Alps, and then a voyage through the Levant; stayed some time in the Isle of Cyprus; from whence he travelled through Syria, notwithstanding frequent obstacles arising from war and the plague; went over the forest of Lebanon; measured the height of mount Sinai, and remained some time in Damascus. He then returned to France, by the islands of Candia, Sardinia, and Corsica. An account of the discoveries made in this voyage was published at Paris, in 1791. He afterwards pursued his researches at the Cape of Good Hope, and in New Holland, having made a collection of 4,000 plants, few of which were before known in Europe.

LA BLANCHÈRE, MAMMÈS CLAUDE PAHIN de, a French writer, was born at Langres, in 1732. In early life he emigrated to the French colonies, and subsequently visited England, taking up his residence in London. The duke of Buccleugh procured him a pension from government, on which he principally subsisted. He died in London, in 1811.

LABOUREUR, JOHN LE, a French historical writer, was born in 1622, at Montmorency. On entering into orders he was made almoner to the king, and appointed commander of the order of St. Michael. He died in 1675. His chief works are "The History of Charles VI.;" and "Genealogies of Noble Families."—CLAUDE LE, was the uncle of the above, and the provost of the abbey of St. Barbe. He wrote the history of that house; a treatise on the "Origin of Arms," and other works.

LABROUSE, SUSANNE, born in 1743; one of the extraordinary characters produced by the French revolution. She proclaimed herself a prophetess at that period; fancied herself inspired, and persuaded many of the Jacobin party to credit her ravings, after the enthusiast, Don Serle, had declared her prophecies true in the Constituent Assembly. She published them in 1799.

LACARRY, GILIS, a learned French jesuit, was born in 1605. He was well skilled in history, and taught philosophy and theology. He died in 1694. Among his numerous works are "Historia Galliarum sub Præfæctis Prætorii Galliarum," 4to.; "Historia Romana," from Julius Cæsar to Constantine, and illustrated by medals; "De Regibus Franciæ et Lege Salica," &c.

LACEPEDE, BERNARD GERMAIN ETIENNE, Count De la Ville, a French naturalist, was born at Agen, in 1756. He was a member of the conservative senate under Napoleon, and grand chancellor of the legion of honour, with many other distinctions. He died in 1825. His chief works are a "History of Fishes," 3 vols. 4to.; "Natural History of Viviparous Quadrupeds and Serpents," &c.

LA CHAPELLE, ABNE DE, a French philosopher of the last century. He was a member of the academies of Lyons and Rouen, and a fellow of the Royal Society of London. Much of his time, however, he spent in retirement and in the pursuit of his literary labours. He died at Paris, about 1792; and left many valuable treatises on mathematics.

LA CLOS, PETER AMBROSE FRANCIS CHODERLOS DE, was born at Amiens, in 1741. Prior to the French revolution he was an officer of artillery, and secretary to the duke of Orleans, whom he followed to England. On his return in 1791, La Clos was one of the chief conductors of the noted Jacobin "Journal des Amis de la Constitution." Leaving this, he was appointed governor of the French establishments in India; but on the eve of departure he was arrested, and committed to prison. Upon being liberated, he found favour with Napoleon. He was the author of that licentious novel, "Les Liaisons Dangereuses." Died, 1803.

LACOMBE, JAMES, a French miscellaneous writer, was born at Paris, in 1724. He published several useful abridgments of histories. His best work, however, is "Histoire de Christine Reine de Suède."

LACOMBE, DE PIRELL HONORE, brother of the above, was born at Paris, in 1735. He published a "Dict. de Citoyen;" "Dict. de Jurisprudence," and other works.

LACRETELLE, PIERRE LOUIS, a French writer, was born at Metz, in 1731. He was a counsellor of parliament, one of the editors of the Grand Repertory of Jurisprudence, and of the Mercur de France; and in 1787 he was appointed member of a committee charged with the reformation of the penal code. When the Revolution took place, Lacreteille embraced its principles with moderation, and sat in the legislative assembly; but during the reign of Robespierre he found it necessary to retire from public duty. He afterwards appeared for a short time, but held no official situation, and during the imperial and regal governments he devoted himself wholly to literary pursuits. Among his writings are, "Eloquence Judiciaire et Philosophie Legislative;" "Roman Théâtral;" "Portraits et Tableaux," &c. Died, 1834.

LACRUZ Y CANO, DON RAMONDE, a famous Spanish dramatic poet, born in 1738, and died in 1796. Among his best pieces are "El Sueño;" "El día de Noche Buena;" "El Temo," &c.

LACTANTIUS, LUCIUS CÆLIUS, or CÆCILIUS FIRMIANUS, an eminent father of the church, was by some esteemed an African, and by others a native of Fermo, in Ancona. He studied rhetoric under Arnobius, and by his production, entitled "Symposium," or "the Bouquet," he obtained such renown, that Diocletian appointed him professor of rhetoric in Nicomedia. Subsequently he was appointed tutor to Crispus, the son of Constantine, who dying not long after, Lactantius was neglected. He wrote many works in vindication of Christianity, from the beautiful style of which, he has been honoured with the name of the Christian Cicero. His principal works are, "Institutiones Divinae," in seven books; and a treatise, "De Persecutione."

LACY, JOHN, a dramatic writer, was born at Doncaster, and bred a dancing-master; this employment he quitted for the army, but subsequently took to the stage; in which line he acquired such celebrity as a comedian, that Charles II. had his portrait painted in three different characters. He wrote the comedies of "The Dumb Lady;" "Sir Hercules Buffoon;" "Old Troop;" and "Sawney the Scot." Died, 1681.

LACYDES, or LACYDAS, a Greek philosopher, of Cyrene, was the disciple of Arceilaus. His system was that of universal scepticism; and he died of excessive drinking, B.C. 212.

LADVOCAT, JEAN BAPTISTE, a learned French Jesuit, was born at Champagne, in 1709. He was professor of Hebrew and theology in the university of Paris, and afterwards became Librarian to the Sorbonne. Dr. Kennicote, in the collation of manuscripts, in the king's library at Paris, was much indebted to M. Ladvoat for his assistance. His own works are, "Dictionnaire Historique Portatif," 2 vols. 8vo.; "A Hebrew Grammar;" "Dissertation on the Councils," and some other Scriptural writings. He died in 1765.—LOUIS FRANÇOIS, a metaphysical writer, was born at Paris, in 1644. He was dean of the chamber of accounts, and died in 1735.

LÆLIUS, CAIUS, surnamed SAPIENS, was a Roman consul and orator, who distinguished himself in Spain in the war against Viriathus. He acquired great reputation, especially with Cicero, and he is said to have assisted Terence in his comedies. He died about 135, B.C.

LAENNEC, R. T. H., an eminent French physician, was born in 1781, at Quimper; studied at Nantes and Paris; and acquired great reputation as an anatomist. He is principally known as the author of a "Treatise on Auscultation," which develops the method of obtaining a knowledge of the viscera, by means of a stethoscope, an instrument invented by him, and which has since obtained great notoriety among medical practitioners. Died, 1826.

LAER, PETER DE, a celebrated painter, usually called Bamboccio. He was born in 1613, at Laeren, in Holland. After studying the art at Rome, and increasing his knowledge of it by an acquaintance with Poussin and Claude, he returned to Holland, in 1639, where he enjoyed unrivalled celebrity, till he was compelled to share it with Wouvermans. In energy of touch, in the management of the chiar-oscuro, and in fertility of invention, he excelled his rival, but not in neatness and delicacy of pencil; yet the competition so much affected his prosperity, that in a fit of despondency he drowned himself in a well, in 1763, when sixty years of age.

LAET, JOHN DE, a writer of the seventeenth century, was a native of Antwerp, and well skilled in history and geography. Little is known of his life, except that he was a director of the Dutch East India Company, and wrote many works, among which are, "Novus Orbis," folio; "Historia Naturalis Brasiliae," folio; "Respublica Belgarum," and other works. He died in 1649, and is said to have contended with Grotius respecting the origin of the Americans.

LÆVINUS, TORRENTINUS, called also VANDER BEKEN, or TORRENTIN, was a native of Ghent. He became bishop of Mechlin, where he died in 1695. He founded a college of Jesuits at Louvain.

LÆVIUS, a Latin poet, prior to the time of Cicero, wrote a poem entitled "Erotopaegia," or "Love Games;" and "Petra-ram," or "The Centaurs;" besides these, nothing further is known either of his life or his writings.

LAFAYETTE, GILBERT MOTTIER, marquis de, one of the most conspicuous characters in France, previous to, during, and since the revolution, was born in 1757, at Chavagnac, near Brioude, in Auvergne. At the age of seventeen he married the grand-daughter of the duke of Noailles; and, although he inherited a large fortune, was of high rank, and had powerful connexions at court, he went, in 1777, to join the war of Independence in America. He there raised and equipped a body of men at his own expense; fought as a volunteer at the battle of Brandywine, in 1778; at that of Monmouth in 1778; and received the thanks of Congress. He then proceeded to France, in order to obtain reinforcements; returned with the armaments under General Rochambeau; and commanded Washington's van-guard at the time of the surrender of lord Cornwallis, in 1782. The capitulation of York-Town followed, and, on the peace with the mother country, the general returned to France. He was elected a member of the Notables in 1787, and, on the breaking out of the revolution, he took part with the friends of liberty, though with wise moderation. In October, 1789, he was made commander-in-chief of the National Guard, and ordered and assisted in the demolition of the Bastille. On the 6th, he marched to Versailles, saved the royal family from the outrages of the mob, and placed them under the protection of the National Assembly. In 1790, he proclaimed the "sacredness of the right of insurrection," and established, in conjunction with Bailly, the club of Feuillans. On the attempted escape of Louis XVI., Lafayette lost some of his popularity, through being accused of conniving at it; but, disavowing these calumnies, he fought against the emigrants and allies in Flanders; and mutual accusations of counter-revolution passed between him, and Dumourier and Colliot D'Herbois. He returned to Paris to denounce them, and to protest against the violence offered to the king. But the Mountain was too strong for him: he was burnt in effigy on the 30th of June, 1793, and, being obliged to escape from France, fell into the hands of the Austrians, who imprisoned him at Olmutz. There he remained five years, till after Bonaparte's first triumphant campaign of Italy, when, on the special demand of the latter, he was set at liberty. Lafayette, however, was consistent: when Napoleon became an apostate from liberty, he voted against the consulate for life, and withdrew from public affairs. But, after the battle of Waterloo, he re-appeared, to protest against a dictatorship; and, having subsequently protested against the dissolution of the legislative body by Prussian bayonets, again withdrew to his estates, till he was returned, in 1818, deputy for the department De la Sarthe. On all occasions, in the Chamber of Deputies, and elsewhere, he proved himself the friend of a real but discreet liberty. In 1821 he made a visit to America, and was received with distinction and popular enthusiasm, as joint founder of American liberty with Washington and Franklin. No event of moment, still further to commemorate the splendid epocha of his life, occurred, till the unconstitutional violence and ordinances of Charles X., in June, 1830, caused his own expulsion; and brought Lafayette on the stage again, in the character with which he commenced his career—that of commander-in-chief of the National Guard, and the advocate and supporter of a citizen-king. He soon after resigned the command; and having seen Louis Philippe recognised as King of the French, he once more retired to the tranquil scenes of domestic life. Died, 1834.

LA FERTE IMBAULT, MARIA THERESA GEOFFRAIN, marchioness de, daughter of the celebrated Madame Geoffrin, was born at Paris, in 1718. She distinguished herself by her opposition to the French philosophers of the last century, with whom her mother had been connected, and by her literary talents generally. In 1771 she was appointed grand mistress of the burlesque order of the Lanturelus, while its founder, her friend, the marquis de Croismare, was grand master. This whimsical institution obtained so much eclat, that it was esteemed an honour by several sovereign princes to become Lanturelus. She died in 1791, and left many posthumous writings.

LAFFON DE LADEBAT, ANDREW DANIEL, a French statesman and financier, born at Bourdeaux, in 1746. Being the inheritor of a good property, he was able to devote his leisure to the study of political economy and the fine arts. He was one of the founders of the academy of painting, at Bourdeaux; and became a member of the academy of arts and sciences in that city, and also of the agricultural society of Paris. On the 10th of August, 1792, when Louis XVI. and his family took refuge in the hall of the legislative assembly, M. Laffon was president of that body; and in the horrid massacre in September following, he saved the life of the abbé Sicard. He was subsequently himself exposed to great danger; but having survived the proscriptions of the reign of terror, he was chosen, in September, 1793, a member of the council of ancients for the department of the Seine. In 1797 he was among those who were condemned to deportation, and sent to Cayenne; but returned from exile on the establishment of the consulate. In 1815 he visited England, and collected much information concerning its finances, commerce, and public institutions; and on his return he presented to Louis XVIII. an interesting work on the finances of France.

LAFFITAU, JOSEPH FRANCIS, a French Jesuit, was born at Bourdeaux, and sent as a missionary among the North American Indians. On his return to Europe he wrote a work, entitled "Mœurs des Sauvages Américains comparées aux Mœurs des premiers Temps," 4 vols.; and another on the possessions and discoveries of the Portuguese in the New World, 2 vols. 4to. He died in 1740.—PETER FRANCIS, brother of the above, and a Jesuit, was also born at Bourdeaux. He was sent on a mission to Rome to arrange the disputes of France, respecting the bull Unigenitus, and while there he obtained favour with the pope, Clement IX., who made him bishop of Sla-teron, in Provence. He left the society of Jesus to preside over his diocese, and died in 1764. He wrote many religious works, among which were the "History of the Constitution Unigenitus;" and the "Life of Pope Clement IX." In the latter he speaks much against Jansenism.

LAFITE, MARY ELIZABETH DE, a popular juvenile writer, was born at Paris, about 1750, and died in London in 1794. Her works for young persons were numerous and useful.

LAFONTAINE, AUGUSTUS HENRY JULIUS, a celebrated German romance writer, was born at Brunswick, in 1736. Among his numerous works of fiction are, "Blanche and Minna, or the Manners of the Burgers;" "Moral Systems, or Ludwig of Esch;" "Raphael, or the Life of Peace;" "Emilia in the World;" "Walther, or the Child of the Battle-field;" "Henrietta Bellman;" "The Baron de Flemming, or the Rage for Titles;" "Family Pictures, or the Journal of Charles Engelmann;" "The Country Clergyman, or new Family Pictures;" and "Clara du Plemsis and Clairaut, or the History of two Lovers." He also wrote some dramas, and published the Agamemnon and Choephore of Æschylus, with Notes, 2 vols. Died, 1831.

LAFOREY, Admiral Sir FRANCIS, K.C.B. was born in Virginia, 1767, and entered the navy at an early age. He was made a commander in 1791, and acted under the orders of his father, admiral Sir John Laforey, while stationed off the Leeward Islands. He was employed in active service during the French war, and commanded the Spartan in the battle of Trafalgar. In 1833 he was promoted to the rank of admiral; and died at Brighton, in 1835, aged 67.

LAFOSSE, STEPHEN WILLIAM, a celebrated French writer on veterinary surgery, in the last century, was veterinary marshal to the king of France, and very eminent in his profession. Died, 1765.—PHILIP STREFFER, son of the above, followed the footsteps of his father, and by many valuable works on the anatomy, diseases, and management of the horse, became equally eminent with him.

LAGARAYE, CLAUDE TOUMAINT MAROT DE, a noted French philanthropist, was born at Rennes, in 1675. He devoted his entire life and fortune in alleviating the wants and miseries of his fellow-creatures; founding schools for the young, and hospitals for the sick and aged. Died, 1764.

LAGERBRING, SURN, a Swedish historian, was born in 1707. He was professor of history in the university of Lund, in Scania; a counsellor of the chancery; and a member of the academy of history and belles-lettres in Stockholm. His chief works are a history of Sweden, to 1457; and an abridgment down to modern times. Died, 1782.

LAGERLOEF, PETER, historiographer of Sweden, in the seventeenth century, and professor of rhetoric at Upsal, was an eminent classic scholar. He wrote a historical description to accompany a collection of national monuments, called "Suecia Antiqua et Hodierna," at the desire of Charles XI., and published numerous historical dissertations, among which was "Historia Lingue Græcæ;" "De Magnæ Sinarum Imperio," &c. Died, 1699.

LAGERSTROEM, MAGNUS VON, a philosopher of Sweden, and director of the Swedish East India Company, was born at Stockholm, in 1696. His youth was spent in Germany and Denmark, and on his return home he applied himself to trade. This he soon relinquished, and became an author. He wrote a dissertation on political economy, and translated many French, German, and Danish works. In 1759 he was appointed secretary to the East India Company of Gottenburgh, and rose to be director. In this situation he considerably promoted scientific researches, especially in natural history, many novel specimens of which, at his instance, were procured from abroad. He was a member of the academy of Stockholm, and of the Royal Society of Upsal. Died, 1759.

LAGNY, THOMAS FAUTET DE, an eminent French mathematician, was born at Lyons, in 1660. He was educated for the bar; but a preference for mathematical studies weaned him from the pursuit of the law, and in that science he became particularly eminent. He wrote many works on the mathematics, and made many important improvements and discoveries. He died in 1734. Among his works may be mentioned "New and Concise Methods for the Extraction and Approximation of Roots;" "The Cubature of the Sphere;" "A general Analysis, or Method of Resolving Problems," &c.

LAGOMARSINI, JEROME, a learned Jesuit and philologist, was born at Genoa, in 1696. He was professor of rhetoric at Florence twenty years, and in 1730 he was appointed professor of Greek in the college at Rome, where he died in 1773. He published many classical works, and left in MS. a collection in thirty volumes, having for its object the justification of his order from all the odious imputations that had been cast upon it.

LAGRANGE, JOSEPH LOUIS, a celebrated mathematician, was born at Turin, in 1736. At the age of sixteen he became a professor in the royal school of artillery, where he formed an association, which afterwards rose to the rank of an Academy of Sciences. Here he made many important discoveries, particularly in calculating the motion of fluids, and in vibrations, introducing also the theory of recurring consequences and the doctrine of chances to the differential calculus, &c. He communicated to the society a number of papers, and some to the academy of Paris, of which he was chosen a foreign member. While on a visit at Paris he wrote his celebrated work "Mécanique Analytique." In 1766 he removed to Berlin, where he was appointed director of the academy; and in 1787 he settled at Paris, and became successively professor of the Normal-school and Polytechnic-school. He there announced his "Fonctions Analytiques," and pursued other literary labours till his health giving way under this fatigue, he died in 1813.

LAGUERRE, LOUIS, a painter, was born in France, in 1663. Louis XIV., who was his godfather, caused him to be brought up under Le Brun, and in the Royal Academy of Paris. In 1663 he came to England, and was much employed in painting ceilings, halls, &c. He was first engaged by Verrio on the large work at St. Bartholomew's hospital; subsequently he had lodgings assigned him in Hampton-court palace, where he painted "The Labours of Hercules." Died, 1721.

LAGUNA, ANDREW, a Spanish writer and physician, was born at Segovia, in 1499. He was a great favourite with Charles V., at whose court he spent the greatest part of his life. Died, 1540.

LAHARPE, JEAN FRANÇOIS DE, an eminent French writer, was born at Paris, in 1730. During the French revolution he was suspected and imprisoned, and finally sentenced to deportation. He was, however, restored to liberty, and passed the remainder of his days in retirement. His chief work is the "Lyceæ," or a complete course of literature, 13 vols. 8vo. Died, 1803.

LAINEZ, ALEXANDER, a native of France, remarkable for his poetical Jeu d'esprits, was born at Chimay, in 1650. After receiving his education at Rheims, he visited Paris, and then journeyed through Europe and Asia. On his return, he took up his abode in the French capital, till his death, in 1710.

LAINEZ, JAMES, a Spanish ecclesiastic, and associate of the famous Ignatius Loyola, was born in 1512. At the death of Loyola he became general of the Jesuits, and induced the pope to grant him many privileges. He obtained the papal decree for rendering the generalship perpetual in the person chosen to fill it, and giving him the power of making any and every compact without consulting the brethren; also, for giving authenticity to all his comments and explanations of their constitutions, which also he might change or alter at his will; and, likewise, for having prisons independent of the secular authority, where he might punish the refractory brethren. From these tenets of the order arose that great influence possessed by the Jesuits, both in church and state, which, so long as the order existed, produced most important events in every part of the world. Lainez died, 1563.

LAING, ALEXANDER GORDON, a traveller, was born in Edinburgh, in 1794. He served in the army many years, both in the West Indies and on the western coast of Africa: while at the latter place he made many fruitless journeys into the interior to establish a commercial intercourse with the natives, and to learn the geography of the country. He was compelled, however, to leave Timbuctoo, and the guard he hired to protect him on his route by Sego to the coast, treacherously murdered him, 1826. What became of his papers is unknown.

LAING, MALCOLM, a Scottish historian, was born at Striroyre, in Orkney, in 1762. He finished his education at the Edinburgh university, and was subsequently called to the bar. On the death of Dr. Henry he completed the unfinished volume of that author's History of England. His chief work, however, was a "History of Scotland," 4 vols. 8vo. He also edited a new edition of the poems of Ossian of some repute, and died in 1819.

LAIRE, FRANCIS XAVIER, a French bibliographer, was born in Franche Comté, in 1730. He became a Minims friar at an early age, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He was librarian to cardinal Lomenie, and wrote numerous works; among which were a "Catalogue of printed Books from the Invention of the Art to the Commencement of the Sixteenth Century," &c. Died, 1801.

LAIRESSE, GERARD, an eminent historical painter, was born at Liege, in 1640. He surpassed his father, under whom he studied, and obtained such renown, as to be considered the Raphael of the Dutch school. He also well understood music and engraving. He lost his sight some time before his death, and died at Amsterdam in 1711. His chef-d'œuvre is a large picture of the child Moses, trampling on the Egyptian diadem.—ERNEST, JOHN, and JAMES, the three brothers of the above also obtained some eminence in the art; the two former excelled in animal painting, and the latter in flowers.—Two sons of Gerard also practised the art, but with very inferior pretensions to eminence.

LAIS, a celebrated courtesan, was born at Hyccara, in Sicily. She possessed great personal charms, and at Corinth sold her favours at a most extravagant price. She was assassinated, B.C. 350.

LAKE, ARTHUR, a pious bishop, was born at Southampton, and passed his youth at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. In 1603 he was master of St. Cross hospital; then dean of Worcester; and finally, in 1616, bishop of Bath and Wells. He died in 1636, leaving many works, which were afterwards published.

LAKE, GERARD, viscount, a distinguished English general, was born in 1744. He early obtained an ensigncy in the foot-guards, and served in Germany during the seven years' war. Under Cornwallis, in America, in 1781, he greatly signalized himself, and on his return home was made aide-de-camp to the king. In 1793 and 1794, he was prominent in many engagements in Holland, and in 1800 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the British forces in India. He overthrew the Mahratta army and the French general Perron, in 1803, and captured Delhi; he next triumphed over Scindiah and Holkar; and on his return to England, in 1807, he was created lord Lake, baron of Delhi and Laswarri. From this he rose to be a viscount, and was appointed governor of Plymouth. Died, 1806.

LALANDE, JAMES DE, an eminent French lawyer, was born at Orleans, in 1623. He rose to be doctor and professor of jurisprudence in the university of that city, and filled other important municipal offices. He published several works on law and juridical antiquities, and died in 1703.

LALANDE, JOSEPH JEROME LE FRANCAIS DE, a very celebrated astronomer, was born at Bourg, in France, in 1732. He showed an early preference for mathematical studies, but he was educated for the law. His intimacy, however, with astronomers and other men of science led him to pursue the early bias of his disposition, and it was not long before the Academy of Sciences deputed him to go to Berlin to make observations for determining the parallax of the moon, and its distance from the earth. On his return home, he was nominated astronomer, extended his researches in the science of the heavenly bodies, and turned his attention to gnomonics. In 1769, on the resignation of Maraldi, Lalande undertook the editorship and publication of the "Connaissance des Temps." Shortly after, he succeeded Delisle as professor of astronomy at the College de France; when successive treatises, talented and voluminous, proceeded from his pen, much to the advancement of astronomical science. Among these mention must be made of the very valuable "Traité de l'Astronomie." Lalande lived to an advanced age, dying in 1807; at which time he was a member of the French board of Longitude, and of the Legion of Honour, and an associate of all the most learned academies of science in Europe. His works fill more than sixty ponderous volumes, and he may be esteemed the most distinguished luminary of science that France ever produced.

LALANDE, MICHAEL RICHARD DE, a celebrated French musician, born at Paris, in 1657. He attained to great perfection on various instruments, particularly on the violin, and was appointed master of music in the chapel-royal, by Louis XIV. He died in 1726, leaving numerous compositions, sacred and profane.

LALLEMANTE, RICHARD COUTERAY, a French printer, was born at Rouen, in 1726. He enjoyed many of the municipal offices of his native city, and when mayor, Louis XV. gave him letters of nobility. He acquired his literary reputation by several good editions of the classics. Died, 1807.—RICHARD XAVIER FELIX DE MAUPAS, brother of the above, was an ecclesiastic. He became vicar-general of Avranches, and, in 1790, president of the academy of Rouen; in which city he died in 1810.

LALLI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian lawyer and poet, was born at Norcia, in 1572. He was governor of many places belonging to Rome and Parma; and died, much esteemed, in 1637. He was placed among the best poets of his time, though his talent was chiefly employed in the burlesque.

LALLY, THOMAS ARTHUR, count, an Irish officer, attached to the house of Stuart, and in the service of France. His bravery at the battle of Fontenoy was rewarded by the appointment of brigadier-general; and in 1756 he was made governor of Pondicherry. This town was soon after besieged by the British; and, unable to withstand their assaults, he surrendered, and with the garrison was made prisoner. He was conveyed to England, but was soon liberated, and permitted to return to France. On arriving in that country public clamour ran so high against him, that he was beheaded, by a most unjust sentence, in 1766. In 1783, his son, Lally Tollendal, obtained possession of his father's estates, and a reversal of the proceedings.

LALLY TOLLENDAL, MARQUIS DE, son of the preceding, was born at Paris in 1751, and was educated at the college of Harcourt. The expenses of his education were defrayed by his cousin the countess Dillon, and by Louis XV., who thus endeavoured to make some atonement for the misfortune which he incurred through the fate of his father. Prompted by filial feeling, he wrote, when only fifteen, a Latin poem on the story of John Calas, who had been sacrificed to the fury of a mob; and when he had attained a more mature age, he warmly exerted himself to retrieve from obloquy the memory of his father; and in 1783 he regained possession of his paternal estates. Previously to the Revolution, he was captain in the regiment of cuirassiers; and in 1789 he was nominated deputy from the nobility of Paris, to the states-general. He soon became one of the most popular members of the constituent assembly; gave his support to the declaration of the Rights of Man proposed by Lafayette, and subsequently suggested as an amendment, that all citizens should be eligible to public employments, which was adopted by acclamation. But though a democrat, he was not an anarchist; he proposed the British constitution as a model of government; and perceiving that principles prevailed repugnant to his sense of justice, he resigned his seat in the assembly, and retired into Switzerland. He published a work entitled "Quintus Capitolinus," in which he retraced the operations of the National Assembly, pointed out the faults of the constitution, and condemned the suppression of the higher orders of the state. Having returned to France in 1792, he was arrested and sent to the Abbaye, but having fortunately escaped amidst the massacres which took place in the prisons in September, he effected his retreat to England, where he obtained a pension from the government. On the trial of Louis XVI. he wrote to the Convention to offer himself as the official advocate of that prince, and he afterwards published the speech which he had composed in his defence. When Buonaparte became consul, he returned to France, where he resided till the restoration of the Bourbons, in 1814. He accompanied Louis XVIII. to Ghent, as one of the members of his privy-council, and he is supposed to have written the manifesto of the king of the French nation. He wrote an excellent work, entitled "The Defence of the Emigrants," published in 1796; also an "Essay on the Life of the Earl of Strafford, the Minister of Charles I.;" and a tragedy on the fall of that nobleman. Died, 1830.

LALUZERNE, CÆSAR WILLIAM DE, cardinal, was born at Paris, in 1738. Having obtained orders in 1763, he was soon after elected agent-general of the French clergy. In 1770 Louis XV. nominated him to the see of Langres; and in 1773, he pronounced his majesty's funeral sermon. On the breaking out of the revolution he advocated many patriotic measures for the relief of his country, but was soon compelled to quit it. Under the government of Napoleon he returned home; and in 1814 he was invited by the king to re-assume his rank of duke and peer. Shortly after he was made a cardinal ; and in 1822 he died. His works, theological and political, are numerous and able.

LAMANON, ROBERT DE PAUL, a French naturalist, was born at Salon, in Provence, in 1752. The death of his father and brother bringing him considerable property, he quitted the church to study the physical sciences ; in which pursuit he ascended the Alps and Pyrenees, and explored Switzerland. He embarked with La Perouse on a voyage of discovery round the world, projected by the government, in 1785, but on visiting Maoua, one of the islands of the southern Archipelago, in order to examine the country, he was murdered. Many of his papers are in the memoirs of the Academy of Sciences ; besides which he wrote "A Theory of the Earth."

LAMARQUE, —, a distinguished French military officer and statesman, was born at St. Sever, in 1772. He entered the army as a private, and soon became captain of grenadiers, in a famous corps commanded by Latour D'Auvergne, first grenadier of France. He served in the wars of the republic, and in the campaigns of Austerlitz, the Tyrol, Naples, and Wagram ; rendered himself eminently conspicuous in Italy, particularly by the capture of Caprea ; and was afterwards sent to Spain, where he was engaged in the most arduous services, and added greatly to his military reputation. On the return of Buonaparte from Elba, he gave Lamarque the command of Paris, and afterwards nominated him general-in-chief of the army of La Vendée. He was placed among the list of the proscribed in 1815 ; but returned to France in 1818, and furnished numerous articles for the opposition journals, chiefly relating to foreign politics. In 1826 he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies ; and after the accession of Louis Philippe, he became one of the most prominent members of the movement party. Died, 1832.

LA MARTILLIERE, count de, a French general of artillery, was a sub-lieutenant in 1757 ; and after serving with distinction in Germany, during the seven years' war, he was employed in the island of Guadaloupe. He acquired much reputation by his tracts on artillery and by his subsequent successes during the revolutionary wars ; his services in which were rewarded with the rank of general of division in the army of the Rhine and Moselle. In 1802 he was called to the senate, and in 1814 the king made him a peer of France, and a member of the council of the Polytechnic school. Died, 1819.

LAMB, CHARLES, an essayist, poet, and miscellaneous writer, was born in London, in 1775, and educated at the school of Christ's Hospital. In 1792 he obtained a situation in the accountant's office of the East India Company, where he remained thirty-five years, till his salary had gradually risen to 700*l.* ; when he was allowed a retiring pension of 450*l.*, which he continued to enjoy till his death. Being thus in easy circumstances, and living unostentatiously as a bachelor,—with a mind formed for wit and good-fellowship, and possessing a keen relish for literature,—he was able not only to gratify his intellectual cravings, but to luxuriate in the company of men of genius, who might be truly said to enjoy "the feast of reason" by his social fire side. It was thus that throughout life, he could boast of the friendship of Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Rogers, Hazlitt, and a host of others, whose minds were stored with knowledge, and whose tastes were in the main congenial with his own. No man was ever more devotedly attached to the old sterling English authors of the Elizabethan age than Lamb, and no one ever more successfully imitated their epigrammatic wit and quaint morality, while he blended with them touches of pathos and fancy peculiarly his own. He began his literary career in 1797, as a poet, in conjunction with his friends Coleridge and Lloyd, their three names appearing to one volume ; and, subsequent to this, the attention of the public was for several years called to his occasional Essays, signed "Elia," which were published in various periodicals, and afterwards collected and printed in two vols. In 1808 he published "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets who lived about the time of Shakspeare ; with Notes, &c." Besides these, he wrote "Rosemund Gray," a tale ; "John Woodvill," a tragedy ; "Album Veritas ;" "Tales from Shakspeare ;" "The Adventures of Ulysses," &c. in some of which he was assisted by Mary Lamb, his sister, with whom he lived. As he wrote, not from necessity, but for his recreation, when unoccupied by official duties or otherwise disengaged, his writings were select rather than numerous ; and his manner of treating the subjects which his fancy suggested, was at once piquant, terse, and playful. He died, December 27, 1834.

LAMB, Sir JAMES BLAND BURGESS, D.C.L. bart., son of George Burgess, Esq., comptroller-general of the customs in Scotland, was born at Gibraltar, in 1732. On finishing his education at Oxford university, he travelled through many of the countries of Europe, and on his return, studied for the bar, to which he was called in 1777. Ten years afterwards he entered the arena of politics, and took his seat in the house of commons, as member for Kelston, in Cornwall. In 1789 he was appointed under-secretary of state in the foreign department, and shortly afterwards a joint commissioner of the privy seal. About this period he established, under the sanction of the premier, "The Sun" evening newspaper, and took a prominent part in conducting it, giving to his contributions the signature "Alfred," which in 1792 were collected into a volume. In 1795 he was created a baronet, and appointed for life knight-marshal of the king's household. The remainder of his life Sir James devoted to literary leisure, and in 1821 obtained permission to assume the name of Lamb only, by which he continued to be known till his death in 1825. He left numerous works connected with politics, poetry, and the drama.

LAMB, Lady CAROLINE, daughter of the earl of Besborough, and wife of the Hon. William Lamb, now lord Melbourne, was distinguished for her literary talents and decided part she took in political affairs, particularly at the time her brother-in-law, the Hon. Geo. Lamb, was a candidate for Westminster, when she personally canvassed the electors, and made herself the subject of great notoriety. She possessed a masculine mind, and was on terms of friendship with several literary characters, but more especially with lord Byron, for whom she entertained an attachment fatal to her domestic felicity. Several of her poetical pieces appeared in the newspapers and periodical journals; and she wrote the novels of "Glenarvon," "Graham Hamilton," and "Ada Reis." Died, aged 43, in 1823.

LAMBALLE, MARIE THERESE LOUISE DE SAVOIE CARIGNAN, princess de, was born at Turin, in 1749, and was married to the duke of Bourbon Penthièvre, whom she soon lost by death. She was superintendant of the household of Marie Antoinette, queen of France, to whom she was remarkably attached. After the flight of the royal family to Varennes she departed for England; but hearing of the imprisonment of her royal mistress, she hastily returned, and shared with the queen her confinement and misfortunes. She was, however, summoned before an iniquitous tribunal, where violence prevailed over pity, and cruelly murdered, in 1793.

LAMBARDE, WILLIAM, a lawyer, was born in London, in 1596. He was a member of Lincoln's-inn, and rose to be a justice of the peace for the county of Kent, and, in 1592, a master in Chancery. In 1597 he was made keeper of the rolls, and, in 1600, keeper of the records in the Tower. He died in 1601; and, from having considerable property at Greenwich, in Kent, he founded several almshouses in that parish. He wrote several professional works, the chief of which are a treatise on the ancient law of England, entitled, "Archæologia;" and another on the office and duties of a justice of the peace, called "Eirenarcha."

LAMBECEIUS, PETER, a learned writer, was born at Hamburg in 1638. He studied at Amsterdam, and in 1646 visited Paris, where he published a critical dissertation on the works of Aulus Gellius, entitled "Prodromus Lucubrationum," &c. From Paris he went to Rome, and on his return to Hamburg, was made professor of history. In 1639 he was chosen rector of the college; but in 1662 circumstances drove him from the city, and he proceeded to Italy, where he became a Roman catholic, and subsequently went to Vienna. At this capital, he was appointed librarian to the emperor, and died in 1680. He compiled a catalogue of the emperor's library, which fills eight folio volumes, and is entitled "Commentarium de Augustissima Bibli. Cæsarea Vindobonensi." He wrote also a "History of Hamburg."

LAMBERT, ANNE THERESA, marquise de, a literary lady of Paris, was born in 1647. Upon the death of her husband, Henri Lambert, marquis de St. Bris, in 1686, she employed her large fortune in patronizing literature, and learned men. At her decease, in 1733, her own writings were collected, and published in two vols.

LAMBERT, GEORGE, an English painter of the last century, imitating the style of Poussin, in which he furnished some pictures of acknowledged merit. He decorated the East India House, in Leadenhall-street, with several pictures of the settlements in India. He died in 1768, and is supposed to have founded the celebrated beef-steak club.

LAMBERT, JOHN, a distinguished general in the time of Charles I., was a student-at-law on the breaking out of the civil wars. He, however, espoused the cause of the parliament, and distinguished himself as colonel at the battle of Marston Moor; and also acted a conspicuous part in many other engagements. He vigorously opposed the advancement of Cromwell to the title of king, upon which he lost his commission; yet a pension was granted him of 2000*l.* a year. Upon the death of Oliver Cromwell, Lambert compelled his son Richard to relinquish his authority, and restored the members of the long parliament to their seats. Subsequently, however, acting in opposition to the parliament, general Monk marched from Scotland to meet him. His troops deserting, he was compelled to submit, and was confined a prisoner in the Tower. Escaping thence, he again quickly appeared in arms, but was defeated, and retaken. At the Restoration, he was brought to trial; but his submissive demeanour gained him a reprieve, and he was banished for life to the Isle of Guernsey. He here lived upwards of thirty years, amusing his leisure with horticulture and flower painting; and is said to have died a Roman Catholic.

LAMBERT, JOHN HENRY, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, was born at Malhausen, in 1728. He possessed natural abilities so powerful as to overcome all the difficulties of his early life. Compelled to follow his father's employment, as tailor, for his support, night was the only time his poverty afforded him for study, till 1748, when he became tutor to the children of baron Salis, president of the Swiss convention. He now enlarged the sphere of his acquirements in an extraordinary degree, which he made manifest by various scientific compositions and inventions. In 1756 he visited Gottingen, where he published his first work; and next, went to Paris. Soon after he published his celebrated work "On Perspective," and in the following year appeared his "Photometry." Other important and valuable scientific works succeeded, and in 1764 he visited Berlin, where he was introduced to Frederic the Great, who admitted him a member of the academy of that capital. His constitution, however, was unable to bear with his intense application, and he fell a victim to a decline, in 1777.

LAMBERT, MICHAEL, a French musician, was born at Vivonne, in 1610. He infused much grace and feeling into the art of singing, and his society was courted by people of the first distinction.

LAMBERT of Schaffnaburg, was a celebrated Benedictine; he visited Jerusalem in 1508, and at his return he composed a chronicle of affairs from Adam to 1077; the last twenty years of which is a history of Germany. A continuation down to the year 1473 was written by a monk of Erfurt.

LAMBERTI, Louis, a learned Greek scholar, was born at Reggio, in Lombardy, in 1758. He studied jurisprudence at Modena, and became secretary to the papal nuncio at Bologna. Soon after the breaking out of the French revolution, he returned to Reggio and Milan; and in 1796, aided Buonaparte in establishing a national republic. He had now become a member of the Italian Institute, professor of the belles lettres at Brera, and keeper of the public library. His chief work was an edition of Homer, in Greek, a copy of which, printed on vellum, he journeyed to Paris, to present to Buonaparte, who made him a donation of 12,000 francs. He wrote some Italian poems and a volume of translations from the Greek poets; and died in 1813.

LAMBIN, DIONYSIUS or DENYS, a French critic and grammarian, was born at Montreuil, in 1516. He was one of the first scholars of his time, and rose to be professor royal of philology and the belles lettres in the university of Paris. He wrote several valuable works on the study of the Greek tongue, and some translations of the classic authors, with excellent annotations. In religion he was a Huguenot, and apprehending a similar fate to the massacre of St. Bartholomew in 1572, his health quickly declined, and he died the same year.

LAMBINET, PIERRE, a French Jesuit, and bibliographer, was born in Ardennes, in 1742. He studied in the Jesuit college of Charleville, and at the suppression of the order he joined the Premonstratensian monks. He afterwards became a secular. Among his numerous works, the chief is "Recherches Historiques, &c. dans la Belgique." Died, 1813.

LAMBLARDIE, JACQUES ELIE, a French engineer, was born at Loches, in 1747. After five years study under Perronet, he was employed as sub-engineer on the coast of Normandy. In 1763 he was sent as engineer to the port of Havre, and subsequently to the department of the Somme. In 1793 he was made assistant to Perronet, in the school of bridges and highways, and at his death succeeded him, as well as being appointed first director of the Polytechnic school. Died, in 1801.

LAMBTON, WILLIAM, an English officer, was for twenty years a lieutenant-colonel in India, where he distinguished himself by conducting a grand trigonometrical survey of that continent. He died in 1823, at Rling, in Ghaut; having much enriched the Transactions of the Royal and Asiatic societies with important papers.

LAMET, ADRIAN AUGUSTINE DE BUSSEY DE, a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, who, from his relationship to cardinal de Retz, adhered to that statesman in his disgrace, and accompanied him in his exile. He returned to the Sorbonne, and died in 1691. After his death was published "Resolutions de plusieurs cas de Conscience."

LAMEX, ANDREW, a learned historian and diplomatist, was born at Munster, in Germany. He was the pupil of Schoeflin, and afterwards his coadjutor. He became keeper of the Palatine library at Mannheim, and in 1763 was made perpetual secretary of the academy recently founded in that capital. He was also a privy-counsellor. He published some historical works, and numerous dissertations. Died, 1802.

LAMI, BERNARD, an ecclesiastic, was born at Mans, in 1640. He obtained priests' orders in 1667, and became professor of philosophy at Saumur and Angers. Being converted, however, to the opinions of Descartes, he was deprived of his church preferment, and compelled to retire to Grenoble. He was received by his friend, cardinal de Camus, who admitted him professor of divinity. He died in 1715, at Rouen; and left numerous of his writings, of which his "Apparatus Biblicus" is very valuable.—FRANCIS, a benedictine, was born in 1636, at Montreuil, in the diocese of Chartres. After serving in the army, he embraced the religious life, and became a benedictine monk, and one of the ablest theologians of his time. He distinguished himself by his writings against Spinoza, and died in 1711. His works are numerous, and written with much purity, and elegance of style.—GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an ecclesiastic, was born at Santa Croce, near Florence, in 1697. He studied at Pisa, of which university he became vice-rector. He afterwards went to Florence, where he was appointed chaplain to the grand duke of Tuscany, professor of ecclesiastical history in the university, and public librarian. He died in 1770. He published a valuable edition of the works of Meursius, in 12 folio volumes. His own writings are numerous.

LAMIA, a celebrated Athenian courtesan, noted for the charms of her person, the brilliancy of her wit, and her proficiency on the flute. She visited Egypt, where she became the mistress of Ptolemy Soter. On the defeat of that prince by Demetrios Poliorcetes, her charms gained a complete ascendancy over the conqueror, from whom she procured great concessions in favour of her countrymen, the Athenians. The time of her death is uncertain.

LAMIRAL, DOMINIQUE HARCOURT, a French navigator, was born at Lyons about 1760. While young he entered the army, and, in 1779, he visited Senegal, with his patron M. Eyries, who was governor of that colony. Being the agent of the company of Guiana, he remained in Africa till the peace of 1783. He returned in 1785, but his conduct dissatisfying the company, he was recalled; and during the reign of terror suffered imprisonment. On his release, he obtained a civil employment, and died in 1795.

LA MOIGNON, CHRETIEN FRANCOIS DE, marquis de Baviile, a French pleader, was born at Paris, in 1644. He was educated by his father, Guillaume de Lamignon, president of the parliament of Paris, and noted for his integrity, and for his "Remonstrances and Discourses." The son closely applied himself to the study of jurisprudence, and by his unaffected style of eloquence completely reclaimed French pleading from the bombast and pedantry that had disgraced it. In 1673 he was made judge-advocate to Louis XIV.; and in 1694 the king appointed him to the vacant post of president of the parliament. In 1707 he resigned this office in favour of his son, and retired from public life. He died in 1700.

LAMOTHE, VALOIS, Comtesse de la, who became generally known in consequence of her intrigues at the French court, which led to a disgraceful trial, was the offspring of poor parents, and was born in 1757. Her occupation of carrying fagots (her father being a woodman) attracted the notice of the lady of the manor, who took the girl to live with her. Hearing her speak of valuable papers which were in her father's possession, the lady, on further inquiry, found they related to the royal family of Valois; and, on investigation, it was proved that she was a descendant of that noble family. The girl married a private in the guards; and, obtaining an introduction to Cardinal de Rohan, great almoner of France, he advised her to make herself known by letter to Marie Antoinette, the reigning queen; at the same time expressing his bitter regret that an offence he had been (though innocently) guilty of towards that illustrious lady, prevented him from requesting an interview. The queen granted her prayer, and employed her about her person; but Lamothe rewarded her royal benefactress by the grossest treachery. By means of a person named Villette, the countess kept up a fraudulent correspondence between the queen and the cardinal. Villette forged the queen's handwriting; while the cardinal fancied himself restored to the royal favour, and even honoured by the queen's confidence; for, through Villette's villany he was led to suppose he had furnished the queen with 120,000 francs, but which were kept by the countess. Not being detected in this, she carried on the fraud to an excess that merited her subsequent disgrace. Böhmer and Bassange, the queen's jewellers, had collected, at an enormous expense, diamonds, which, set as a necklace, they intended to sell for 1,800,000 francs. Lamothe persuaded the cardinal that the queen passionately desired to possess this necklace, and confided to him the commission to purchase it; and that she would give a note in her own writing for the sum, which she would repay from her private purse by instalments, unknown to the king. The cardinal fell into the snare; he bought the desired necklace, which he committed to the care of the countess, who, better to prevent suspicion, told the cardinal the queen would meet him in the garden, as she wished to thank him. A courtesan residing at the palais-royal, Mademoiselle Olivia, personated the queen; in a short speech she thanked the cardinal, and promised him her future protection. Ambition silenced every other idea, and he left the garden elated to excess. Meantime the countess sent her husband to London with the necklace; but the period of the first payment being allowed to pass without any notice being taken of it, Böhmer made his complaint to the queen, and the whole plot was discovered. The queen, incensed at the affair, required public satisfaction to be made. The minister Breteuil was a sworn enemy to the cardinal, and, by his advice, the king ordered the cardinal to be arrested; he was taken in his sacerdotal habit to the Bastille, and proceedings were entered into against Mademoiselle Olivia, who proved to be a degraded female; Cagliostro, a mountebank, the forger Villette; and the contriver of all, the countess. She alone was punished; the cardinal was acquitted, because he was a duped agent in the business; and the others effected their escape from prison: but Madame la Comtesse was whipped and burnt on each shoulder with the letter V, and then taken to the hospital, where it was intended she should remain for life; but she made her escape at the end of ten months, and proceeded to England, where she published her justification, which was read with curiosity, but excited little interest in her favour. She spent the rest of her time in London, and died in 1791.

LAMOTTE FOUQUE, CAROLINE, baroness de, a popular German novelist, was the wife of the author of "Undine," &c. Among this lady's works are, "Rodrich," 3 vols.; "Die Frau des Falkenstein," 3 vols.; "Die frühste Geschichte der Welt," 3 vols. &c. He died in 1831.

LAMOURETTE, ADRIAN, a French ecclesiastic, was a conspicuous character in the revolution. He became a Lazarist, and in 1789, was grand vicar of Arras. He much assisted Mirabeau, and in 1791 he was admitted to the legislative assembly, where he distinguished himself by his moderation. After the massacres in 1792, he retired to Lyons, but on the taking of the city by the republicans, he was captured, and sent to Paris, where he was guillotined in 1794.

LAMOUREUX, J. V. F., professor of natural history in the university of Caen, was born at Agen. He published several valuable and important works on natural history, particularly on marine botany. His treatises on the classification of submerged algae and his work on the corallines are greatly valued. He died in 1825.

LAMPE, FREDERIC ADOLPHUS, a protestant divine, was born at Dethmold, in Westphalia, in 1683. He became minister of the church of Bremen, and, in 1720, theological professor at Utrecht, to which was added, in 1726, the chair of ecclesiastical history. These distinctions he resigned, on being appointed rector of the university of Bremen, to which city he removed. Died, 1749. His principal works are "De Cymbalis veterum," and a "Commentary on the Gospel of St. John," 3 vols. 4to.

LAMPILLAS, DON FRANCIS XAVIER, a Spanish jesuit, was born at Jaen, in 1739. He was professor of the belles lettres in the college of Seville, when his order was suppressed, in 1767. He thence retired to Genoa, and devoted himself to Italian literature. His chief work was a vindication of the literary character of his countrymen against the criticisms of Bettinelli and Tiraboschi, in 6 vols. 8vo. Died, 1798.

LAMPRIIDIUS, ELIUS, a Latin historian of the fourth century, in the reigns of Dioclesian and Constantine the Great. He wrote the Lives of Antoninus, Commodus, Didamenus, and Heliogabalus, which were first printed at Milan. He is supposed also to LAMPRIIDIUS, BENEDICTUS, a Latin poet and scholar of the sixteenth century, was born at Cremona. He taught the classical languages at Rome with great reputation, and in 1521 removed to Padua. At the invitation of Frederic Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, he settled in the latter city, and superintended the education of the duke's son. He died in 1540.

LANA, FRANCIS DE, an Italian mathematician, was born at Brescia in 1637. He was a Jesuit, and a celebrated teacher of philosophy and mathematics. He first gave the hint of the principles of aerostatic machines, to be conducted by gas, in his work entitled "Magisterium Naturæ et Artis," printed at Brescia, in 3 vols. folio, 1684, which was a collection of inventions. He died about 1700.

LANCASTER, JAMES, an English navigator, sailed to the coast of America in 1591, and afterwards doubled the Cape of Good Hope on a voyage to the East Indies. He subsequently, in 1600, effected a commercial treaty with the king of Achen, and a friendly intercourse with the state of Bantam; and gave such information relative to a N.W. passage to the East Indies as led to the attempt of Baffin and others to discover it. Died, 1620.

LANCELOTTI, GIANPAOLO, a jurist, was born at Perugia, about 1510. He drew up an institute of canon law under the direction of pope Paul IV., which was published in 1633. He wrote other legal treatises, and died in 1591.

LANCELOTTI, D. SECONDO, was born at Perugia, about 1578. He travelled through the principal cities of Italy, and became a member of several academies. He wrote some works on history, and died in 1643.

LANCELOT, ANTHONY, was born in 1675. He was educated for the church, but took to the law in preference. On finishing his studies, he was made sub-librarian at the Mazarin college, where he made extracts from the most curious MSS. He assisted Valbonnais in his history of Dauphiny, continuing in the province five years, and making inventories of its principal archives. He became secretary to the king, and, in 1732, he was made inspector of the royal college. He died in 1740.

LANCELOT, CLAUDE, a learned French ecclesiastic, was born in 1619, at Paris. His reputation for learning procured him the tutorship of the prince of Conti. He afterwards lectured on belles lettres at the monastery of Port Royal, and subsequently became a Benedictine monk. Upon the suppression of his order, he was banished to Quimperlay, in Brittany, where he died in 1695. He was the author of the Port Royal grammars, so well known in England; and of many other useful philological works.

LANCISI, GIAMARIA, an eminent physician, was born at Rome, in 1654. He studied philosophy and divinity, but preferred the science of medicine; and he early became professor of anatomy in the college della Sapienza. To three successive popes he was appointed physician, enjoying at the same time other honours. He died in 1730, leaving a library of upwards of 20,000 volumes to the hospital of the Holy Ghost, for the use of the public. His own writings are esteemed, and have been collected into two volumes, 4to.

LANCRE, PETER DE, a native of Bourdeaux, was a counsellor of parliament, and presided over the trials of sorcerers and witches in the provinces of Labourd and Gascony. Greatly infected with the error of his time, multitudes were condemned to death, who now would be looked upon as lunatics or impostors. His services in this capacity were rewarded by the appointment of councillor of state. He wrote two curious works on demonology. Died, 1630.

LANCRINCK, PROSPER HENRY, an able painter, was born at Antwerp, in 1638. He imitated Titian and Salvator, and was much encouraged in England, where he met with employment under Sir Peter Lely, painting the grounds, landscapes, &c., of his principal pictures. His own works are much admired for their originality, colouring, and harmony. Died, 1692.

LANDAIS or LANDOIS, PETER, was born at Vitre, in Champagne. His father was tailor to Francis II., duke of Brittany in 1475, and the insinuating address and cunning tact of young Landais procured him the situation of grand treasurer to that prince. He became a very adroit politician, but was vindictive and cruel to such as offended him. The virtuous chancellor Chanoin felt the effect of his malice, and died in prison. This, however, brought down general indignation against the unworthy favourite, who was hastily tried, condemned, and executed in 1443. The execution of his sentence was not allowed to wait for the sanction of the duke, lest he should be reprieved.

LANDEN, JOHN, an eminent mathematician, was born at Peakirk, Northamptonshire, in 1719. He was early a proficient in the mathematics, and contributed many able papers on that subject. He made an "Investigation of some Theorems which suggest several remarkable properties of the circle," and in 1755 published a volume of "Mathematical Lucubrations." Soon after, he became agent to earl Fitzwilliam, an appointment he held till just before his death. In 1764 he published his "Residual Analysis," subsequently a "New Theory of the Rotatory Motion of Bodies affected by forces disturbing each motion," and afterwards his volume of "Memoirs." Died, 1790.

LANDINUS, CHRISTOPHER, an Italian scholar, was born at Florence, in 1424. He obtained the favour of the Medici family, through whom, particularly Lorenzo, he made some advancement in life. He became secretary to the signory of Florence, and died in 1504. He wrote several Latin poems, and other works.

LANFRANC, a learned prelate of the eleventh century, was born at Pavia, in 1005. He became prior of the abbey of Bec in 1044, and strongly expressed himself opposed to transubstantiation, and the great encroachments of the see of Rome. In a short time he removed from Bec to the abbey of St. Stephen at Caen, in Normandy, and came over to England with William the Conqueror. Through the interest of that prince, he obtained the archbishopric of Canterbury, vacant by the deposition of Stigand. Becoming involved in a controversy with the archbishop of York respecting primacy, and also with the pope himself, he so far showed his independence, by refusing to appear to the citation of the pope. He was an able politician, as well as a munificent prelate, founding two hospitals near Canterbury, which he liberally endowed. Died, 1089.

LANFRANC or LANFRANCO, GIOVANNI. There were two of this name; one was an artist, born at Parma in 1581. He was originally a domestic in the service of count Horatio Schotte, who, finding him to have a taste for design, placed him under Caracci. Under this great master he improved so rapidly that his talent was soon in requisition, and the Farnese palace and churches of St. James and St. Peter at Rome, bear ample testimony of his capability. The great excellence of this artist consisted in his composition and foreshortening, and in fresco painting. He died in 1647.—The other Lanfranc was a physician of Milan, where he practised with much success, but attempting some innovations in his profession, he was compelled to take refuge in France. He died in 1500, and left a valuable treatise on surgery, entitled "Chirurgia Magna et Parva."

LANG, CHARLES NICHOLAS, a Swiss naturalist, was born at Lucerne in 1670. After obtaining the degree of M.D. at Rome, he went to Paris, and became a corresponding member of the academy of sciences. He settled at his native place as physician, and died in 1741. He left many writings, some of which are still unpublished.

LANGALLERIE, PHILIP DE GENTIL, marquis de, was born at Salotonge, and early distinguished himself as a soldier. His capriciousness and eccentricity, however, lost him many friends, and he at last became religious, renounced Roman Catholicism, and wrote a book on the occasion. He subsequently visited the Hague, where, linking himself with a French adventurer, in negotiating with the Turkish ambassador for raising Christian troops for the Porte, he was arrested in 1716, sent to Vienna, and died the next year.

LANGBAINE, GERRARD, an English divine, was born at Bartonkirke, in Westmoreland, about 1608. He was educated at Queen's college, Oxford, where he obtained the degree of D.D. in 1646. He was also keeper of the archives, and provost of his college, which places he held till his death, in 1668. He was well acquainted with the laws and antiquities of his country, and corresponded with Seiden, Usher, and other learned men. He endowed a free-school at his native place, and published an edition of Longinus, and several works on history, theology, and criticisms.

LANGDALE, SIR MARMADUKE, was a royalist officer in the civil wars of Charles I. He gained many successes over the Scots, and general Fairfax, but on the ruin of the king's cause, he fled to Flanders.

Charles II., in 1658, created him a baron in reward of his services, and he died in 1661.

LANGE or LANG, JOHN MICHAEL, a learned divine, was born in Germany, in 1684. He became an M.A. in 1697, when he visited Jena, where he devoted himself to medicine and botany, and in 1699 he became a professor of philosophy. In 1697, he obtained the degree of D.D. at Altorf, soon afterwards the theological chair, and the rectory of the principal church. These offices, however, he subsequently resigned and went to Prenzlau, in Brandenburgh, where he was appointed inspector in 1710. He was well acquainted with the Oriental languages, and with biblical and Mahometan literature. Died, 1731.

LANGE, LAWRENCE, a traveller, was born at Stockholm. He served under Peter the Great in Russia, and in 1715 superintended the erection of the palace of Peterhof. At the desire of Peter, he visited China to procure some curiosities, and returned in 1717. He subsequently repaired to Chius two or three times as ambassador; and he was eventually made governor of Irkutsk in Siberia, in 1737. Prior to his death he published accounts of his several journeys.

LANGEBECK, JAMES, a learned Danish writer, was born in 1710. He studied theology, and the northern languages, with much success. Frederic V., employed him to travel in Sweden, to collect every thing he could relative to Danish history. During his journey he was chosen member of the royal academy of Sweden, and on his return, a member of the academy of sciences at Copenhagen, and also one of Göttingen. He was also made keeper of the archives of the realm, councillor of justice, and lastly, councillor of state. He died in 1774. His most important work is the historical collection, entitled "Scriptores Rerum Danicarum," &c.

LANGHAM, SIMON DE, abbot of St. Peter's, Westminster, was born at Langham, in Rutlandshire, in the early part of the 14th century. In 1360 he was made lord high treasurer; in the following year he accepted the bishopric of Ely; in 1364 he became chancellor; and was promoted to the see of Canterbury in 1366. He there distinguished himself by the violence of his opposition to Wickliffe, and was made a cardinal; but this so offended Edward III. that he seized the temporalities of his see. He accordingly repaired to the papal court, and was amply recompensed for its loss. He died in 1376, and his body was brought to England, and buried in Westminster abbey, to which he had been a liberal benefactor.

LANGHANS, CHARLES GOTHARD, an eminent architect, was born at Landshut, in Silesia, in 1733. He became a member of the fine arts, at Berlin, where he was also principal decorator of public buildings. His new structures were the Brandenburg gate, and the Salle de Spectacle. He was also a member of the arts and sciences at Bologna, and died in 1800.

LANGHORNE, DANIEL, an English historian, and antiquary, was born in London,

He procured the degrees of M.A. and B.D. at Cambridge university, and in 1670 he was presented to the living of Layston, in Hertfordshire, where he died in 1681. His works are on the ancient history of England.

LANGHORNE, JOHN, an English divine, poet, and historian, was born at Kirkby Stephen, in Westmoreland, in 1735. His father dying when he was a child, his mother placed him in Appieby school, and, shortly after, he became a tutor in a private family. He next was usher in a school at Wakefield, and while there was admitted into orders. In 1759 he resided with Mr. Cracroft, of Hackthorn in Lincolnshire, as tutor to his sons; and, the year following, he entered at Clare-hall, Cambridge. He published several popular pieces, particularly a poem, entitled "Genius and Valour," and having therein defended Scotland from the scurrility thrown out by Churchill in his "Prophecy of Famine," he was complimented with the degree of D.D. by the university of Edinburgh. In 1770, Dr. Langhorne, in conjunction with his brother, published a translation of Plutarch, which is still a very popular work; in 1777, he was presented to a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Wells; and died in 1779. Dr. Langhorne printed two volumes of sermons, and, in 1804, his son published his several poems.—WILLIAM, the doctor's brother, born in 1721, was presented to the rectory of Hakinge, and the perpetual curacy of Folkstone, where he died in 1773. He wrote one or two poems, and had a share in the translation of Plutarch.

LANGIUS, CHARLES, a learned critic, was born at Ghent, and adopted the profession of jurisprudence. He removed to Liege, where he obtained a canonry in the church. Died, 1573.

LANGIUS, JOHN, a learned physician, was born at Loewenberg, in Siccaia, in 1485. After studying at Bologna and Pisa, he became an M.D., and settled at Heidelberg. He was physician to four electors palatine. Died, 1565.

LANGIUS, RODOLPHUS, canon of Munster, in Germany, travelled much in Italy, and on his return excited a taste for study. He wrote a poem on the taking of Jerusalem, and died in 1519.

LANGLANDE, ROBERT, a secular priest of the fourteenth century, and fellow of Oriel college, Oxford, known as the author of some satirical poems against the vices of the Romish clergy.

LANGLES, LOUIS MATTHEW, a celebrated Oriental scholar, was born at Peronne, in France, in 1763. He published a "Dictionnaire Mauchon-Francais," and various works translated from the Oriental tongues, particularly a work on Hindoo literature. In 1792 he was appointed keeper of the Oriental MSS. in the royal library, and in the next year, he was attached to the committee of public instruction. He died in 1824, leaving an admirable collection of books, MSS. &c.

LANGLEY, BATTY, an English builder, known by his attempt to re-model the gothic style of architecture, by inventing different orders of the gothic, from an intermixture of the various Grecian orders. Died, 1731.

LANGTOFT, PETER, an historian, and Augustin friar, was born in Yorkshire, in the thirteenth century, and is known as the translator of "Boscam's Life of St. Thomas of Canterbury."

LANGTON, STEPHEN, archbishop of Canterbury in the time of king John, was born in Lincolnshire, but educated in France. He rose through the various honours of the university of Paris till he became its chancellor; and then on visiting Rome, Innocent III. so admired his learning and abilities, as to promote him to the see of Canterbury, a power of disposal then disputed by the king of England. John, however, refused to confirm the nomination, and the kingdom was accordingly under excommunication. The pusillanimous monarch at length yielded, and Langton entered into quiet possession of his diocese in 1213. This prelate was not so subservient to the Romish church as was expected, but became a strenuous supporter of the English church, and died in 1228; leaving many works, which have since been printed.

LANGUET, two French ecclesiastics, brothers. JEAN BAPTISTE JOSEPH, the elder, was born at Dijon, in 1675, and early became a doctor in the Sorbonne. For ten years he acted as curate at St. Sulpice, in Paris, and then succeeded to the benefice. From this moment, the whole life of this pious and good churchman was devoted to acts of charity and benevolence. He founded a hospital, "The Maison de l'Enfant Jesus," for the support of many hundred men, women, and children; and applied all his zeal, as well as income, in aiding his more indigent brethren. He died in 1753.—JEAN JOSEPH possessed great benevolence, became bishop of Soissons, and afterwards archbishop of Sens, where he died in 1753.

LANGUET, HUBERT, a scholar and diplomatist, was born at Vitreux, in Burgundy, in 1818. He studied the law, and took the degree of D.D. in that faculty at Padua; after which he visited Wittenberg, where, at the instance of his friend Melancthon, he embraced the Protestant religion. Shortly after, he became minister of state to the elector of Saxony, and was at Paris at the time of the massacre of St. Bartholomew, from which he very narrowly escaped. Subsequently being suspected of Zuinglianism, he retired to Antwerp, where he entered into the service of the prince of Orange. He died at Antwerp in 1681, and left many writings to bear witness to his learning.

LANIER, or LANIERE, NICHOLAS, an Italian artist, was born about 1668. He was employed by Charles I. of England; but the time of his death is uncertain.

LANJUMAIS, JOSEPH DE, an ecclesiastic, was born in Brittany. After entering the order of St. Benedict, and becoming professor of theology, his connexion with d'Alembert and Diderot compelled him to retire to Lausanne, where he embraced the reformed religion, and became principal of the college of Moudon. He published many works, which excited some attention, and died in 1808.

THE BEST HEADS CAN BUT MISJUDGE IN CAUSES BELONGING TO THE JURISDICTION OF THE HEART.

LANJUNAIS, JEAN DENIS, count DE, was born at Rennes, in 1733. He was a member of the third estate at the breaking out of the revolution; and, when the republic was proclaimed, he was as zealous in defence of the rights of his prince, as of the rights of the nation. He opposed the usurpations of Buonaparte, and after the second restoration, he strenuously resisted the extravagant pretensions of the French clergy, defended the liberty of the press and individual freedom, the law of election and the charter. He died in 1837.

LANNES, JOHN, duke of Montebello and a marshal of France, was born, in 1769, at Lestoure. He was apprenticed to a dyer, but entering the army, his zeal and energy gained him promotion, and, in 1795, he was made a chief of brigade. After various successes in Italy, and under Buonaparte, in Egypt, and other places, particularly at Marengo, he was made a marshal of the empire, and afterwards duke of Montebello. He contributed much to the victory of Austerlitz, and was very prominent in the battles of Jena, Eylau, Friedland, Tudela and Saragossa. At the battle of Essling he received a mortal wound, of which he died in 1809. His son was created duke of Montebello in 1815.

LANSBERGHE, or LANSBERGIUS, PHILIP, a mathematician and divine, was born at Ghent, in Flanders. He was long a protestant minister at Antwerp, and afterwards at Ter-Goes, in Zealand; thence he removed to Middleburg, where he died, in 1632. He wrote several astronomical works, and one on sacred chronology.

LANZI, LOUIS, an Italian antiquary, was born at Monte del Celmo, in 1732, and became a Jesuit. He taught rhetoric with great success, and, on the suppression of his order, he was sub-director of the Florence gallery. He wrote several works, particularly one on "The Tuscan Language," and "A History of Painting," &c. He died in 1810.

LAO-TSEE, a celebrated Chinese philosopher, was born about 600 years B.C., in the service of Hou-Konang. He was contemporary with Pythagoras, and taught the doctrine of metempsychosis. He followed the sect of Tao-Tsee, and must have lived to a great age, having been visited by Confucius in 517 B.C. Little, however, is known of his personal history.

LANTIER, E. F. DE, a poet, dramatist, and miscellaneous writer; born at Marseilles, in 1736, and died there in 1826. From his great age he had obtained the appellation of the Nestor of literary France. His principal works are "The Travels of Anseor in Greece" (which has not inaptly been called the Anacharsis of the bouddois); "Geoffrey Ridel, or the Troubadour;" "A Journey in Spain;" besides various other poems and tales.

LAPLACE, PIERRE SIMON, marquis DE, a celebrated mathematician and astronomer, was born at Beaumont-en-Auge, in 1749; where he became professor of mathematics in the military school. From this place he soon removed to Paris, where he distinguished himself by his knowledge of analysis and the highest branches of geometry, and was chosen a member of the academy of sciences, one of the forty of the French academy, and member of the bureau des longitudes. In 1796 appeared his famous work, "Exposition du Systeme du Monde." After the Revolution, on the 18th of Brumaire, in 1799, he was made minister of the interior by the first consul. But from this he was removed, to make room for Lucien Buonaparte, and was then admitted into the senate, of which, in 1803, he became president. Having, in 1814, voted for the deposition of Napoleon, on the re-organization of peers, he was made a marquis. He died in 1827, leaving numerous scientific works, evidences of his talent.

LAPPO, JAMES or JACOPO, an Italian architect living at Florence, who built the church of the Virgin Mary at Assisi, founded by Helius; which obtained him great reputation. Died, 1332.—ARNOLFO, his son, became a most celebrated architect and sculptor, displaying great genius and skill in his profession. Died, 1300.

LARCHER, PETER HENRY, an eminent French scholar, was born at Dijon, in 1726. His first translation was the "Electra of Euripides;" after which he translated "Martius Scribnerus," from Pope's Miscellanies, and furnished notes to the French version of "Hudibras." In 1767, a difference took place between him and Voltaire, on whose "Philosophy of History," he published remarks, under the title of a Supplement; to which the latter replied in his well known "Defense de mon Oncle." Larcher rejoined in a "Reponse," with which the controversy ceased on his part; but not so the merciless wit of his opponent. He afterwards published his "Memoire sur Venus," and translated Herodotus and Xenophon. Died, 1812.

LARDNER, Dr. NATHANIEL, a learned dissenting divine, was born at Hawkhurst, Kent, in 1684; and received his education at Utrecht and Leyden. He was the author of several important theological works; viz. "The Credibility of the Gospel History;" "The Testimonies of the Ancient Jews and Pagans in favour of Christianity;" "The History of Heretics," sermons, &c. Died, 1764.

LARGILLIERE, NICHOLAS DE, a portrait painter, was born at Paris, in 1656. He lived several years in England, and was much employed by Charles II. and James II. On his return to France he became historical painter, and afterwards director of the academy. Died, 1746.

LARIVE, M., a celebrated French tragedian, was born at Rochelle, in 1749; appeared at the theatre Francais, Paris, in 1771; where by his fine person, and his powers of declamation, he rose to eminence. He quitted the stage rather earlier in life than most actors, and died at Montignion, in 1827, aged 78. He wrote a drama, entitled "Pyramus and Thisbe;" "Reflections on the Histrionic Art," and other works.

LARIVEY, PETER DE, an old French dramatic writer, and one of the first who considered comedy as the representation of real life, was a native of Troyes, and is supposed to have died about 1612.

LARRIVEE, HENRY, a distinguished French actor and opera singer, was originally a hair-dresser, but having acquired the art of giving to recitative all the energy and expression of tragic declamation, he speedily arrived at the highest eminence in his peculiar department of the art. His wife and daughters also possessed considerable musical talents; and on his retirement from the metropolitan stage, with a pension, in 1779, they travelled through the provinces, giving concerts together. Died, 1802.

LARREY, ISAAC DE, an historian, was born, in 1638, at Montvilliers. He went to Holland, where he was made historiographer to the states-general. His works are, "The History of Augustus;" "The History of Eleanor, wife of Henry II.;" "History of England," 4 vols. folio.;" "History of the Seven Sages of Greece," 3 vols. 8vo., and "The History of France under Louis XIV.," 3 vols. 4to. Died, 1719.

LARROQUE, MATTHEW DE, a protestant divine, was born near Agen, in 1619. He was minister of the church of Vitry, in Brittany, where he officiated twenty-seven years, and then removed to Rouen. He was the author of a "History of the Eucharist;" the "Conformity of the Reformed Churches of France with the Ancients," &c. Died, 1684.—His son, DANIEL, on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, quitted France; but afterwards returned, and abjured the protestant religion. In 1693 he was sent to prison for writing a satire on the king. After a confinement of five years he obtained his release, and was appointed secretary to the council. He published several works; the principal of which was a satire, entitled "Les véritables Motifs de la Conversion de M. l'Abbé de la Trappe."

LA SALLE, Count de, a brave soldier, was born at Metz, in 1771, and entered the army, with the rank of an officer, at eleven years of age, under prince Maximilian, afterwards king of Bavaria. The privilege of birth opened to him a line of promotion; but he resolved that merit alone should distinguish him. He accordingly resigned his commission, became a private soldier, and at length rose, through long and dangerous services, which occupied eight years, to the post which he had before resigned. By his decisive conduct at the battle of Rivoli he possessed himself of the colours; upon which the commander-in-chief addressed him in these words: "Rest yourself upon these flags, you have deserved them." He was equally victorious in Egypt; conquered the Prussians on the walls of Königsberg; and finished an honourable and glorious career, in the arms of victory, on the field of Wagram.

LASCARIS, CONSTANTINE and JOHN, two noble Greeks of the 15th century, who on the taking of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, took refuge in Italy.—CONSTANTINE went to Milan, where he instructed the daughter of the grand duke in the Greek language. From thence he removed to Rome, and next to Naples, in which city he opened a school for Greek and rhetoric. Lastly, he settled at Messina, where he died about 1500. His Greek grammar was printed at Milan, in 1476; and again by Aldus, in 1493.—JOHN, surnamed RHYNDACENUS, took up his residence at Padua, and was patronised by Lorenzo de Medici, who sent him to Greece, to purchase certain valuable manuscripts, a mission which he accomplished much to the satisfaction of his employer. In 1484 he entered the service of Louis XII. of France, who made him his envoy to the Venetian senate; in 1513 he went to Rome, and persuaded Leo. X. to found the Greek college, of which Lascaris became the principal, and also the superintendent of the Greek press; and in 1518 he returned to France, and was employed by Francis I. in forming the royal library. His taste for literature induced his contemporaries to expect that he would greatly benefit the world by his own productions: his natural indolence, however, prevented him from writing much that was original, though he published translations of several classical works, with annotations, &c. Died, 1535.

LASCY, PETER, count de, a military officer, born in Ireland, in 1678. After the conquest of that country by William III. he entered the French service; and was subsequently an officer in the Austrian, Polish, and Russian armies. He rose to the rank of a Russian field-marshal; was appointed governor of Lithuania; and died in 1761.

LASCY, JOSEPH FRANCIS MAURICE, count de, son of the preceding, was born at St. Petersburg, in 1736; entered the Austrian service, and obtained the rank of general, after having displayed his military talents at the battles of Lowowitz, Breslau, and Hochkirchen. In 1780 he penetrated to Berlin, at the head of 15,000 men; for which bold exploit he was made a commander of the order of Maria Theresa, and in 1782 received the baton of marshal. He was employed against the Turks in 1788, and remained in active employment under the emperor Joseph II. during great part of the remainder of his life. Died, 1801.

LASERNA-SANTANDER, CHARLES ANTHONY, distinguished as a bibliographer in the last century, was a native of Biscay. He went to reside at Brussels, and there collected a noble library, which he opened to the public; but having been obliged to dispose of it, he was appointed keeper of the public library. He published a "Dictionnaire Bibliographique," &c.; and died in 1813.

LASSALA, MANUEL, a Spanish jesuit; author of an "Account of the Poets of Castile;" an "Essay on General History," &c. Born, 1729; died, 1798.

LISSO, ORLANDO DE, an eminent musician, was born at Mons, in Hainault, in 1530. De Thou relates, that he was forcibly taken from his parents in his childhood by Ferdinand Gonzaga, on account of his fine voice, and carried by him to Milan, Naples, and Sicily. He subsequently taught music at Rome, Antwerp, &c. and finally settled at Munich, as chapel-master to Albert, duke of Bavaria. His productions are numerous, but now rarely to be met with. Died, 1603.—His two sons, RUDOLPH and FERDINAND, were also good musicians; and besides producing many compositions of their own, published their father's works, under the title of "Magnus Opus Musicum Orlandi de Lasso."

LASSUS, a dithyrambic poet, born at Hermone, in Peloponnesus, about 500 years B.C. He is particularly known by the answer he gave to a man who asked him—What could best render life pleasant and comfortable? "Experience."

LATHAM, JOHN, M.D., F.R.S., &c. an eminent ornithologist and antiquarian, was born at Ekham, in Kent, in 1740, where his father practised as a surgeon and apothecary. Dr. Latham for many years followed similar professional pursuits at Dartsford, but he subsequently removed to Romsey, and during the latter period of his life he resided at Winchester. Though chiefly known as a naturalist, he was also much attached to the study of antiquities; while at the same time, as a medical practitioner he enjoyed a deservedly high reputation. He was the author of several professional works, besides treatises on subjects relating to medicine, antiquities, and natural history, which appeared in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. Among his productions are, "A General Synopsis of Birds," 6 vols. 4to.; "Index Ornithologicus," 2 vols. 4to.; "Herald's Pharmacopœia Improved;" and others; but his great work, which he commenced in his 32nd year, was "A General History of Birds," in 10 vols. 4to. So indefatigable was he, and withal so capable of this undertaking, at such an advanced period of life, that, with singular fidelity to nature, he designed, etched, and coloured the whole of the plates himself. This venerable man, who was in his 97th year, was active and cheerful, and in the possession of all his faculties up to the time of his death, in Feb. 1837.

LATIMER, HUGH, bishop of Worcester, one of the first reformers of the church of England, was born at Thurcaston, in Leicestershire, in 1470. It is a remarkable circumstance, though not altogether without parallel, that from being a zealous papist, he became a zealous protestant, active in supporting the reformed doctrine, and assiduous to make converts. He first became obnoxious to the enemies of innovation, by a series of discourses, in which he dwelt upon the uncertainty of tradition, the vanity of works of supererogation, and the pride and usurpation of the Roman hierarchy. Latimer had the courage to write a letter of remonstrance to Henry VIII., on the evil of prohibiting the use of the Bible in English. Although this epistle produced no effect, Henry presented the writer to the living of West Kinton, in Wiltshire. The ascendancy of Ann Boleyn, and rise of Thomas Cromwell, proved favourable to Latimer, and he was, in 1533, appointed bishop of Worcester. But the fall of his patrons prepared the way for reverses, and the six articles being carried in parliament, Latimer resigned his bishopric, rather than hold any office in a church which enforced such terms of communion, and retired into the country. During the short reign of Edward VI. he again preached, and was highly popular at court, but could not be induced to resume his episcopal functions. Soon after Mary ascended the throne, Latimer was cited to appear before the council, in doing which, an opportunity was afforded him to quit the kingdom. He, however, prepared with alacrity to obey the citation, and, as he passed through Smithfield, exclaimed, "This place has long groaned for me." In 1555, new and more sanguinary laws having been enacted, in support of the Romish religion, a commission was issued by cardinal Pole, the pope's legate, to try Latimer and Ridley for heresy, who were, in consequence, delivered over to the secular arm, and condemned to the flames. This sentence was put in execution at Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. At the place of execution, having thrown off the old gown which was wrapped about him, Latimer appeared in a shroud, prepared for the purpose, and, with his fellow-sufferer, was fastened to the stake with an iron chain. A fagot, ready kindled, was then placed at Ridley's feet, to whom Latimer exclaimed, "Be of good comfort, master Ridley, and play the man. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as, I trust, shall never be put out." He then recommended his soul to God, and, with firm composure, expired amid the flames.

LATIMER, WILLIAM, a celebrated scholar of the 16th century, who taught Erasmus Greek, and was tutor to Reginald, afterwards cardinal Pole. He was a prebendary of Salisbury, and held two livings in Gloucestershire. Died, 1545.

LATINI, BRUNETTO, an eminent grammarian of Florence, in the 13th century, who had the honour of being Dante's tutor. Died, 1294.

LATINUS, LATINUS, a learned critic of the 16th century, born at Viterbo, in 1513, author of "Bibliotheca Sacra et Profana," &c. Died, 1593.

LATOUR D'AUVERGNE-CORRET, THEOPHILUS DE, one of the bravest soldiers of France, was born in 1743, at Carbaix, in Brittany. He had been aid-de-camp to the duke De Crillon at the siege of Mahon; but during the revolution he always refused a higher station than the command of a company of grenadiers, at the head of whom his personal exploits were unparalleled. His corps generally made the van-guard, and was called the "infernal column." He fell at Neuburg, in 1800, while attached to the army of the Rhine, having been named by Buonaparte, a short time before, "first grenadier of France." A monument was erected on the spot where he fell; and his heart, embalmed, was carried in a silver box, by one of his old comrades.

LATTAIGNANT, GABRIEL CHARLES, abbé de, a poet whose songs were once popular in France. He was canon at Rheims, and counsellor of the parliament of Paris; and after having lived a life of gaiety and pleasure, retired to a monastery, and died in 1779.

LATUDE, HENRY MAZERS DE, who was a prisoner in the Bastille for thirty-five years, was born in 1724, at Montagnac, in Languedoc. In order to gain the favour of Madame de Pompadour, he persuaded her that an attempt was to be made on her life, by a box containing the most subtle poison; and when the box arrived, it was discovered that it had been sent by Latude himself, and contained nothing but ashes. This offence, aggravated by repeated endeavours to escape, was the cause of his long and rigorous incarceration; but when his sufferings became known, by the publication of his memoirs, which he wrote soon after his liberation, they became a formidable weapon in the hands of the revolutionists, and the national assembly decreed him a pension. He died in 1804, aged 80.

LAUD, WILLIAM, archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Charles I., was born in 1573, at Reading, in Berkshire; was educated at the free-school of his native place, and at St. John's college, Oxford; was ordained in 1601; became president of his college in 1611; accompanied James I. to Scotland, as one of his chaplains, in 1617; was installed a prebend of Westminster in 1620; and obtained the see of St. David's in the following year. On the accession of Charles I. his influence became very great; and he was translated to the see of Bath and Wells, and, in 1628, to that of London. In 1630, he was elected chancellor of the university of Oxford; to which he was a great benefactor, and which he enriched with an invaluable collection of manuscripts, in a great number of languages, ancient, modern, and Oriental. In 1633, he attended Charles into Scotland, who went there to be crowned; on his return, he was promoted to the see of Canterbury, and during the same year he was chosen chancellor of the university of Dublin. The zeal which he displayed for conformity to the church, and his endeavours to introduce the liturgy into Scotland, created him numerous enemies. At the commencement of the long parliament, therefore, he was impeached by the commons, and sent to the Tower. After lying there three years, he was brought to his trial before the lords, by whom he was acquitted, which so provoked the faction in the lower house, that they passed a bill of attainder, declaring him guilty of treason, which they compelled the peers to pass; and the archbishop was accordingly beheaded on Tower-hill, Jan. 10, 1644-5. He was in the 72d year of his age, and met his fate with great fortitude. Among his works are "Annotations on the Life and Death of King James;" his "Diary," edited by Wharton, and published with his "Remains;" "Officium Quotidianum," &c.

LAUDER, WILLIAM, a literary impostor, who acquired an unenviable notoriety by endeavouring to hold up Milton as a plagiarist, was a native of Scotland. In 1747 he began an attack upon Milton in the Gentleman's Magazine, which he followed up by a pamphlet, entitled "An Essay on Milton's Use and Imitation of the Moderns in his Paradise Lost." His alleged quotations from Grotius, Massenius and others, passed as genuine for a time, until they were exposed by Dr. Douglas, bishop of Salisbury, which drew from the fabricator an acknowledgment of his guilt. Yet after this he returned to the charge, in a tract, with this title, "The Grand Impostor detected, or Milton convicted of Forgery against Charles I." Lauder died at Barbadoes, in 1771.

LAUDERDALE, J. MAITLAND, earl of, was born in 1732. He was educated at Glasgow; where he distinguished himself by his brilliant talents; and devoted himself to the study of the law. His proficiency there introduced him to the House of Commons in 1783, as lord J. Maitland, where he took a decided part in the opposition to the ministry. In 1783, he supported Fox's India Bill. In 1787, he was appointed one of the commissioners to conduct the trial of Warren Hastings. In 1789, on the death of his father, he succeeded to his title and honours, and became one of the sixteen representative peers of Scotland, notwithstanding the secret and open opposition of the existing ministry. He blamed the war with Russia in 1791, and the violent measures taken a little while after against Tippono Salb. He supported Erskine's view of the paramount rights of juries in actions of libel; and was one of the most decided partisans of the French revolution, at the era of its explosion. Residing in France, in 1792, he separated its excesses from its primary objects, and was the friend of Brissot, and the Girondist, or moderate party. He attributed the French revolution to the bankruptcy of the finances, and the prodigal expenses of the court and noblesse. In 1792, he opposed the war with France, the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, the incorporation of the militia, &c.; and, in 1793, presented petitions, numerously signed, for peace. He denounced lord Grenville's bill against seditious practices, as arbitrary and uncalled for; and in 1796 demanded the abolition of Negro slavery. In 1806, his friend Fox becoming minister, lord Lauderdale was made member of the privy council, and invested with the great seal of Scotland; but he lost this place on the death of Fox, and was sent to Napoleon as ambassador, to treat for terms of peace. The negotiation failing, he quitted Paris, on Napoleon's invasion of Prussia in 1808. In 1816 he proposed, in conjunction with lord Holland, that Napoleon should be removed from St. Helena to Great Britain, and there kept a state prisoner. Throughout his career, he remained the inflexible opponent of Tory measures; and lost few opportunities of expressing his sentiments on great public questions, either in the House, or by his pen.

LAUDON, GIDEON ERNEST, a celebrated Austrian general, was born at Toizen, in Livonia, in 1716. He displayed great talents in the seven years' war, for which he was made a major-general, and invested with the order of Maria Theresa. The victories at Hochkirchen, Kunersdorf, Landshut, and Glatz, were such proofs of his skill and valour, that Frederic the Great used to own there was nobody he feared so much as Laudon. On the conclusion of peace he was created a baron of the empire; in 1786, nominated an aulic councillor; and, in 1778, made field-marshal. He next commanded against the Turks; and in 1799 took Belgrade.

LAUNAY, BERNARD RENE' JORDAN DE, the last governor of the Bastille in Paris, which was erected in 1383, and destroyed, July 14, 1789. He was a son of the former governor, and his residence in that abode had given to his character a bluntness of manner, and inflexibility of temper, which proved the cause of his own destruction. Fifteen days before the prison was attacked, three individuals, disguised, but whose manners and address showed they had popular interest, came to the prison, and asked the governor, how he purposed to act in case of an attack. "My conduct is regulated by my duty; I shall defend it," was his reply. In fact, he resolved to do so, and rather to set fire to the magazine, and perish in the ruins, than yield to the desire of the people. He executed his intention as long as he could, but was at length brought out by the populace, and murdered in a most cruel and inhuman manner.

LAUNOI, JOHN DE, a French divine, born in 1603, who defended the liberties of the Gallican church, and reformed the calendar by purging it of fictitious saints and legendary tales. Died, 1678.

LAURENT, PETER JOSEPH, a mechanic, was born in Flinders, in 1715. He is said to have constructed some hydraulic machines, when he was not more than ten years of age; and at twenty-one he was made superintendent of several public works; among which was the direction of the canals in the Netherlands. He also projected the junction of the Somme and the Scheldt; for which he was honoured with the order of St. Michael. Died, 1773.

LAURENS, HENRY, a distinguished American statesman, born at Charlestown, South Carolina, in 1734. He was chosen president of the council of safety, in 1774; elected a delegate to congress, and soon after taking his seat, was made president of that body. Having resigned in 1779, he received the appointment of minister plenipotentiary to Holland, and, on his way thither, being captured by the British, was carried to London, and committed to the Tower. His confinement lasted for more than fourteen months, during which, various efforts were made to shake his constancy, but without effect. Soon after his release, he received a commission from congress to be one of their ministers for negotiating a peace with Great Britain, and, having repaired to Paris, he signed the preliminaries of the treaty. Died, 1792.

LAURENS, JOHN, lieutenant-colonel, son of the preceding, joined the American army in 1777. He gave repeated proofs of his valour and military skill in various actions, sieges, and assaults during the contest between Great Britain and her colonies, and was killed in a skirmish near Combshee, at the close of the war. He was on terms of the closest intimacy with Washington, who highly valued his services, and sincerely mourned his loss.

LAURI, FILIPPO, a painter, was the son of a Flemish artist, but born at Rome, in 1623. His altar-pieces and other scriptural paintings are held in much esteem. Died, 1694.

LAURISTON, JAMES ALEXANDER BERNARD LAW, count DE, grandson of the celebrated projector Law, was born in 1768. He embraced the military profession at an early age, and served in the artillery, in which he obtained a rapid promotion, owing to his own activity, and to the friendship of Buonaparte, whose aid-de-camp he was, and who employed him on several important missions. He brought to England the ratification of the preliminaries of the peace of Amiens; and was received with enthusiasm by the populace of London, who took the horses from his carriage, and conducted him in triumph to Downing-street. He was in every campaign of note in Spain, Germany, and Russia, and decided the victory in favour of the French at Wagram, by bringing up to the charge, at full trot, 100 pieces of artillery. After the conclusion of the general peace, Louis XVIII. created him a grand cordon of the legion of honour, and he subsequently rose to the high rank of marshal. Died, 1826.

LAURIERE, EUSEBIUS JACQUES DE, an eminent writer on civil law, was born at Paris, in 1639, and died in 1728.

LAVALETTE, MARIE CHAMANS, COUNT DE, was born at Paris, in 1769. He was at first destined for the clerical profession; afterwards took to the study of the law; but while pursuing his studies, the revolution broke out, and he became an officer of the national guards. Though he concurred with the revolutionary feeling, he displayed moderation, voting, by petition, against the camp under the walls of Paris, and was prosecuted for leading his detachment of the national guards to the defence of the Tuilleries. He sought refuge in the army of the Alps as a volunteer, and obtained military promotion in several fields of battle, in Italy and on the Rhine. In 1796, after the battle of Arcola, Buonaparte appointed him his aid-de-camp, and he was frequently charged by him with difficult missions. In 1797 he sent him to Paris, to judge of the state of the public feeling previous to the memorable crisis of September. After the revolution, which he correctly appreciated, he returned to Napoleon, with whom he arrived at the capital towards the close of the same year; and whose friendship procured him a marriage-union with Emilie de Beauharnais, Josephine's niece. Lavalette next accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt, and there improved his title to public estimation. On his return to France, he was first appointed a commissary, and finally, director-general of the post-office, and counsellor of state. After Napoleon became emperor, in 1803, he was appointed a count of the empire. In 1814, he was removed from the post-office; but on the 20th March, 1815, by virtue of orders from Napoleon, who entered Paris in the evening, he resumed his former duties, and gave notice to stop the departure of the journals, despatches, and travelling post-horses, without signed orders. At the same time, he despatched a courier to Napoleon, to describe the actual condition of the capital. On the 2nd of June, he was nominated a peer. On the second restoration, in July, 1815, he was deprived of his functions, arrested by the sub-prefect of police, Decazes, and condemned to death as an accomplice in Buonaparte's treason against the royal authority. lette's application for pardon being declined, his execution was fixed for the 21st December. On the evening of the 20th, his lady, her daughter, twelve years old, and her governess, presented themselves at the prison door, and were admitted by the gaolers, as usual. A short time after, the daughter and governess re-appeared, supporting Madame Lavalette, apparently in great affliction. They were scarcely gone, when the turnkey appeared in his cell, and Lavalette was not to be found—his wife, Madame Lavalette, had taken his place. The alarm was given—the carriage which brought the visitors was overtaken, but only the daughter found in it. Orders were given to close the barriers, and descriptions of the person of the fugitive were despatched in all directions. Meanwhile, Lavalette was occupied with the care of quitting Paris, and passing the frontiers. The means of doing so were supplied by Sir R. Wilson, and Messrs. Bruce and Hutchinson. Dressed as an English officer, he went to their quarters, and started at seven in the morning, with Sir R. Wilson, in a cabriolet. He passed the barriers without being recognised, and arrived at Mons, where he obtained permission to settle at Munich. Five years after, a royal ordinance revoked the sentence of death, and permitted him to rejoin his family in France. On the escape of Lavalette being known, his wife was arrested, and tried, with her governess, Sir Robert Wilson, and Messrs. Hutchinson and Bruce, by the Cour Royale. The latter were condemned to a short imprisonment, and she and the governess acquitted; but she never recovered the shock caused to her nerves and constitution by the risks to which her noble fidelity had exposed her. A fixed mental alienation succeeded.

LAVALLEE, JOHN, marquis de, a French dramatist and miscellaneous writer, was born near Dieppe, in 1747. He became a member of several literary societies, wrote many dramatic pieces, and assisted in editing various periodical works. He died in 1815.

LAVATER, JOHN GASPAR, the celebrated physiognomist, was born at Zurich, in 1741. He became pastor of the principal church of St. Peter, at his native place, and was distinguished by his unwearied zeal in behalf of practical Christianity. He died in 1801, in consequence of a wound which he received in 1799, when the French troops under Massena took Zurich by storm. He was the author of a "Treatise on Physiognomy;" the "Journal of a Self-Observer;" "Jesus the Messiah," in 4 vols.; "Spiritual Hymns;" Swiss Lays, &c.; but the work by which he is universally known, and which once was highly popular, is that on physiognomy. Lavater was pious, but credulous; enthusiastic, but sincere.

LAVICOMTERIE DE ST. SAMPSON, Louis, a violent partisan of the French revolution, who rendered himself notorious by the publication of the following works: "Crimes des Rois de France," "Les Crimes des Empereurs," and "Les Crimes des Papes." He became a member of the Convention in 1792; voted for the death of the king; and, in 1794, was ordered by the Jacobin club to draw up the "Act of Accusation against Kings." The fall of the terrorists put an end to his influence; and he died in 1800.

LAVINGTON, GEORGE, bishop of Exeter, a prelate of great piety and learning, was born in 1683, and died in 1762. He was the author of a well-known treatise, entitled, "The Enthusiasm of the Methodists and Papists compared," another on the Moravians, and also some single sermons.

LAVOISIER, ANTHONY LAURENCE, a celebrated French chemist, was born at Paris, in 1743; was educated at Mazarin college; and, on quitting it, devoted himself wholly to the sciences, but more particularly to chemistry. The discoveries of Black, Cavendish, and Priestley, relative to the nature of elastic fluids or gases, having attracted his notice, he entered on the same field of inquiry, with all his characteristic ardour in the cause of science; and, possessing the advantage of a considerable fortune, he conducted his experiments on a large scale, and obtained highly interesting results. His new theory of chemistry was received with applause in Germany and France, though strenuously opposed by Dr. Priestley, whose phlogistic hypothesis it tended to overthrow. In 1789 he published his "Elements of Chemistry," a work of merit and importance. He succeeded Buffon and Tillet as treasurer of the academy; and became also farmer-general; but notwithstanding his talents and virtues, he was condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal of Paris on the frivolous charge of having adulterated the tobacco with ingredients obnoxious to the health of the citizens, and was guillotined in 1794. Besides his Elements, he wrote "Chemical and Philosophical Miscellanies," 2 vols.; "Report of the Commissioners charged to examine Animal Magnetism;" "Instructions for making Nitre," &c.

LAW, JOHN, a celebrated financial projector, was born, in 1681, at Edinburgh, where his father, a goldsmith, resided. He was bred to no profession, but studied the mathematics, and particularly excelled as an accountant. For the purpose of remedying the deficiency of a circulating medium, he projected the establishment of a bank, with paper issues, to the amount of the value of all the lands in the kingdom; but this scheme was rejected. Having seduced a young lady in England, he killed her brother in a duel, and was obliged to leave the country. He went first to Holland, and afterwards to Venice and Genoa, from which cities he was banished, as a designing adventurer; but, at length, he secured the patronage of the regent duke of Orleans, and established his bank at Paris, 1716, by royal authority. To this was joined the company of the Mississippi, a pretended scheme for paying off the national debt, and for enriching subscribers. The project became extravagantly popular, and every one converted his gold and silver into paper. In 1730 Law was made controller of the finances. The bubble, however, burst; and the people, enraged, besieged the palace of the regent, crying out, as they held up their hands full of bills, "See the fruits of your system." Law was exiled to Pontoise, from whence he escaped to Italy, and died at Venice in 1739.

LAW, WILLIAM, a pious English divine, was born at King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, in 1686; was educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge; and lived for the most part a retired life at the house of Mrs. Hester Gibbon, aunt of the celebrated historian, to whom he had been tutor. He wrote against bishop Hoadly, and was also the author of some valuable practical books, as, "A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life;" "A Treatise on Christian Perfection," &c. In his latter days he fell into the mystic reveries of Jacob Behmen, whose works he published. Died, 1761.

LAW, EDMUND, a learned prelate, was born at Cartmel, in Lancashire, in 1703; received his education at St. John's college; Cambridge; and, after obtaining various church preferments, was raised to the see of Carlisle, in 1768. He was the author of many able theological works; among which are, "Considerations on the Theory of Religion;" "Reflections on the Life and Character of Christ;" an "Enquiry into the Ideas of Space, Time, &c." Died, 1787.

LAWLESS, JOHN, the once celebrated Irish agitator, was a native of Dublin, and originally designed for the legal profession. For many years he was distinguished as a leading political character with the Liberals of Ireland; and, from his straightforward and fearless conduct, he acquired from all parties the title of "honest Jack Lawless." When the English government first proposed to grant emancipation to the Irish Catholics, provided their clergy were paid by the state, and the forty-shilling freeholders were disfranchised, "honest Jack" vehemently opposed the measure in the Catholic Association, and thereby acquired a degree of popularity, which aroused the jealousy of his great rival co-agitator. His eloquence was energetic, forcible, and convincing; and it is generally understood, that whatever might have been the faults of the head, his heart was sound at the core. He died in London, aged 65, in August, 1837.

LAWES, HENRY, a musician, was born at Salisbury, in 1600, and is said to have been the first who introduced the Italian style of music into England. In 1633 he published his "Airs, Dialogues," &c. He set to music the "Comus" of Milton, with whom he was intimate. He also set most of Waller's songs, and died in 1652.—His brother WILLIAM, who was an excellent performer, took up arms in the royal cause, and was killed at the siege of Chester, in 1646.

LAWRENCE, STRINGER, an eminent general, in the service of the East India Company. He was born in 1697; was employed during a period of twenty years on the coast of Coromandel, where he added greatly to the British possessions; and died in 1773. The Company erected a fine monument to his memory in Westminster abbey.

LAWRENCE, THOMAS, was an eminent physician, born in Westminster, in 1711; was chosen anatomical reader at the university of Oxford, in 1740; was elected fellow of the college of physicians in 1744; became president in 1767, and was re-elected during the ensuing seven years. He was the author of "De Hydrope," and other medical productions, in Latin; and was the intimate friend of Dr. Johnson. Died, 1783.

LAWRENCE, DR. FRENCH, a native of Bristol, was educated at Winchester, and at Corpus Christi college, Oxford; became eminent as a civilian and a man of letters; and died in 1800. Among his writings are, "Remarks on the Apocalypse;" and several beautiful poems. He edited and partly composed "The Rolliad" and "Probationary Odes;" and published an edition of the works of Edmund Burke, of whom he was the bosom friend and executor.

LAWRENCE, SIR THOMAS, the most celebrated portrait painter of the age, was born in 1769, at Bristol, where his father kept an inn. Having early exhibited proofs of his talent for the art, he is said to have sketched portraits in his fifth year. At the age of six he was sent to school, where he remained two years; and this, with the exception of a few lessons subsequently in Latin and French, constituted his whole education. Young Lawrence, however, had access to the galleries of some of the neighbouring gentry, in which he employed himself in copying historical and other pieces. In 1782, his father, who had been unsuccessful in business, removed to Bath, where his son was much employed in taking portraits in crayon; and, having made a copy of the Transfiguration by Raphael, the Society for the encouragement of Arts bestowed on him their prize of five guineas and a silver palette. In 1787 the family removed to London, and Lawrence was admitted a student at the royal academy. His subsequent career was successful and brilliant. He was elected royal associate in 1791, and, on the death of Sir J. Reynolds, the next year, was made painter to the king. He was honoured with the personal friendship of George IV., who sat to him for several portraits, and bestowed on him the order of knighthood. After the peace of 1814 he painted the portraits of the allied sovereigns, and the generals Blücher, Platonoff, and Wellington; also Louis XVIII. and Charles X. of France; besides numerous others, consisting of the principal nobility of England, the pope, cardinal Gonsalvi, and many other distinguished personages on the continent. On the death of Mr. West, in 1820, Sir T. Lawrence was elected president of the royal academy; and he died in 1830. No artist ever possessed in a higher degree the merit of preserving exquisite likenesses, while at the same time he heightened the beauty and characteristic expression of his originals; and had he cultivated the higher branches of the art, it is probable that few would have excelled him. In early life he was remarkably handsome, and he retained much of personal beauty to the last. He obtained high prices for his productions, and his income has been estimated at from 10,000*l.* to 15,000*l.* a year; yet so profusely liberal was he, particularly in the purchase of scarce and valuable works of art, that he died in embarrassed circumstances; though the collection which he left of drawings, etchings, &c. was valued at 50,000*l.* He was buried in St. Paul's cathedral, his LAX, Rev. WILLIAM, F.R.S., an eminent mathematician and astronomer, Lowndes' professor of astronomy and geometry in the university of Cambridge, and the author of several elaborate Tables, connected with the Nautical Almanack. Died, 1836.

LEAKE, Sir JOHN, the son of Mr. Richard Leake, who was master-gunner of England, and one of the bravest men that ever served in the British navy, was a gallant and successful English admiral, born in 1656. He was distinguished by many great actions; but chiefly by his relief and preservation of Gibraltar from the French and Spaniards in 1705. He also took Carthage and Minorca; and afterwards, as commander-in-chief of the fleet, greatly signalized himself in the Mediterranean. Died, 1720.

LEAKE, JOHN, an eminent English physician, was the founder of the Westminster lying-in-hospital, and died in 1793. He published several valuable books on midwifery and female diseases.

LEAKE, STEPHEN MARTIN, a nephew of the preceding, was an ingenious writer on coins and heraldry. Died, 1773.

LEAPOR, MARY, an ingenious female, a native of Marlton St. Lawrence, who died in 1748. Two volumes of her poems were printed after her death, in the last of which is a tragedy, entitled "The Unhappy Father."

LE BLANC, MARCEL, one of the fourteen Jesuits sent by Louis XVI. to Siam. He laboured for the conversion of the Taiapins, and embarked for China, but the vessel was taken by the English, and he continued a prisoner till 1690. He died at Mombique in 1693, aged 40. He wrote a "History of the Revolution of Siam."

LE BLANC, JOHN BERNARD, born at Dijon, in 1707; author of "Letters on the English Nation," 3 vols. Died, 1781.

LEBRUN, CHARLES, accelerated painter, was born at Paris, in 1618. He studied under Vouet and Poussin; and, after his return from Rome, was made president of the new royal academy of painting and sculpture. From 1681, he was principally employed in embellishing the residences of Louis XIV. and his nobles with works of art, and in superintending the brilliant spectacles of the court. He died in 1690. Lebrun possessed a comprehensive genius, which was cultivated by the incessant study of history and national customs. He wrote a treatise on the Passions, and another on Physiognomy.

LEBRUN, PIERRE DENIS EDOUARD, a French poet, who for a time obtained the appellation of the French Pindar, was born in 1729; became secretary to the prince of Conti; and early distinguished himself as a writer of elegant lyrics. At the commencement of the revolution he celebrated the birth of freedom in odes, epigrams, and songs; but, like many others, he saw, ere long, sufficient reason to deplore the fate of his unhappy country, crushed beneath the foot of anarchy. When the ac-demical establishments were re-organized, Lebrun became a member of the Institute; and he received from Buonaparte, when first consul, a pension of six thousand francs. Died, 1807.

LEBRUN, CHARLES FRANCIS, duke of Placentia, was born, in 1739, at Coutances, in Normandy; came at an early age to Paris; and being nominated deputy to the states-general, in 1789, he occupied himself, during the session, with affairs of police, finance, and domestic administration. In 1793, he was elected to the council of elders, and became president in 1796. He was appointed third consul in December, 1799; nominated arch-treasurer of the empire in 1804; and in 1805, governor-general of Liguria, and duke of Placentia. Having signed the constitution that recalled the house of Bourbon to the throne, he was created a peer of France by the king, and, in the beginning of July, was appointed president of the first bureau of the chamber of peers. After the return of Napoleon, he accepted the peerage from him, and likewise the place of grand-master of the university, a proceeding which rendered him incapable of sitting in the new chamber of peers, formed in August, 1815. In the early part of his life he translated the Iliad and Odyssey, and Tasso's Jerusalem. Died, 1824.

LE BRUN, PIGAULT, an eminent French novelist, who for humour, truth to nature, and graphic powers of description, particularly in scenes of low life, may be regarded as the Fielding of France, was born in 1749, and died at Paris, in 1836.

LECCHI, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, an Italian Jesuit, born in 1702, was an excellent mathematician, and published several clever treatises on hydrostatics, navigable canals, geometry, trigonometry, conic sections, &c. He went to Vienna, and was employed by the emperor in the arduous task of measuring the bed of the Rhine, in which he displayed great talent. Died, 1776.

LECLERC, JOHN, an eminent critic, born at Geneva, in 1657. He was the author of numerous works; among which are, "Ars Critica," "Harmonia Evangelica," and three voluminous "Bibliothèques." He was professor of philosophy, the belles lettres, and Hebrew, at Amsterdam, where he died in 1736. So prone was he to dogmatize, and so impatient of contradiction, that he has been styled the self-constituted inquisitor of the republic of literature.

LECLERC, NICHOLAS GABRIEL, a physician, was born in Francie Comté, in 1726. In 1757 he was appointed first physician to the forces of the emperor of Germany. afterwards served with the duke of Orleans; and, in 1769, went to Russia, with the title of first physician to the grand duke, and director of the schools of the imperial corps of cadets. In 1777 he returned to France, and published his "Histoire Physique, morale, civile, et politique de la Russie," 6 vols. 4to.; for which the French government rewarded him with a patent of nobility, and a pension of 6000 livres; he also published many other works, medical and historical. He was deprived of his pension by the Revolution, and died in 1796.

LECLERC, VICTOR EMANUEL, a French general, was born at Pontoise, in 1772; entered the army as a volunteer, in 1791; and, having distinguished himself at the siege of Toulon, was promoted to be chief of a battalion. He was attached to the army of Italy, under the command of Buonaparte, in 1796; was made a general of brigade, in 1797; married one of the sisters of Buonaparte; and, in 1799, was placed at the head of the army of the Rhine. In December, 1801, he sailed from Brest, on an expedition intended for the conquest of St. Domingo; and in a few months after his arrival, he was seized with the yellow fever, and died, in 1802.

LE CONTEUR, JOHN, lieutenant-general, was born in Jersey, in 1761; entered the army when a boy of 15 years of age, and bore a conspicuous part in the defence of his native island, under the lamented Major Pierson, in 1781; for which he was promoted to a lieutenancy. In the following year he joined the 100th foot in India, and was among those who, under general Mathews, so bravely defended the town and fort of Nagur, against Tipoo's army of 2,000 French and 100,000 Sepoys; the British force consisting of only 600 Europeans and 1,000 natives. After losing 600 men in killed and wounded, they surrendered; and, with the other subaltern officers, he was marched, naked and fettered, 150 miles up the country. The general and all his captains were poisoned; the lieutenants, &c. were threatened with a similar doom, and sustained the greatest privations and hardships in prison for eleven months; when, on account of peace having been made with Tipoo, the prisoners were released. He was during a long life engaged in active service in different parts of the world, and was promoted to the rank of major-general in 1811. Died, 1836.

LEDWICH, EDWARD, a learned antiquary and topographer, was born in Ireland, in 1739; received his education at Trinity college, Dublin, where he obtained a fellowship, and the degree of LL.D.; and was presented to the living of Aghadoe. His principal work is the "Antiquities of Ireland," 3 vols. 4to.; in which he disproved many of the legendary tales and saintly miracles, currently believed, and thereby brought upon himself the enmity of the credulous and bigotted. Died, 1823.

LECOMTE, FELIX, a celebrated French sculptor. Having obtained a prize for a bas-relief of the massacre of the Innocents, while he was a pupil of Vasé, he was sent to Rome as a pensionary of the French school of arts. His statue of Phœbus preserving Œdipus, procured him admission into the academy; but the statue of Fénélon, which ornaments the hall of the National Institute, is considered his chief-d'œuvre. During the Revolution he lived in retirement; but at the restoration of the Bourbons, he was nominated professor in the academy of sculpture. Died, aged 80, in 1817.

LEDYARD, JOHN, an adventurous American traveller, of the last century, was born at Groton, in Connecticut, in 1751. For a short time he resided among the Six Nations, with whose language and manners he became acquainted. He then came to England, enlisted as a marine, and sailed with captain Cook, on his second voyage, of which he published an account. He next determined to make the tour of the globe from London east, on foot, and proceeded to St. Petersburg in the prosecution of this design, through the most unfrequented parts of Finland. After waiting there nearly three months, he obtained his passport for the prosecution of his journey to Siberia. On his arrival at Yakutsk, he was prevented by the Russian commandant of the place, from proceeding any farther; and was conducted to the frontiers of Poland, with a threat of being consigned to the hands of the executioner, should he again be found in the Russian territories. He was next employed by the African association to explore the interior of Africa; but he had proceeded no farther than Grand Cairo, when he was attacked with a fatal disease, and died, in 1788.

LEE, NATHANIEL, an English dramatic writer, was born at Hatfield, in Hertfordshire; and was educated at Westminster school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge. Being disappointed of a fellowship, he made an attempt as an actor, but without success; on which he turned his attention to dramatic composition, and in 1675 produced the tragedy of "Nero." He afterwards became insane, and was confined in Bedlam for two years; and died in 1692, in consequence of some injury received in a drunken frolic. He wrote eleven tragedies, of which "The Rival Queens," and "Theodosius," are the best; and he assisted Dryden in writing "Œdipus," and "The Duke of Guise." Lee's dramas are not deficient in poetic genius, but a degree of turgid eloquence too often destroys the effect of his most pathetic scenes.

LEE, CHARLES, a military officer, distinguished during the American war, was a native of North Wales. He entered into the army at a very early age, and served in America, and under Burgoyne in Portugal. In the contest between the colonies and England, he wrote on the side of the former, and engaged in their service. In 1775 he received a commission from congress, and, as a major-general, accompanied Washington to the camp before Boston. He was afterwards invested with the chief command in the southern department, where his conduct on the memorable attack of the British upon Sullivan island, raised his military reputation. While marching through the Jerseys to join Washington, Lee was made prisoner by the English, as he lay carelessly guarded, at a considerable distance from the main body, and carried to New York. Howe affected to consider him as a deserter from the British army, and he was treated in a manner unworthy of a generous enemy, until the surrender of Burgoyne; after which event he was exchanged. He was brave in action, and possessed military talents of a high order; but he was jealous of the power of Washington; and at the battle of Monmouth, in 1776, he disobeyed that general's orders. For this he was tried by a court-martial, and suspended for a year. He then retired from the service; and died in 1782.

LEE, HENRY, an American general, was born in the state of Virginia, in 1736. He commenced his military career as captain of one of the six companies of cavalry, raised by Virginia, after she had thrown off the authority of the mother country; and, having shown much skill and energy on several occasions, was raised to the rank of major, and entrusted with the command of a separate corps. In the famous retreat of Greene, before Cornwallis, into Virginia, Lee's legion formed the rear-guard of the American army, and repelled every attempt of the enemy to impede its march. From that time to the termination of the war, general Lee was constantly engaged, and performed many valuable services to the republic. When the independence of the United States was ratified, he was appointed a member of the house of delegates; was made governor of Virginia, in 1792; chosen a member of congress in 1799, and retained his seat till the accession of Mr. Jefferson to the president's chair, when he retired into private life. Died, 1818.

LEE, SOPHIA, the daughter of an able actor, and a most respectable member of society, was born in London, in 1730, and had the advantage of an excellent education. In 1780 she produced the comedy of "The Chapter of Accidents," which was so successful that the profits of it enabled her to establish a ladies' school at Bath, which was conducted by herself and sisters for several years with reputation. Her next literary performance was "The Recess," a romance, which became very popular, and established her fame. She also wrote "Almeyda," a tragedy; "The Assumption," a comedy; "A Hermit's Tale," a poem; "The Life of a Lover;" and three of the stories in her sister's Canterbury Tales. In 1803 Miss Lee retired from the toils of talent; and died at Clifton, near Bristol, in 1834.

LEE, RACHAEL FANNY ANTONINA, an eccentric woman, of ample fortune, and of masculine mind. She married, in 1794, Mathew Allen Lee, from whom she separated the following year, with a settlement of 1000*l.* annually. In 1804 she became the subject of public conversation by an alleged abduction from her house in Bolton-row, by two brothers, the Rev. Lockhart and Mr. Loudoun Gordon, cousins to the earl of Aboyne; for which they were tried at the Oxford assizes, and, though acquitted, received a severe reprimand. Mrs. Lee published a vindication of her conduct, an "Essay on Government," and other pamphlets. Died, 1839.

LEECHMAN, WILLIAM, a learned Scotch divine, particularly celebrated as a lecturer on theology, was born at Dolphinston, in Lanarkshire, in 1708; was educated at the university of Edinburgh; and elected professor of theology at Glasgow. He held this situation seventeen years, during which time he signalled himself by ably combating the reasonings of Voltaire, Bolingbroke, and Hume; and in 1761 he was raised to the office of principal of the university of Glasgow, by a presentation from the king. Died, 1785.

LEEVEES, the Rev. WILLIAM, rector of Wrington, in Somersetshire; author of the plaintive air of "Auld Robin Grey," which he composed in 1770, but was not known to be the author until 1812. He also composed much sacred music, in which were united considerable taste and feeling. He died, aged 79, in 1828.

LEFEVRE, FRANCIS JOSEPH, duke of Dantzig, a French marshal, was born at Rufack, in the department of the Upper Rhine, in 1755. He entered when young into the French guards; was a sergeant at the beginning of the revolution; reached the rank of adjutant-general in 1793; and in 1794 was a general of division. In June that year he distinguished himself at the battle of Fleurus; and, after the death of Hoche, was raised to the command of the Meuse and Sambre. Being wounded at the battle of Stockhet, in 1799, he retired to Paris, where he assisted Buonaparte in seizing the supreme power, and was rewarded by him with the dignities of senator, marshal of the empire, and grand cross of the legion of honour. At the battle of Jena he commanded the imperial guard; but his greatest exploit was the taking of Dantzig, May 24, 1807; after which he was raised to the dignity of a duke. He subsequently commanded in Spain and Germany; and he contributed greatly to the success of the French at Eckmuhl and Wagram. After the restoration of royalty he was made a peer; and died at Paris, in 1830.

LEFEVRE, ROBERT, an eminent French artist, distinguished chiefly as a portrait painter. He also produced several historical pieces of great merit. Died, 1831.

LEFORT, FRANCIS JAMES, noted as the favourite of Peter the Great, was the son of a merchant at Geneva, where he was born in 1636. Having an inclination for a military life, he entered the French army when a mere boy, and afterwards went into that of Holland; which he left to go to Moscow, by the way of Archangel, in 1675. Here he became secretary to the Danish ambassador; and a fortunate accident gave him an opportunity to gain the favour of the young czar, which he retained till his death. Peter felt that he needed an instructor and assistant; and Lefort possessed talents fitted for both offices. The first great service which he rendered the czar was in a rebellion of the Strelitz (1688). Lefort quelled the insurrection, and saved the prince from the danger which threatened his life. This exploit gained for him the unbounded confidence of the czar, who was now become the absolute master of Russia. Lefort's influence increased daily. He established the military system of Russia, and laid the foundation of her navy, which Peter afterwards carried to such a degree of perfection. Lefort had a comprehensive and cultivated mind, a penetrating judgment, much courage, and an uncommon knowledge of the resources of the Russian empire. He died in 1699.

Cherneix, in Brittany. He was an eminent physiological writer, and became physician to the Bicêtre. Died, 1814.

LEGENBRE, ADRIEN MARIE, one of the first mathematicians of the age, filled the professor's chair at the military school at Paris, was a member of the French academy of sciences, and a knight of the legion of honour. In 1767 he was employed by the French government to assist Cassini and others, in obtaining accurate estimates of the relative meridional situations of Paris and Greenwich. He also distinguished himself by very profound researches concerning the attraction of elliptic spheroids, and was the first who demonstrated that the ellipse is the only figure in which the equilibrium of a homogeneous fluid mass can be preserved under the influence of rotatory motion, and that all its component molecules would be mutually attracted in the inverse ratio of the squares of their distances. On the formation of the Institute he became a member of that body; and under the imperial government he was nominated a councillor for life of the university of Paris. In 1815 he was made an honorary member of the council of public instruction; and in 1816, conjointly with M. Poisson, examiner of candidates for the polytechnic school. Among his works are, "Eléments de Géométrie," "Mémoires sur les Transcendentes Elliptiques," "Nouvelle Théorie des Paraboliques," &c. Died, 1832.

LEGER, FRANCIS BARRY BOYLE, ST., barrister-at-law; author of "Gilbert Earle," the "Blount Manuscripts," and "Tales of Passion." He was also editor of the "Album," and a contributor to several periodical publications. He showed early indications of a precocious mind; and died, aged 30, in 1829.

LEGGE GEORGE, was the son of colonel W. Legge, groom of the bed-chamber to Charles I. He distinguished himself as a naval commander, and, in 1682, was elevated to the peerage; soon after which he was sent out to Tangier, in order to demolish the fortifications, and bring away the garrison. In this he did not succeed; and though he served his country with honour, he was committed to the Tower, and died there, in 1691.

LEGGE, the Hon. Sir ARTHUR KAYE, admiral, K.C.B. &c. He was born in 1766; entered the navy very young; was shipmate with his majesty William IV. in the Prince George; and escorted the Princess Caroline of Brunswick to this country, when captain of the Latona. He captured many of the enemy's ships; became a vice-admiral in 1814; and, in 1820, he was promoted to the rank of admiral. Died, 1835.

LEGOUVE, GABRIEL MARIE JEAN BAPTISTE, a French dramatist and poet, was born, in 1764, at Paris; and was admitted as a member of the Institute in 1798. He wrote six tragedies and several poems. Died, 1813.

LEGRAND D'AUSSAY, PIERRE JEAN BAPTISTE, a French jesuit, was born in 1737, at Amiens; became professor of rhetoric at Caen; and died at Paris, in 1800. He was the author of "Fables and Tales of the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries;" and a "Life of Apollonius Tyanæus."

LEGUANO, STEPHANO MARIA, a painter, was born at Bologna, in 1660. He was the pupil of Carlo Maratti, and his works are held in much estimation. Died, 1715.

LEIBNITZ, GOTTFRIED WILHELM, baron, a man of splendid abilities, was born in 1646, at Leipzig, in which city his father was a professor of jurisprudence and moral philosophy. After studying at Jena and Nuremberg, he removed to the court of Mentz, and was appointed a counsellor. In 1673 he went to Paris, where he applied himself to mathematics, and enjoyed the acquaintance of the celebrated Huygens, whose expectations he answered by the invention of an arithmetical machine. The elector of Brandenburg (afterwards Frederic I., king of Prussia) requested his advice in the establishment of the royal academy of sciences at Berlin, and, when completed, made him president of the institution. In 1711 he was made Aulic councillor to the emperor of Germany; and the emperor of Russia appointed him privy councillor of justice, with a pension. He was, after this, engaged in a controversy with Dr. Clarke, on the subject of free-will, as he had been before with Newton on the invention of fluxions. His philosophical writings are very numerous; and he crowned his literary fame by an "Essai sur l'Entendement humain." According to the Leibnizian system of optimism, an infinite number of worlds are possible in the divine understanding; but, of all possible ones, God has chosen and formed the best. Each being is intended to attain the highest degree of happiness of which it is capable, and is to contribute, as a part, to the perfection of the whole. Died, 1716.

LEIGH, CHARLES, a physician and naturalist, who published the "Natural History of Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derby;" a "History of Virginia;" and "Exercitationes de Aquis Mineralibus." He died at the beginning of the 18th century.

LEIGH, Sir EDWARD, a learned biblical critic and historian, born at Shawell, in Leicestershire, in 1602. He was educated at Oxford; studied in the Middle Temple; and afterwards devoted several years to professional and literary researches. He was M.P. for Stafford, and a colonel in the parliamentary army; was expelled from the House in 1649, along with other presbyterian members; and occupied himself after the Restoration in literary pursuits. His most important work is entitled "Critica Sacra." Died, 1671.

LEIGHTON, ALEXANDER, a Scotch divine and physician, was born at Edinburgh in 1568. He became professor of moral philosophy in that university, but afterwards went to Leyden, and took his doctor's degree. He then visited London, where he had a lectureship, till he was prosecuted in the Star Chamber, for publishing two libels, one entitled "Zion's Plea," and the other "The Looking-glass of the Holy War." He was sentenced to stand in the pillory, to have his ears cut off, his nose slit, branded on the cheek, publicly whipped, and impris-soned in the Fleet, where he remained eleven years, and died insane, in 1644.

LEIGHTON, ROBERT, son of the preceding, was born in London, in 1613; he received his education at Edinburgh; and in 1643 settled as minister of Newbottle, near that city. He then quitted the Presbyterian church for the episcopal; was successively principal of Edinburgh university, bishop of Dunblane, and archbishop of Glasgow; and died in 1664. He was a good theologian, an eloquent preacher, and a pious and disinterested man.

LEKAIN, HENRY LOUIS, a celebrated French actor, was born at Paris, in 1730, and brought up to the trade of a goldsmith, but renounced it at sixteen years old, for the stage, and became one of the most popular and accomplished tragedians that ever appeared in France. Died, 1778.

LELAND, JOHN, an English antiquary, was born in London, about the end of Henry the Seventh's reign; was educated at St. Paul's school, Christ's college, Cambridge, and All Soul's, Oxford; and was made chaplain and librarian to Henry VIII., who also appointed him his antiquary, with a commission to examine all the libraries of the cathedrals, abbeys, and colleges in the kingdom. He spent six years in travelling to collect materials for the history and antiquities of England and Wales; and retired to his house in London, to arrange and methodize the stores of intelligence which he had collected; but, after about two years, he died insane, in 1552, without having completed his undertaking. The great bulk of his collections, after passing through various hands, was placed in the Bodleian library, in an unfinished state. Hearne published his "Itinerary" and "Collectanea;" and Hall edited his "Commentarii de Scriptoribus Britannicis," 2 vols.

LELAND, JOHN, a dissenting minister; author of "A View of the principal Deistical Writers in England," 3 vols.; "The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Revelation," 2 vols.; and "Sermons," 4 vols. He also wrote against Tindal, Dodwell, and Bollingbroke. Born, 1691; died, 1766.

LELAND, THOMAS, a divine and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1722, at Dublin, and was educated at Trinity college. In 1768 the lord lieutenant appointed him his chaplain, and subsequently gave him the vicarage of Bray, and a prebend in St. Patrick's cathedral. He was the author of a "History of Ireland," 3 vols.; "The Life of Philip of Macedon;" "A Dissertation on the Principles of Human Eloquence," &c. This last was replied to anonymously by Dr. Hurd. Died, 1783.

LELLI, HERCULES, an Italian painter and modeller; chiefly noticeable for the anatomical figures which he made for the Institute of Bologna. Born, 1709; died, 1766.

LELY, SIR PETER, a celebrated painter, whose family name was Vander Vaes, was born at Soest, in Westphalia, in 1617, and was a pupil of Grebber, of Haerlem. In 1641 he came to England, and from that period he gradually rose in reputation. He finished portraits both of Charles I. and Cromwell, but it was not till the restoration that he reached the height of fame and prosperity. He fell in with the voluptuous taste of the new court, in his representation of the beauties who adorned it, and, by the delicacy and grace of his pencil, became the favourite painter, and was knighted by Charles II. who highly esteemed him. Died, 1680.

LEMAIRE, JAMES, a Dutch navigator of the 17th century, was the son of a merchant of Egmont, in North Holland. He embarked on an expedition with Cornelius Schooten, and in 1616 discovered the straits which now bear his name. He also visited some hitherto unexplored islands in the South Sea, and died soon after his return, Dec. 31, 1616.

LEMAN, THOMAS, F.S.A. a clergyman of the church of England, and a distinguished antiquary, who devoted his talents to the investigation of British and Roman antiquities remaining in this country. He was a most valuable contributor to several works by other authors, but he does not appear to have published any distinct treatises himself. He died in 1827, aged 76.

LEMERY, NICHOLAS, a French chemist, was born in 1645, at Rouen, in Normandy; studied chemistry at Paris and Montpellier; and gave experimental lectures at Paris, which procured him the patronage of the prince of Condé. In 1675 he published his "Cours de Chymie," which was exceedingly popular; he was also the author of a "Universal Pharmacopœia," and a "Traité sur Drogues." On the revocation of the edict of Nantes he abjured the protestant religion to avoid banishment; and died in 1715.

LEMERY, LOUIS, son of the preceding, was a physician, and in 1708 delivered lectures in chemistry at the royal garden. He was appointed physician to the king, and to the queen of Spain; communicated several papers on chemical subjects to the Academy of Sciences, of which he was a member; and wrote some works on medical subjects. Died, 1743.

LEMIERRE, ANTHONY MARIN, a French dramatist, born in 1733, at Paris. He was assistant sacristan to the church of St. Paul, and at his leisure composed sermons, which he sold in manuscript. He afterwards became rhetorical teacher at Harcourt college, and secretary to Dupin, one of the farmers-general, who had the liberality to settle a pension on him, in order that he might give himself up to literature. He produced several poems, and nine tragedies; among the latter are "William Tell," "Hypermetra," and the "Widow of Malabar." In 1791 he was chosen a member of the French academy; and he died in 1792.

LEMOINE, FRANCIS, an historical painter, born at Paris, in 1668. His principal work is the ceiling in the hall of Hercules, at Versailles, the largest painting in Europe, containing 142 figures, and being 64 feet long and 54 broad, without being divided by any architectural interruptions. He destroyed himself in a fit of insanity, in 1797.

Lemon evinced the most praiseworthy zeal; and it may be truly said, that "nearly every recently published historical work bears a testimony to his exertions."

LEMONNIER, PETER CHARLES, an eminent French astronomer, was born at Paris in 1718, and accompanied Maupertuis in his tour towards the north pole for measuring a degree of the meridian. He wrote several works on the science, and had the honour of numbering among his pupils the celebrated Lalande. Died, 1796.

LEMONNIER, LOUIS WILLIAM, brother of the preceding, was first physician to the king, and professor of botany at the Jardin du Roi. After narrowly escaping destruction during the French revolution, he retired to Montreuil, where he died in 1779. He was the author of "Observations d'Histoire Naturelle," &c. and a contributor to the Encyclopédie and other scientific works.

LEMOT, FRANCIS FREDERIC, a French statuary, was born at Lyons, in 1773. At the age of seventeen he obtained a prize for a bas relief, representing "The Judgment of Solomon;" was afterwards taken as a conscript, and served in the artillery under general Pichegru. In 1795 he was ordered to Paris, to assist in the execution of a statue of Henry IV. to be placed on the Pont Neuf. Many of his productions adorn the principal buildings of the French capital. Died, 1837.

LEMOYNE, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French musician, born at Eymet, in 1751. He studied at Berlin under Graun and Kirnberger, and had the honour of giving lessons occasionally to Frederic the Great. He afterwards returned to Paris, produced eleven successful operas, and was the first composer ever summoned on to the stage by a French audience, to receive their plaudits at the conclusion of the piece. Died, 1796.

LEMONTEY, PETER EDWARD, a French poet and jurist, was born at Lyons, in 1762. In the deliberations on the fate of Louis XVI., and in the other wild and despotic measures of the revolutionists, he advocated the cause of humanity and justice; but he was obliged to save himself from the fury of the terrorists by precipitately quitting France for Switzerland, where he resided till after the overthrow of the Mountain party. Deeply affected with the calamity which had involved Lyons, his native city, in ruin, he published his beautiful ode, "Les Ruines de Lyons." He afterwards travelled through Italy, and wrote various operas, romances, and poems; in 1804 he was appointed one of the censors of the drama; and at the restoration he was invested with the order of the legion of honour, and appointed director-general of the book trade. Among his works, the most successful are, the opera of "Palma, ou le Voyage en Grèce;" his "Essai sur l'Etablissement monarchique de Louis XIV.;" and a romance, entitled "La Famille de Jura ou iron-nous à Paris!" Died, 1836.

LEMPRIERE, JOHN, D.D. an eminent classical scholar, was a native of Jersey; received his education at Reading, Winchester, and Pembroke college, Oxford; graduated at that university; was head master of Abington grammar school, and afterwards of the school at Exeter; and on resigning the latter, was presented to the livings of Meeth and Newton Pettock, in Devonshire, which he held till his decease, in 1834. His principal works are the "Bibliotheca Classica, or Classical Dictionary," and a "Universal Biography."

L'ENCLOS, ANNE, or NINOW DE, a celebrated female voluptuary, distinguished alike by her beauty, wit, and accomplishments, was born at Paris, in 1616. She was left at an early age the mistress of a good fortune; and, being possessed of the highest personal as well as intellectual charms, and giving free scope to the indulgence of her amatory passions, it is no wonder that she drew around her a circle of lovers and suitors, distinguished either for their rank or gallantry; but her love of independence, or a more unworthy cause, prevented her from forming a serious connexion. Without making a traffic of her charms, she attached herself to those who pleased her; and having extended her favours, in succession, to the most celebrated men of her time, she proved to all that, while she held chastity in utter contempt, she was quite as regardless of constancy in her attachments. Strange as it may appear to those who have been bred up in the paths of virtue, this modern Lais was countenanced, complimented, and consulted by some of the most eminent writers of the day. Scarron, we are told, consulted her on his romances, St. Evremont on his poems, Moliere on his comedies, Fontenelle on his dialogues, and Rochefoucault on his maxims! Nay, it is also seriously asserted, that her friendship was sought by some of the most respectable of her own sex! But mark the sequel. "The power of her natural beauty," says one of her biographers, "was indeed tragically illustrated by the often told adventure of one of her own sons, who, being brought up in ignorance of his birth, fell desperately in love with his mother, and when she discovered to him the fatal secret, he, in a fit of despair and desperation, stabbed himself in her presence!" This terrible event has been introduced by Le Sage into his Gil Blas. She died in 1705, in the 90th year of her age.

LENFANT, JAMES, a French protestant divine, was born in 1691, and died in 1738. He published histories of the councils of Constance, Basle, and Pisa, very faithfully written. He likewise translated the New Testament into French, with notes, in conjunction with Beausobre. His other works are, a "History of Pope Joan;" "Sermons;" a "Preservative against Uniting with the Church of Rome," &c.

LENGLET DU FRESNOY, NICHOLAS, a French writer, was born at Beauvais, in 1674. He was an ecclesiastic, but so much given to satire and political intrigues, that he was frequently sent to the Bastille. His death was occasioned by falling into the fire, in 1755. Among his voluminous works, the best are, his "Method for Studying History," and "Chronological Tablets of Universal History," which have been translated into English.

skderable literary abilities, was born in 1720. Her father, colonel Ramsay, was lieutenant-governor of New York; by whom she was sent to England, where she married early, and was left a widow with one child. In 1747 she published a volume of poems; and in 1751 her novel of "Harriet Stuart;" which was followed, the next year, by "The Female Quixote," and "Shakespeare Illustrated." After this appeared, in quick succession, several works translated from the French, and the novels of "Henrietta" and "Euphemia." She was also the author of some dramatic pieces. Her character was unimpeachable, and she was highly respected by Dr. Johnson and Samuel Richardson; but in her declining years she was doomed to penury and sickness; and had it not been for the relief afforded her by the Literary Fund Society, her latter days must have been truly miserable. Died, 1804.

LENOTRE, ANDREW, a French architect and ornamental gardener, was born, in 1613, and studied painting under Vouet. He was a great favourite of Louis XIV., and his plans for the decoration of the park of Versailles contributed principally to establish his reputation. Deille has celebrated the talents of Lenotre, whose style of ornamental planting was fashionable, not only in France but in England, till it was superseded by the more natural style introduced by Kent, Brown, &c. Died, 1700.

LENTHALL, WILLIAM, an English statesman of the 17th century, was born at Henley, in Oxfordshire, in 1591. In 1639 he was elected into parliament for Woodstock, and in 1640 he was chosen speaker, but was turned out by Cromwell in 1653. The year following he became speaker of the parliament called by the usurper, as he did also of the Rump. Died, 1682.

LEO I., surnamed the Great, and canonized as a saint, was a native of Tuscany, and succeeded Sixtus III. in the papal chair in 440. He took a very decided part against the Manichean heresy and other schismatics; persuaded Attila to withdraw his forces from the very gates of Rome, and afterwards saved the city from being burned by Genseric. Died, 461.

LEO X., GIOVANNI DE MEDICI, pope, son of the celebrated Lorenzo de Medici, was born at Florence in 1475. At the age of eleven he was made an archbishop by Louis XI. king of France; at fourteen Julius II. invested him with the dignity of legate, and he served as such in the army which was defeated by the French, near Ravenna, in 1512. He was taken prisoner after that battle; but the soldiers showed the most superstitious veneration for his person, as the representative of the pope. He was elected to the papacy in 1513, and his coronation was celebrated with unusual pomp. He terminated the disputes which had subsisted between his predecessor and Louis XII. of France; concluded the council of Lateran; and formed a splendid library, which he enriched with inestimable manuscripts. This pontiff formed two great projects, the one to effect a general association of the Christian powers against the Turks, and the other to complete the church of St. Peter. To aid these schemes he issued plenary indulgences, by which the purchasers procured the pardon of their sins; but these indulgences being carried into Germany, aroused the zeal of Luther, and ultimately produced the reformation. He died in 1521. Leo X. was a munificent patron of learning and the arts; and his short pontificate forms one of the most interesting periods in papal history.

LEO. XII., ANNIBALE DELLA GENOA, was born at Genoa, in 1760, and succeeded Pius VII. in the papal chair, in 1823. By the remission of many taxes, as well as by his benevolence, and personal attention to the hospitals, prisons, and public institutions for the poor, he obtained the love of the people; he also endeavoured to free the states of the church from robbers and banditti, as well as to suppress the remains of Carbonarism. Leo died in Feb. 1829, and was succeeded by cardinal Castiglione, who took the name of Pius VIII. Pius died Dec. 1830, and was succeeded by cardinal Capellari (Gregory XVI.).

LEO of Modena, a learned rabbi of Venice, in the 15th century, who wrote a "History of the Jewish Rites and Ceremonies;" also a Dictionary, Hebrew and Italian. Died, 1654.

LEO, JOHN, surnamed Africanus, a traveller and geographer of the sixteenth century, was born of Moorish parents, at Grenada, in Spain. On that city being taken by the Spaniards, in 1492, he retired to Africa, through various parts of which he afterwards travelled. Having been captured by pirates, he was taken to Italy, and presented to pope Leo X., who persuaded him to embrace Christianity, and gave him his own name on being baptized. At Rome, he acquired a knowledge of the Italian language, into which he translated his "Description of Africa, originally written in Arabic. This is a very curious and interesting work, comprising accounts of several countries rarely visited by Europeans. Died, about 1526.

LEO VI. emperor of the east, called the Philosopher, succeeded his father Basil, the Macedonian, in 886. He expelled the patriarch Photius, and defeated the Hungarians; but just before his death, which happened in 911, his fleet sustained a total defeat by the Saracens.

LEO, LEONARDO, an eminent musician, was born in 1694, at Naples, and is regarded as one of the greatest of the Italian masters. He composed nineteen operas, two oratorios, and numerous sacred pieces. Brilliancy and flexibility are the characteristics of his style. Died, 1745.

LEON, FRAY LUIS DE, a Spanish poet and ecclesiastic, was born in 1527, and died in 1591. His ode entitled "La Profecía del Tago," has been translated into English by Mr. Wiffen, and published at the end of his translation of the poems of Garcilaso de la Vega.

LEONIDAS, the Spartan king and hero, was the son of king Anaxandrides, and succeeded his half brother Cleomenes, a.c. 491. When Xerxes, king of Persia, invaded Greece, with an immense army, Leonidas marched to Thermopylæ, and on arriving there, posted his army, which, including the whole of the allies, amounted only to 7000 men, so skillfully, that the enemy, on coming to the narrow pass, became aware of the difficulty of carrying it by force. Xerxes, therefore, attempted to bribe Leonidas, offering him the dominion of all Greece. This proposal being rejected with scorn, the despot sent a herald to order the Greeks to surrender their arms:—"Let him come and take them," was the hero's reply. Thrice did the Persians advance in great force; and thrice were they repelled, with enormous loss. Meanwhile, a traitorous Greek, named Ephialtes, led 10,000 of the enemy, by a secret path, over the mountain, who thus gained the rear of Leonidas. He now saw that all was lost, but resolved to show, by a memorable example, what the Greeks could perform in the cause of their country. After a long contest, the hero fell, surrounded by countless assailants. The gratitude of Greece raised a splendid monument to the memory of Leonidas and his brave associates, and annually celebrated the great event by warlike games and orations.

LEPAUTRE, or LEPOTRE, ANTHONY, first architect to the king of France, erected the palace of St. Cloud. His chief talent lay in the decoration of edifices, but his fondness for excessive ornament in a measure destroyed the simple beauty of his designs. Died, 1691.—His son, PETER LEPAUTRE, was an eminent sculptor, and became royal statuary and director of the academy of St. Luke. Died, 1744.

LE SAGE, ALAIN RENE', a distinguished French novelist and dramatist, was born in 1668, at Sarzeau, in Brittany; and studied at the Jesuit's college at Vannes. In 1692 he went to Paris, where his talents and manners procured him admission into the best society, and he soon adopted the profession of an author. He studied the Spanish language, and produced a multitude of translations or imitations of Castilian dramas and romances. His comedy of "Crispin the Rival of his Master," first attracted the public notice; but his success as a novelist has most contributed to make him known to foreigners. "Le Diable Boiteux," known in England by the title of "the Devil upon two Sticks," became extremely popular; the comedy of "Turcaret," added to his fame; and that fame was soon rendered imperishable by his admirable "Gil Blas." Le Sage was endowed with great literary fertility; he composed twenty-four dramatic pieces, and had a share in the composition of seventy-six others. Among his novels are, "The Adventures of Guzman d'Alfarache," "The Bachelor of Salamanca," "The History of Estovaniile Gonzales," &c. Died, 1747.

LE SAGE, GEORGE LOUIS, a philosophical writer, was born at Geneva, in 1724, and died in 1803. He wrote "Fragments on Final Causes," and a treatise on "Mechanical Physics."

LESBONAX, a philosopher of Mitylene in the first century of the Christian era. None of his works have reached us; but there are two orations with his name, in Greek, which Aldus printed in 1513.

LESCURE, LOUIS MARIE, marquis de, a

French royalist general, who distinguished himself, in 1793, as the commander of one of the Vendean divisions, and displayed the utmost intrepidity in various sanguinary battles with the troops of the republic. Born, 1766; died, of the wounds he received at the action of La Tremblaye, in 1793.

LESLEY, JOHN, bishop of Ross, in Scotland, was born in 1527. He accompanied queen Mary from France to Scotland, and soon after became bishop of Ross and a privy counsellor. He zealously defended the Romish religion; and when queen Elizabeth appointed commissioners to meet at York, to consider the complaints made against Mary, Lesley appeared in behalf of his mistress, whose cause he pleaded with great ability. He also tried many experiments to procure her liberty, for which he was committed to the Tower; but in 1573 he recovered his liberty, and after residing some years in France, was made bishop of Constance. Died, 1596.

LESLIE, CHARLES, son of the bishop of Clogher (who died at the age of one hundred years, fifty of which he had been a bishop) was born in Ireland; studied at Trinity college, Dublin, and the Temple; quitted the law for divinity, and obtained preferment in Ireland. He was a zealous protestant, but refused to transfer his allegiance to the new government, by taking the oaths to king William. Both by his personal exertions and his writings, he endeavoured to promote the interests of the exiled family; and on the termination of the rebellion in 1715, he accompanied the Pretender into Italy. He wrote many political tracts, against the doctrine of resistance, and in defence of hereditary right, the most important of which were in a weekly paper, called "The Rehearsal;" he also wrote some treatises against Deists and Socinians, among which are "The Snake in the Grass," and "A Short and Easy Method with the Deists." Died, 1732.

LESLIE, SIR JOHN, a celebrated mathematician and natural philosopher, was born at Largo, in Fifeshire, in 1766. His father, who was a joiner and cabinet-maker, intended to bring him up to some useful trade; but his fondness for calculation and geometrical exercises, joined to a consideration of the unfavourable circumstances under which he was placed for obtaining such proficiency, brought him at an early period under the notice of professors Robinson, Playfair, and Dugald Stewart; and when he was thirteen, his parents were induced to let him enter as a student at the university of St. Andrew's. After remaining there some time, he removed to that of Edinburgh, where he was engaged by Dr. Adam Smith to assist the studies of his nephew, afterwards lord Reston. In 1790 he proceeded to London, with an intention of delivering lectures on natural philosophy; but being disappointed in his views, he found it expedient to commence writing for the press, as the readiest means of obtaining a subsistence. His first undertaking of any importance was a translation of Buffon's "Natural History of Birds," which appeared in 1793, in 9 vols. 8vo.; and the sum he received for this laid the foundation of that pecuniary independence, which his prudent habits fortunately enabled him to attain. In 1794 Mr. Leslie spent a short time in Holland; and in 1796 he made a tour of Germany and Switzerland with Mr. Thomas Wedgwood. In 1800 he invented that admirable and delicate instrument the differential thermometer; and in 1804 appeared his celebrated "Essay on the Nature and Propagation of Heat." For this performance he was honoured by the council of the Royal Society with the Romford medals; and in 1805 he was elected to the mathematical chair in the university of Edinburgh, which, in 1819, he exchanged for that of philosophy on the death of professor Playfair. By the invention of his hygrometer he succeeded in making the discovery of that singularly beautiful process of artificial freezing or consolidation of fluids, which enabled him to congeal mercury, and convert water into ice by evaporation. Early in the year 1832 he was invested with a knighthood of the Guelphic order, an honour he was not destined long to enjoy. A neglected cold, and exposure to wet, in superintending some improvements at his country seat of Coates, near Largo, brought on erysipelas in one of his legs, and the progress of the disease was so rapid that in three days he was a corpse. The chief works of Sir John Leslie are, "An Account of Experiments and Instruments depending on the relation of Air to Heat and Moisture;" the "Philosophy of Arithmetic;" "Elements of Geometry;" "Elements of Natural Philosophy;" besides many admirable treatises in "Nicholson's Philosophical Journal," the "Encyclopædia Britannica," &c. Died, Nov. 3, 1832.

LESSING, GOTTHOLD EPHRAIM, an eminent German author, remarkable for the versatility of his genius, was born in 1729, at Kamenz, in Pomerania; and was educated at Meissen and Leipsic. In the early part of his career he connected himself with theatricals, and led an erratic life, but he afterwards compensated for it by the closest mental application. At Berlin, where he sometimes resided, he became acquainted with Voltaire, the Jewish philosopher Mendelssohn, Nicolai, Ramler, Sulzer, and other literary characters. In 1770 the hereditary prince of Brunswick appointed him librarian at Wolfenbützel; and one of the fruits of this appointment was a periodical publication, entitled "Contributions to Literary History." Among his dramatic works are, "Nathan the Wise," "Miss Sarah Samson," "Emilia Galotti," "Minna de Barnhelm," "The Misogynist," and "The Freethinker." His other principal works are, "Laocoon," "Fables," "Fragments of an Unknown," "The Ham-burgh Dramaturgy," and a "Dissertation on the Education of the Human Race." Died, 1781.

LESSIUS, LEONARD, a learned Jesuit, was born near Antwerp, in 1554, and died in 1623. His principal works are, "De Justitia et Jure," "De Protestate Summi Pontificis," &c. His books on the "Existence of a Deity," and the "Immortality of the Soul," have been translated into English.

L'ESTRANGE, Sir ROGER, a political partizan and controversial writer, was born in 1616. His father, Sir Hamond L'Estrange, of Hunstanton-hall, Norfolk, was a zealous royalist; and the son, following his example, was concerned in raising forces and in some unsuccessful enterprises in favour of Charles I. during the civil wars; for which he was obliged to leave the kingdom. Upon the restoration he returned, and established an English newspaper, under the title of "The Public Intelligencer," in 1663; which he discontinued upon the publication of the first London Gazette. He was author of many violent political tracts; translated Josephus, Cicero's Offices, Seneca's Morals, the Colloquies of Erasmus, and Æsop's Fables. He died in 1704.

LESUEUR, EUSTACHE, a distinguished French painter, was born at Paris, in 1617, and obtained from his countrymen the name of "The French Raphael." His conceptions are noble and elevated; his composition is simple, careful, and well arranged; the drawing is correct, in good taste, and proves his diligent study of the antique and of the great Italian masters; but his colouring is deficient in truth and vigour, which often renders his pictures too uniform. Altogether he may be considered a fair representative of the French school of painting. He died in his 38th year.

LESUEUR, JEAN BAPTISTE, a musical composer, born in 1763. After completing his studies at Amiens, he obtained various appointments, as director of music in cathedrals; but having an inclination for theatrical compositions, he resigned his place at Notre-Dame, in 1788, and produced several operas. "Telemachus" was his first; he afterwards composed "La Caverne," which met with the most brilliant applause; and in 1793 he produced "Paul et Virginie," the "Death of Adam," and "The Bards." This last so delighted Napoleon, that he made him chapel-master at the Tuilleries, conferred on him the order of the legion of honour, and presented him a gold snuff-box, with this inscription:—"The emperor of the French to the author of The Bards."

LETHIEULLER, SMART, an English antiquary and virtuoso, was born in Essex, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford. He made a most valuable collection of antiquities, fossils, and other curiosities, and died in 1760.

LETI, GREGORY, an Italian historian, was born in 1630, at Milan; and, after studying at Rome, went to Geneva, where he abjured the Catholic religion, and afterwards resided in England. While there he was known to be collecting materials for a history of the court of Charles II., and Charles seeing him one day at his levee, told him to take care that his history did not give offence. To which Leti replied, "I will do what I can; but if a man were as wise as Solomon, he would hardly be able to avoid giving some offence." "Why then," retorted Charles, "be as wise as Solomon; write proverbs, and let history alone." Leti, however, did not take this advice. The history appeared, under the title of "Teatro Britannico;" and the author was ordered to quit the kingdom. He then went to Amsterdam, where he died in 1701. Among his works are, Lives of "Sixtus V." 3 vols.; "Charles V." 4 vols.; "Queen Elizabeth," 3 vols.; "Oliver Cromwell," 3 vols.; the "History of Geneva," 5 vols.; and a "History of the Cardinals." But the whole are so interspersed with error and fiction, that they may be regarded rather as romances than authentic histories.

LETTICE, JOHN, a clergyman, poet, and miscellaneous writer, was born at Rushden, in Northamptonshire, in 1737, and educated at Sidney Sussex college, Cambridge, of which he was afterwards a fellow and public tutor. In 1766 he quitted the retirement of college life, and was secretary to the British embassy at Copenhagen. He subsequently engaged as private tutor in some families of distinction; was presented to the living of Peasemarch, in Sussex, in 1768; and he was also a prebendary in Chichester cathedral. His works consist of "Fables for the Fire-side," 2 vols.; "Strictures on Elocution;" "A Tour through various Parts of Scotland;" and "Miscellaneous Pieces on Sacred Subjects;" besides Sermons, Tracts, and Poems; a translation of Holberg's "Parallel Lives of famous Ladies;" and, in conjunction with Professor Martyr, "The Antiquities of Herulanum." Died, 1832.

LETTSON, JOHN COAKLEY, an eminent physician, was born in 1744, in the island of Little Vandyke, near Tortola, in the West Indies. He was educated in England, served his time to an apothecary, and became a pupil at St. Thomas's hospital; after which he practised for a short time at Tortola; then returned to Europe, took his degree at Leyden, and settled in London, where he attained considerable celebrity, not merely as a medical practitioner, but as an active philanthropist. He was a member of many literary and scientific institutions, and the author of "Hints on Beneficence, Temperance, and Medical Science," and other useful works. Died, 1813.

LEUCIPPUS, a philosopher of Elea, who lived in the fifth century before the Christian era. He was the disciple of Zeno, and the master of Democritus. The atomic system originated with him; and thus, by ascribing a sensible power to the particles of matter, and setting them in motion, Leucippus and his follower accounted at once for the origin of the universe, without the interposition of Divine agency. From him Democritus borrowed his hypothesis of the "Vortices," and Kepler was also much indebted to the theory of Leucippus.

LEUNCLAVIUS, JOHN, a native of Westphalia, born in 1533. After visiting various parts of the East, as well as great part of Europe, he settled at Vienna, and wrote a "History of the Ottoman Empire," and the "Annals of the Sultans." He also published an abridgment of the "Basilica," in 2 folio volumes; and translations of the works of Zosimus and Xenophon. Died, 1593.

LEUSDEN, JOHN, a celebrated biblical critic and theologian, was a native of Utrecht, where he distinguished himself as one of the most erudite scholars and able divines of the age. His theological works are numerous and valuable. He was born in 1634, and died about the close of the 17th century.

LEUWENHOEK, ANTHONY, a celebrated natural philosopher, was born at Delft, in 1632, and was celebrated for his microscopical improvements and discoveries, chiefly anatomical, the particulars of which were published in the Philosophical Transactions, and the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences. A selection from his works was published in English. Died, 1723.

LEVAillant, FRANCIS, a traveller and naturalist, was born at Paramaribo, in Guiana, and from childhood showed a strong predilection for the study of natural history, particularly of ornithology. In furtherance of this desire, he undertook to penetrate the interior of Africa; which he twice accomplished, though under circumstances of great difficulty. He published two narratives of his "Travels into the Interior of Southern Africa," and a "Natural History of African Birds," of "Parrots," and of the rare "Birds of the Indies." Insurmountable obstacles prevented him from pursuing his researches so far as he wished; but his travels are very amusing, and also afford much information of a philosophical nature. He died at Paris, in 1824, aged 70.

LEVER, Sir ASHTON, an English gentleman, memorable as the collector of a valuable museum of natural history; the expense of which having impaired his fortune, he was authorised, in 1783, by act of parliament, to dispose of it by lottery. The winner, Mr. Parkinson, removed the museum from Leicester-fields to the building now called the Rotunda, in Blackfriars-road; and after exhibiting it some years, sold the whole by auction. Sir Ashton died in 1788.

LEVESQUE DE POUILLI, LOUIS, a member of the French academy of Inscriptions. He died, governor of Rheims, in 1746. He established schools for mathematics, and wrote an ingenious book, entitled "The Theory of Agreeable Sensations," which has been translated into English.

LEVESQUE, PETER CHARLES, a French writer on history and general literature, was born in 1736, at Paris, and was apprenticed to an engraver, but removed and sent to Mazarin college. In 1773 he visited St. Petersburg, and was appointed professor of belles lettres at the school of cadets. After seven years' absence he returned to France, and became professor at the royal college. He was subsequently made a member of the Institute, and died in 1812. Among his writings are, "A History of Russia," "Histories of France, of Greece, and of the Roman Republic;" a translation of Thucydides, &c.

LEVI, DAVID, a London Jew, of considerable acquirements, though of humble birth and occupations. He was first a shoemaker and afterwards, a hatter, but the works he published evinced much study and ability. In 1787 he entered into a polemical cal controversy with Dr. Priestley, whose "Letters to the Jews" he answered in two series of epistolary essays. He was also the author of a volume on the Rites and Ceremonies of the Jews; "Lingua Sacra, or a Hebrew and English Dictionary," 3 vols.; "the Pentateuch in Hebrew and English;" a translation of the Hebrew Liturgy, in 6 vols.; "Dissertations on the Prophecies;" and some other works. Born, 1740; died, 1799.

SOPHISTRY IS NOT THE LESS DETESTABLE BECAUSE IT FINDS A REWARD FOR THE ABUSE OF REASON, IN THE APPLAUSE OF FOOLS AND KNAVES.

LEIVINGSTON, JAMES, earl of Callendar, a famous soldier of Scotland, was gentleman of the bed-chamber to Charles I., who created him lord Levingston of Almont, in 1633, and afterwards earl of Callendar. He took Carlisle, and endeavoured to rescue Charles from his confinement in the Isle of Wight. Died, 1672.

LEVIS, Duke de, a French nobleman of distinguished talents, who at the beginning of the revolution was chosen as a deputy to the states general, by the nobility of Dijon; but, though friendly to a reform of abuses in government, he opposed the destruction of the monarchy, and in 1792 became an emigrant, and joined the royalist army. Being wounded in the engagement at Quiberon Bay, he came to England, where he resided till the establishment of the consular government, when he returned to France, but passed his time in retirement and literary pursuits. On the restoration of Louis XVIII. he was raised to the peerage, and admitted a member of the academy. His works consist of "Maxims and Reflections;" "The Travels of Kanghi, or new Chinese Letters," 2 vols.; "Recollections and Portraits;" and "England at the beginning of the Nineteenth Century;" Died, 1830.

LEVIZAC, JOHN PONS VICTOR LACONTE, a French grammarian, was born at Alby, in Languedoc; emigrated to Holland at the beginning of the Revolution; and settled in England as a French teacher. He commenced his literary career as a poet; but he is best known by his Grammars, Dictionaries, and other practical works on the French language. Died, 1813.

LEWIS, JOHN, a learned divine and antiquary, was born at Bristol in 1673, and died at Margate in 1746. He published "The Life of Wickliffe," "Wickliffe's Translation of the New Testament," "The History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet," "The History of the Abbey and Church of Faversham," "The Life of William Caxton," &c.

LEWIS, MERIWETHER, an American officer, born in 1774; and employed by the government of the United States, with Clarke, to make discoveries in the northern parts of the American continent, with a view to the extension of commerce to the Pacific Ocean. In 1803, they undertook a journey for the purpose of discovering the sources of the Missouri; and they passed the winter in an icy region, five hundred leagues beyond its confluence. Lewis was soon after made governor of Louisiana, and Clarke a general of its militia, and agent of the United States for Indian affairs. Lewis died in 1809.

LEWIS, MATTHEW GREGORY, (familiarily styled "Monk" Lewis), a popular romance writer and dramatist, was born in London, in 1773, and was the son of the under secretary at war. He was educated at Westminster school; after which he travelled on the continent, and imbibed while in Germany that taste for the marvellous and romantic which characterizes most of his writings. His first production was "The Monk," a romance, admired for its talent, but justly censured for its licentiousness; he also wrote "Feudal Tyrants," 4 vols.; "Romantic Tales," 4 vols.; "Tales of Terror;" "The Castle Spectre," a drama, and many others. He was a member of parliament, but undistinguished by any oratorical powers; and he died in 1818.

LEY, Sir JAMES, a learned English judge, was a native of Wiltshire, and for his extraordinary merit was made lord chief justice, first in Ireland, and afterwards in England. He was also created baron Ley, lord high treasurer, and earl of Marlborough. Born, 1552; died, 1632.

LEY, HUGH, M.D., was born at Abingdon, in Berkshire, in 1790, and received his education there under the celebrated Dr. Lempriere. He graduated at Edinburgh, in 1813; afterwards became a physician in the Middlesex hospital; and was appointed to the obstetric chair at St. Bartholomew's in 1836. He was the author of "An Essay on Laryngismus Stridulus," and of many papers in the Medical Gazette; but it was in the lecture-room that his abilities were seen to the greatest advantage. Died, 1837.

LEYBOURN, WILLIAM, a mathematical writer, was originally a printer in London. He became a schoolmaster, and published a number of practical works, which were once popular and of great utility, particularly "A Treatise on Surveying;" "A Course of Mathematics;" and the "Traders' Sure Guide." He died about 1695.

LEYDEN, JOHN, a physician, but more distinguished as a poet and oriental scholar, was born in 1775, at Denholm, Roxburghshire, and was the son of a small farmer. Displaying in early youth an eager desire for acquiring knowledge, his parents contrived to send him to a college at Edinburgh, where he first studied theology, but relinquished it for medicine, and, in addition to the learned languages, he acquired French, Spanish, Italian, German, Arabic, and Persian. In 1801 he assisted Sir Walter Scott in procuring materials and illustrations for his "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border," and republished "The Complaint of Scotland," with a learned preliminary dissertation, notes, and a glossary. Having obtained a doctor's degree, he was appointed assistant surgeon on the Madras establishment; after which he was made professor of the native dialects in the Bengal college; from which situation, however, he was removed, to be judge of the twenty-four Pergunnahs of Calcutta. His power of acquiring languages was truly wonderful, and during his residence in India he devoted himself to the study of oriental literature; but he did not long survive the influence of the climate. His "Poetical Remains" were published in 1821.

divinity at Utrecht, was born at Middleburgh, in 1652, and died in 1721. He was a sound theologian, and wrote a "Treatise on the Republic of the Hebrews," 2 vols. folio; "A History of the African Church," and other works.

LEZAY-MARNESIA, CLAUDE FRANCIS ADRIAN, marquis de, was born at Metz, in 1735. In his youth he entered into the French army, but soon quitted it, and retired to his estate of St. Julian, near Lons-le-Saunier, where he employed himself in literature. At the commencement of the French revolution he was chosen a deputy from the states-general, and sat in the constituent assembly; but alarmed at the progress of Jacobinism, he emigrated to North America in 1790, taking with him artists, labourers, &c. to form a colony on a large tract of land he had purchased of the Scioto company; but the scheme failed, and he returned to France in 1792. During the reign of terror he was arrested and imprisoned, but regained his liberty on the fall of Robespierre; and died in 1800.

LEZAY-MARNESIA, ADRIAN, count de, son of the preceding, was engaged on several diplomatic missions under the consulate. In 1806 he was made prefect of the department of the Rhine and Moselle, and in 1810 of that of the Lower Rhine, in which office he was continued after the restoration. He wrote several political tracts, which at the time excited considerable attention; and died in 1814.

LHUYD, EDWARD, an eminent antiquary and naturalist, born about 1670, was a native of Wales; studied at Jesus college, Oxford, in which university he succeeded Dr. Plot as keeper of the Ashmolean museum; and was the author of a learned and valuable work, entitled "Archæologia Britannica." He also published "Lithophylaci Britannici Iconographia;" and left in manuscript an "Irish-English Dictionary;" and other curious papers on antiquarian subjects. Died, 1709.

LHUYD, or LHUYD, HUMPHREY, an antiquary, born at Denbigh, Wales; author of "Commentarioli Britannicæ descriptionis fragmentum;" "De Mousæ ruidum insula;" "De Armentario mano;" and "The History of Cambria." Died, 1570.

LIBANIUS, a celebrated Greek rhetorician, born at Antioch in 314. He studied at Athens, and afterwards became famous as a teacher of eloquence at Constantinople, till the jealousy of the other professors being excited by his success, he was accused of magical practices, and banished. He afterwards became preceptor to Basil and John Chrysostom, so celebrated in the Christian church; and on the accession of Julian, he was honoured with his friendship, and is supposed to have assisted the emperor in some of his compositions. Many of his orations and declamations are extant, but they are verbose and pedantic.

LICETUS, FORTUNUS, a voluminous Genoese writer on medicine, philosophy, history, and antiquities, who occupied the medical chair in the university of Padua till his death, in 1637.

LICHTENBERG, GEORGE CHRISTOPHER,

an eminent natural philosopher, was born near Darmstadt, in 1742; studied at Göttingen, where he was appointed professor extraordinary of the physical sciences; and succeeded Erleben, in 1777, as professor of experimental philosophy. His astronomical observations were original and important. He also indulged much in satire; and among others, possessing much wit and humour, was an effusion, entitled "The Physiognomy of Tails," in which Lavater and his system were held up to ridicule. Died, 1799.

LICHTENSTEIN, JOSEPH WENCESLAUS, prince of, an Austrian general and diplomatist, was born at Vienna, 1804. He had the chief command of the Austrian army in Italy, with the title of field-marshal, in 1746, when he gained the victory of Placentia. From that time he was chiefly employed in diplomatic affairs, and the duties of his office, as director-general of the artillery. He was a patron of the arts and artists, and founder of the Lichtenstein gallery at Vienna. Died, 1772.

LIDDEL DUNCAN, a mathematician and physician, was born in 1561 at Aberdeen, where he received his education. He afterwards went to Frankfort, and there taught mathematics and philosophy, till obliged to leave that city on account of a contagious disease, at that time raging there. He then removed to Rostock, and, in 1591, was elected professor of mathematics at Helmstadt, where he took his doctor's degree in physic. In 1607 he returned to Scotland, and founded a mathematical professorship and six scholarships at Aberdeen. He wrote several works on medical subjects; and died in 1613.

LIEUTAUD, JOSEPH, a physician, was born at Aix, in Provence, and became first physician to the king of France, and, in 1753, member of the academy of sciences. He wrote "Anatomical Essays;" "Elements of Physiology;" a "Synopsis of the Practice of Medicine;" and "Historio Anatomico Medico." Died, 1780.

LIGHTFOOT, JOHN, a learned English divine, was born at Stoke-upon-Trent, in Staffordshire, in 1602, and educated at Christ's college, Cambridge. He made extraordinary advances in the Greek and Latin languages, and applied himself to Hebrew with singular assiduity and success. In 1629, he printed his first work entitled "Eubhim, or Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical." He distinguished himself as a zealous promoter of the Polyglott Bible, and, at the Restoration, was appointed one of the assistants at the Savoy conference. He became vice-chancellor of Cambridge, and died in 1675. The works of Lightfoot, who, for biblical learning, has had few equals, were printed in 1614, 2 vols., folio, and his "Remains," were published by Strype, in 1700.

LIGHTFOOT, JOHN, a botanist, born at Newent, in Gloucestershire, in 1736, was educated at Pembroke college, Oxford, and became, successively, rector of Sheldon, in Hampshire, and of Gotham and Sutton, in Nottinghamshire. He was patronized by the duchess of Portland, and drew up the catalogue of her museum. He was a fellow of the Royal and Linnæan Societies; and published the "Flora Scotica," 2 vols. He died in 1766, and his Herbarium was purchased by George III.

LIGNE, CHARLES JOSEPH, prince de, was born at Brussels, in 1735; entered the Austrian army at the age of seventeen; distinguished himself in the seven years' war; was invited to the French court by the count D'Artois, and admitted into the privacy of the royal family; was sent on a mission to Russia, where his talents and personal accomplishments rendered him a great favourite of Catharine, who made him a field-marshal and gave him an estate in the Crimea; and, after enjoying great popularity, he died in 1814. His knowledge, experience, activity, and acute observation appear by the numerous writings which he published, at different periods; and the information he gives of the leading persons and events of his time, is detailed in an amusing and instructive manner.

LIGONIER, JOHN, earl of, field-marshal of the English army. He served in all the wars of queen Anne, under the duke of Marlborough, with distinguished glory, and was employed in every succeeding war. He died in 1770, aged 92.

LIGORIO, PETER, a painter and architect of Naples, who died in 1380. His "Designs after the Antique," make thirty volumes in folio.

LILBURNE, JOHN, a violent and enthusiastic republican in the reign of Charles I. was born in 1618, in the county of Durham. Having gone to Holland to superintend the printing of some libels on the government, he was sentenced by the star-chamber council to receive 600 lashes and to stand in the pillory; for which the long parliament voted him reparation. He fought at the battle of Edge-hill as a captain of foot; but at Brentford he was made prisoner, and carried to Oxford, where he would have been hanged, had not the parliament threatened retaliation. He then obtained his liberty, and was made first a major, and afterwards a colonel of dragoons, in which capacity he served at the battle of Marston-moor, where he behaved with great gallantry. Being committed to Newgate for contempt, when brought before the house of Lords for a libel on the earl of Manchester, he contrived, while thus imprisoned, to publish pamphlets in rapid succession, in which he virulently assailed his enemies, and even charged Cromwell and Ireton with high treason. For this piece of daring he was again tried, but he defended himself with so much boldness and ability, that he was acquitted. He possessed an unconquerable spirit, and was of so quarrelsome a disposition that it has been appositely said of him, "that if there were none living but him, John would be against Lilburne, and Lilburne against John." He died in 1667.

LILLO, GEORGE, a tragic writer of the last century, was born in London, in 1692. He carried on the business of a jeweller many years in a style of great respectability, and contrived to devote no small portion of his time to dramatic productions. He well knew how to touch the heart, and his pieces, which are subservient to the cause of virtue, are, "George Barnwell;" "Fatal Curiosity;" and "Arden of Fever-sham." He died in 1799.

LILLY, JOHN, an English writer, was born in Kent, about 1553, and died about 1600. He wrote "Euphues," a description of different characters; also some plays, as "Endymion;" "Campaspe;" "Midas," acted before queen Elizabeth; "The Maid's Metamorphosis;" "The Woman in the Moon," &c.

LILLY, WILLIAM, an English astrologer, was born in Leicestershire, in 1692. After receiving a common education he went to London, and became book-keeper to a tradesman, at whose death he married his widow. In 1692 he became the pupil of Evans the astrologer, and soon excelled his master. He was employed by both parties during the civil wars, and even Charles I. is said to have made use of him. Lilly was certainly consulted respecting the king's projected escape from Carisbrook castle. He, however, gained more from the parliament party; and the predictions contained in his almanacks had a wonderful effect upon the soldiers and common people. He died at Hortham, in 1681. His principal works are, "Christian Astrology;" "A Collection of Nativities;" and "Observations on the Life and Death of Charles, late King of England."

LILY, WILLIAM, a learned grammarian, born at Odiham, in Hampshire, in 1488. He was appointed first master of St. Paul's school by the founder, Dr. Collet, in 1510, and died of the plague in London, in 1532. He is highly praised by Erasmus, for his uncommon knowledge in the languages, and admirable skill in the instruction of youth. He wrote some poems and tracts, but he is chiefly remembered by the Latin grammar which bears his name.

LIMBORCH, PHILIP, a celebrated Dutch theologian, of the sect of remonstrants, born at Amsterdam, in 1633; chosen professor of divinity there in 1668; and died in 1712. He was the author of "A History of the Inquisition;" "A System of Christian Theology;" and other works.

LIMONADE, Count de, an emancipated Negro slave of Hayti, born about 1770; distinguished in the war of independence waged by Toussaint; and was secretary of foreign affairs to Christophe, when he superseded Dessalines as emperor of Hayti. He survived the suicidal death of Christophe, and the destruction of the imperial government. His sagacity and statesman-like talents were exhibited in frequent diplomatic correspondences with Napoleon's ministers.

LINACRE, Dr. THOMAS, a very learned English physician, was born in 1460. He projected the foundation of the college of physicians, was the first president after its erection, and held that office for the seven years he lived afterwards. He was successively physician to four sovereigns; but at the close of his life he entered into orders, and obtained the prebendaryship of York, and a prebend of Westminster. Died, 1524.

sician, who wrote treatises on the scurvy, and on the means of preserving the health of seamen. Died, 1794.

LINDANUS, WILLIAM, a native of Dordt, who exercised the office of inquisitor, in Holland and Friesland, with such severity, that Philip II. made him bishop of Ruremunde, in 1582; and in 1588 he was removed to Ghent, where he died the same year. He was the author of several theological tracts, in Latin, all of them tinged with intolerance.

LINDBLOM, AXEL, a Swedish lexicographer; professor of belles lettres and politics at Upsal, of which place he was afterwards archbishop. He crowned Bernadotte in 1818, and died the year following.

LINDSAY, or LYNDSEY, SIR DAVID, an ancient Scottish poet, descended from a noble family, was born at Garmylton, in Haddingtonshire, in 1480, and became page of honour to James V., then an infant. His first poetical effort was the "Dreme," after which he wrote the "Complaynt," and presented it to the king. In 1536, he was inaugurated Lyon king-at-arms, knighted, and, sent on a mission to Charles V.; on his return from which he occupied himself on a drama of a singular kind, entitled a "Satyre of the Three Estates," which was followed by "The History and Testament of Squire Meldrum," and other poems. During the regency, he espoused the cause of the reformers and entered with great zeal into religious disputes. His death took place about the year 1537. A complete edition of his works was published in 1806.

LINDSEY, THEROPHILUS, an eminent divine of the Unitarian persuasion, was born in 1723, at Middlewich, in Cheshire, and was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. He entered into orders, and held the vicarage of Catterick, in Yorkshire, which from conscientious scruples he resigned, and embraced the principles of Unitarianism. From 1774 till 1793, he was minister of a congregation in Essex-street, in the Strand; and died in 1803. He wrote several works on the subject of his faith; among which are, his "Apology," and a "Sequel to the Apology;" "Considerations on the Divine Government;" an "Historical View of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship," &c.

LINGUET, SIMON NICHOLAS HENRY, a political and miscellaneous writer, was born at Rheims, in 1736. Early in life he entered the army, and served as aide-de-camp to the prince de Beauvau, in Portugal; he afterwards studied the law, and became a barrister; but being expelled from the bar, in consequence of some dispute with his professional brethren, he turned political writer, and having given offence to the ruling powers, was sent to the Bastille. On obtaining his liberty, he published an account of his imprisonment, a work which produced a strong sensation, and is said to have prepared the way for subsequent events. He retired to Brussels in 1787, and there published his "Annales Politiques," for which he was rewarded by the emperor Joseph II. with a present of 1000 ducats. He then returned to France; took an active part in the revolution; and closed his life by the guillotine, at Paris, in 1794.

LINIERS, DON SANTIAGO, a Spanish admiral, born in 1760. He re-took Buenos Ayres from the English in 1808, and treated with Napoleon for the purpose of subjecting New Spain to his brother Joseph's authority. Attempting an ultra-royalist plot to suppress the revolution, he was arrested, condemned, and executed, by the successful insurgents, at Buenos Ayres, in 1809.

LINLEY, THOMAS, the name of two distinguished English musicians, father and son. The elder received his musical education under Chilcote, the organist at Bath, and for many years conducted the oratorios and concerts in that city. One of his daughters became the object of a most romantic attachment to, and subsequently married, the celebrated Richard Brinsley Sheridan; and on that gentleman completing the purchase of Drury-lane theatre, Linley became joint patentee with him, and conducted the musical department. In conjunction with his son, whose professional abilities were of a high order, he composed the airs to numerous operas, many of which are still held in great esteem. A melancholy fate awaited the younger Linley. In August, 1786, while on a visit, with his sisters, at Grimsthorpe, the seat of the duke of Ancaster, he went on board a pleasure-boat in the canal, with three other young men, when, through some mismanagement, the boat upset; his companions saved themselves by clinging to the keel, but he sank in his endeavours to reach the shore. On the intelligence being conveyed to his father, he was seized with a brain fever, and though he lived till the year 1793, he never recovered the shock which the loss of his favourite and talented son occasioned.

LINN, JOHN BLAIR, an American poet, born in 1777, at Phippenburgh, Pennsylvania. In 1799 he became a preacher among the Presbyterians at Philadelphia; but continued to cultivate his poetical talents. He replied with zeal and indignation to Dr. Priestley, respecting the comparison drawn by the latter between the merits of Jesus Christ and Socrates; was the author of "The Powers of Genius," and other poems; and died in 1804.

LINNEÆUS, or more properly, LINNÉ, CHARLES VON, the most celebrated of modern naturalists, and the founder of the present botanic system, was born in 1707, at Ræshult, in Sweden. From his infancy he discovered a propensity and talent for the study of plants; and though destined for the church, his predilection for natural history withdrew his attention from theological studies, and his destination was changed for the medical profession. While at the universities of Lund and Upsal, he laboured under great disadvantages, from the narrowness of his father's circumstances; but the patronage of Celsius, the theological professor, who was also a naturalist, improved his condition, and he obtained some private pupils. It was at this period that he formed the idea of that botanical system which has immortalized his name. In 1732 he made a tour through Lapland, and, visiting the mining district round Fahlun, formed a system of that science, which he afterwards published in his "Systema Naturæ." He next resided for three years in Holland, where he took his doctor's degree, and was superintendant of Clifford's celebrated garden, at Hartecamp, near Haerlem. After visiting England, in 1738, he made an excursion to Paris, and, towards the end of that year, returned to his native country, and settled as a physician at Stockholm, where the establishment of a royal academy, of which he was one of the first members, contributed to the advancement of his reputation, by the opportunities which it afforded for the display of his abilities. In 1741, he succeeded to the professorship of medicine at Upsal, to which was added the superintendence of the botanic garden. His fame now spread through the civilized world, and scientific bodies eagerly enrolled him among their members; in 1747 he was nominated royal archiater; in 1753 he was created a knight of the polar star—an honour never before bestowed on a literary man; in 1761, he was elevated to the rank of nobility, and acquired a moderate degree of opulence, sufficient to enable him to purchase an estate and mansion at Hammarby, near Upsal, where he chiefly resided during the last years of his life. He died in 1778. Besides his works on natural history, he published a classified "Materia Medica," &c.; but it is as the founder of a system of botanical science that he ranks as an original genius, and will continue to be remembered.

LINSCHOTEN, JOHN HUGH VAN, a Dutch voyager, of the 16th century, who wrote narratives of his voyages to the East Indies, and a description of the coasts of Guinea, Congo, and Angola. Born, 1553; died, 1633.

LINT, PETER VAN, an historical and portrait painter of Antwerp, was born in 1609. He painted in Italy several years, and returned to his own country increased in wealth and reputation.—A relation of his, HENDRIC VAN LINT, was an eminent landscape painter, and executed some fine views about Rome.

LIOTARD, PETER, a French botanist, was originally a peasant in Dauphiny, and afterwards a common soldier. Liotard was above forty years old when he began to study botany, but he applied to it with such ardour that in 1782 he was appointed director of the public garden at Grenoble, where he died in 1796.

LIPPI, LORENZO, a painter and poet, was born at Florence in 1606, and died in 1664. He executed many fine pieces for the chapels and convents of his native city. As a poet he is known by a burlesque piece entitled, "Malmantile Racquistaro," printed at Florence in 1688, 4to. under the name of Perloni Zipoli.—There were also two other Florentine artists of the name of LIPPI; one, FRANCISCO FILIPPO, who died in 1488; and his son FILIPPO, who died in 1505: the latter was a painter of considerable talent and reputation.

LIPSIUS, JUSTUS, an eminent critic and scholar, born at Overysche, a village of Brabant, in 1547. He studied at Aeth, Cologne, and Louvain; then went to Rome, and became secretary to cardinal Granvella. On his return to the Netherlands, after a short time spent at Louvain, he visited the capital of the German empire, and then accepted a professorship in the university of Jena. Many tempting and honourable offers were made him by various potentates, to engage him in their service; but he refused them all; and, at length, died at Louvain, in 1606. Lipsius changed his religion several times; and whether as a Catholic, a Lutheran, or a Calvinist, he was equally zealous for the time, and equally bigotted. He wrote many learned treatises, but his principal work is the "Varie Lectiones."

LISLE, Sir GEORGE, a gallant royalist officer during the civil wars in England, was a native of London, where his father was a bookseller. He distinguished himself so much by his courage at the battle of Newbury, that Charles I. knighted him on the field. In 1648 he defended Colchester with great bravery; but being at length compelled to surrender the town, he was basely shot by the parliamentary leaders. He submitted to his fate with heroic fortitude.

LISLE, CLAUDE DE, a French historian, was born at Vaucouleurs, in 1644, and died in 1730. His works are, "Relation Historique du Royaume de Siam;" "Abrégement of the Universal History," 7 vols.; and a "Genealogical and Historical Atlas," —WILLIAM DE, son of the preceding, was born at Paris, in 1675. He was appointed geographer to the king, to whom he had the honour of giving lessons in that science. Died, 1738.—LOUIS DE, brother of the preceding, an able astronomer and geographer, made several journeys on the coast of the frozen ocean, to determine the situation of a variety of places in the countries lying nearest to the north-pole; after which he traversed Siberia; and in 1741 went alone to Kamtschatka, with the same object; but died the same year.—JOSEPH NICOLAS DE, the youngest and most celebrated of the three brothers, was born at Paris, in 1688; visited England, where he formed an acquaintance with Newton and Hailey; and in 1726 was appointed astronomer-royal at Petersburg, where he resided twenty-one years, during which he published "Mémoires illustrative of the History of Astronomy," 2 vols. 4to.; and an atlas of Russia. On his return to Paris, in 1747, he was appointed professor of mathematics in the royal college. Died, 1766.

LISLE, JOHN BAPTIST ISOARD DE, a French writer, known also under the name of Delile de Sales, was born at Lyons, in 1743. He was the author of "La Philosophie de la Nature," which being denounced as immoral and irreligious, he was tried and imprisoned, thereby acquiring a temporary celebrity. He afterwards wrote romances, histories, and Platonic dreams; was imprisoned during the reign of Robespierre; subsequently became a member of the Institute; and died in 1816.

LISTER, MARTIN, a physician and naturalist, born at Radcliffe, in Buckinghamshire, about 1638. In 1670 he settled at York as a practitioner; removed to London in 1682, and obtained his diploma; was elected a fellow of the royal college of physicians; attended the earl of Portland in his embassy to France, in 1698, of which he published an account; was made physician in ordinary to queen Anne, in 1709; and died in 1712. He published several works on natural history, and communicated many papers to the Royal Society, of which he was a fellow.

LITHGOW, WILLIAM, a native of Scotland, who in the reign of queen Elizabeth travelled on foot through numerous countries in Europe, Asia, and America, over a distance of more than 36,000 miles; during which he encountered many hardships, and was at length thrown into the prisons of the Inquisition in Spain, and so cruelly tortured, as to be deprived of the use of his limbs. On regaining his liberty, and coming to England, he published an account of his adventures, which he presented to James I. He also wrote a narrative of the siege of Breda. Died, 1640.

LITTLE, WILLIAM, an ancient English historian, known also by the name of Guilelmus Naubrigensis, was born at Bidlington, in Yorkshire, in 1136, and educated at the abbey of Newborough, in the same county. In his advanced years he composed a History of England, in five books, from the Norman Conquest to 1197, which for veracity, regularity of disposition, and purity of language, is one of the most valuable productions of that period.

LITTLETON, ADAM, a learned divine, was born at Hales Owen, in Shropshire, in 1637, and educated at Westminster school, from whence he was elected student of Christ-church, Oxford, but was ejected by the parliamentary visitors in 1648. He then became usher to Dr. Busby, and in 1658 was appointed under master. In 1674, being D.D., he obtained the living of Chelsea, and a prebend of Westminster. He was the author of "Elements Religionis," a Latin and English Dictionary, several sermons, and other works. Died, 1694.

LITTLETON, or LYTTLETON, THOMAS, a celebrated English judge, and law authority, was born at Frankley, in Worcestershire. He studied at the Temple; was appointed one of the judges of the common pleas, and continued to enjoy the esteem of his sovereign, Edward IV., and the nation, until his death, at an advanced age, in 1481. The memory of judge Littleton is preserved by his celebrated treatise on "Tennres," which is esteemed the principal authority for the law of real property in England. This work has been commented on by Coke, Sir M. Hale, lord chancellor Nottingham, and other eminent legal characters.

LITTLETON, EDWARD, an able English judge, was of the same family as the preceding, and born at Halesley, in Shropshire, in 1480. In 1639 he was made chief justice of the common pleas, and the year following lord keeper of the great seal, at which time he was created a peer by the title of lord Littleton. He died at Oxford in 1645.

LIVERPOOL, CHARLES JENKINSON, earl of, eldest son of colonel Jenkinson, was born in 1727, and was educated at the Charter-house, and at University college, Oxford. He entered parliament in 1761, and soon took office as under-secretary of state; in 1766 he was made a lord of the admiralty; in 1773, vice-treasurer of Ireland; in 1778, secretary at war; and in 1784, president of the board of trade. He was a great favourite of George III. and was often accused of being one of his secret advisers. In 1786 he was created baron Hawkesbury; in 1796, earl of Liverpool; and he died in 1808.

LIVERPOOL, ROBERT BANKS JENKINSON, earl of, son of the preceding, was born in 1770, and received his education at the same seminaries of learning as his father. On quitting college, he spent some time in foreign travel: was in Paris during the destruction of the Bastille, and rendered himself useful at that period to the English government by his communications to Mr. Pitt. At the general election in 1790, Mr. Jenkinson was returned member for Rye; and as he wanted twelve months of the age required for a member to sit in parliament, he spent that time in acquiring further information respecting continental affairs. His maiden speech in 1792 indicated his future eminence as an orator, and as a member of the cabinet. In 1796, his father being created earl of Liverpool, he became lord Hawkesbury, and was made a commissioner of Indian affairs. In 1801 he was appointed secretary of state for foreign affairs; which office, four years after, he exchanged for that of the Home department. This he resigned on the dissolution of the Addington administration; and at the death of Mr. Pitt, succeeded him as lord warden of the Cinque-ports. In 1807 he was again minister for the Home department; and on the death of his father, in the year following, succeeded to the title of earl of Liverpool. At the death of Mr. Perceval, in 1812, his lordship was raised to the premiership, and he held that elevated station till 1827, when an apoplectic and paralytic attack rendered him incapable of public business. He died in 1828.

LIVINGSTON, WILLIAM, an American author and statesman, was born at New York, in 1723. He filled several important situations at New York, and after the establishment of the constitution, was made governor of New Jersey. He was a zealous advocate of American independence; wrote a "Review of the Military Operations in North America, from 1753 to 1768;" "Philosophical Solitude," a poem; and several other works. Died, 1790.

LIVINGSTON, BROCKHOLST, son of the preceding, was born at New York, in 1737; entered the army in 1776; and being afterwards attached to the suite of general Arnold, with the rank of major, he shared in the honour of the conquest of Burgoyne. In 1779 he accompanied Mr. Jay to the court of Spain, as his private secretary; studied the law on his return; and ultimately became judge of the supreme court of the state of New York, in 1802. He enjoyed the reputation of being an upright judge, an able pleader, and an accomplished scholar. Died, 1823.

LIVINGSTON, ROBERT, an eminent American politician, was born at New York, in 1746; in which city he practised the law with great success. He was one of the committee to prepare the declaration of independence; was appointed secretary of foreign affairs in 1790; and, throughout the war of the revolution, signalized himself by his zeal and efficiency in the cause. He was afterwards chancellor of the state of New York; and, in 1801, was appointed by president Jefferson, minister plenipotentiary to France, where, during a residence of several years, he was treated with marked attention by Buonaparte, who, on his quitting Paris, presented to him a splendid snuff-box, with a miniature likeness of himself, painted by Leakey. Died, 1813.

LIVIVS, or LIVY, TITUS, a celebrated Roman historian, was born in the territory of Patavium, now Padua. In the reign of Augustus he went to Rome, and was held in great esteem by the emperor and many other distinguished characters. His reputation is principally built upon his "History of Rome," from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus, in one hundred and forty-two books, of which only thirty-five have been preserved. This history is highly praised by Seneca, Pliny the Elder, Quintilian, &c.; and may be regarded as one of the most valuable literary relics of antiquity.

LORENTE, DON JUAN ANTONIO, a modern Spanish historian and ecclesiastic, born in 1756. He was secretary-general to the Inquisition, of which court he published a "Complete History." He was also the author of "Memoirs relative to the History of the Spanish Revolution," "Political Portraits of the Popes," and other works. Having accepted a situation under Joseph Buonaparte, and written in his favour, he was compelled to quit Spain on the return of Ferdinand. Died, 1823.

LLOYD, DAVID, a biographical writer of the 17th century, was born in Merionethshire, in 1623; was educated at Oxford; became reader at the Charter-house; subsequently obtained a prebend at St. Asaph; and died in 1691. His principal works are, "Memoirs of the Statesmen and Favourites of England;" "Memoirs of Persons who suffered for their Loyalty;" a "Life of General Monk;" and a "History of Plots and Conspiracies."

LLOYD, HUMPHRY, an eminent military officer, and writer on tactics, was born at Waler, in 1739. He served with great reputation in the Austrian, Prussian, and Russian armies, and rose to the rank of general. On his return to England he surveyed the coasts, wrote a memoir on the "Invasion and Defence of Great Britain," "The History of the Seven Years' War," and other military treatises. Died, 1783.

LLOYD, ROBERT, an English poet, was born in 1723, and was the son of the Rev. Dr. Lloyd, second master of Westminster school. After finishing his education at Trinity college, Cambridge, he became an usher at Westminster: but disliking the restraints which the situation imposed on him, and having formed an acquaintance with Churchill, Bonnet Thornton, and 4 other gay wits of that age, he quitted the usher's desk, and commenced author by profession. His first production, "The Actor," gave rise, it is said, to the famous Roast of his friend Churchill. His other poems possess much merit; but his genius could not shield him from the assaults of poverty, and he died a prisoner in the Fleet, in 1764.

LLOYD, WILLIAM, a learned English prelate, was born in 1637, at Tilehurst, in Berkshire; was educated at Oxford; obtained a prebend in the collegiate church of Ripon, soon after the Restoration; was appointed chaplain to the king in 1666; and collated to a prebend in Salisbury the year following. Other church preferments followed; and, in 1680, he was raised to the bishopric of St. Asaph, when he joined archbishop Sancroft and other prelates in presenting a petition to James II. deprecating his assumed power of suspending the laws against popery. On the revolution taking place he was made almoner to king William; was promoted to the see of Lichfield, in 1692; and died, bishop of Worcester, in 1717. His writings, which relate to divinity and history, display much learning and acuteness. Among them are, "A Dissertation upon Daniel's Prophecy of the Seventy Weeks;" "An Account of the Life of Pythagoras;" "The History of the Government of the Church," &c.

LOBEIRA, VASCO, author of the celebrated romance of "Armadillo de Gaul," was a native of Porto, in Portugal, in the 16th century. In 1596 he was knighted by Joam I. on the field of battle at Aljubarrota; and he died at Elvas, in 1603. Dr. Southey has translated Lobeira's work, and has satisfactorily proved it to be an original, and not a translation from the French, as many had before imagined.

LOBO, JEROME, a Portuguese Jesuit, was born at Lisbon, in 1603. He went as a missionary to Abyssinia, and, on his return to Europe, became rector of the college of Coimbra, where he died in 1676. He wrote "An Account of Abyssinia," of which Dr. Johnson published an abridged translation.

LOCK, MATTHEW, an eminent English musician, was born at Exeter, where he became a chorister in the cathedral. He published some musical pieces in 1657, and, after the Restoration, he was employed as a composer of operas. He was also appointed composer to the chapel royal; and has acquired considerable reputation by the beautiful music to Shakespeare's Macbeth.

LOCKE, JOHN, one of the most eminent philosophers and writers of modern times, was born at Wrington, in Somersetshire, in 1632. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christchurch college, Oxford, where he distinguished himself much by his general proficiency; and finally applied to the study of physic. In the year 1666, he was introduced to lord Ashley, afterwards the celebrated earl of Shaftesbury, to whom he became essentially servicable in his medical capacity, and who formed a high opinion of his general powers, and introduced him to the duke of Buckingham, the earl of Halifax, and other distinguished characters. He also confided to him the superintendence of his son's education; and when, in 1672, lord Shaftesbury was appointed chancellor, he made Mr. Locke secretary of presentations, and, at a later period, secretary to the board of trade. On his patron retiring to Holland, to avoid a state proscription, Locke accompanied him, and remained there several years. So obnoxious was he to James's government, that the English envoy demanded Mr. Locke of the States, on suspicion of his being concerned in Monmouth's rebellion, which occasioned him to keep private, and employ himself in finishing his Essay on the Human Understanding. At the close of the revolution he returned to England, and was made a commissioner of appeals, and in 1695 a commissioner of trade and plantations. He died at Oates, in Essex, in 1704. His principal works are, an "Essay on Human Understanding," 2 vols.; "Letters on Toleration;" "A Treatise on Civil Government;" and "Thoughts concerning Education."

LOCKMAN, JOHN, an English writer, was the author of "Romilda," a musical drama; and "David's Lamentations," an oratorio. He was also one of the compilers of the Great Historical Dictionary. He died in 1771.

LODGE, THOMAS, an English physician and poet, who died in 1623. He wrote "Wounds of Civil War," a tragedy; "Looking-glass for London and England," a tragic-comedy. He also assisted Robert Green in writing some of his works.

LOFFT, CAPEL, a barrister, and the author of several works in polite literature, was born in London in 1751. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge; and was called to the bar in 1775. On succeeding to the Capel estates, in 1781, he removed to Troston, in Suffolk, and became an active magistrate of the county till 1800; when, for having too zealously exerted himself as under sheriff to delay the execution of a young woman who had received sentence of death, he was removed from the commission. Mr. Lofft was a very considerable contributor to most of the magazines of the day; and it was to his active patronage of Robert Bloomfield that the public was indebted for the Farmer's Boy, and other poems by that author. Died, 1824.

LOFTUS, DUDLEY, an oriental scholar, was born, in 1616, at Rathfriland, near Dublin; studied at Trinity college, and at Oxford; became vicar-general and judge of the prerogative court in Ireland; and died in 1695. Among his writings are, "A History of the Eastern and Western Churches;" "The History of Our Saviour, taken from the Greek, Syriac, and other oriental authors;" a translation of the Ethiopic New Testament into Latin, &c.

LOGAN, JOHN, a Scottish divine and poet, was born in 1716, and died in 1788. His poems were published in 8vo. 1781; and in 1790 and 1791, two volumes of his sermons were printed; for he had obtained much distinction as an eloquent and affecting preacher.

LOGAN, FREDERIC, baron DE, a German poet, was born in 1604, and died in 1685. Lessing and Ramler published an edition of his Epigrams, which are much esteemed.

LOHEENSTEIN, DANIEL GASPARD DE, a learned German nobleman, was born at Nimptsch, in Silesia, in 1636, and died in 1683. He wrote some dramatic pieces; an historical romance, entitled "Arminius, or the Defender of Germanic Liberty," 2 vols., &c.

LOKMAN, surnamed Al-hakim, or the Wise, an Eastern philosopher and fabulist, who by some is supposed to have been an Arabian, and by others an Arab, is said to have been contemporary with David, and that he embraced the Jewish faith; but neither the age in which he lived, nor the country which gave him birth, are correctly known. His fables were published at Leyden, by Erpenius, in Arabic and Latin, in 1636.

LOLLARD, WALTER, the founder of a religious sect in Germany about 1315. He was burnt, at Cologne, in 1322.

LOM, or LOMMIUS, JOSEPH VAN, an ingenious physician, was born at Buren, in Guelderland, in 1500, and died in 1562. His Latin style is pure and elegant; and his works are held in estimation.

LOLLI, or LOLLY, ANTONIO, a celebrated performer on the violin, was a native of Bergamo, in Italy, and born in 1728. In Germany, Russia, England, Spain, France, and Naples, he excited the admiration of the musical world; but though for many years he possessed a wonderful command over the instrument, yet during the latter part of his life not a trace was left of that extraordinary skill which had established his fame. Died, 1802.

LOMBARD, JOHN LOUIS, an eminent writer on military tactics, was born at Saraberg, in 1723; became professor of artillery at Metz; and died in 1794. He translated into French, "Robins's Principles of Gunnery," and wrote, "Aide Memoire a l'Usage des Officiers d'Artillerie de France," 2 vols.; "Instruction sur la Manœuvre et le Tir du Canon de Batterie," and "Traité du Mouvement des Projectiles."

LOMONOZOF, MICHAEL WASTLOWITZ, a Russian poet, and historian of the last century, was born in 1711. He was the son of a h-monger; and having fled from his father, he took refuge in a monastery, where he received his education, which he afterwards improved at a German university. In 1741 he returned to his native country, and became member of the academy of Petersburg, and professor of chemistry. In 1764 he was made a councillor of state, and died in the course of the same year. His Odes partake much of the fire of Pindar, and he has been justly called, the father of Russian poetry. He also wrote several works in prose, particularly a "History of the Empire of Russia."

LONDONDERRY, ROBERT STEWART, marquis of, who for many years was known as lord Castlereagh, was a native of Ireland, and born in 1769. He was educated at Armagh and St. John's college, Cambridge; and having made the tour of Europe, was, on his return, chosen a member of the Irish parliament. He joined the opposition, in the first place, and declared himself an advocate for parliamentary reform; but, on obtaining a seat in the British parliament, he took his station on the ministerial benches. In 1797, having then become lord Castlereagh, he was made keeper of the privy seal for Ireland, and soon after appointed one of the lords of the treasury. The next year he was nominated secretary to the lord-lieutenant, and, by his strenuous exertions and abilities, in the art of removing opposition, the union with Ireland was greatly facilitated. In 1805, he was appointed secretary of war and the colonies; but, on the death of Mr. Pitt, he retired, until the dissolution of the brief administration of 1806 restored him to the same situation in 1807; and he held his office until the ill-fated expedition to Walcheren, and his duel with his colleague, Mr. Canning, produced his resignation. In 1813, he succeeded the marquis of Wellesley as foreign secretary, (which office he held till his decease), and the following year proceeded to the continent, to assist the coalited powers in negotiating a general peace. In 1814 he was plenipotentiary extraordinary to the allied powers, and, towards the close of the same year, to the congress of Vienna. For these services he received the thanks of parliament, and was honoured with the order of the garter. On the death of his father, in 1821, he succeeded to the title of marquis of Londonderry; but he did not long enjoy it; for in a fit of insanity, brought on by excessive mental and bodily exertion in attending to his public duties, he put an end to his existence, by severing the carotid artery with a penknife. This event took place on the 13th of August, 1822; and on the 20th, his remains were interred in Westminster abbey.

LONG, ROGER, an English divine, eminent as an astronomer and a mathematician, was born in 1679, in Norfolk; was educated at Pembroke hall, Cambridge, of which college he became master in 1733; was chosen Lowndes' professor of astronomy; held livings in Huntingdonshire and Essex; and died in 1770. Dr. Long was the author of a valuable "Treatise on Astronomy;" and constructed, at Pembroke-hall, a hollow sphere, eighteen feet in diameter, on the interior surface of which were represented the stars, constellations, &c., the whole being moved by means of machinery.

LONG, EDWARD, was born in 1734, at St. Biazze, Cornwall. He was brought up to the law, and became judge of the vice-admiralty court in Jamaica, where his father possessed estates, and of which island his brother-in-law, Sir Henry Moore, was lieutenant governor. Being obliged to return to England for the restoration of his health, in 1769, he devoted his time to literary pursuits; and wrote an admirable "History of Jamaica," 3 vols.; a collection of essays, entitled "The Prater;" "The Antirallian," a novel; "Letters on the Colonies," &c.—Died, 1813.

LONG, THOMAS, an English nonjuring divine, was born at Exeter, in 1621; was educated at Exeter-college, Oxford, and after the Restoration, was made prebendary of Exeter; but lost that preferment at the Revolution, for refusing the oaths. His principal works are, "Calvinus Redivivus;" "History of the Donatists;" "Vindication of the Primitive Christians in point of Obedience;" "History of Popish and fanatical Plots;" and "A Vindication of King Charles's Claim to the Eikon Basilike." Died, 1700.

LONG, ST. JOHN, was born at Newcastle, in Limerick, in 1794. The name of his father was John Long, whose vocations were no less numerous than those of Caleb Quitem himself; for he was a steward, parish clerk, harness-maker, a maker of mouse-traps, and the manufacturer of certain ingenious machinery for winnowing wheat, &c. John inherited the multipotent genius of his sire, and was considered a perfect prodigy in painting, glazing, and basket-making; and a certain lady, having been much pleased with his attempts to copy some drawings, laid the foundation of his future fortune. Through her notice of John, a subscription was raised for him at Donegal; he was sent to Dublin, and there placed with a furniture-painter, of the name of Richardson, for two years; during which period he attended the school of painting attached to the Dublin Society. Having made some little progress in the art, he returned to Limerick, started as drawing-master, and, taking the hint of a friend, adopted the maiden name of his mother (St. John) in preference to plain John, as he had received it at the font; he then set out, in 1822, to seek his fortune in London, at the age of 28, with some of his own pictures, a light purse, and a good share of confidence. His genius as a painter was, however, not so highly appreciated in London as he had expected; and he resolved to turn doctor. The first account of his success in his newly-adopted line of business, is recorded by himself in a letter to a friend, in 1826, by which it appeared he had cured a fellow-craftsman (a carriage-painter) of a decline. He now proclaimed his competency to cure consumption, rheumatism, and, in short, all other diseases, how incurable soever they might be deemed by the faculty—taking fees accordingly. He made his professional debut in Howland-street. Here business increased so rapidly, that in the following year he was settled in Harley-street, Cavendish-square, in an elegantly-furnished house, with servants in attendance to usher in his patients, who were not only numerous, but of the highest rank. He thus floated on the full tide of fortune for two years, when a temporary check was given to his success in consequence of a young lady having died through the baleful effects of his nostrums, for which he was tried, and found guilty of manslaughter. In the following year, 1831, another lady died under the same mode of treatment, and he was again tried, but acquitted. On the first of these trials, no less than sixty-three of his patients, who were all persons of rank, and wealth, appeared in his favour! He still continued to practice, and to be visited by many patients; when a rapid consumption, the very disease which he boasted of eradicating by a simple remedy, hurried him to an early grave. He died, July 2, 1834, leaving the bulk of his property to his brother William; and also the celebrated recipe, which he desired should be sold for 10,000*l.*; or, otherwise, that his brother should use it, after having studied anatomy. He was buried at the new cemetery in the Harrow road, followed by many of the nobility, &c.

LONGPIERRE, HILARY BERNARD DE, a French critic, born at Dijon, in 1689; author of several tragedies in imitation of the Greek poets; but only two of them, the "Medea," and "Electra," were ever performed. Died, 1721.

LONGINUS, DIONYSIUS, a celebrated Greek critic and philosopher of the third century; but whether born at Athens or in Syria is uncertain. In his youth he travelled for improvement to Rome, Athens, and Alexandria, and attended all the eminent masters in eloquence and philosophy. At length he settled at Athens, where he taught philosophy, and where he also published his inimitable "Treatise on the Sublime." His knowledge was so extensive, that he was called "the living library;" and his fame having reached the ears of the celebrated Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, she invited him to the court, entrusted to him the education of her two sons, and took his advice on political affairs. But this distinction proved fatal to him; for after the surrender of Palmyra, Aurelian hastily put him to death, for having advised Zenobia to resist the Romans, and for being the real author of the spirited letter which the queen addressed to the Roman monarch. His death took place in 273. He met his fate with calmness and fortitude, exclaiming with his expiring breath, "The world is but a prison; happy therefore is he who gets soonest out of it, and gains his liberty."

LONGLAND, JOHN, an English prelate, was born in 1473, at Henley on Thames; received his education at Magdalen college, Oxford; was made dean of Salisbury, in 1514; and was appointed confessor to Henry VIII., who gave him the bishopric of Lincoln, in 1531. He was a liberal benefactor to the university of Oxford, of which he was chancellor.

LONGLAND, or LANGELENDE, ROBERT, an old English poet, was born in Shropshire. He was fellow of Oriel college, Oxford, and a secular priest; but espoused the doctrines of Wickliffe. He is believed to have been the author of the "Vision of Pierce Plowman," and "Pierce Plowman's Crede," two curious poems, containing severe reflections on the Romish clergy, and exhibiting a curious picture of the times.

LONGOMONTANUS, CHRISTIAN, a celebrated astronomer, was born in 1562, at Langsberg, in Jutland, and was obliged to earn his bread by hard labour, having been left an orphan in his eighth year; notwithstanding which, he studied hard, and, with the assistance of the minister of the parish, acquired a good knowledge of the mathematics. At last he became a servitor in the college of Wibourg; the professors of which university recommended him to Tycho Brahe, whom he assisted in his astronomical researches, and with whom he lived eleven years. In 1601 he was made professor of mathematics at Copenhagen, where he died in 1647. He was the author of several works, of which the principal is his "Astronomia Danica."

LONGUERNE, LOUIS DUFOUR DE, an eminent scholar, was a native of Charleville, in France, and born in 1632. He was a child of such precocious talent, that before he had attained his fifth year, he attracted the notice of Louis XIV. As he grew up, his application and perseverance in literary pursuits were quite in character with his early proficiency, and he became one of the most profound orientalists of the age. His chief works are, "The Annals of the Arsacides;" an "Historical Description of the History of France;" "Remarks on the Life of Cardinal Wolsey;" a "Treatise on the Eucharist;" and "A Dissertation on Tautau," written in Latin. Died, 1732.

LONGUEVAL, JACQUES, a French Jesuit; author of an elaborate history of the French church, in eight folio volumes, and other theological works. Born, 1680; died, 1735.

LONGUS, a Greek pastoral writer, whose work, entitled "Poimeuca," or "The Loves of Daphnis and Chloe," is exceedingly curious, for the picture it affords of rural manners in ancient Greece, but is at the same time tainted with licentiousness. It is supposed to be the earliest specimen there is of a prose romance; but no account has been transmitted either of the age in which Longus lived, or the place of his birth.

LONGICERUS, ADAM, a physician and naturalist, was a native of Marburg, in Germany; and after occupying the mathematical chair there, removed to Frankfurt, where he held the office of stipendiary physician to the senate during thirty-two years. His name has been preserved in the Linnean appellation of the Loniceria, a beautiful genus of plants. Died, 1566.

LOOS, CORNELIUS, a Dutch divine of the 16th century, who had the temerity to write a treatise, "De vera et falsa Magia," against the then prevailing notions of witchcraft. Such was the ignorance and superstition of the age, that Loos was more than once subjected to a prosecution, and obliged to make a recantation of his supposed error. He was also the author of other learned works; and died in 1595.

LOOSJES, ADRIAN, a Dutch novelist, poet, and librarian, born at Haarlem, in 1761. Always an ardent friend of liberty, he opposed Napoleon's design of converting Holland into a monarchy, with honest, but abortive, zeal. He was the author of "Gewarta und Gyzelaar," a drama; "Lucius Junius Brutus;" "Marcus Junius Brutus;" and several romances; "Life of a Dutch family in the Seventeenth Century;" "Jean de Witt;" "Conrad and Jacquelin;" &c.

LOPES, FERNAN, a Portuguese historian, whose "Chronicle of Joam," describing the great struggle between Portugal and Castile, towards the close of the fourteenth century, exhibits, according to the opinion of Dr. Southey, all the manners, painting, and dramatic reality of Froissart. Lopes is the oldest of the Portuguese chroniclers.

LOPEZ DE RUEDA, a Spanish dramatist and actor, who in the 16th century composed humorous pieces, and with his itinerant band of performers, exhibited them to his countrymen. Died, 1564.

LORENZ, JOHN MICHAEL, was professor of history and rhetoric in the university of Strasburg; where he was born in 1723, and died in 1801. Among his writings are, "Elementa Historiæ Universæ;" "Elementa Historiæ Germanicæ;" and "Summa Historiæ Gallo Francicæ, civilis et sacræ."

LORENZINI, LORENZO, an ingenious mathematician, who for some offence while in the service of Ferdinand, son of Cosmo III., was confined in the tower of Volterra, where he solaced the hours of a wearisome imprisonment, which lasted nearly twenty years, by writing a work on conic sections. Died, 1721.

LORENZINI, or LAURENTINI, FRANCESCO MARIA, was a native of Rome, and patronized by cardinal Borghese, who gave him apartments in his palace and a pension. He was the author of a number of sacred dramas, written in Latin; and at the time of his death filled the situation of president of the academy of the Arcadi. Born, 1680; died, 1743.

LORGNA, ANTONIO MARIE, an eminent mathematician of Verona, in which city he was born, about 1730. He became colonel of a corps of engineers, and filled the mathematical chair in the military school of Verona. He died in 1798, and had the reputation of being one of the best geometers in Italy.

LORiot, ANTHONY JOSEPH, an excellent French mechanician, who, in 1733, presented to the Academy of Sciences a machine, by means of which a child might raise a weight of several thousand pounds. He afterwards constructed machines for the naval service, and for working the mines of Pompeau; claimed the merit of inventing a kind of cement used in building, called "mortier Lorient," and a hydraulic machine for raising water. Born, 1716; died, 1762.

LORME, PHILIBERT DE, a distinguished architect, was born at Lyons, in 1665; studied under Girardon, and afterwards in Italy; and, on his return to France, contributed much to the introduction of a taste for classical architecture. He was employed by Henry II., who rewarded his services with two abbacies, and appointed him his counsellor and almoner. Died, 1577.

LORRRAINE, ROBERT LE, an eminent French sculptor, was born at Paris, in 1665; studied under Girardon, and afterwards in Italy; and, on his return, in 1701, produced the most beautiful of his works, the "Galatea," which at once procured his admission into the society, of which he eventually became the president. Died, 1743.

LORRIS, WILLIAM DE, a French poet of the 13th century, was born at Lorris, near Montargis; and was the first author of the "Romance of the Rose," a composition in part imitating Ovid's Art of Love, and which during the middle ages had a great influence on the literature of France and England. He died young, and left his work unfinished; but it was completed, forty years later, by John de Meung.

LOSSIUS, LUCAS, a German ecclesiastic, born in 1604. He became rector of Lunenburg, which situation he filled for more than half a century, till his death in 1582. His "Psalmodia, hoc est Cantica sacra veteris ecclesiæ selecta," with Melancthon's Encomium on Music prefixed, is the most classical work of his kind.

LOTICH, or LOTICHIVS SECUNDUS, PETER, an eminent Latin poet, was born at Solitaire, in Hanau, in 1538. He studied at Wittenberg, where he contracted an intimacy with Melancthon; and in the war in Saxony he served in the protestant army. He afterwards visited France and Italy; and having taken the degree of doctor of physic at Padua, he became professor in that faculty at Heidelberg. His poems were printed in 1561, and reprinted at Amsterdam, in 1754, 3 vols. 4to. In this addition are included the Latin poems of Christian Lotichius, his brother, and those of John Peter Lotichius, his grand-nephew. He died in 1560.

LOUBERE, SIMON DE LA, a native of Toulouse, who was sent on a diplomatic mission to Siam, and whose account of his "Voyage" to that kingdom, contains many curious and interesting particulars. On one occasion, while he was at Madrid, he was arrested as a spy, and confined in the state prisons of that capital for a considerable time, but was ultimately released, and returned to Toulouse. Died, 1729.

LOUIS IX., king of France, canonized in the Romish calendar as St. Louis, was born in 1214, and succeeded his father, Louis VIII., in 1226. Being then only in his twelfth year, he was placed under the guardianship of his mother, who was made regent of the kingdom, and who inculcated in him a strong attachment to religion. He was surrounded by churchmen, and was sincerely devout; but he knew the limits between secular and ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and displayed a well-founded jealousy of usurpation in the latter. Having made a vow, in the event of recovering from a dangerous disease, to march against the infidels, he made preparations for so doing, and, in 1248, he accordingly embarked at Aigues-Mortes, with an army of 50,000 men, accompanied by his queen, his brothers, and almost all the chivalry of France. The particulars of his eventful and disastrous campaign, which ended in his surrender, and that of the remains of his army, cannot be recorded here; but we may remark, that a greater union of fortitude, punctilious honour, humanity, and personal bravery, was never witnessed in the conduct of a prince than was displayed by Louis throughout the whole of this ill-advised and unfortunate expedition. The town of Damietta, which remained in the possession of the French, was demanded as the price of the monarch's freedom, and a vast ransom was also claimed for his followers. These terms being punctually fulfilled, Louis em-marked with about 8000 men, the sole remains of his fine army, for Acre, and spent four years more in fortifying the strong places in Palestine. On his return to France, he applied to the government of his kingdom with exemplary diligence, and ruled with strict impartiality and moderation. Notwithstanding the disasters of the previous crusade, he was again incited to encounter a new one, the ultimate object of which was the conquest both of Egypt and Palestine. Tunis, however, was the first point of attack; but while engaged at the siege of that place, a pestilence broke out among the French troops; and, after seeing one of his sons perish, and a great part of his army, he was himself doomed to be one of its victims, August 24, 1370. The instructions he left in writing for his son, show the noble spirit which inspired this king; a spirit, which, if it had not been infected with the false zeal and bigotry of the times, would have rendered his administration a perfect specimen of monarchical wisdom.

LOUIS XI., king of France, was the son of Charles VII., and born at Bourges, in 1423. Active, bold, and cunning, he was the reverse of his well-disposed but imbecile father, of whose ministers and mistresses, Agnes Sorel, he soon showed himself a decided enemy. In 1440, he left the court, and put himself at the head of an insurrection. Charles defeated the rebels, and executed some, but pardoned his son, whom he even trusted with a command against the English and Swiss. Louis conducted himself with valour and prudence, and his father became entirely reconciled to him; but having soon entered into new conspiracies, he was obliged to take refuge in Burgundy, and lived there five years, in a dependent condition. On the death of his father, in 1461, he dismissed the former ministers, and filled their places with men taken from the lower orders, without character or talents to recommend them. Insurrections broke out in various parts of his dominions; but they were soon quelled, and followed by many executions. In every thing he did, his crooked policy and sinister views were evident. Whilst he pretended to reconcile contending parties, he secretly instigated them against each other; and whenever he had a meeting with a foreign prince, he corrupted his courtiers by bribes, and established secret correspondences with them. He became involved in a war with Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy; and having requested a passport from the duke, he went to visit him at Peronne, though he had just before secretly instigated the people of Liege to rise, and promised them aid. Charles having discovered this act of treachery, was furious with rage, and hesitated three days (during which he kept the king in prison) as to what course he should adopt. Nothing but the aversion of Charles to take the life of a king, and the greatest presence of mind on the part of the latter, who asserted his innocence under the most solemn oaths, saved him. He was obliged to accompany Charles to Liege, and to witness the pillage and slaughter of which he had been the cause. A peace was concluded on favourable terms for Charles and his allies; but, when Louis returned to Paris, he used every artifice to evade its fulfilment. He died in 1483. The great object of Louis was the establishment of the royal power, and the overthrow of the feudal aristocracy; but it is almost impossible to convey a just idea of his character, so contradictory were its qualities. He was at the same time confiding and suspicious, avaricious and lavish, audacious and timid, mild and cruel; yet he was the first French monarch who had the title of "most Christian king."

LOUIS XII., king of France, was the son of Charles, duke of Orleans, and born in 1462. On ascending the throne, in 1498, he pardoned the wrongs he had suffered before his accession. "The king of France," said he, "must not revenge the injuries done to the duke of Orleans." His reign was a continued scene of warfare: he conquered the Milanese, Genoa, and Naples; but after ravaging Italy, the French were expelled in 1513. The emperor Maximilian, Henry VIII. of England, and the Swiss, attacked Louis in his own dominions; he was obliged to sue for peace, and died in 1515. Louis XII. possessed many of the qualities of a good ruler; he was open, honest, economical, just, kind-hearted, and magnanimous; he was also a friend to science; and France enjoyed under him a degree of prosperity and security which it had never possessed before.

LOUIS XIII., king of France, was the son of Henry IV. and born in 1601. Being only nine years old at the death of his father, the care of him and of the kingdom was entrusted to his mother, Mary de Medicis. During the early part of his reign, France became the prey of civil dissensions, which marshal D'Ancre, prime minister at that time, was utterly unable to suppress; and when the king, in 1615, married a Spanish princess, the disturbances grew still more alarming. At length the Huguenots rose in arms, with Rohan and Soissons at their head; and a great part of the kingdom rebelled against the king, who now delivered himself up to the guidance of cardinal Richelieu. After victory had inclined, sometimes to one side and sometimes to the other, and both parties felt deeply the necessity of repose, peace was concluded in 1623. But it was of no long duration. Rochelle, the head quarters of the Huguenots, revolted, and was supported by England. The king drove the English to the sea, conquered the island of Rhé, and at last took Rochelle, which had sustained all the horrors of a siege for twelve months, and cost the crown 40 million livres. After this event, so fatal to the protestant interest in France, Louis assisted the duke of Mantua against the emperor, and entered on the campaign in person, in which he showed skill and bravery. In 1631 a treaty was concluded, by which the duke was confirmed in his estates. The year following, Gaston of Orleans, only brother of the king, revolted, out of dislike to Richelieu, and was assisted by the duke de Montmorency, who being wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Castelnaudary, in 1632, was beheaded at Toulouse. Louis and the cardinal were attacked with a mortal disease nearly together; the latter died in December 1649, and the king in May following.

LOUIS XIV., son of the preceding, was only five years old on the death of his father; the regency being in the hands of the queen-mother, Anne of Austria, under whom Mazarin acted as prime minister. The nation was then involved in a war with Spain and the emperor, which was maintained with glory to the French arms by the prince of Condé and the famous Turenne; but although Louis was successful abroad, his kingdom was distracted by internal divisions; the Parisians, irritated against Mazarin and the queen, took up arms; and the king, his mother, and the cardinal were obliged to fly. The Spaniards, profiting by these troubles, made several conquests in Champagne, Lorraine, and Italy. In 1651 the king assumed the government, but Mazarin retaining to power the year following, the civil war was renewed. On the war breaking out between England and Holland, Louis joined with the latter, but after a few naval actions the peace of Breda was concluded in 1667. In 1672 the French king made an attack on Holland, and reduced some of the provinces in a few weeks. This invasion produced a new confederacy against Louis, between the emperor, Spain, and the elector of Brandenburg, in which all the allies were unsuccessful, and which terminated in 1678, by the treaty of Nimeguen. Amidst all his glory, Louis committed an act of impolitic cruelty by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, granted by Henry IV. in favour of the protestants—a measure which drove from France a vast number of ingenious mechanics and others, who settled in England and Holland. About this time another league was formed against France by the prince of Orange, the duke of Savoy, and the electors of Bavaria and Brandenburg. To this league were afterwards added the emperor of Germany and the king of Spain. The dauphin had the command of the French army, and he opened the campaign by taking Philippsburg in October 1688, but he was soon forced to retreat before a superior force. In 1690 the French were more successful: Luxembourg gained the battle of Fleurus, and Catinat took Nice, and gained a victory over the troops of the duke of Savoy; this was followed by the taking of Mons in Flanders, Valence in Catalonia, Carmaux and Montmelian in Savoy. These successes were counterbalanced by the defeat of Tourville's squadron off La Hogue, by admiral Russell, June 2, 1692. Louis in person took Namur, and Luxembourg gained the battles of Strenkirk and Nerwinde. In 1696, Savoy made a separate peace with France, which was followed by a general one at Ryswick in 1697. The tranquillity of Europe, however, was again broken by the death of Charles II. king of Spain, in 1700. He left his crown to Philip of France, duke of Anjou, who assumed the title of Philip V. In opposition to him the archduke Charles laid claim to the throne; and he was supported by the emperor of Germany, Holland, and England. Prince Eugene had the command of the imperial forces, with which he took Cremona. In 1704 Eugene and Marlborough gained the great battle of Blenheim: the year following Nice and Ville-Franche were taken by the French, who also gained a dear victory at Cassano over Eugene; on the other hand, Barcelona surrendered to the archduke, and Gironne declared in his favour; the battle of Ramilles was gained by the duke of Marlborough, and prince Eugene saved Turin by defeating the duke of Orleans. In 1708 Lisle was retaken by the allies, who also gained the battle of Oudenarde, and the imperialists made themselves masters of Naples. The year following the French lost Tournay, and suffered a defeat at Malplaquet. In 1713 a treaty of peace was signed at Utrecht by France, Spain, England, Savoy, Portugal, Prussia, and Holland; and the next year peace was concluded with the emperor at Radstadt. Louis died in 1716, aged 77: by his first wife he had one son, Louis, dauphin of France, who died in 1711, leaving three sons, Louis, Philip, and Gaston, besides several illegitimate children by his mistresses. At the close of life he became serious and even devout, through the influence of Madame de Maintenon, whom he secretly married. The reign of Louis XIV. was adorned by great statesmen and generals, ecclesiastics, and men of literature and science, who made the national glory and the splendour of the king the object of their exertions. At his court, which became a model for all the others of Europe, every thing had reference to the king, and tended to augment his dignity; while no man possessed in a higher degree than Louis the requisite qualities for playing well the part of a monarch. He was twenty years of age, and devoted to the pleasures of the court and chase, when Mazarin died. "To whom shall we now apply?" asked his secretaries of state: "To me," he replied, with dignity; and he who had grown up in perfect ignorance, with his heart full of romantic gallantry, devoted himself sedulously to business, and the acquisition of information. But his natural pride often degenerated into haughtiness, his love of splendour into useless extravagance, his firmness into despotism. Determined no longer to tolerate Calvinists in France, which had now, for some years, existed in peaceful separation from the national church, he said, "My grandfather loved the Huguenots without fearing them; my father feared, without loving them; I neither fear nor love them." But his conduct showed that a stern and unfeeling rigor towards them was uppermost in his mind: their privileges were gradually infringed; missionaries, supported by dragons, were employed for their conversion; and severities were practised which excited the horror and indignation of every breast that was not hardened by bigotry and intolerance.

LOUIS XV., king of France, great grandson and successor of the preceding, was born in 1710; and Louis XIV. dying when he was only five years of age, the kingdom was placed under the regency of Philip, duke of Orleans. He was crowned in 1722, and declared of age the following year: The beginning of his reign was rendered very disagreeable by the Mississippi scheme of Law, the famous financier, which ruined thousands of people. On the death of the duke of Orleans, in 1733, he was succeeded, as prime minister, by the duke of Bourbon, who was displaced in 1738, when cardinal Fleury entered upon that station. The same year the king married the daughter of the king of Poland. On the death of the last mentioned monarch, in 1733, Louis supported the election of his queen's relation Stanislaus, against the elector of Saxony, which occasioned a war between France and the emperor: Stanislaus, however, was forced to abandon the throne; but the French were successful in Italy, on which a peace was concluded in 1735. The death of the emperor Charles opened a new scene. The succession of the house of Austria was disputed by four persons, and Louis declared himself against Maria Theresa, daughter of the late emperor, contrary to his own engagements. He supported the pretensions of the elector of Bavaria, who called himself Charles VII. That prince took Prague, where he was crowned king of Bohemia, but in 1742 that city was retaken; and the allies, with the king of Great Britain at their head, gained the battle of Dettingen. In 1744 Louis took the field in person, and captured Courtray, Menin, and Ypres; he was also present at the battles of Fontenoy and Lawfeld. These advantages were accompanied by the taking of Ghent, Ostend, Brussels, Bergen-op-Zoom, and other places. On the other hand, the troops of the duke of Saxony, and of the queen of Hungary, ravaged Provence, and the English completely ruined the French commerce at sea, which effected the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle, in 1748. In 1755 a new war broke out between France and England, in which the latter power had Prussia for an ally, while Austria leagued with France. At first the French were very successful, by taking Port Mahon, defeating the duke of Cumberland at Hastenbeck, and forcing the English general and his army to capitulate at Closter-seven. The electorate of Hanover was conquered; but in 1757 the French and Austrians were defeated at Roebach; this was followed by other losses both by land and sea, particularly of Canada; and Louis died in 1774. He was polite, affable, and naturally humane; but want of strength of character, and sensual indulgences, degraded him equally as a monarch and a man: the coming storm which burst on the head of his devoted successor was fully expected by him; but he selfishly congratulated himself, that, bad as things were, they would last his time.

LOUIS XVI., the son of Louis the dauphin, and of Maria Josephine, daughter of Frederic Augustus, king of Poland, was born in 1754, and immediately created duke of Berri. On the death of his father, in 1761, he became the heir to the throne; and in 1770 he married Maria Antoinette, an Austrian princess, of great beauty and accomplishments. In 1774 he succeeded to the crown; at which period France was in a deplorable state; her finances were nearly exhausted, her trade diminished, her navy destroyed, and the nation groaned under a weight of debt. In this state of things the people looked to the young king to recover their lost greatness, and he seconded their hopes by calling around him those persons whom he thought most likely to redeem the errors of the late administration. His first act was very popular; he dispensed with the customary tax paid by the people at the beginning of every new reign. In 1774 the parliament was recalled, and affairs began to assume a favourable aspect, when, unfortunately, the French government, always jealous of England, took part with the revolted Americans, and a ruinous war ensued between the two countries; which, though it terminated in the loss of the colonies to the English, brought about a bloody revolution in France. The finances of the latter country were completely exhausted, and the cardinal de Brienne, who succeeded Calonne as minister, framed imposts, which laid such intolerable burdens upon the people, that the parliament refused to register them. For this the members were exiled to Troyes, but were afterwards recalled by Louis, who, at their request, convened the states-general of three orders. This assembly met in May, 1789: the public mind was now agitated, and artful demagogues took the advantage of diffusing the worst of principles. Mirabeau was the leader of these men; a violent republican, and an atheist. At his voice the people of Paris arose, and on the 14th of July, that year, stormed the Bastille. Revolution now marched with gigantic steps, and, in October, the armed mob, with a prodigious number of women, marched to Versailles, which palace they forced, murdered the guards, and searched in vain for the queen, who would have shared the same fate, had she not escaped from her bed, which the miscreants pierced with their sabres. The result of this insurrection was, the leading of the king and his family in triumph to Paris, amidst all the insults of a lawless rabble. In February, 1790, Louis was forced to accept the new constitution; but, notwithstanding all his concessions, finding himself a mere prisoner at Paris, and exposed daily to new injuries, he resolved to escape: Accordingly, in the night of June 21, 1791, he and his family quitted the Tuilleries; but at Varennes his person was recognized, and he was conducted back to Paris, where he became a prisoner in his own palace, and suffered the vilest indignities. War was declared against France by the emperor and the king of Prussia; and the duke of Brunswick marched into the country, but was forced to retreat. In the mean time the people were wrought up to a pitch of savage ferocity by the factious leaders, and assaulted the Tuilleries: in storming which they murdered the brave and loyal Swiss guards. The king and family sought refuge in the national assembly, who ordered them to be sent to the Temple. The legislative assembly gave way to the national convention, which brought Louis to a mock trial; his defence was conducted by Malaberbies, Tronchet, and Desaze, and his own deportment was, as it had uniformly been during his confinement, firm and modest, dignified and resigned. January 17, 1793, he was adjudged to death for conspiring against the public good: his separation from his family was uncommonly affecting, yet in every scene he manifested the spirit of a Christian, and employed the short interval allowed him, in the preparations for death enjoined by his religion, to which he was sincerely devoted. On the 21st of January he was led to the scaffold, where his behaviour partook of the calm fortitude which had distinguished him through all the scenes of suffering and indignity to which he had been exposed. On ascending it, he declared his innocence to the surrounding crowd, but was purposely interrupted while addressing the people, by the noise of drums and the officious interference of his executioners. He was accompanied by his confessor, the abbé Edgeworth, who, as the monarch laid his head on the fatal block, exclaimed with energetic force, "Ascend, O son of St. Louis, ascend to heaven!" His body was thrown into a pit, filled with lime, and no vestige left of the place of his interment. Such was the tragical end of Louis XVI., one of the most moral and best-intentioned sovereigns of France; and who, in spite of all the prejudices to which the misrule of his ancestors had subjected him, was allowed to possess an amiable heart, an upright mind, and a refined and enlarged understanding.—His son, Louis Charles, the dauphin, regarded by the mockery of etiquette as Louis XVII., was, at the death of his father, only eight years old. The inhuman murderers caused him to be placed with a shoemaker, named Simon, who treated him with savage barbarity; and the innocent victim died shortly after, as was generally believed, of poison. The daughter of Louis, after the murder of her parents and brother, was suffered to quit France, and she married her cousin, the duke of Angoulême.

LOUIS XVIII., STANISLAUS XAVIER, surnamed le Désiré, second son of the dauphin (the son of Louis XV.), was born in 1755, and was originally known as the count of Provence. At the accession of his brother, Louis XVI. in 1774, he received the title of Monsieur; and after the death of his nephew, in 1795, from which time he reckoned his reign, he took the name and title of Louis XVIII., king of France and Navarre. As a boy he is said to have manifested a disposition tinged with much timidity and reserve, but to have exhibited a far more decided turn for literary pursuits than either his elder or his younger brother (Charles X.) with whom he was educated; and he early acquired the character of a good classical scholar. When Louis XVI. attempted to escape to the frontiers of the kingdom, and took the road to Montmedy, and was arrested at Varennes, Monsieur took that of Mons, and reached Brussels in safety; and in 1792, he and the count D'Artois joined the Prussian army, at the head of 6000 cavalry. The progress of the republican arms, however, compelled them to make a retreat, first to Turin, and afterwards to Verona, where he assumed the name of the count de Lille, a title which he retained till his accession to the French throne. He now led a wandering life, supported by foreign courts, especially the British, and by some friends of the house of Bourbon. In 1796 he joined the army of the prince of Condé, on the Rhine.

After this he went to Blackenburg, where he lived under the protection of the duke of Brunswick, and carried on a correspondence with his friends in France, especially with Pichegru. Being invited to Russia by the emperor Paul, he took up his residence for a while in the ducal castle of Mittau, in Courland. The versatility of his new ally, however, soon put an end to his continuance there, and he received peremptory orders to quit Russia in a week. The Prussian government then allowed him to reside at Warsaw; and while there, in 1803, Buonaparte, at that time first consul, attempted to induce him to renounce his claims to the throne. To which he replied, "I do not confound M. Buonaparte with his predecessors; I esteem his valour and his military talents, and thank him for all the good he has done my people. But, faithful to the rank in which I was born, I shall never give up any rights. Though in chains, I shall still esteem myself the descendant of St. Louis. As successor of Francis the first, I will at least say like him—"We have lost all except our honour." In 1805, Louis, with the consent of the emperor Alexander, returned to Mittau; but the peace of Tilsit obliged him to leave the continent, and, as a last resource, he took refuge in England. Here he was hospitably received; and Hartwell, in Buckinghamshire, a seat belonging to the marquiss of Buckingham, assigned as his residence, where he remained till the fall of Napoleon, in 1814, drew him from his retreat to reascend the throne of his ancestors. He was accompanied from London to Dover by George IV., at that time prince regent, and conducted to Calais by his late majesty, then duke of Clarence. With Louis landed also the duchess of Angoulême, the prince of Condé, and his son, the duke of Bourbon. Upon landing, he pressed the duchess of Angoulême to his heart, and said, "I hold again the crown of my ancestors; if it were of roses, I would place it on your head; as it is of thorns, it is for me to wear it." The memory of his landing upon French ground is perpetuated by a Doric column of marble erected at Calais, and the trace of his first footstep is carefully preserved in brass. On the 3d of May he made his entry into Paris; on the 20th he caused a constitution to be drawn up; on the 4th of June it was formally accepted; and the chamber of deputies, which was established by this instrument, requested the king to take the surname of "The desired," Louis le Désiré. But the disgrace which the French arms had received was too deeply felt by the soldiers who had fought under Napoleon to make them satisfied with the Bourbons, and the prevalence of ultra-liberal opinions rendered a great portion of the people disaffected to the monarchy; and when Napoleon made his appearance in France, March 1, 1815, his presence roused every latent feeling, and inspired his former followers with tenfold courage and enthusiasm. Louis was compelled to flee from Paris on the 20th, and seek refuge in Belgium. The duke and duchess of Orleans, the old prince of Condé, the count D'Artois, and the duke de Berri, also hastily left Paris; and, proceoting to La Vendée and the south of France, they endeavoured to awaken popular sympathy in favour of the royal cause. The duchess of Angoulême, whose fortitude has been the subject of admiration, showed at Bourdeaux the courage of a heroine; the inhabitants were devoted to her, but the troops favoured the advance of general Cavaignac, and the duchess was obliged to embark for England, April 2. The ministers, together with several officers of distinction, followed the king; and Talleyrand, in particular, was actively engaged in his cause at Vienna. Great events now followed in rapid succession. The battle of Waterloo, fought on the 18th of June, broke down the power of Napoleon, and dissolved the charm of his supposed invincibility; Wellington and Blücher besieged Paris; and Fouché, who had already induced the emperor to leave France, put a stop to the shedding of blood, by the capitulation of Paris, July 3. Thus was Louis once more restored to the throne of France. On the 7th of July the British and Prussians occupied Paris; on the 9th the king entered his capital, under the protection of the duke of Wellington; and he immediately appointed his new ministry, at the head of which was Talleyrand, and in which Fouché was minister of police. Among the most decided measures by which the king sought to support his throne, was the ordinance of July 16, disbanding the army, according to the wishes of the allies, and another, dated July 24, excluding from the general amnesty those who were there denominated "rebels," and whose punishment, for the most part, consisted in exile, or degradation from the peerage. All the relations of Napoleon were, under pain of death, banished from France; as were also those who had voted for the death of Louis XVI., and those who in 1815 had received offices or honours from the "usurper." During the last few years of his reign, he was much enfeebled by disease; a dry erysipelas in his legs had deprived him of the power of walking, while his attachment to the pleasures of the table increased his natural tendency to corpulence, and a paralysis of the lower limbs taking place, he died, Sept. 16, 1824, having survived his second elevation nine years.

LOUIS, ANTHONY, secretary of the academy of surgeons at Paris, was born at Mentz in 1723, and died in 1792. He was a very able anatomist and surgeon, and wrote a "Course of Practical Surgery," an "Essay on the Mind, and on its Union with the Body," "Observations on Electricity and its Effects on the Animal Economy," &c.

LOUIRIERO, JOHN DE, a Portuguese botanist, who, being also an ecclesiastic, visited Cochinchina as a missionary. To his religious duties he joined the practice of medicine; and not being sufficiently provided with European remedies, he was induced to collect and examine the plants of China, Malabar, and other parts, whence he procured a large and valuable store. On his return to Portugal, after thirty-six years' absence, he published the result of his botanical researches in a work, entitled "Flora Cochinchinensis" 2 vols. Born, 1715; died, 1796.

LOUTHERBOURG, PHILIP JAMES, an eminent landscape painter, was born at Strasburg, in 1740; studied under Fischlein and Casanova; and displayed great talents in his delineation of battles, hunting-pieces, &c. He came to London in 1771, and while there contrived an exhibition, called the Eidophusikon, somewhat on the plan of the Diorama. He was a member of the academy of painting at Paris, and a royal academician of England. Died, 1812.

LOUISA, AUGUSTA WILHELMINA AMELIA, queen of Prussia, daughter of Charles, duke of Mecklenburg-Streitz, was born at Hanover, in 1776, and was married to the crown-prince of Prussia, afterwards king, Dec. 24, 1793; on which day her sister, the present queen of Hanover, was betrothed to prince Louis of Prussia. In 1797 the king of Prussia ascended the throne, and his consort became the model of a wife, a mother, and a queen, alleviating misery, wherever she could, and rewarding merit. When Napoleon was in the zenith of his power, and Prussia lay prostrate before him, her popularity rose in proportion to her sufferings; while her pure and benevolent heart, and the fortitude with which she endured the indignities of the French emperor, rendered her an object almost of adoration. She died in 1810.

LOUVEL, PETER LOUIS, the assassin of the Duc de Berry, was born at Versailles, in 1783. He was by trade a saddler, and worked in the stables of the emperor Napoleon and the French king. His disposition was gloomy, and his mind seemed devoid of interest, except on political subjects. He appeared to dwell intently on what he had heard respecting the causes of the French revolution, until he felt a rooted hatred towards the Bourbons. During six years he ruminated in silence on their destruction, and began with the youngest, as he afterwards acknowledged, from a wish to exterminate their race; having resolved to omit no opportunity of killing the others. Louvel perpetrated the fatal deed on the 13th of February, 1820. He conducted himself with firmness during his long examination, and appeared calm throughout, even in his last moments, positively declaring that he had no accomplice.

LOUVET DE COUVRAY, JOHN BAPTIST, a distinguished French advocate, during the revolution, was, in 1792, chosen a deputy to the convention, when he attached himself to the party of the Girondists, and voted for the death of Louis. Denounced by the terrorists, and included in an order of arrest, issued in June, 1794, he escaped from the capital, retired to Caen, with several of his colleagues, and employed himself in writing against the Jacobins. At length he returned to Paris, where he kept himself concealed till after the fall of Robespierre; recovered his seat in the convention; and was afterwards a member of the council of five hundred. He died at Paris, in 1797, and is chiefly known in literature as the author of an obscene and disgusting novel.

1686, he had the whole management of the ministry of war, and soon exercised a despot control over the king and the army. His extensive knowledge, his decision, activity, industry, and talents, rendered him an able minister; but he was too regardless of the rights of human nature, too lavish of the blood and treasure of France, and too much of a despot, to deserve the appellation of a great statesman. On the death of Colbert, in 1683, of whom he had been the enemy, his influence became still greater, and one of its most fatal effects was the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685, and the consequent flight of so many peaceful and industrious Calvinists. His atrocious cruelties to the Protestants, indeed, have braided his name with infamy. Died, 1691.

LOVE, CHRISTOPHER, an eminent Presbyterian divine, was born at Cardiff, in 1618. He studied at Oxford, and entered into orders; but refusing to subscribe to the canons enjoined by archbishop Laud, he was expelled the congregation of masters, and repaired to London. He was one of the commissioners for the parliament at the treaty of Uxbridge; he was also one of the assembly of divines, and chosen minister of St. Lawrence Jewry; yet he signed the declaration against the murder of the king. After this he was concerned in a plot against Cromwell and the Independents, for which he was tried and beheaded, Aug. 22, 1651. Ashe, Calamy, and Manton, three eminent non-conformist divines, accompanied him to the scaffold, and he was deemed a martyr by the whole of the Presbyterian party.

LOVE, JAMES, a dramatic writer and performer, whose real name was Dance, was, for a time, a partisan of Sir Robert Walpole, and an expectant of political preferment; but being disappointed in his hopes, and involved in difficulties, he went on the stage, and excelled in the part of Falstaff. "Pamela," a comedy; "The Village Wedding," a pastoral entertainment; and "The Lady's Frolic," a comic opera, were the productions of his pen. Died, 1774.

LOVELACE, RICHARD, an English poet of the 17th century, was a son of Sir William Lovelace, of Woolwich, and born in 1618. He was educated at the Charterhouse, and at Gloucester hall, Oxford; became a colonel in the army of Charles I., and spent the whole of his fortune in the support of the royal cause; was imprisoned by the parliament, and died in indigence in 1658. His poems, published under the title of "Lucasta," are light and elegant; he also wrote two plays, "The Scholar," a comedy, and "The Soldier," a tragedy. For spirit and gallantry, Colonel Lovelace has sometimes been compared to Sir Philip Sidney.

LOVIBOND, EDWARD, a minor English poet, was the son of an East India director, who left him a considerable estate at Hampton, Middlesex. He was the author of Poems, in 2 vols., the most pleasing of which is called "The Tears of Old May Day;" he also wrote some papers in The World. Died, 1775.

LOWENDAL, ULRICH FREDERIC WOLDEMAR, count of, a celebrated military officer and engineer, was born at Hamburgh, in 1700. He began his military career in Poland, in 1713; but entered the Danish service during the war with Sweden. He afterwards served in Hungary, with great éclat, and next took part in the wars of Naples and Sicily. He returned to Poland in 1721, and was made colonel of infantry, and commander of the royal horse guards. During the peace he studied gunnery and engineering, and was made field-marshal and inspector-general of the Saxon infantry in the service of Augustus, king of Poland. In 1734 and 1735 he was in the Austrian service; and he subsequently entered into that of Russia. He accepted the commission of lieutenant-general in the French army in 1743, and distinguished himself at the sieges of Menin, Ypres, Friburg, &c., and also at the battle of Fontenoy. In 1747 he took Bergen-op-Zoom by storm, which, till then, had been deemed impregnable; for which and his other services, he was created a marshal of France. His knowledge of engineering and military tactics in general was of the first-rate order; he spoke all the European languages with fluency; and with these accomplishments he combined modesty and amiable manners. Died, 1748.

LOWER, RICHARD, a physician and anatomist of some eminence in the 17th century, was a native of Cornwall; assisted Dr. Willis, in his anatomical researches, and in his professional practice; and obtained considerable reputation as a man of science by his experiments on the transfusion of blood from one animal to another. Died, 1691.

LOWRY, WILSON, F.R.S., an eminent English engraver, was born in 1762, at Whitehaven, where his father, Mr. Strickland Lowry was a portrait painter. He was the inventor of a ruling-machine, possessing the property of ruling successive lines, either equidistant or in just gradations, from the greatest required width to the nearest possible approximation; also of one capable of drawing lines to a point, and of forming concentric circles: he likewise introduced the use of diamond points for etching, and many other useful improvements in the art, and was the first who succeeded in what is technically termed "biting in" well upon steel. For thirty years before his death he was engaged by eminent publishers on their most extensively illustrated works; and having attained to the highest rank in his peculiar branch of the art, his services were thoroughly appreciated. He was well acquainted with anatomy, having studied it in the early part of his life, under Sir William Blizard. Died, 1830.

LOWTH, WILLIAM, an eminent divine, was born in London, in 1661, and was educated at Oxford. Being recommended by his worth and learning, he became chaplain to Dr. Mew, bishop of Winchester, and was provided with a prebendal stall in his cathedral and the living of Barlton. He was an excellent classical scholar and critic, and the author of several theological works of merit.

LOWTH, ROBERT, son of the preceding, and a distinguished English prelate, was born at Burton, in 1710; received his education at Winchester, and at New college, Oxford; in which university he was elected professor of poetry, in 1741. He accompanied Mr. Legge on an embassy to Berlin, and was subsequently travelling tutor to the sons of the duke of Devonshire. In 1753 he published his "De Sacra Fœsi Hebræorum Prælectiones Academicæ;" in 1758, the "Life of William of Wykeham;" in 1762, a "Short Introduction to English Grammar;" and, in 1765, he replied in a masterly and unanswerable style, to some acrimonious remarks of Warburton, who thought Dr. Lowth had aimed at his "Divine Legation of Moses," in the "Prælectiones." After having enjoyed some valuable preferments, he was raised to the see of St. David's in 1766; was translated to Oxford in the same year; and, in 1777, succeeded to the diocese of London. In 1778 he published his "Translation of Isaiah." The archbishopric of Canterbury was offered him, on the death of Dr. Cornwallis, but he declined the primacy, and died in 1787, aged 77.

LOYOLA, IGNATIUS, founder of the society of Jesuits, was born in 1491, of a noble family, in the Spanish province of Guipuscoa. He was at first in the army, and served with distinguished bravery; but having been severely wounded at the siege of Pampluna, he beguiled his time with books, and on reading the Lives of the Saints, his imagination became highly excited, and he determined to devote himself from that time to works of piety. He began by making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; not from a mere wish to see those places, which had been hallowed by the presence of our Lord, but in the hope of converting some of the infidels, who were masters of the Holy Land, or of gaining the palm of martyrdom in the attempt. Having accomplished this painful and perilous journey, he returned to Spain, more unprovoked even than he had left it. In 1526, he went to the university of Alcalá, where he found some adherents; but the Inquisition imprisoned him for his conduct, which appeared strange, and rendered him suspected of witchcraft. He was not delivered from the prison of the holy office until 1528, when he went to Paris to continue his studies, the subjects of which, indeed, were only works of an ascetic character. Here he became acquainted with several Spaniards and Frenchmen, who were afterwards noted as his followers. They conceived the plan of an order for the conversion of heathens and sinners, and, on Ascension day, in 1534, they united for this great work in the subterranean chapel of the abbey of Montmartre. They then met again in 1536, at Venice, whence they proceeded to Rome, and received the confirmation of their fraternity from pope Paul III., as "the Society of Jesus." In 1541, Ignatius was chosen general of the society; continued his abstinence and penances during life; and died in 1556. Loyola was in person of a middle stature, of an olive complexion, with a bald head, eyes full of fire, and an aquiline nose. His fanaticism and enthusiasm were certainly dignified by sincerity, and he doubtless believed as he taught, that the Society of Jesus was the result of an immediate inspiration from Heaven. He was canonized in 1622, by Gregory XV.

LUBIENIETSKI, STANISLAUS, a celebrated Sucinian minister, was born at Cracow, in Poland, in 1623. On the banishment of his sect, he went to Denmark, where he was poisoned, with his two daughters, in 1673. His principal work is entitled "Theatrum Cometicum;" but at the time of his decease, he was engaged in writing an account of the rise and progress of the Reformation in Poland.

LUBIN, AUGUSTIN, an Augustine friar, was born at Paris, in 1634. He became provincial-general of his order in France; and afterwards assistant-general of the French monks at Rome; but he returned to Paris, and died there in 1684. He was made geographer royal, and wrote "The Geographical Mercury;" "Notes on the Roman Martyrology;" "History of the French Abbays;" "Geographical Notes and Tables to Plutarch;" and "The Geography of the Bible."

LUBIN, EILHARD, a protestant divine, was born at Westerstedt, in the duchy of Oldenburg, in 1556; became professor of poetry, and afterwards of divinity at Rostock; and died in 1631. He wrote many works, theological and classical; but the one which excited most notice, and which led to much controversy was entitled "Phosphorus, or the first cause of Sin."

LUCAN, MARCUS ANNEUS, a celebrated Roman poet, was born at Corduba, in Spain, in the year 37. He was a nephew of Seneca; and being taken early to Rome, he studied there under the best masters. Before he was of the legal age he was made questor; and he was also admitted into the college of augurs. He excited the anger of Nero for having had the effrontery to recite one of his compositions, in a public assembly, in competition with the emperor, and was ordered never more to recite in public. This induced Lucan to join Piso and others in a conspiracy against the tyrant; for which he suffered death, A.D. 66.

LUCAS, PAUL, a French traveller, was born at Rouen, in Normandy, in 1664. He made trading voyages to the Levant, Greece, Asia Minor, and Africa; and having brought home medals and other curiosities for the king's cabinet, he was made one of the royal antiquaries. During one of his voyages he entered into the Venetian army, and served at the siege of Negropont. His travels, which are romantic and improbable, form 7 vols. He died in 1737.

LUCAS, CHARLES, a noted Irish patriot, who was a physician at Dublin, was born in 1713. He was a member of the Irish house of commons, and obtained immense popularity by his opposition to the court party. Died, 1771.

LUCAS, RICHARD, D.D., a native of Presteigne, in Radnorshire, was born in 1648, and educated at Jesus college, Oxford. He was a pious and learned divine, and held a prebend in Westminster; but lost his sight many years before his death. Among his writings are, "Sermons," 5 vols.; "An Enquiry after Happiness," 2 vols.; "The Morality of the Gospel;" and "Practical Christianity." Died, 1713.

LUCCHESINI, JOHN VINCENT, an historian, was a nobleman of Lucra, where he was born in 1680. His translation of Demosthenes, published in 1712, was, in the opinion of Rollin, an unrivalled piece of modern latinity; and his "Historie sui Temporis," 2 vols. 4to. is much admired. Died, 1744.

LUCCHESINI, GIROLAMO, marquis of, was born at Lucra, of a noble family, in 1732, and became Prussian minister of state. He was the literary friend of Frederic II., and first received a diplomatic appointment under his successor, being sent to the council of state at Warsaw, in 1788, and ultimately brought about an alliance between Prussia and Poland. From that time he was ambassador on all great occasions, at Vienna, at Paris, and Milan. He accompanied the king to the battle of Jena, then signed an armistice with Napoleon at Charlottenburg, of which, however, the king did not approve; in consequence of which, as he believed himself to have lost the favour of the king, he took his dismissal. He was afterwards chamberlain to Napoleon's sister, the princess of Lucra, and accompanied her to Paris on the occasion of her brother's second marriage. He was active, sagacious, and zealous; combining the qualities of an experienced courtier with the practical knowledge of a statesman. Died, 1833.

LUCIAN, a celebrated Greek author, distinguished for his ingenuity and wit, was born at Samosata, the capital of Comagene, during the reign of Trajan. He was of humble origin, and was placed, while young, with an uncle, to study statuary; but being unsuccessful in his first attempts, he went to Antioch, and devoted himself to literature and forensic rhetoric. In the reign of Marcus Aurelius, he was made procurator of the province of Egypt, and died when eighty or ninety years old. The works of Lucian, of which many have come down to us, are mostly in the form of dialogues; but none are so popular as those in which he ridicules the pagan mythology and the philosophical sects. Many of them, however, though written in an elegant style, and abounding with witticisms, are tainted with profanity and indecency.

LUCILIUS, CASSIUS, a Roman satirist, who served under Scipio in his expedition against the Numantians. Only a few of his verses remain, which are in the Corpus Poetarum of Maittaire. He died at Naples, A. C. 108.

LUCRETIA, a Roman matron of distinguished virtue, was the wife of Collatinus, and the cause of the revolution of Rome from a monarchy to a republic. Sextus Tarquinius, who contrived to become a guest in the absence of her husband, whose kinship he was, found means to reach her chamber in the middle of the night; and finding himself repulsed, he threatened to stab her, kill a slave and place him by her side, and then swear he had slain them both in the act of adultery. The dread of infamy succeeded, and he triumphed over her fears; but she acquainted her husband, father, and kindred of the transaction, and in spite of their soothing remonstrances, drew a dagger and stabbed herself to the heart. The bloody poulard, with her dead body exposed to the senate, was the signal of Roman liberty. The expulsion of the Tarquins, and the abolition of the regal dignity, was instantly resolved on, and carried into execution.

LUCRETIVS, TITUS CARUS, an ancient Roman philosopher and poet, much esteemed for his learning and eloquence. His celebrated work, "De Rerum Natura," has been translated into English by Mr. Creech.

LUCULLUS, LUCIUS LICIVIVS, a Roman consul and commander, celebrated for his military talents and magnificence, was born, A. C. 115. He first distinguished himself in the social war, and afterwards defeated Hamilcar in two naval battles. He also conquered various cities of Pontus; and, although overcome by Mithridates in a battle, soon acquired such advantages that he finally broke up the hostile army, and Mithridates himself sought protection in Armenia; where Tigranes refusing to surrender him to the Romans, Lucullus attacked that monarch, and completely subdued him. By a mutiny of his soldiers, who accused him of avarice and covetousness, he was deprived of the chief command, and recalled. From this time, Lucullus remained a private individual, spending in luxurious ease the immense riches which he had brought with him from Asia, without, however, abandoning the more noble and serious occupations of a cultivated mind. Died, A. C. 48.

LUDLOW, EDMUND, an eminent republican leader, was born at Maiden Bradley, Wilts. in 1620; studied at Trinity college, Oxford, and at the Temple; was an officer in the parliamentary army, and fought at Edgehill, Newbury, and other places; but when the "self-denying ordinance" took place, he remained out of any ostensible situation, until chosen member for Wiltshire, in the place of his father. At this time the machinations of Cromwell becoming visible, he was opposed by Ludlow with firmness and openness. To establish a republic, he joined the army against the parliament, and sat also as one of Charles's judges. Nominated general of horse in Ireland, he joined the army under Ireton, and acted with great vigour and ability. When Cromwell was declared protector, Ludlow used all his influence with the army against him, on which account he was recalled, and put under arrest; but he avowed his republican principles, and, refusing all security or engagement for submission, retired into Essex, where he remained until the death of the protector. When Richard Cromwell succeeded, he joined the army party at Wallingford-house, and was instrumental in the restoration of the long parliament, in which he took his seat. The restoration was now rapidly approaching, and finding the republicans unable to resist it, he quitted the country, and proceeded to Geneva, whence he afterwards, with many more fugitives of the party, took refuge at La-same. After the Revolution he ventured to appear in London, which gave such offence, that an address was presented to king William, by the House of Commons, praying his majesty to issue a proclamation for apprehending him. On this, Ludlow went back to Vesvy, in Switzerland, where he died in 1693. He was one of the purest and most honourable characters on the republican side, free from fanaticism or hypocrisy. His "Memoirs" are interesting, and written in a manly and unaffected style.

LUDOLPH, JOH, a learned orientalist, was born at Erfart, in Thuringia, in 1624; studied at Leyden; and became a traveling tutor. In 1646 he went to Rome on a literary commission, and while there formed an acquaintance with some Abyssinians, from whom he acquired a perfect knowledge of the Ethiopic language. In 1652 he was made aulic-counsellor to the duke of Saxe Gotha, and governor to the young prince. Among his works are, "A History of Ethiopia," and various Lexicons and Grammars of the Ethiopian dialects. Died, 1704.

LUDOLPH, HENRY WILLIAM, nephew of the above, and secretary to prince George of Denmark, who espoused queen Anne of England, settled in London, where he died in 1716. He wrote a "Grammar of the Russian Language;" and published the New Testament in modern Greek.

LUITPRANDUS, an historian and statesman of the tenth century, was born at Pavia. He was secretary to Berengarius II., who sent him ambassador to Constantine Porphyrogenitus; but afterwards disgraced him for censuring his conduct. On this he complained to the emperor Otho, who expelled Berengarius; and in 963 made Luitprandus bishop of Cremona. He also sent him on an embassy to Nicephorus Phocas, who threw him into prison. On regaining his liberty he returned to Italy, where he wrote the "History of his own Times," a work which throws considerable light on the manners and transactions of the middle ages.

LULLI, or LULLY, JEAN BAPTISTE, a musical composer, was born of obscure parents, at Florence, in 1634. Having discovered a passionate fondness for music when quite a child, he was sent to Paris in his tenth year, to be page to Mlle. Montpensier. The lady, however, was so little pleased by his appearance, that she sent him into her kitchen, where he remained some time in the humble capacity of an under scullion. His musical talent becoming accidentally known to a gentleman about the court, his representations procured him to be placed under a master. He now rose rapidly, till he obtained the appointment of musician to the court, and, in 1670, was made joint director of the French opera, which situation he filled till his decease, in 1687. Lully contributed much to the improvement of French music; composed nineteen operas, and was much admired by his cotemporaries. Died, 1687.

LULLY, RAYMOND, a distinguished philosopher and scholar of the thirteenth century, born at Palma, in Majorca. In his youth he had been a soldier; but he became a religious ascetic, and travelled into Africa, and the East, for the purpose of converting the Mahometans to Christianity. He suffered tortures and imprisonment at Tunis; but was released by some Genoese merchants, and died on his voyage home, in 1315. He wrote on divinity, medicine, chemistry, metaphysics, &c.; was styled "Doctor Illuminatus;" and his method, which prevailed in Europe during the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries, was dignified by the title of "Ars Lulliana."

LUMSDEN, MATTHEW, LL.D. professor of Persian and Arabic in the college of Fort William, Calcutta; author of two Grammars of those languages. In 1825 he resigned the service of the East India Company, came to England, and died in 1833, aged 58.

LUPTON, DANIEL, an English author, who, about the middle of the 17th century, published various works, among which are, "Modern Protestant Divines, the Glory of their Times;" "Emblems of Rarities," &c.

LUPTON, WILLIAM, a prebendary of Durham, and the author of a volume of sermons, among which is one combating the opinions of Tillotson respecting the punishments of a future state. Died, 1726.

LUSSAN, MARGARET DE, a French authoress, of considerable talents, born in 1682, was the daughter of one of cardinal Fleury's coachmen. Among her most esteemed productions are, "La Comtesse de Gondez," 2 vols.; "Anecdotes de Philippe Auguste," 6 vols.; "Anecdotes of Francis I.," 3 vols.; "La Vie de M. Crillon," 2 vols.; and "Histoire de Charles VI.," 9 vols.

LUTHER, MARTIN, the great reformer of the church, was born in 1483, at Eisleben, in Lower Saxony. At the age of fourteen he was sent to the school of Magdeburg, from which he removed to Eisenach, and thence to the university of Erfurt, where, in 1503, he received a master's degree, and delivered lectures on the physics and ethics of Aristotle. He was seduced by his father for the legal profession; but the impression produced on him by the fate of his friend Alexis, who was struck dead by lightning, while walking by his side on their road from Mansfield to Erfurt, uniting with the effect of his early religious education, induced him to devote himself to the monastic life, and he entered the monastery of Angustines, in 1505, submitting patiently to all the penances and humiliations which the superiors of the order imposed upon novices. In 1507 he was constituted priest, and in 1508 he was made professor of philosophy in the new university of Wittenberg. In this sphere of action his powerful mind soon showed itself; he threw off the fetters of the scholastic philosophy, asserted the rights of reason, and soon collected a large number of disciples. In 1510 he visited the court of pope Leo X., at Rome, a journey which revealed to him the irreligion and corruption of the clergy, and destroyed his reverence for the sanctity of the pope. After his return, he became a preacher, and was made doctor in theology. His profound learning, together with the fame of his eloquence, soon made Luther known to the principal scholars, and esteemed as a powerful advocate of the new light which was breaking upon the world. Great, therefore, was the attention excited by his ninety-five propositions, given to the world, Oct. 31, 1517, and intended to put an end to the sale of indulgences, by the Dominican Tetzel. They were condemned as heretical; but neither menaces nor persuasions could induce him to recant, and he still maintained the invalidity of indulgences, and of the papal supremacy. In 1520, Luther and his friends were excommunicated, and his writings burnt at Rome, Cologne, and Louvain. Indignant at this open act of hostility, Luther burned the bull of excommunication, and the decretals of the papal canon. Being called upon by many of the German nobility to defend the new doctrine, he presented himself at the diet of Worms, April, 1521, before the emperor, and a vast assemblage of the princes and prelates of Germany. He there made an elaborate defence, and concluded it with these words: "Let me then be refuted and convinced by the testimony of the Scriptures, or by the clearest arguments; otherwise I cannot and will not recant; for it is neither safe nor expedient to act against conscience. Here I take my stand; I can do no otherwise, so help me God! Amen." He left Worms, in fact, a conqueror; but it was so manifest that his enemies were determined upon his destruction, that the elector of Saxony conveyed him to the castle of Wartenberg, to save his life. In this fortress, as he called it, Luther remained ten months, and then returned to Wittenberg, where he published a sharp reply to Henry VIII., who had written a book against him, on the seven sacraments. Luther also printed a translation of the New Testament, which greatly alarmed the Romanists, and severe edicts were issued against the reading of it by the princes of that communion. In 1524 he married Catherine de Bore, who had been a nun, by whom he had three sons. In 1529 the emperor assembled another diet at Spire, to check the progress of the new opinions; and here it was that the name of Protestants first rose, occasioned by the protest made, on the part of the electoral princes, who were for the Reformation, against the rigorous impositions brought forward in this assembly. After this, the protesting princes determined to have a common confession of faith drawn up; which was accordingly performed by Melancthon, and, being presented at the diet of Augsburg, in 1530, was called "The Confession of Augsburg." In 1534 Luther's translation of the whole Bible was published; and the same year he printed a book against the service of the mass. At length, worn out, more by labour than age, this illustrious man died at his native place, Feb. 18, 1546; having lived to see that his doctrines had taken such deep root, that no earthly power could eradicate them.

LUTTI, BARNABE, an eminent Italian painter, on whom the emperor of Germany conferred the honour of knighthood, was born at Florence, in 1666. He resided at Rome, where he was president of the academy of St. Luke. His paintings are rare and valuable. Died, 1724.

LUXEMBOURG, FRANCIS HENRY DE MONTMORENCI, duke of, a famous general and marshal of France, born in 1638, was the posthumous son of the count de Bouteville, who was beheaded in the reign of Louis XIII. for fighting a duel. He served when young under the prince of Condé; was made a duke and peer of France, in 1662; was a lieutenant-general at the taking of Franche-Comté, in 1668; commanded during the invasion of Holland, in 1672; and having gained the battle of Serey, in 1674, was created a marshal. He subsequently distinguished himself at the battles of Fleurus, Leuze, Steinkirk, &c.; and died in 1693.

LYCOPHRON, a Greek poet, was born at Chalcis, in Eubœa. He flourished in the age of Ptolemy Philadelphus, and was one of the seven poets termed the Pleiades. He wrote numerous tragedies, a satirical drama, and other works; but the only extant production of this writer is a poem relating to the predictions of Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, king of Troy.

LYCURGUS, the celebrated Spartan legislator, son of Enomæus, king of Sparta, is supposed to have been born about a.c. 800. His elder brother, Polydectes, who succeeded to the throne on the death of his father, soon after died, and left the kingdom to him; but Lycurgus finding that the widow was pregnant, forbore to assume the sceptre; and the issue proving to be a boy, he faithfully fulfilled the office of guardian to it. He made the study of legislation his principal object; and having travelled for the purpose of investigating the institutions of other lands, he returned to his own country, and established those laws by which Sparta was so long governed. Having bound the king, senate, and people, by a solemn oath, not to alter any of the laws he had made until his return, he left Sparta with the avowed intention of visiting the oracle of Delphos, but he secretly determined never to see it again. Plutarch affirms, that he put himself voluntarily to death by starvation, while Lucian asserts that he died naturally, at the age of eighty-five. The rigid character of the laws of Lycurgus was intended to make public principle predominate over private interests and affections. Children were not allowed to be the property of their parents, but of the state; which directed their education, and even determined on their life or death. The severest penalties against debauchery and intemperance were affixed; and it was enjoined that the people should all take their meals in public. They were allowed to possess neither gold nor silver; iron was used for money; the theatres were abolished; and nothing but the most indispensable knowledge was allowed to be acquired; in short, all that tended to soften and humanize mankind was prohibited, while every thing that could promote a hardy life and personal bravery was encouraged. The Spartans under the laws of Lycurgus, consequently became a nation of warriors, who, for ages, proved the bulwark of their friends, the dread of their foes, and an example for future ages—more, however, to be shunned than imitated.

LYDGATE, JOHN, one of the oldest English poets, was a Benedictine monk of Bury St. Edmund's. He was educated at Oxford; travelled in France and Italy; opened a school on his return for the tuition of the young nobility; and died about 1460.

LYDIAT, THOMAS, a chronological and mathematical writer, was born in 1572, at Otherton, in Oxfordshire; received his education at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford; and became rector of his native place. He was reduced to poverty by being security for a friend, and afterwards suffered greatly for his loyalty to Charles I. This industrious and able scholar died in indigence and obscurity, in 1649.

LYE, EDWARD, a learned antiquary, was born at Totness, in Devonshire, in 1704; and he died, rector of Yardley, in Northamptonshire, in 1780. He was well versed in the Anglo-Saxon language and history; and was the author of an "Anglo-Saxon and Gothic Dictionary," 2 vols., with a grammar of the two languages. He was also the editor of "Junius's Etymologicon Anglicanum."

LYNAR, ROSE FREDERIC, count de; author of "Travels in Upper Lusatia;" "Political Reflections and Negotiations;" &c. was a native of Lower Lusatia, and held several important situations in the government of Denmark. Born, 1706; died, 1781.

LYNDWODE, or LINDWOOD, WILLIAM, an eminent ecclesiastical lawyer of the 15th century, was keeper of the privy seal in the reign of Henry VI., and was sent repeatedly on embassies to Spain and Portugal. He died, bishop of St. David's, in 1446.

LYON, GEORGE FRANCIS, an enterprising traveller and a captain in the British navy, was born at Chichester in 1795, and entered the service on board the Milford, of 71 guns, in 1809; from which period up to the battle of Algiers, where he was present, he was continually engaged in the active duties of his profession. It is, however, in the capacity of a traveller and navigator that we have to consider him; for in 1818 he was employed, under Mr. Ritchie, on a mission to the interior of Africa; captain Marryat, to whom the post had been originally assigned, having relinquished it. Of this expedition Mr. Lyon published his journal, under the title of "A Narrative of Travels in Northern Africa, accompanied by Geographical Notices of Soudan, and of the Course of the Niger." A more disastrous undertaking has been seldom known; the travellers suffered every kind of privation, were attacked with the most alarming disorders, and Mr. Ritchie fell a martyr to extreme suffering and disappointment while at Mourzouk, the capital of Fezzan, from which place Mr. Lyon returned. A very different scene of operations next awaited him. In 1821 he was appointed to the command of the Hecla, one of the ships belonging to captain Parry's expedition to the Polar Seas; of which he also published "A Private Journal." In 1823 he was raised to the rank of post captain, and appointed to the command of the Griper gun-brig, then fitting out for another voyage of discovery in the icy regions. Here he and his gallant crew encountered the most frightful perils, but providentially returned to England, though without effecting any part of their object. He afterwards went to Mexico as one of the commissioners of the Real del Monte Mining Company, and was wrecked on his return, near Holyhead, in 1827, losing every thing belonging to him. He again visited South America, but died on his passage home, October, 1832, aged 37; thus terminating a life of adventures and misfortune not often paralleled.

LYONNET, PETER, an eminent naturalist, was born at Maestricht, in 1707. Being bred to the law, he became one of the secretaries to the states of Holland; and their law translator from the Latin and French. In his latter years he applied to the study of natural history, particularly insects; on which subject he wrote several esteemed books, the most important of which is, "Traité anatomique de la Chenille qui rouge le bois de Saule." Died, 1788.

LYONS, ISRAEL, an astronomer, botanist, and mathematician, born in 1719, was the son of a Polish Jew, who was a Hebrew teacher at Cambridge. He was Sir Joseph Banks's instructor in botany, and accompanied captain Phipps, afterwards lord Mulgrave, as astronomer, in his voyage towards the North Pole. He was one of the calculators of the "Nautical Almanack," wrote a "Treatise on Fluxions," and other works, and lectured on botany. Died, 1778.

LYRA, NICHOLAS DE, a converted Jew of the 14th century, was born at Lyre, in Normandy. He assumed the tonsure, and was so remarkable for his intemperate zeal in defence of the religion he had embraced, that many Catholic writers assert, that he contributed not a little to the progress of the Reformation. Died, 1340.

LYSANDER, a famous Spartan commander, the splendour of whose victories, his extraordinary liberality, and his apparent disinterestedness, seconded his ambitious views, and rendered him, in fact, though not in name, the master of all Greece. He was slain fighting against the Thebans, B. C. 306.

LYSIAS, an Athenian orator who died B. C. 378, aged 81. Only thirty-four of his orations are extant.

LYSIMACHUS, one of the generals of Alexander the Great. He was killed in battle by Seleucus, 281 B. C.

LYSIPPUS, a celebrated Grecian sculptor, who worked with such extraordinary diligence, that he is said to have left behind him fifteen hundred pieces, every one of which evinced marks of superior genius. He received from Alexander the Great the singular privilege of exclusively making his effigy in cast metal; and he accordingly executed a series of figures of that prince, from childhood to maturity. He greatly improved the art of statuary, and gave to the human figure a degree of symmetry and beauty unpractised by his predecessors.

rian and topographer, was born in 1763, at Rodmerton, in Gloucestershire; studied at the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar; was appointed keeper of the records in the Tower of London; and died in 1819. His works relate principally to the Roman antiquities in Britain.

LYTE, HENRY, an English botanist of the 16th century, was a native of Somersetshire. After he left Oxford, he travelled to foreign countries; and having collected a number of rare plants, on his return, he formed one of the first botanical gardens in England. He is known as the translator of "Doedon's Herbal." Born, 1529; died, 1607.

LYTTLETON, GEORGE, lord, an elegant poet and historian, was born at Hagley, in Worcestershire, in 1709; was educated at Eton, and Christchurch, Oxford; and, on entering parliament, became an active member of the opposition while Walpole was minister. When Frederic, prince of Wales, formed a separate court, he was appointed his secretary; and on the resignation of Walpole, he was made one of the lords of the treasury; he was subsequently chancellor of the exchequer; but resigned in 1757, and was raised to the peerage, after which he withdrew from public affairs. Though in early life lord Lyttleton had imbibed sceptical opinions, his works show how sincere a believer he afterwards was in the truths of Christianity. He was the author of a "Dissertation on the Conversion of St. Paul;" "Dialogues of the Dead;" a "History of Henry II.;" and "Poems." The latter are correct in versification and replete with delicate sentiments; nor are his miscellanies in prose devoid of good taste and refinement. Died, 1773.

LYTTLETON, THOMAS, lord, son of the preceding, was a young nobleman of promising talents, but of dissipated manners; and whose death is said to have been preceded by a very extraordinary circumstance. He dreamt that a young female, dressed in white, solemnly warned him of his dissolution in three days from that time. On the third day, his lordship had a party to spend the evening with him, and about the time predicted, he observed to the company present, that "he believed he should jockey the ghost;" but in a few minutes afterwards he was seized with a sudden faintness, carried to bed, and rose no more. He died in 1779, aged 35. (The widow of this nobleman was living in 1837, and was then in her 95th year.)

LYTTLETON, CHARLES, a younger brother of lord George Lyttleton, was born in 1714, and educated at Eton and Oxford. He first studied the law; but afterwards entered into orders, and rose to the bishopric of Carlisle in 1748. He was eminent as an antiquarian, and, in 1765, was chosen president of the society, in which station he contributed several excellent papers to the collection entitled "Archæologia." Died, 1768.

LYTTLETON, WILLIAM HENRY, lord, was born in 1782, and educated at Christchurch, Oxford, where he was distinguished for his great natural abilities and academical learning. On the death of his half-brother, William-Fulke, lord Lyttleton, in 1838, he succeeded to the peerage. In company with lord Lowther, he visited Napoleon on board the Northumberland, and printed in 1836, for private circulation, an account of his interview and conversations with the fallen emperor. He died in May, 1837.

M.

MABILLON, a learned French Benedictine, famous as a writer on ecclesiastical antiquities and diplomatics, was born in 1632, at Pierre-Mont, in Champagne, and studied at the college of Rheims. He assisted D'Acheri in his "Spicilegium," and published several laborious works, among which are "De Diplomata;" the "Museum Italicum," 2 vols., and "The Annals of the Order of St. Benedict." Died, 1707.

MABLY, GABRIEL BONNET DE, a French abbe, eminent as a political and historical writer, was the brother of Condillac, and born at Grenoble, in 1709. He was educated by the Jesuits at Lyons, but soon abandoned theological studies for Thucydides, Plutarch, and Livy. Being patronized by his relation, cardinal Tencin, who employed him to write his memorials and reports, he might, if he pleased, have risen to eminence in the state; but he preferred a life of literary independence, and was content with a small income. His works include "Parallels des Romains et des François;" "Le Droit public l'Europe;" "Observations sur les Grecs;" "Observations sur les Romains;" "Observations sur l'Histoire de la France;" "Sur les Constitutions des Etats unis de l'Amerique," &c. forming altogether 15 vols. All the writings of this author display deep thinking, and a regard for the welfare of mankind, but his manner is dictatorial and severe. He died in 1785.

MAUSE, or MAUBEUZE, JOHN DE, an eminent painter, was born at Maubeuge, in Hainault, in 1699. Having obtained considerable reputation, he visited England, and resided some time at the court of Henry VIII. He painted the portraits of the royal family, as well as of the nobility; but his best works are an altar-piece at Middleburg, representing the descent from the cross, and another of the Madonna and Child. He led a very intemperate life; and having once received a piece of brocade for a dress, to appear before the emperor Charles V., he sold the stuff at a tavern, and painted a paper dress so like it, that the difference could hardly be distinguished. Died, 1562.

MACABER, an early German poet; author of a work, entitled "The Dance of Death," consisting of a series of dialogues between Death, and a number of personages belonging to various ranks of society. Latin, English, and French versions of it have been printed; and Holbein's celebrated paintings have contributed much to this author's fame.

MACADAM, JOHN LOUDON, known as the introducer of an improved system of road-making, which bears his name, was descended from an ancient and respectable family in Kirkcudbright, Scotland, where he was born in 1736. He was a man of science generally; and in the course of his active services as a magistrate and trustee of roads, his attention was first attracted to the want of scientific principles in the construction of roads. At that time he was in his 60th year, and the subject continued to occupy his leisure till he finally effected what may fairly be termed a national good. Government appreciating the vast utility of his plans, rewarded him by two grants amounting together to 10,000*l.* and he was offered the honour of knighthood, which, however, he declined in consequence of his advanced age, and it was conferred on his son, now Sir James Nicoll M'Adam. He died in November, 1836, aged 80.

MACARIUS, Sr., (the elder), a celebrated anchorite of the fourth century, who passed sixty years in a monastery on mount Sceta, and died about 391. St. Macarius the younger was a monk of Alexandria, who being persecuted by the Arians, and banished to an island, converted its inhabitants to Christianity. Died, 393.

MACARTHY, Sir CHARLES, an active but unfortunate Irish officer, who commanded at Cape Coast, in 1821. While making preparations to repel the Ashantees, the king sent his compliments to him, and said he hoped to have his head as an ornament to his great war-drum. In 1823, Sir Charles marched against the Ashantees, with a mixed force of Europeans and blacks, the latter of whom ran away, and the whites being defeated, their commander was captured, and the victor's menace was ferociously realized, Jan. 21, 1824. In a subsequent battle, the Ashantees were defeated, and this barbarous trophy was recovered and conveyed to his relations.

MACARTNEY, GEORGE, earl of, was born at Lismore, near Belfast, in 1737; was educated at Trinity college, Dublin; and afterwards travelled on the continent. He was employed by government on several missions, particularly as ambassador from Great Britain to the emperor of China in 1792, with a view to extend our commerce there. He conducted himself with great address on that occasion; and an account of the mission was published by Sir George Staunton, who acted as his secretary. The embassy returned in 1794, and the earl was next sent to Louis XVIII., then Monsieur, at Verona; after that, he was appointed governor of the Cape of Good Hope, which he was compelled, from ill health, to resign. During his retirement in Surrey, he wrote "The State of Russia in 1767," and "The State of Ireland in 1772." As a writer he is candid and modest; the Life of earl Macartney has been published in 2 vols.

MACAULAY, CATHERINE, a female historian, was the daughter of John Sawbridge, esq. of Ollantigh, in Kent, and born in 1730. In 1760 she married Dr. George Macaulay, a physician in London, but soon became a widow. In 1778 she married Mr. Graham, a clergyman, and brother to the noted empiric of that name. In 1785 she went to America, for the purpose of visiting general Washington, with whom she maintained a correspondence during her life. She died in 1791. Among her works are, "The History of England from James I. to the Accession of the House of Hanover," 8 vols.; "The History of England from the Revolution to the present time;" "Remarks on Hobbes's Radiments of Government and Society;" "A Treatise on Moral Truth;" "Letters on Education," &c. The spirit in which her History of England is written is almost purely republican, which, although it elicits a noble zeal for civil liberty, yet, like most party productions, it frequently misrepresents facts and misjudges motives.

MACAULEY, ELIZABETH WRIGHT, a lady, who, in the varied characters of an actress, a lecturer, and a preacher of the Gospel, was well known both in London and the provinces, was born in 1785. She left the stage on the plea of ill health, and became the occupant and preacher of a chapel in the metropolis; she also occasionally entertained audiences with dramatic recitations; and for the twelvemonth preceding her death, she was occupied in delivering lectures on "Domestic Philanthropy" in various parts of England. While at York, in February, 1837, where she had been then employed, she was seized with an apoplectic fit, and shortly afterwards expired.

MACBRIDE, DAVID, a celebrated physician, was born at Ballymony, in the county of Antrim, in 1727. He was a surgeon in the navy until 1760, when he settled in Dublin, where his industry and genius were directed to medical researches, and were productive of discoveries which will transmit his name with honour to posterity. He published his "Experimental Essays," in 1764, which work immediately attracted the attention of the faculty, and procured for the author a doctor's degree from the university of Glasgow; but his most extensive publication, more immediately in the line of his profession, was a "Methodical Introduction to the Theory and Practice of Medicine," a valuable work, which afforded a concise and connected view of the principles and practices of the healing art, as best established by sound reason, and confirmed by accurate observation. This work, which was highly appreciated by Dr. Cullen, was translated into Latin, and published at Utrecht. He died in 1778.

MAC CORMICK, CHARLES, an historian and miscellaneous writer, was a native of Ireland, and born in 1744. He entered as a student in the Middle Temple; but the death of his father happening just as he was about to be called to the bar, and his pecuniary resources being reduced, he employed himself in writing for the press. His principal works are, "The Secret History of King Charles II.," "The Reign of George III. to the year 1763," a "Continuation of Rapin's History of England," "Night Reading for Leisure Hours," and the "Life of the Right Honourable Edmund Burke." Died, 1807.

MAC CREACH, Col. Sir MICHAEL, C. B., &c. He entered the army young; served in the Peninsula, and was afterwards engaged in the Burmese war; rising in rank until he became inspecting field-officer of the northern recruiting district. Died, 1834.

MAC CRIE, THOMAS, D. D. was a native of Scotland, and received his education at the university of Edinburgh. In 1806 he separated from the General Associate Synod, and became one of the founders of the Constitutional Associate Presbytery. He was the author of the Lives of "Knox," "Melville," &c.; and a History of the Progress and Suppression of the Reformation in Italy, in the 16th century. Died, aged 63, in 1833.

MAC CULLOCH, JOHN, M. D. was born in 1773, at Guernsey, and in his infancy he is said to have evinced great precocity of intellect. He was first placed at the grammar school of Loozwithiel, in Cornwall; from thence, in 1790, he was sent to Edinburgh to study medicine, and at the very early age of eighteen he received the diploma of a physician, being the youngest student who had ever passed the required examination. He, however, thought himself too young to succeed as a private practitioner; and, after remaining at Edinburgh five years, he entered into the artillery as assistant-surgeon, and became chymist to the Ordnance in 1803. He was afterwards engaged by government in the surveys of Scotland; and his mineralogical and geological survey of that portion of the kingdom is deemed his most important public work. In 1832 his able map of it was completed, and he received from government the sum of 7000*l.* He also wrote many scientific works. His studies, or pursuits, were innumerable; and he is said to have excelled in all, however dissimilar. He held the situation of lecturer on chymistry, &c. in the East India Company's establishment at Addiscombe. In 1835, when in the 63d year of his age, he married; and while on a visit to some of his old friends in Cornwall, he had the misfortune to be thrown out of a chaise, by which he so much injured one of his legs as to render amputation indispensable. He bore the operation with firmness, and even deliberately gave directions to the surgeon while performing it; but all attempts to save him proved abortive. He died, August, 1835.

MACDIARMID, JOHN, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1779, at Weem, in Perthshire; studied at Edinburgh; and on coming to London, became editor of the St. James's Chronicle. He published "An Inquiry into the System of Military Defence," 2 vols.; "An Inquiry into the Nature of Civil and Military Subordination;" and "Lives of British Statesmen." Died, 1808.

MACDONALD, JOHN, F.R.S., only son of the celebrated Flora MacDonald, who so materially assisted in the escape of Charles Edward Stuart, in 1744, was born in 1789. He passed many years in the service of the East India Company, and attained the rank of captain in the corps of engineers on the Bengal establishment. On his return home he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the royal Clanalpine regiment, and commandant of the royal Edinburgh artillery. But it is as a writer on military tactics, and as a man of science, that colonel Macdonald is especially entitled to our notice. His productions relative to the art of war are chiefly translations from the French, and consist of "The Experienced Officer," "Rules and Regulations for the Field Exercise and Manœuvres of Infantry," "Instructions for the Conduct of Infantry on Actual Service," &c.; besides which he produced, in 1808, a "Treatise on Telegraphic Communication, Naval, Military, and Political;" and, in 1816, a "Telegraphic Dictionary," extending to 150,000 words, phrases, and sentences. Among his scientific labours were numerous papers on magnetism, the variation of the magnet, and other kindred subjects, which he communicated in letters to the Gentleman's Magazine. Among his contributions in the same valuable miscellany were also letters on Ireland, Scotland, the Celtic language, and Ossian; with various suggestions and experiments in different branches of political economy. During the latter part of his life he resided at Exeter, where he died, aged 72, in 1831.

MACDOWALL, Major-general Sir ANDREW, K.C.B., was in the service of the East India Company upwards of half a century, during which period he was engaged in all the most brilliant achievements of the Madras army; and died in India, May, 1833, at the age of 73.

MACE, FRANCIS, a popular French ecclesiastic, born at Paris, in 1840, who was celebrated both for his preaching and his theological writings. He was the author of "A Chronological Abridgment, Historical and Moral, of the Old and New Testament," 2 vols.; "History of the four Ciceros;" "An Analysis of the Works of Saint Augustin," &c. Died, 1721.

MACE, THOMAS, an English musician, who was an excellent performer on the lute. He published a work, entitled "Mace's Monument, or a Remembrance of the best Practical Music," &c. Died, 1676.

MACEDONIUS, a prelate of Constantinople in the fourth century. The Ariane made him bishop of that see, in opposition to Paul, whom the orthodox party had chosen; but he was ultimately deposed. He maintained that the Holy Ghost was not a person, but a divine energy diffused throughout the universe.

MACFARLANE, HENRY, an historical writer, was born in Scotland, in 1734, and educated at Edinburgh. He came when young to London; was for some years a reporter of speeches in parliament; and afterwards kept a respectable seminary at Walthamstow. He was the author of a "History of George III.," an "Essay on the Authenticity of Ossian," "An Address to the People of Britain," &c. Died, from bruises received at Brentford election, in 1804.

MACKGREGOR, ROBERT, colonel of the 88th regiment, was a native of Edinburgh. He entered the army by proceeding to the West Indies as a volunteer in the 57th foot, where, after serving at the reduction of St. Lucia, he was appointed by Sir Ralph Abercromby to an ensigncy in the 27th. After a few years' probation in the West Indies, he purchased a company in the 88th regiment, and accompanied it to the East Indies; served afterwards in Egypt; and in 1806 his regiment formed part of general Crawford's expedition to Buenos Ayres. In 1808 he proceeded to the Peninsula, and was severely wounded at the battle of Busaco. His character for personal bravery was quite proverbial. Died, Dec., 1835.

MACHA-ALLAH, or MESSAHALAH, an Arabian astronomer and astrologer, but of the Jewish persuasion, who lived in the eighth century, and obtained a high reputation for his skill in mathematics, astronomy, and the mystic science of astrology.

MACHIAVEL, or MACCHIAVELLI, NICCOLAS, a celebrated political writer and historian, was born at Florence, in 1469, of a noble family, whose members had enjoyed the highest dignities in the republic. On account of his distinguished talents, he was very early appointed chancellor of his native state, and not long afterwards advanced to the post of secretary. When Florence had recovered her liberty, by the expulsion of the Medici, he was several times charged with important embassies, which were of great use to the commonwealth. On the return of the Medici to Florence, he was deprived of his post; and being afterwards accused of participating in a conspiracy, he was imprisoned, put to the torture, and banished; all which he endured with a firmness approaching to indifference. Having returned to his native country, the favour and confidence shown him by the Medici alienated him from the affections of the Florentines; and he died in indigent circumstances, in 1527. His chief works are, "The History of Florence;" "The Life of Castruccio Castracani;" "A Treatise on the Military Art;" and "The Prince." This last work, if taken literally, contains the most pernicious maxims of government, founded on the vilest principles: hence the word Machiavellism is used to denote that system of policy which disregards every law, human or divine, to effect its purposes. There are many, however, who regard it rather as a covert satire upon tyranny, than as a manual for a tyrant; while others think it a work full of valuable counsel for a prince, to whom all eyes in Italy were turned for deliverance from foreign thralldom.

MACHIN, JOHN, an English astronomer of the 18th century; author of a treatise on the "Laws of the Moon's Motions," published with Newton's Principia; and other works. He was professor of astronomy at Gresham college, and secretary to the Royal Society.

MACK, CHARLES, baron Von, an Austrian general, notorious for his ill-concerted military operations, was born in 1752, at Neusling, in Franconia. He entered the army as a private in a regiment of dragoons, but gradually rose till he became aid-de-camp to general Laudohn, who strongly recommended him to the emperor. As quarter-master-general of the army of the prince of Coburg, he directed the operations of the campaign of 1793; and was afterwards employed in negotiating with Dumouriez. At that time the plans and proposals of Mack were so much extolled, that he was sent to London to concert measures with the English ministers. George III. gave him a sword ornamented with diamonds; and Mr. Pitt so wholly approved of his propositions, that he hastened his return, in order that the allied army might benefit by his plans. In 1797 he commanded the Neapolitan troops, but was so outgeneralled, that he resigned the command, and surrendered himself a prisoner of war. Bonaparte, then consul, allowed him to reside at Paris, on his parole; upon which Mack requested permission to go to Vienna, that he might prevail upon the emperor to exchange him for generals Perignon and Grouchy; a request which the court of Vienna refused. Mack then secretly formed a plan of escape, which he effected, and took with him, as companion of his flight from Paris, in April, 1800, Mile. Louise, a courtesan of some celebrity. Arrived in Austria, he persuaded his countrymen that his ill success had arisen solely from the cowardice and disorderly conduct of the Neapolitans. The emperor Francis believed his assertion, and confided to him, in 1804, the command of his troops in the Tyrol, Dalmatia, and Italy; and in the following year made him president of the council of war. In September, 1805, Marshal Soult defeated Mack at Mueningen; he quailed before Napoleon, who forced him to retreat beyond the Danube, and in October he surrendered Ulm, by which 28,000 of the Austrians became prisoners. Mack once more presented himself at Vienna. He had acted in direct opposition to the wishes of the archduke Ferdinand, and public indignation was at its height: he was therefore subjected to a court-martial, and received sentence of death as a traitor to his country; but the emperor commuted it to perpetual imprisonment, and even from that he was released at the end of one year. He then retired to Bohemia, but afterwards returned to Vienna, where he died in obscurity, in 1829.

MACKAY, ANDREW, LL.D., an eminent mathematician; author of a "Treatise on the Longitude," 2 vols., and a contributor to Rees's Cyclopaedia. Died, 1809.

MACKAY, ROBERT, a lieutenant-general of the Madras establishment, entered the army in 1774; and at the investment of Pondicherry, in 1778, he was appointed adjutant of a battalion of native infantry. He served under Sir Eyre Coote in the campaigns of 1781 and 1782, and was present at the battle of Culladore in 1783. He continued actively employed, on various services, having at one time the command of a native corps belonging to the nizam of the Deccan; and was engaged, while in that service in 1794, in some arduous but successful sieges. In 1800 he was made commandant of Ryacottah in Mysore; and shortly after he took possession of a large tract of country ceded by the nizam. He returned to England in 1802, after twenty-nine years service; and arrived at the rank of lieutenant-general in 1811. Died, 1838.

MACKENZIE, GEORGE, author of "The Lives and Characters of the most eminent Writers of the Scottish Nation," &c. a work of considerable research and authority. He practised as a physician at Edinburgh, in the 17th century.

MACKENZIE, Sir GEORGE, an ingenious lawyer and writer, was born at Dundee, in 1636; became an eminent advocate; and gained from the courtiers the appellation of "blood-thirsty." When James II. abrogated the penal laws, he resigned, but was afterwards restored by that prince. Not approving the measures of the prince of Orange, he again retired, and went to London, where he died in 1691. He wrote several works of merit on the laws of Scotland; "A Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Line of Scotland;" "Essays on Moral Subjects;" and some poetical pieces.

MACKENZIE, GEORGE, viscount Tarbat, and earl of Cromarty, was born of a noble family, nearly related to that of Sir George Mackenzie. He distinguished himself by his loyalty, for which, after the Restoration, he was made a senator of the college of justice, clerk of the privy council, and justice-general. James II. raised him to the peerage, and queen Anne made him secretary of state, and earl of Cromarty. He died, aged 88, in 1714.

MACKENZIE, HENRY, an essayist and elegant writer of works of fiction, was the son of an eminent physician in Edinburgh, and born in 1748. He received a liberal education; and, in 1746, became an attorney in the Scottish court of exchequer. His first production was "The Man of Feeling," which soon acquired unbounded popularity; this was followed by "The Man of the World;" and he subsequently produced a third, "Julia de Rouvigné." He next, in conjunction with other literary characters, published a series of essays, under the title of "The Mirror," and afterwards "The Lounger." He also contributed many excellent papers to the Transactions of the Royal Society of Edinburgh and of the Highland Society, of both of which he was a member. His dramatic works were by no means so successful: they consist of two tragedies, "The Prince of Tunis," and "The Shipwreck;" and of two comedies, "The Furze of Fashion," and "The White Hypocrite." He was the author of a political tract, entitled "An Account of the Proceedings of the Parliament of 1784," and at the commencement of the French revolution he published several others, with the view of counteracting the prevalence of democratic principles at home, which introduced him to the notice of Mr. Pitt, and some years after he was appointed comptroller of the taxes for Scotland, an office which he held till his death. For highly-wrought scenes of pathos, and for the graces of style, Mackenzie has but few rivals: his novels, tales, and essays, can never fail to please; but his dramatic writings are deficient in striking characters, so essential to scenic representations. In his earliest youth he had opportunities of becoming acquainted with Hume, Smith, Robertson, Blair, and others who then formed the literary galaxy of Edinburgh; and his days being protracted to a healthy old age, his reminiscences of the great men whom he had so long survived were highly interesting. He died in 1831, aged 83.

MACKEY, JOHN, an Englishman, who basely betrayed James II. by giving information of every secret with which he was entrusted, to William. He wrote a "Picture of the Court of St. Germain," and Memoirs of the Court of England, in the reigns of William and Anne; both of which abound with many curious anecdotes.

MACKINNON, DANIEL, colonel; a gallant British soldier, and nephew to general Mackinnon, who was killed at the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo. He entered the army at the early age of fourteen, and was immediately sent to the siege of Copenhagen, then to Bremen, and the next year to the Peninsula, where he was present in nearly all the great battles; his cool daring, extraordinary activity, and amiable disposition, rendering him an especial favourite. He was also at the battle of Waterloo, where he so eminently distinguished himself, that we shall trespass on our usual limits by relating, in the words of one of his biographers, his acts on that eventful day.

Colonel Mackinnon, then lieutenant-colonel in the Coldstream Guards, led the advance against the French, at the head of his battalion. In so doing, his horse was shot dead, he was wounded, and in falling lost his sword, which, in the confusion, he could not again find; but he fell close to a French officer, who was still more severely wounded; and, in taking the French officer's sword, he gently told him he hoped they might sup together that night. Immediately after, however, colonel Mackinnon rose up, cheered on his men, and advanced at their head. In the latter part of the day he was ordered to take post in the farm of Hugoumont, with orders not to give it up on any account. On this point Napoleon directed his great efforts, and the slaughter was terrific. The Coldstream and part of the Grenadier Guards were posted in the farm-house, filling all the windows; after a short pause, the French pas-de-charge was heard, and instantly loud voices exclaimed, L'Empereur récompense le premier qui escalade, when about five hundred men of the élite of the French army jumped over the wall that surrounded the farm, and run towards the house. In a few seconds these poor fellows all lay in a shapeless mass, so badly and true was our fire. Colonel Mackinnon then walked out with some of his men, and directed them to pile up the bodies of the French soldiers round the farm, so as to make a bulwark against another assault. Several successive assaults were made in a similar manner, and met with a similar fate. Notwithstanding the pain of his wound, and being disabled in one leg by a shot in the knee, colonel Mackinnon continued to defend the farm of Hugomont until the French troops gave up the day, and retired. When the business was over, he became delirious with the pain and fatigue, and was sent in a cart to Brussels, where he met with every attention, and soon recovered his health." In consequence of his Majesty having expressed a desire that every officer commanding a regiment should write to the Horse Guards, and give some account of it, colonel Mackinnon commenced author, and produced the "History of the Coldstream Guards," a work containing much interesting information. Died, June 22, 1836, aged 46.

MACKINTOSH, Sir JAMES, a celebrated British statesman and lawyer, was born in Inverness, in 1766. His father, Captain Mackintosh, intended him for the medical profession, and conferred on him an excellent education. In 1787, after taking his degree of M. D. he repaired to the continent, and established himself at Leyden, to improve his knowledge of the medical art. He preferred however, the study of law to that of medicine; and, after the death of his father, devoted himself entirely to the study necessary for the bar. The French revolution, which had just then commenced, gave a new impulse to his mind, and politics and legislation became the paramount objects of his attention. In conjunction with other partisans of reform, he published several works in advocacy of this cause, especially his "Vindiciæ Gallicæ," or defence of the French revolution, against the strictures and accusations of Edmund Burke. But it is said that an interview with this celebrated statesman changed Sir James's opinions—some alleging sincere conviction, some political interest, as the cause. However this may be, the change produced ministerial favour, and he was appointed, by Pitt and Loughborough, a professor of Lincoln's Inn, where, in a course of lectures on the constitution of England, he exhibited himself as an uncompromising censor of the doctrines he had approved in the "Vindiciæ Gallicæ." It was Sir James Mackintosh who undertook the defence of the emigrant, M. Peltier, for a libel on Buonaparte in the Amigü; and his address, eloquence, and profound knowledge of the law, contributed greatly to the slight penalty which was awarded to his client, and to the frustrated expectations of the First Consul. Shortly after this, in 1803, he was appointed by the existing ministry recorder of Bombay; and his administration there rendered him highly popular, especially his able protection of the rights of native and British subjects. He also established a literary society there, and became its president. On returning to England, he was elected member of parliament for Nairn; and, from this time, joined and co-operated with the popular party. In 1816-17, he opposed the green-bag and spy system—concurred with lord Milton in a motion for reducing the army—voted with lord Althorp against the severe restrictions of the Alien Bill—and against lord Castlereagh's measures generally. In 1818, he made his first celebrated motion for amending the criminal laws. During the Canning administration of 1827, Sir James acted in concurrence with the premier, and held office for a short time; but went out on its dissolution; and, on the fall of the Wellington ministry in 1830, joined lord Grey's, which succeeded it, as president of the India board. Besides the "Vindiciæ Gallicæ," Sir James Mackintosh published "The Regency Question;" "Discourse on the Study of the Law of Nature and Nations," and a "History of England," in parts. He was also an essential contributor to the "Edinburgh Review." Died, 1832.

MACKLIN, CHARLES, a celebrated veteran actor and dramatist, whose real name was Mac Laughlin, was born in the county of Westmeath, Ireland, in 1690. He came to London, and appeared as a performer at the theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, in 1725; but it was not till 1741, that he established his reputation as an actor, by his admirable and still unrivalled, performance of Shylock. He continued on the stage until 1789; but during the last years of his life, his understanding became impaired, and he died in 1797, at the patriarchal age of one-hundred-and-seven. His "Man of the World," a comedy, exposes meanness, sycophancy, and political servility, with considerable skill; and his "Love a-la-mode," a very popular farce, also attests the talents of its author. During his long continuance on the stage he experienced the usual vicissitudes of theatrical life; but he was a zealous supporter of the rights of his professional brethren, and, though dictatorial and irascible, a most entertaining companion, and a steady friend.

MACKNIGHT, JAMES, a learned Scottish divine, was born in 1721, at Irvine, in Argyleshire; and was ordained minister of Maybole, where he composed his "Harmony of the Gospels," and his "New Translation of the Epistles." In 1763, he became one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and was employed nearly thirty years in the execution of his last and greatest work, viz. "New Translation of the Greek of all the Apostolical Epistles," with commentaries and notes. Died, 1800.

MACLAINE, ARCHIBALD, a learned divine, born at Monaghan, in Ireland, where his father was a dissenting minister, is advantageously known by his Letters to Soame Jenyns on his View of the Internal Evidence of Christianity: a translation of Mosheim's Ecclesiastical History; and a volume of miscellaneous sermons. Died, 1804.

MACLAURIN, COLIN, an eminent mathematician, who was born at Kilmoddan, in Scotland, in 1698, and educated at the university of Glasgow, where he applied himself assiduously to the study of the mathematics. In 1717 he obtained the mathematical professorship in the Marischal college of Aberdeen, and in 1725 was elected professor of mathematics at Edinburgh. In 1734 he entered the lists against Berkeley, which produced his excellent "Treatise on Fluxions. He also wrote several papers in the Philosophical Transactions; a treatise, entitled "Geometria Organica;" another on "Algebra;" and "An Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries." In the rebellion of 1745 he took so active a part in fortifying Edinburgh, that when the Pretender approached with his forces, Mr. Maclaurin deemed it prudent to retire to York, where he was entertained by archbishop Herring, in whose palace he died, in 1746.

MACLAURIN, JOHN, lord DREGHORN, son of the preceding, was born at Edinburgh in 1734; was admitted a member of the faculty of advocates; and in 1767 was raised to the bench by the title of lord Dreg-horn. His works are, "An Essay on Literary Property;" "A Collection of Criminal Cases;" and an "Essay on Patronage." Died, 1796.

MACLEOD, JOHN, M.D. a medical practitioner, born about 1782, at Bunhill, in Dumbartonshire, Scotland. He made several voyages as a naval surgeon, and accompanied the embassy to China under lord Amherst. On his return he published "The Voyage of the Alceste to the island of Lew-chew; and died in 1830.

MACNAB, HENRY GREY, born about 1763, was professor of rhetoric at the university of Glasgow, and physician in ordinary to the duke of Kent. Being among the députés in France on the sudden occurrence of hostilities after the peace of Amiens, he became so habituated to the manners and customs of the country, that he fixed his residence at Paris, where he died in 1823. He was the author of "A Synopsis of a Course of Lectures on Elocution," and various tracts of a political nature.

MACNALLY, LEONARD, a lawyer and dramatist, was born in Dublin, in 1742, and, after studying at the Middle Temple, was called to the Irish bar in 1776. He was the author of "The Rules of Evidence," 3 vols.; and "The Irish Justice of the Peace," 2 vols. His theatrical productions are, "Fashionable Levities," a comedy; "Richard Cœur de Lion," an opera; "Robin Hood, or Sherwood Forest," a comic opera; and "Retaliation," a farce. Died, 1830.

MACPHERSON, JAMES, a writer distinguished for his translations or imitations of ancient Gaelic poems, was born at King-castle, in Inverness, in 1738. Having, in 1760, produced "Fragments of Ancient Poetry, translated from the Gaelic or Erse Language," they were so well received, that a subscription was formed to enable the author to collect additional specimens of national poetry. The result of his researches was "Fingal, an Ancient Epic Poem in six books," together with several other poems, (professedly translated from originals) by Ossian, the son of Fingal, a Gaelic prince of the third century, and his contemporaries. Dr. Johnson treated him as an impostor, and a violent controversy ensued concerning their authenticity. From the evidence of the contending parties, it may be concluded, that Macpherson's prose epics were founded on traditional narratives current among the Highlanders; but the date of the oldest of their lays is comparatively modern; and it is now difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain the precise extent of his obligations to the Gaelic bards of former ages. In 1764 he accompanied governor Johnstone to Florida, as secretary. After his return he translated the Iliad into Ossianic prose; wrote a "History of Great Britain from the Restoration to the Accession of the House of Hanover;" and also employed his pen in vindicating the measures of government during the American war. He was afterwards appointed agent to the nabob of Arcot; became a member of parliament; and died in 1796.

MACQUER, PIERRE JOSEPH, an eminent French chemist, born at Paris, in 1718. He wrote in the Journal des Savans, from 1768 to 1776, the articles relating to natural philosophy, medicine, chemistry, anatomy, &c. and he published "Elémens de Chymie theorique et pratique," a chemical dictionary, &c. Died, 1784.

MACQUER, PHILIP, brother of the preceding, a counsellor of the parliament of Paris, was the author of an "Ecclesiastical History," 3 vols., and several other useful historical works. Died, 1770.

MACROBIUS, AURELIUS AMBROSIIUS THEODOSIUS, a Latin author, in the reign of the emperor Theodosius. He held the consular dignity; and was the author of a miscellaneous work, entitled "Saturnalia," curious for its criticisms, and valuable for the light it throws upon the manners and customs of antiquity. He wrote other works, and is supposed to have died about the year 420.

MADAN, Rev. SPENCER, D.D., eldest son of Dr. Madan, bishop of Peterborough, was born in 1730, and educated at Westminster and Trinity college, Cambridge. He held, successively, the livings of Bradley Magna, in Suffolk, Ibsstock, in Leicestershire, and St. Philip's, Birmingham; was chaplain in ordinary to his majesty for thirty-four years; and died at Ibsstock, in 1836, prebendary and chancellor of Peterborough. He was a learned and eloquent preacher, and to his theological erudition was added the ornament of classic elegance; as a zealous promoter of morality and subordination to the laws, he was unsurpassed by any member of the Established Church; while in works of charity, and in all the relations of domestic life, his conduct was truly exemplary.

MADAN, MARTIN, an English divine, was born in 1735, and was educated for the bar, but took orders, and became a popular preacher at the Lock chapel, till, by publishing an apology for polygamy, in a work entitled "Thelyphthora," he lost his popularity, and retired from the pulpit. He was also the author of "A Commentary on the Articles of the Church of England," a "Treatise on the Christian Faith," and the translator of Juvenal and Persius.—His brother, Dr. SPENCER MADAN, became successively bishop of Bristol and Peterborough; and died in 1813.

Trinity-college, Dublin, where he introduced the scheme for promoting learning by premiums at the quarterly examinations. In 1732 he published the first volume of "Memoirs of the Twentieth Century, or original Letters of State under George the Sixth," which was intended to form 6 vols. This work had excited considerable notice, and been brought out with extraordinary dispatch, but the rapidity with which it was bought up, was still more surprising, nine hundred out of the thousand copies that were printed being recalled and destroyed within a week of its publication. He founded a society at Dublin for the improvement of the arts, in 1740, similar to that which was afterwards established in London. In 1744 he published "Boulter's Monument," a poem; and a play, entitled "Themistocles." He had a deanery in Ireland, and the living of Drumully. Died, 1765.

MADDOX, ISAAC, an English prelate, was born in London, in 1697. Being left an orphan he was taken under the care of a relation, who placed him with a pastry-cook; but he soon left that situation, and went to Scotland with a view of obtaining at St. Andrew's a cheap but solid education, and eventually becoming a minister of the kirk. The tenets and discipline of Presbyterianism, however, not being congenial with his sentiments, he returned to England, entered at Queen's college, Cambridge, was episcopally ordained, and rose so rapidly, that in 1733 he was made dean of Wells. In 1736 he was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph; whence, in 1743, he was translated to Worcester, where he died in 1750. Bishop Maddox published "A Vindication of the Church of England," in answer to Neal's History of the Puritans; and fourteen occasional sermons. He was a zealous promoter of hospitals, and other benevolent institutions.

MADERNO, CARLO, an Italian architect, of the 16th century, who was appointed by Pope Paul V. to complete St. Peter's, at Rome; in the execution of which he has been charged with committing some important errors. He was, however, in high repute, and built the Maffei palace, and many other public edifices at Rome. Born, 1556; died, 1626.

MADERNO, STEPHEN, was an eminent sculptor; born in Lombardy, 1576; died, 1636.

MADISON, JAMES, ex-president of the United States of America, born in Virginia, in 1751. His education was of the best description, and for a time he devoted himself to the study of the law. He was only twenty-two when he was first invested with public employment, in which he soon distinguished himself by his zeal and ability; and as a member of Congress, he was remarkable for his fluency and eloquence. Attaching himself to Jefferson, he became secretary of state under that president; and, on the death of Jefferson in 1809, being appointed to succeed him, he made an inaugural address, which inclined against the federal party. A few days after, he published an order in council, forbidding all communication with England and France, until those powers had revoked their orders in council and Berlin decrees. At the same time, he took off the embargo laid on all foreign vessels but those of England and France, and took measures to make the American flag respected. France complied, but England did not; fruitless negotiations followed; till, in 1811, a British frigate attacked an American frigate on the coasts of the United States, and war broke out between the contending parties in 1812. In 1813, Congress re-appointed Mr. Madison to the presidency, and approved his measures with regard to England. Russia offered her mediation between the belligerents; but the right of search, the abandonment of which was claimed by America, and refused by England, was a constant obstacle. At length, on the fall of Napoleon in 1814, Mr. Madison, considering England, strengthened by that event, would be less likely than ever to sacrifice the point, declined to press it as a sine qua non. Negotiations were opened at Ghent, and closed again, in consequence of the American envoy (Gallatin) declaring the conditions demanded by England humiliating. The war was resumed: the British fleet scoured the American coasts, made descents in various places, and took and burned Washington, the capital. Notwithstanding these misfortunes, and the alacrity of the Federalists, he retained the presidency till 1817, when peace was formally concluded and ratified with England. He then retired from office with a high reputation for ability and integrity. Died, June, 1836.

MADDOX, THOMAS, a legal antiquary and historiographer, who published, in 1702, "A Collection of Charters taken from the Originals," with the title of "Formulare Anglicanum." In 1711 appeared "The History and Antiquities of the Exchequer," folio; which was followed by his "Firma Burgi, or Historical Essay concerning the Cities, Towns, and Boroughs of England." After his death, a collection of his manuscripts, occupying ninety volumes, was presented by his widow to the British Museum.

MADRID, J. F. de, minister from the republic of Columbia to Great Britain, which post he held at the time of his death, in 1836. He distinguished himself as the successful imitator of the best Spanish poets; and was the author of two tragedies, and various poetical compositions of a lighter kind, possessing very considerable merit.

MÆCENAS, CAIUS CILNIUS, the friend and minister of Augustus, and the patron of Virgil and Horace, was a Roman knight, and traced his genealogy from the ancient Etrurian kings. He has been described as a pattern of every political virtue, and a most generous patron of the sciences. Though luxurious and effeminate in his hours of relaxation, he was vigilant and active in business, and well understood how to employ the favours of fortune. Many pleasant and useful qualities gained him the confidence of Augustus, which he enjoyed undiminished until his death, in the year of Rome 745, and 8 A.C.—So signal were his good offices towards literary genius, that the name of Mæcenas has since MÆSTLINUS, MICHAEL, a celebrated German astronomer, was born in the duchy of Württemberg, about 1542. He went to Italy, where he became intimate with Galileo; and on his return to Germany he was chosen professor of mathematics, at Tübingen, where he had Kepler for a pupil. He published many mathematical and astronomical works; and died in 1629.

MAFFEI, or MAFFEIUS, FRANCIS SCRIPTO, marquis, an eminent Italian writer, was born in 1673, at Verona; and was educated at the college of nobles at Parma. He entered the army, and distinguished himself as a volunteer at the battle of Donawert, in 1704; but at the end of the campaign, quitted the service, and devoted himself to literature. Among his works are, the tragedy of "Merope;" a "Treatise against Duelling;" a "History of Diplomacy;" "Museum Veronense;" and "Verona Illustrata." Died, 1755.—There were several other learned Italians of the name of Maffei, but better known by their Latin denomination of Maffei.—VROLO, a native of Lodi; author of "Epigrams," "Famys," and a "Supplement to Virgil," which he called the 13th book of the Aeneid. Julius Scaliger and Gerard Vossius have declared him a great poet. Born, 1407; died, 1480.—BERNARDIN, a learned cardinal, who died at Rome in 1553, aged 40. He wrote a "Commentary on Cicero's Epistles," and a "Treatise on Medals and Inscriptions."—JOHN PERER, a learned Jesuit, was born at Bergamo in 1536, and died at Tivoli in 1603. He wrote the "Life of Ignatius Loyola;" a "History of the Indies;" and other works, in the purest Latin.

MAGALLON, CHARLES, born in 1741, was French consular agent for twenty years at Cairo. He is said to have suggested the invasion of Egypt to Bonaparte.

MAGALOTTI, LORENZO, count, an elegant poet and learned naturalist, was born at Florence, in 1637. He wrote many philosophical and poetical works, of which latter the most valued is his "Canzonette Anacreontiche," published under his Aradian name Lindoro Eliato. He died in 1712.

MAGEE, WILLIAM, a learned Irish prelate and a theological writer, was born in humble life, and admitted as sizar at Dublin university. He was soon distinguished for his scholastic attainments; and in 1806 became a senior fellow of Trinity college, and professor of mathematics. In 1801 he published his celebrated "Discourses on the Scriptural Doctrines of the Atonement and Sacrifice," 2 vols., a work directed against the tenets of the Unitarians, and written with peculiar force. By this he added much to his former reputation; and he was, in 1816, advanced to the deanery of Cork; in 1819, he was consecrated bishop of Raphoe; and, in 1822, translated to the see of Dublin. Died, 1831, aged 66.

MAGELLAN, or MAGALHAENS, FERDINAND, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who, in 1519, discovered and passed the Straights which have since been called by his name. His services not being valued by his own country, he offered them to Charles V. of Spain, who entrusted him with a fleet destined to attempt a westward passage to the Moluccas; hence his discovery. He was slain in 1521, in a skirmish with the natives of one of the Philippine islands.

MAGEOGHEGAN, JAMES, an Irish priest; author of an "Ancient and Modern History of Ireland," 3 vols. Born, 1702; died, 1764.

MAGGI, or MAGIUS, JEROME, a learned Italian, was a native of Tuscany. The Venetians appointed him judge of the admiralty in the island of Cyprus, where, by his skill, the capital of the island resisted for a long time the attacks of the Turks. When it was taken he was carried in chains to Constantinople, and strangled by order of the vizir, in 1573.

MAGGI, CARLO MARIA, an Italian poet, born at Milan, in 1630, was secretary to the senate of his native city, and died there in 1690. His sonnets are much admired, and some of them have been translated into English.

MAGINI, or MAGINUS, JOHN ANTHONY, professor of mathematics at Bologna, was born at Padua, in 1536. He was the author of many valuable astronomical and mathematical works; and is said to have accurately predicted the time of his own death, which took place in 1618.

MAGISTRIS, SIMON, a learned Corsican orientalist, born in 1749; author of "Gli Atti di Cinque Martiri Nella Corsica," Origine della Fede in quel Regno.

MAGLIABECCHI, ANTONIO, a learned critic, whose eccentric habits were almost as extraordinary as his varied erudition, was born at Florence, in 1633. He was placed, when a boy, as servant to a dealer in fruit, or, as others say, with a goldsmith, in which situation he discovered such a propensity to letters, that a bookseller took him into his employment, where his talents and memory made him so much talked of, that the grand duke, Cosmo III. appointed him his librarian. His attention was wholly absorbed by his books; among them he took his rest and meals; nor could he be persuaded to leave his old apartment for one more commodious which the duke had provided for him. A threadbare cloak served him for a garment by day, and a covering at night; he had one straw chair for his table, another to sleep on, and the only luxury in which he indulged was smoking. He left no literary work deserving of particular notice; but he freely afforded information to those authors who sought his advice or assistance. Died, 1714, aged 81.

MAGNAN, D., an accomplished French antiquarian and numismatist; born in 1731, died in 1800. His "Villie de Rome," 4 vols. folio, with 425 plates, is a superb work.

MAGNENTIUS, a German, who rose from being a private soldier, to the first employments in the empire. The emperor Constantine had a great esteem for him, and in a mutiny among the troops delivered him from the fury of the soldiers by covering him with his robe. Magnentius murdered his benefactor in 350, and assumed the title of emperor; but Constantine II.

avenged the death of his brother, and after a bloody battle took Marenthios prisoner, and put him to death at Lyons, in 333.

MAHOMET, or MOHAMMED, the founder of a religion which has spread over a considerable portion of the globe, was born in 570, at Mecca, a city of Arabia, of the noble family of Koreish. Losing his father in his infancy, the guardianship of him devolved on his uncle Abu Taleb, who employed him to go with his caravans from Mecca to Damascus. In this employment he continued till he was twenty-eight years of age, when he married Khadijah, a rich widow. He continued to act for some time as a merchant; but a disposition to religious contemplation seems to have attended him from his early youth; and having remarked in his travels the infinite variety of sects which prevailed, he formed the design of founding a new one. He accordingly spent much of his time in a cave near Mecca, seemingly alone, and employed in meditation and prayer; but in reality he called to his aid a Persian Jew, well versed in the history and laws of his persuasion, and two Christians, one of the Jacobite and the other of the Nestorian sect. With the help of these men he framed the celebrated "Koran," or "Book," which he pretended to have received at different times from heaven by the hands of the angel Gabriel. At the age of forty he publicly assumed the prophetic character, calling himself the apostle of God. At first he had only his wife and eight other followers; but in three years the number of his disciples was very considerably augmented. On these he imposed the most marvelous tales, and pretended to have passed into the highest heavens in one night, on the back of a beautiful ass, called Al-borak, and accompanied by the angel Gabriel. In the tenth year of his mission, he lost both Abu Taleb, and his faithful wife Khadijah, which so exposed him to the enmity of the Koreishites, that he found it necessary to make a temporary retreat to the city of Yafel. The fundamental doctrine inculcated in the Koran was, "There is but one God, and Mahomet is His prophet." His proselytes rapidly increased; and as they swore fidelity to him, and proffered their assistance, he adopted the resolution of encountering his enemies with force. Being the more exasperated at this, they formed a conspiracy to murder him: warned of the imminent danger, he left Mecca, accompanied only by Abubeker, and concealed himself in a neighbouring cave. Here he spent three days undiscovered, after which he arrived at Medina. It is from this event, called the Hegira, or Flight, that the Mussulmans compute their time: it corresponds with the 16th of June, 622. Mahomet now assumed the sacerdotal and regal dignity, married Ayesha, daughter of Abubeker, and declared his resolution to propagate his doctrines by the sword. The hopes of booty were thus added to the religious zeal of his partisans; and after many minor exploits with various hostile tribes of the Jewish persuasion, he sent a summons to the principal neighbouring princes, particularly Chosrou Parviz, king of Persia, Heraclius, emperor of Constantinople, Mokawkas, ruler of Egypt, the king of Ethiopia, and the princes of various districts of Arabia, to embrace his new revelation of the divine law. The more remote and powerful parties gave no heed to him; others, however, submitted; and having, made himself master of Mecca, the Arabs, who regarded it as a holy city, embraced the proffered creed. In the tenth year of the Hegira, Mahomet undertook his farewell pilgrimage to Mecca. On this occasion he was surrounded with the utmost splendor, and attended by 80,000, or, as some say, 120,000 friends. This was the last important event of his life. He died soon after his return to Medina, in his 63rd year. The Mahometan writers undoubtedly exaggerate the corporeal and mental endowments of their prophet: it is, however, very credible, that there was a prepossessing majesty in his appearance, and that he united much natural eloquence with a decisive and enterprising mind. The reverence which the faithful Moslems pay to the prophet, and all that is connected with him in the remotest degree, proves the sincerity with which they believe in his divine mission. But the wonder-loving populace alone gives credence to the fable that Mahomet's coffin is suspended in the air: on the contrary, he lies buried at Medina, where he died; and an urn, enclosed in the holy chapel, constitutes his sepulchre, which is surrounded with iron trellis work, and is accessible to no one.

MAHMED, AGA, sultan of Persia, born in 1738, was an infant when his father and brothers were slaughtered by Thomas Kouli Khan, who took the precaution of making him a eunuch. He, however, became an expert warrior, and, on the death of Kouli Khan, re-asserted his rights, and made himself sultan. He opposed the Russians, and their progress towards the south of the Caspian, with success, till his death in 1793.

MAIGNAN, EMANUEL, an eminent mathematician and philosopher, was born at Toulon, in 1601. He entered into the society of Minims, and acquired such celebrity as a mathematician, that his superiors called him to Rome, to take upon him a professorship, in 1636. He returned, in 1650, to Toulouse, where he became provincial of his order, and refused all higher preferments. He wrote "De Perspectiva Horary," and "A Course of Philosophy," 4 vols.

MAILLA, JOSEPH ANNA MARIA DE MOYRIAC DE, born in Savoy, in 1670; was brought up in the Jesuit's college, and sent as a missionary to China, where he was greatly esteemed by the emperor, who employed him in constructing a map of the empire and Chinese Tartary. He afterwards executed some other geographical surveys, and translated the "Great Annals of China" into French, in 13 vols. 4to. He died, at Peking, in 1748.

MAILLARD, OLIVIER, was an eccentric French ecclesiastic, of the 15th century. His sermons were distinguished by their gross and ridiculous denunciations against those who might happen to offend him. Having glanced in one of them at some traits in the character of Louis XI., that king, who had just established the post in France, sent him word that he would have him thrown into the Selve. "The king is master," he replied, "but tell him that I shall get to Heaven by water sooner than he will by his post-horses." Died, 1502.

MAILLE, DUCHESS OF, lady of the bed-chamber to Marie Antoinette, who twice escaped the guillotine by singular contingencies. On the 7th of July, 1794, a lady named Maillet, detained in St. Lazare, was executed by Robespierre's revolutionary tribunal, by mistake, in her place; on the 8th she was summoned; but having remarked to the huissier that there was a mistake in the register of her baptismal name, a delay occurred, in order to see her sister-in-law on the subject; but the latter being seized with convulsions, the examination was delayed till the 10th, during which interval Robespierre was himself guillotined, and the duchess escaped.

MAILLET, BENEDICT DE, a whimsical but ingenious French writer, born at Lorraine, in 1659. He successively became consul at Egypt and Leghorn; and died in 1738. His principal work, "Telliamed (the anagram of his name) contains a singular system of cosmogony, in which he maintains that all the land of the globe was originally covered with water, and that every species of animal, man included, owes its origin to the sea.

MAILLY, JOHN BAPTIST, a French historical writer, born in 1744, at Dijon; of the academy of which place he became a member, and where he died in 1794. His principal works are "L'Esprit de la Froude," 5 vols.; "L'Esprit des Croisades," 4 vols.; and "Fastes Juifs, Romains, et Français," 2 vols.

MAILLY, ANTOINE, born in 1775, was an enthusiastic French revolutionist, though a noble; and editor of the famous "Bouche de Fer." He and his brother Minerve were treacherously seized and beheaded, and their bodies thrown into the sea, at the siege of Acre, by Djessar Pacha.

MAIMBOURG, LOUIS, a celebrated French ecclesiastical historian, was born at Nancy, in Lorraine, in 1610. He entered into the society of Jesuits; but having written a treatise in defence of the rights of the Gallican church against the see of Rome, he was expelled the order. Louis XIV. however, made him ample amends by giving him a pension. His chief works are, "A History of Arianism," 2 vols.; "A History of the Iconoclasts;" "A History of the Crusades;" and "Histories of Calvinism and Lutheranism." Died, 1688.

MAIMONIDES, or BEN MAIMON, Moses, one of the most celebrated of the Jewish rabbis, called by the Jews the "eagle of the doctors," and the "lamp of Israel," was born in 1131, at Cordova; was profoundly versed in all the learning of the age; became chief physician to the sultan of Egypt; and died in 1204. His works are, the "Mishna Terah;" the "More Nevochim;" and the "Peruschim." The first is a code of the Jewish law; the second, which was originally written in Arabic, is an explanation of obscure places in Scripture; and the last consists of commentaries on the Mishna.

MAINTENON, FRANCES D'AUBIGNÉ, marchioness of, who rose to share the throne of France, was born in the prison of Niort, where her father, Constans D'Aubigné, was confined in 1635. On his release he went with his family to Martigny, and died there in 1646, leaving his widow so poor, that she returned to Europe without this child, who was sent after her to France, and there taken under the protection of her aunt, Madam Villette, who brought her up in the Protestant persuasion; from which, owing to the interference of her mother, a strict Catholic, she was afterwards converted. Subsequently being left in very reduced circumstances, she married the celebrated poet and novelist, Scarron. On his death, in 1660, she obtained the continuance of his pension, through the interest of Madam de Montespan, who also appointed her governess of the children which she had by Louis XIV. This connection brought her merits under the observation of the monarch, who increased her pension; and in 1679 changed her name to Maintenon, by giving her an estate with that title. Becoming fond of her society, he gradually passed from intimacy to love; Montespan was supplanted; and Lachaise, his confessor, having advised him to sanction his wishes by a secret but formal marriage, it was solemnized in 1683. After her elevation, she lived in a sort of retirement from the world. Louis visited her several times a-day; and transacted business with his ministers in her apartments, while she read or otherwise employed herself. The king, who sometimes teased her with his ill-humour, endeavoured to atone for this by proofs of his esteem such as he had never shown to any other woman. But she feared to attract the notice of the nation, and would receive nothing more than the estate of Maintenon, with a pension of 48,000 livres. Having founded the school at St. Cyr, for the education of poor girls of good family, she retired to it, after the death of the king, and there passed the remainder of her life. The life of penitential piety after her marriage, and her extensive charity to the poor, in some measure atoned for her ingratitude to Madame de Montespan, who had raised her from indigence; and she died, generally respected, in 1719. Her Memoirs and Correspondence have been printed, the former in three volumes, the latter in nine.

MAINVILLE, PIERRE, a rich silk merchant of Avignon, born in 1765, who perished by the guillotine on the fatal 30th of October, 1793, with the Girondist party; not for the sanguinary crimes in which he participated with the Jacobins at Avignon, but for repenting of them, and deserting the ruffians of the "Mountain," in order to join the Girondists.

MAIRAN, JOHN JAMES D'ORTOUS DE, an ingenious Frenchman, was born at Beziers, in 1678; succeeded Fontenelle as secretary, in 1741, and died at Paris, in 1771. His principal works are, a "Dissertation on the cause of the Phosphoric Light;" an MAISTRE, JOSEPH, count de, Sardinian minister, and member of the royal academy of sciences at Turin. He was born at Chamberrì, in 1753, and was a senator of Piedmont during the French invasion in 1792. In 1784 he was sent ambassador to St. Petersburg, returned to Turin in 1807, and died in 1821. He was decidedly adverse to the progress of liberal principles; and as a diplomatist, he exerted himself to effect the restoration of all his former possessions to his master, and to obtain the transfer of Genoa. He was the author of several political works, enforcing the doctrine of the divine right of kings, &c.

MAISTRE, LOUIS ISAAC LE, better known by the name of Sacy, was born at Paris, in 1813. He entered into orders, but being a zealous Jansenist, he was sent to the Bastille, where he continued two years, and wrote some works, particularly one entitled "The Figures of the Bible." He also published a new translation of the Scriptures, "Letters of Piety," 1 vol.; "Heures de Port Royal;" "An Attack on the Jesuits," &c. Died, 1864.

MAITLAND, SIR RICHARD, an early Scottish poet, distinguished also as a lawyer and a statesman, was born in 1496. He held the office of a lord of session, and in that capacity he took the title of lord Lethington, from his estate. He was appointed keeper of the privy seal, in the reign of queen Mary; which office, as well as his judicial seat, he resigned a few years after, and died in 1566. He wrote several poems, some of which are in Allan Ramsay's Evergreen.—WILLIAM MAITLAND, of Lethington, the eldest son of Sir Richard, was secretary of state to Mary queen of Scots.—JOHN MAITLAND, second son of Sir Richard, succeeded his father in the office of lord privy seal, and lost it through his attachment to the interests of the queen. He was afterwards secretary to James VI., and at length chancellor of Scotland. In 1589 he attended the king on his voyage to Norway, where his bride, the princess of Denmark, was detained by contrary winds. The marriage was immediately consummated; and they returned with the queen to Copenhagen, where they spent the ensuing winter. In 1590 he was created lord Maitland, of Thirlestane. Towards the end of the year 1597, the chancellor incurred the queen's displeasure, for refusing to relinquish his lordship of Muesburgh, which she claimed as being a part of that of Dunfermline. He absented himself for some time from court; but was at length restored to favour, and died in 1598. Besides his Scottish poetry in the Maitland collection, he wrote several Latin epigrams, &c. to be found in the Deliciae Poetarum Scotorum.

MAITLAND, JOHN, a British naval officer, second son of colonel the Hon. Richard Maitland, entered the navy at an early age, and went to the West Indies as midshipman on board the Boyne of 98 guns, the flagship of Sir John Jervis, where he distinguished himself by his gallantry at Mar-unique, Guadaloupe, &c. On obtaining his commission, he was appointed to the Winchelsea frigate; from which he removed into the Lively, and was in that ship when, in 1795, it captured, after an action of three hours, La Tourterelle. In 1797 he was appointed to the Kingfisher; and when her crew on the 1st of July mutinied, he, with the aid of his officers, attacked the mutineers sword in hand, and, after killing and wounding several, quelled it. This spirited conduct was highly applauded by the earl of St. Vincent, who called it "Doctor Maitland's recipe," and recommended its adoption to the fleet on similar emergencies. He next had the command of the Bonadice, in which ship he saw much service in the Channel; and his last appointment was to the Barfleur, of 98 guns, in which he served with the Mediterranean fleet until the conclusion of the war. He attained the rank of rear-admiral in 1821; and died in 1836.

MAITLAND, JOHN, duke of Lauderdale, was born at Lethington, in 1616. He was with Charles II. at the unfortunate battle of Worcester, where he was taken prisoner and committed to the Tower. At the restoration he obtained his liberty, and was appointed secretary of state and high commissioner of Scotland. Died, 1682.

MAITLAND, WILLIAM, an historian and topographer, was born about 1693, at Brechin, in Forfarshire. He was originally a travelling hair-merchant, but turned his talents to literature, gained a competent fortune, and became a member of the Royal and Antiquarian Societies. He wrote a "History of London;" a "History of Edinburgh;" and "The History and Antiquities of Scotland." Died, 1757.

MAITTAIRE, MICHAEL, a learned critic and bibliographer, was born in France, in 1608. His parents having fled to England, to avoid the persecutions in his native country, he was educated at Westminster school, and Christ Church college, Oxford; of the former of which he became for some time second master. His editions of Greek and Latin classics are numerous, and valuable for their accuracy; but his chief work is his "Annales Typographici ab Artis Inventione," 5 vols. 4to. Died, 1747.

MAIUS, or MAY, JOHN HENRY, a Lutheran divine, was born in 1633, at Fortsheim. He became professor of the Oriental languages at Giessen, and died there in 1719. His works are: "Historia Animalium Scripturae sacre;" "Vita Johannis Reuchlini;" "Synopsis Theologicæ Symbolicæ;" "Historia Reformationis Lutheri," &c.

MAIZEROI, PAUL GIDEON JOLY DE, an eminent writer on military tactics, and a brave officer, was born at Metz, in 1719; entered the army at the age of fifteen; became a lieutenant-colonel; and died in 1780. Besides being the author of several excellent works on tactics, he translated the "Military Institutions of the Emperor Leo," and was a formidable opponent of the system of Guibert.

MAJO, FRANCESCO, or CICCO DI, an eminent Italian composer, born at Naples, in 1740; author of "Montezuma," "Ipermestra," and other operas. Died, 1773.

MAJOR, JOHN, a Scotch divine and historian, was born near North Berwick, in 1469. He became professor of divinity at St. Andrew's of which university he was appointed provost. He wrote the "History of Scotland;" the "Mirror of Examples;" a "Commentary on the Gospels." &c. Died, 1550.

MAJORIAN, JULIUS VALERIUS, emperor of the west, was raised to the throne in 457. He made war against the Vandals with success, and drove Genseric from Italy. He governed with equity and prudence, made excellent laws, and would in all probability have much longer averted the fall of the western empire, had he not been deposed and murdered in 461, after a reign of less than four years.

MALACHY, Sr., was born at Armagh, in Ireland, in 1094. He was successively abbot of Benetor, bishop of Connor, and archbishop of Armagh. Died, 1148.

MALACKOWSKI, a noble Pole, born in 1766. He was a friend of Kosciuszko, and one of the victims of the partitioners of Poland. He was president of the Diet from 1788 to 1793, and chief author of the constitution of 1791.

MALAGRIDA, GABRIEL, an Italian Jesuit, who was sent by his superiors to Lisbon, where he was regarded as a saint, till he involved himself in the conspiracy of the duke d'Aveiro. He was then sent to the prison of the Inquisition, where he pretended to visions and prophecy, for which he was burnt as a heretic, in 1761, aged 78. He published the "Life of St. Anne," and other works, and was supposed to have been of unsound mind.

MALAPERT, CHARLES, a poet and mathematician, was born at Mons, in 1581, became a Jesuit; and died in Spain, in 1630.

MALCOLM, JAMES PELLER, an artist and antiquary, was a native of America; studied painting in England, and eventually became an engraver. He was the author of "Londinium Redivivum;" "Anecdotes of the Manners and Customs of London;" "First Impressions," &c. Died, 1815.

MALCOLM, Sir JOHN, a distinguished military officer and diplomatist, was born near Langholm, Scotland, in 1769. At the age of 14 he went out as a cadet to India; and, being placed under the care of his maternal uncle, Dr. Fasley, he soon acquired an intimate acquaintance with the manners of the natives, and with the Persian language. The first service of any importance in which he was engaged, was the siege of Seringapatam, in 1792, where he attracted the notice of lord Cornwallis. In 1794, the state of his health requiring a change of climate and a temporary relaxation from the active duties of his profession, he revisited his native country; but he returned to India the following year, and, having shewn great skill in minor situations of responsibility, he was not only appointed to the command of the regular troops belonging to the Nizam, but had the charge of all the supplies from the Deccan. After the termination of the Mysore war, captain Malcolm was sent on a mission to Persia, and concluded an important commercial and political treaty with that court. In 1804 he concluded a treaty of alliance with Dowlah Rao Scindia; and continued to display great judgment as the diplomatic agent of the British government in India for several subsequent years. In 1807, intelligence having been received that the French designed to invade India through Persia, Malcolm (then a lieutenant colonel) was vested with plenipotentiary powers in Persia, the Persian Gulph, and Turkish Arabia; but he was at that time unable to accomplish the object of his mission; and it was not till 1810 that he succeeded in establishing the political and commercial relations which at present exist between this country and Persia. He had now attained the rank of brigadier-general, and on his return to England, in 1812, he received the honour of knighthood. In 1817 he again went out to India; and in the war that followed the defection of the Peishaw, his undaunted gallantry in the field, and the admirable tact he displayed in the subsequent negotiations, obtained the highest praise from Lord Hastings, and was universally acknowledged at home. Many brilliant exploits and important services continued to be performed by this able officer, till he quitted the theatre of action in 1822, with a determination to spend the evening of his life in his native country; but by the earnest solicitations of the court of directors and his Majesty's ministers, in 1827, he once more resumed his duties, accepting the high and responsible situation of governor of Bombay, which post he continued to fill till 1831, when he finally returned to England, and sat in parliament for the borough of Lancaster. An author Sir John Malcolm also attained considerable celebrity, as may be seen in his "History of Persia;" "Sketches of Persia;" "Memoirs of Central India;" "The Administration of British India," &c. He died, in 1833.

MALEBRANCHE, NICHOLAS, a French priest and celebrated philosopher, was born at Paris, in 1638; and at the age of twenty-two, being determined to embrace the monastic life, was admitted into the congregation of the oratory. His attention was first directed to metaphysics by perusing Descartes' Treatise on Man, and he immediately became a devoted partisan of the Cartesian philosophy. His famous treatise "On the Search after Truth," was first printed in 1672, and is principally distinguished by the maintenance of a mysterious union between God and the soul of man, and the doctrine that the human mind immediately perceives God, and sees all things in him. Malebranche, who wrote several other works, among which are a "Treatise on Nature and Grace;" "Christian Conversation;" and "Dialogues on Metaphysics and Religion." He was highly venerated for his elevated genius, and nothing could be more amiable and simple than his conversation and manners. Died, 1715.

superintendence of the press, in which office he acted with great lenity. In 1771, on the abolition of the legal constitution, Malesherbes was banished to his country-seat, but he was recalled three years afterwards, and made minister of state, which post he soon resigned, and then went to Switzerland. In 1786 he was again called to the councils of his sovereign, Louis XVI., when he drew up two memoirs, "On the Calamities of France, and the means of repairing them;" but his advice was rejected, and he retired to his country house, where he employed himself in agricultural pursuits. He however, hastened, of his own accord, to plead the cause of his sovereign in 1792; and he was one of the last who took leave of him before his execution. This generous attachment to a fallen master excited the jealousy of the French rulers, and caused his destruction. Shortly after his return home, his daughter, Madame De Rosambo, and her husband, were arrested and conducted to Paris; and his own arrest, with that of his grandchildren, soon followed. Almost his whole family were extirpated by the merciless proscription of his persecutors. Malesherbes was beheaded, April 22, 1794, and bore his sufferings with a spirit worthy of his virtuous and honourable life.

MALET, General C. F., born in 1754; a decided republican, who, opposing Bonaparte's elevation to the empire, languished several years, on a charge of conspiracy, in prison; but escaping in October, 1812, during Bonaparte's absence at Moscow, nearly overthrew the imperial government, alleging Bonaparte's death, declaring a provisional government, gaining over many Parisian regiments, and taking the Hotel de Ville. The plan being frustrated by the incredulity of Hullin, the governor of Paris, Malet was condemned and shot.

MALEZIEU, NICHOLAS DE, a learned Frenchman; author of "Elements of Geometry;" and "Miscellanies in Verse." Born, 1650; died, 1725.

MALHERBE, FRANCIS DE, a French poet, was born at Caen, about 1555; bore arms in the troops of the League; was pensioned by Henry IV.; and died in 1628. His works consist of paraphrases on the Psalms, sonnets, odes, and epigrams. He also translated some of Seneca's letters; and may be considered as one of the first who gave to French poetry its polish and regularity; but he was as lax in morals and religion, as he was rigid in his zeal for the purity of the French language.

MALIBRAN DE BERIOT, MARIA FELICITAS, a celebrated vocal performer, was the eldest daughter of Manuel Garcia, a well-known tenor singer at the Italian opera, and was born in Paris, in 1808. She was brought to London by her parents when eight years old, and made music her unceasing study, not the slightest relaxation being allowed her by her father, from whom she received her instruction. Being sustained by a temperament of singular energy and vivacity, she was enabled at the early age of sixteen, to make her debut as prima donna at the Opera. This was in 1825. During the following year she accompanied her father to America, where her union with M. Malibran, an elderly French merchant at New York, took place. Shortly after their marriage, her husband failed, and was thrown into prison; and Madame Malibran, believing she had been deceived, separated from him, and voluntarily giving into the hands of his creditors her marriage settlement, returned to Europe. Intense study, the love of her art, and the motives she had for exertion, had already made her a performer of unrivalled excellence. The Parisian audiences were perfectly enraptured, and every night she concluded her performances amidst a thunder of applause and a shower of flowers. From Paris she came to London, where she shone with increased lustre, through the brilliant season of 1829, in the characters of Rosina, Tancredi, Desdemona, Semiramide, Zerlina, and Ninetta. Her widely-extended reputation now occupied the attention of musical society throughout Europe; and after traversing incredible distances to fulfil different engagements, and receiving vast sums for her performances, she revisited England in 1835. She made her first appearance at Covent Garden, in an English version of "La Sonnambula," on the 18th of May. Her thorough knowledge of the English language, her full-toned pronunciation, and her high dramatic talent, combined with her wonderful voice, had the effect of enchantment. But it was not merely at the theatre that her brilliant talents were displayed; her nerve and spirit appeared to be unconquerable; her magic tones were heard at the numerous royal and noble entertainments to which she was invited, and at the concerts of professors; in short, such was her perseverance, that after her astonishing exertions in the evening, she often rose by five o'clock the next morning, and practised for several hours those miraculous achromatic passages by which audiences were again to be electrified. In March, 1836, Madame Malibran, then in Paris, having been freed, by the French courts, from the bondage of her union with Monsieur Malibran, was married to Monsieur de Beriot, a Belgian, whose extraordinary ability as a violinist, had placed him in the highest rank of his profession. In May following, she resumed her English performances at Drury-lane theatre; and at the close of the season she accompanied her husband to Brussels, and other cities on the continent. But the end of her career was fast approaching. Having been engaged for the Manchester grand musical festival, she arrived in that town on the 11th of September, and, though evidently indisposed, commenced her arduous task the next day. Her illness rapidly increased; and though she endeavoured to conceal it, by sustaining her part with the apparent vigour of health and unusual energy, she sank under the effort. On Wednesday, the 14th, her last notes in public were heard, in the duet, "Vanne se alberghi in petto," from Andronico, with Madame Caradori Allen. It was a desperate struggle with expiring nature; and many who were present declared, that they found in Malibran's pealing melody a pathos superior to what they had ever before heard from her. She was immediately bled, and removed to her apartments; but notwithstanding she had the best medical attendance in Manchester, and that of her own physician, Dr. Belluomini, the homœopathist, who was immediately sent for from London, she breathed her last on the 23rd of September, 1836, aged 28. M. de Berlioz, her husband, to whom she was most affectionately attached, left Manchester immediately after her decease, and proceeded post to Belgium, to seek consolation in the bosom of his family; commissioning Mr. Beale, music-seller, of Manchester, to undertake the solemn duties of sepulture. The funeral, which took place on the 1st of October, was a public one, under the superintendence of a managing committee, and was conducted with every mark of respect for the memory of one so highly gifted, and so prematurely snatched away. But after the body had been deposited in a vault of the collegiate church, application was made on the part of De Berlioz, to have her remains disinterred, for the purpose of being removed to Belgium;—a request which gave rise to much contention and angry remark, but which was ultimately complied with. There were many noble traits in the character of this accomplished vocalist. Her generosity was unbounded; so that notwithstanding the immense sums she received, her liberality absorbed all. Of her genius, energy, industry, and high attainments, it is difficult to speak without appearing too eulogistic. In the words of an eminent critic, she had all the endowment, all the acquisitions, and, above both, all the devotion and concentration of mind, common to those strong and gifted individuals who rise to pre-eminence, whatever the nature of their pursuits."

MALLET, DAVID, whose real name was MALLOCH, a poet and uncelebrated writer, was born, about 1700, at Crief, in Perthshire. He was tutor to the sons of the duke of Montrose; and, having made the tour of Europe, settled in London, where he altered his name to Mallet, and acquired literary reputation. His first publication was the ballad of "William and Margaret," which was followed by "The Excursion," a poem; and in 1731, he produced the tragedy of "Eurydice." Soon after this, he formed an acquaintance with Pope, who introduced him to Bolingbroke; and about the same time he was appointed under secretary to the prince of Wales. In 1739 his play of "Mustapha," was performed with success; and the next year he wrote, in conjunction with Thomson, the masque of "Alfred." He also published a "Life of Lord Bacon," and the works of Bolingbroke, who left them to him as a legacy, and in whose scepticism he participated. He died in 1763, possessed of a place in the customs, obtained by advocating the measures of Lord Bute, and more particularly for contributing to write down the unfortunate admiral Byng; an act which has loaded his memory with great and justifiable odium.

MALLET DU PAN, JAMES, a political writer, was born at Geneva, in 1749. After filling the professorship of belles-lettres at Cassel with great reputation, he engaged in politics, and continued the "Annals of Linguet." He also conducted the political part of the "Mercure de France." When the revolution broke out, he espoused the royal cause, and defended it at the risk of his life. Being driven from his country he came to London, where he published his "Mercure Britannique," and was patronized by government. He also wrote a discourse on the "Influence of Philosophy upon Letters;" and another "on Eloquence and Political Systems;" "Considerations upon the French Revolution;" "Correspondence for a History of French Republicanism;" and other works of a similar class. Died, 1800.

MALLET, PAUL HENRY, an historian and antiquary, was born at Geneva, in 1730; was successively professor of belles-lettres at Copenhagen and at Geneva. Being deprived of his fortune during the first revolutionary war, he for some time received pensions from the landgrave of Hesse and the duke of Brunswick, of which he was deprived by the late war. His merit as an antiquary was very great. Among his works are, Histoire du Danemark, Hesse, the Swiss, the Hanseatic League, and the House of Brunswick, and an introduction to the History of Denmark, which Dr. Percy translated, under the title of "Northern Antiquities." Died, 1807.

MALLINKROTT, BERNARD, dean of the cathedral of Munster, to which see he aspired, but was disappointed; and conspiring against the bishop he was degraded from his dignity, and imprisoned in the castle of Ottenheim, where he died in 1664. He wrote "De Natura et usu Literarum;" "De Ortu et Progressu artis Typographicæ;" and some other works.

MALMESBURY, WILLIAM OF, an English historian, who flourished in the twelfth century, was born in Somersetshire; educated at Oxford; became a monk of Malmesbury, and was elected librarian of the monastery. His "De Regibus Anglorum" is a general history of England, in five books, from the arrival of the Saxons, in 449, to the 28th Henry I., in 1156. He also wrote a "History of his Own Times," in two books, from that year to the escape of the emperor Mand from Oxford, in 1143; an "Ecclesiastical History of England," in four books; "The Antiquities of Glastonbury;" and a "Life of St. Aldhelm." Died, 1143.

MALONE, EDMUND, a dramatic critic and miscellaneous writer, was the son of an Irish judge, and born at Dublin, in 1741. He studied at Trinity college and the Inner Temple, and in 1767 was called to the bar; but being possessed of an independent fortune, he retired from the profession, and devoted himself to literature. In 1780 he published two supplementary volumes to Steevens's Shakespeare, and a detection of Chatterton's forgeries. In 1790 appeared his edition of Shakespeare; and in 1798 he exposed the imposture of the Ireland. He also published a "Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds," prefixed to his writings; a "Life of Dryden;" and a "Biographical Sketch MALPIGHI, MARCELLUS, an eminent Italian physician and anatomist; born, 1628; died, 1694. His discoveries in anatomy were considerable, particularly respecting the liver and kidneys; but his merit is still higher as a vegetable anatomist and physiologist.

MALTE-BRUN, CONRAD, a poet, geographer, and political writer, was born in 1775, at Thye, in the isle of Jutland. Having given offence by his writings in favour of the liberty of the press, and the enfranchisement of the peasants, he was banished to Sweden in 1798. After having resided for a time at Stockholm, he went to Paris, where he acquired great reputation, particularly as a geographer. He edited the foreign political department of the Journal des Débats, was a contributor to the Biographie Universelle, and produced various works; among these are his "Précis de la Géographie Universelle," 7 vols. 8vo.; "Tableau de la Pologne Ancienne et Moderne;" "Poems," &c. He also published, in conjunction with Mentele, "Géographie Mathématique, Physique, et Politique," 16 vols. 8vo. Died, 1826.

MALTHUS, the Rev. THOMAS ROBERT, F.R.S. Few writers (whether deservedly or not, it is not for us to decide) have been more severely attacked than has the subject of this brief notice for his "Essay on Population," a work, however, which cannot be said to be perfectly original, since Townsend and others who preceded Malthus advocated the same doctrines in, as some think, a less objectionable form. He was born in Albury, Surrey, in 1766, and educated at Cambridge. He was appointed professor of history and political economy in the college of the East India Company at Hallsbury, and continued to hold that situation till his death, which occurred in his 70th year, at Bath, when on a visit to his relatives. By his friends he is honoured as a real philanthropist. Died, 1835.—The Malthusian or anti-conubial system is founded on the hypothesis, that population increases in a geometrical, while provisions only increase in an arithmetical ratio.

MALUS, STEPHEN LOUIS, a French mathematician and experimental philosopher, was born at Paris, in 1775; became a professor in the polytechnic school; and subsequently served as an officer of engineers, on the Rhine, in 1797, and under Buonaparte in Egypt, where he much distinguished himself. After this he entered on a course of experiments on the phenomena of optics, and ultimately discovered the polarisation of light. This discovery, the greatest since that of the achromatic telescope, gained him admission into the Institute; he also received the gold medal of the Royal Society, and honours flowed in upon him from all quarters. He died in 1812, and was at the time of his death director of the polytechnic school, and superintendent of fortifications.

MALVASIA, CHARLES CESAR, an Italian ecclesiastic; author of "A History of the Painters of Bologna," 3 vols., and a work entitled, "Marmora Felsinea."

MALVEZZI, VIROLIO, marquis of, was born at Bologna, in 1589. He was a member of the council of war to Philip IV. of Spain; and died in 1654. His discourses upon Tacitus have been translated into English.

MAMBRUN, PETER, a French Jesuit, was born in the diocese of Clermont, in 1581, and died in 1661. He is celebrated for his Latin "Eclogues," and "Georgics."

MAN, CORNELIUS DE, a Dutch historical and portrait painter. Born, 1621; died, 1708.

MANARA, PROSPER, marquis, an Italian poet, born in the duchy of Parma, in 1714. He became chamberlain to the duke; and was intrusted with the education of the young prince, Ferdinand; which office he discharged with such satisfaction, that he was advanced to several places of distinction. His works form 4 vols. Died, 1820.

MANCO CAPAC, the founder of the Peruvian empire, and the first of its incas, reigned, as is supposed, about 400 years before the Spanish invasion in 1532. According to the tradition of the natives, he first appeared with Mama Oella his wife, and sister, in an island of the lake Titicaca, and declared themselves to be children of the Sun, sent down to civilize them. He is said to have instructed the natives in religion, agriculture, and the useful arts; to have founded Cusco; and to have ruled long and prosperously over a grateful people. It is possible he was a stranger from some civilized land, who suddenly appeared in Peru, and employed religion, in order to procure an ascendancy which enabled him to form a regular government.

MANDAR, THEOPHILE, born in 1759, was one of the most exalted of the French revolutionists, and as remarkable for his sonorous and powerful eloquence, as for his small frame, which he told the emperor Alexander was like a spark. He had the courage to seek Pétion, and all the leading Jacobins, at Danton's house, during the height of the massacre of all the prisoners in September, 1792, and state, that he would propose a dictatorship next day to the Convention, to prevent the further horrible effusion of blood. Blood was then literally flowing through the streets of Paris. "The massacre is necessary," said Danton, sternly, and coolly eying him—"The Prussians are at Verdun." Mandar took Robespierre and Pétion aside, and reminded them of his eloquence; "You know its effect," said he; "I will insist on a dictatorship to-morrow." "Take care what you do," replied Robespierre, changing colour; "Brisot will be dictator." Pétion remained silent. Mandar, after this scene, when Robespierre became dictator, through sacrificing Danton and Brissot, withdrew from politics. He produced a number of able works: "Le Génie des Siècles;" "La Cité des Sages;" "Des Insurrections;" and numerous political brochures and translations from the English. His "Phare des Rois," and "Chant du Crime," are his most eminent poetical pieces.

MANDEVILLE, Sir JOHN, an English

traveller, was born at St. Alban's about the beginning of the 14th century; left his native country in 1332, to proceed on his peregrinations; spent thirty-four years in visiting various countries; and on his return, published an account of his travels; but the wonders he describes, have thrown such an air of improbability over his narrative, as to stagger the belief of the most credulous. He died at Liege, in 1372.

MANDEVILLE, BERNARD, a Dutch physician, was born at Dord, about 1670. He settled in London at the beginning of the 18th century, and published, in 1709, a licentious book, entitled, "The Virgin Unmasked." In 1711 appeared his treatise on "Hypochondria and Hysterical Passions," but the work by which he is most known is his "Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices made Public Benefits." He was also the author of "An Inquiry into the Origin of Honour;" "Free Thoughts on Religion," &c. Died, 1733.

MANES, or MANICHÆUS, the founder of a Christian sect, called, after him, Manichæans, was a native of Persia, and born about the year 230. He obtained the tenets, which made his name famous, from the books of Scythianus, an Arabian, who maintained two co-eternal principles, one good, and the other evil. Upon this stock Manes set up as an heresiarch, blending with the philosophy of Scythianus, or rather of Empedocles, some notions, partly Christian, and partly heathen. He rejected the Old Testament, and taught that Christ had come to save mankind, and that he himself was the Paraclete announced in the New Testament. He also pretended to the gift of healing; but failing to cure the son of the king of Persia, he was stoned alive, and his body given to the dogs, A.D. 274.

MANETIO, an ancient Egyptian historian, who was high priest of Heliopolis, in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, about 304 B.C. He wrote the history of his country, in Greek, and pretended to have taken it from the sacred inscriptions on the pillars of Hermes Trimegistus.

MANFREDI, EUSTACHIO, an eminent mathematician and astronomer, born at Bologna, in 1674. He was appointed professor of mathematics, in 1696; placed at the head of the college of Montalto, in 1704; and afterwards nominated astronomer to the Institute of Bologna. He was a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and of the Royal Society of London. Died, 1740.

MANILIUS, MARCUS, a Roman poet, who flourished in the Augustan age. He undertook a didactic poem, of which we have but five books, entitled "Astronomica." It is valuable chiefly as a work of science, but contains, however, a few beautiful and splendid passages, particularly in the introductions.

MANLEY, DE LA REVIÈRE, was the daughter of Sir Roger Manley, governor of Guernsey, a gentleman who suffered much for his adherence to Charles I., and also distinguished himself as a writer. She was left to the care of a cousin, who seduced her under the mask of a pretended marriage, and then abandoned her. Being thus dependent on her own exertions for support, she became a dramatic and political writer. Her first effort was "The Royal Mistress," a tragedy, which was successful. She then composed "The New Atalantes," 4 vols., in which, under feigned names, and with much warmth and freedom, she relates the amours and adventures, real and supposed, of many distinguished persons of the day. For the libels contained in this work she was committed to the custody of a messenger, but afterwards admitted to bail; and a Tory administration succeeding, she lived in high reputation and gaiety. She was also employed in writing for queen Anne's ministry; and when Swift relinquished "The Examiner," she continued it for a considerable time with great spirit. Besides the works before-mentioned, she wrote "Lucius," a tragedy; the "Lost Lover," a comedy; "Memoirs of Pompey towards the close of the Eighteenth Century;" "Court Intrigues;" "Adventures of Rivelle," &c. Died, 1724.

MANLIUS, TITUS TORQUATUS, a famous Roman, who, in a war against the Gauls, accepted a challenge given by one of the enemy, and having slain him, took his collar from his neck, on which account he assumed the name of Torquatus. But he tarnished his glory by a judicial act of unparalleled severity. Contrary to his express orders, that no Roman should engage in combat without command, out of the ranks, his son, remembering his father's victory, accepted a challenge from one of the chiefs of the enemy. He came off victorious, and laid his trophies at his father's feet. He turned reluctantly from his son, gave him the crown of victory, and immediately ordered the victor to execute upon him the punishment of his disobedience. This gave great disgust to the Romans, and on account of his severity, all edicts of extreme rigor were called "Manliana Edicta." He held the consulship in the Latin war, B.C. 360.

MANLIUS, MARCUS, a brave, ambitious warrior of Rome, who saved the capitol, B.C. 390, when attacked by the Gauls, under Brennus, and received the surname of CAPITOLINUS, for his services on that occasion. The people looked up to him as the greatest benefactor, but his restless spirit led him to ambitious enterprises, on a charge of which he was condemned to death, and thrown from the Tarpeian rock, B.C. 383.

MANNERS, ROBERT WILLIAM, lord; born in 1791; and died, at Belvoir Castle, November 15, 1865. Lord Manners entered the army as a cornet in the 10th dragoons, in 1798, and by degrees rose to the rank of a major-general, which he attained in 1830. He was an extra aid-de-camp and an intimate friend of the duke of Wellington, under whom he served throughout the whole Peninsular war; and he was present at the field of Waterloo, where he received a severe wound, which he concealed till the fate of the day was decided. He first entered parliament in 1802, for the borough of Scarborough; and was subsequently returned for Leicestershire many times, the northern division of which county he represented at the time of his death.

MANNI, DOMINIC MARIA, an eminent Italian historian, was born at Florence, in DELIBERATE BEFORE YOU PROMISE: FOR A MAN PROMISE SETS INCINATION AT VARIANCE WITH JUSTICE.

LET YOUR INCLINATION BE TO THOSE WHO ADVISE, RATHER THAN TO THOSE WHO TRAVE YOUR CONDUCT.

1690; and died, in his 98th year, in 1768. His principal works are, "A Series of Florentine Senators," 3 vols. folio; "De Florentinis Inventis Commentarium;" "Illustrations of the Decameron of Boccaccio;" "Observations on the Seals of the Lower Age," 30 vols. 4to.; which is esteemed a highly valuable compilation of records and notices of the persons who acted a great part in the history of Florence, and other leading cities in Italy; a "History of Florence;" "Le Veglie l'acevoli, or the Lives of the most famous and entertaining Tuscans," 4 vols.; "The Life of Nicholas Trucio of Denmark;" and "Lectures on Italian Eloquence."

MANNING, OWEN, an English antiquary and topographer, was a native of Northamptonshire; was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; entered into orders, and became a prebendary of Lincoln, and vicar of Godalming. His principal literary labours are, "Dictionarium Saxonicæ et Gothico-Latinnæ, auctore Edvardo Lye, editio: et auxit D.M.," 2 vols. folio, and the "History and Antiquities of Surrey;" published posthumously, by Mr. Bray, in 3 vols. folio. He died, aged 80, in 1801.

MANSART, FRANCIS, a French architect; born, 1598; died, 1666. He built several churches, and other public structures at Paris.—His nephew, JULIUS-HENRIQUE MANSART, was also an excellent architect, and the superintendent of the royal edifices. He built the palaces of Versailles, Marly, and the Great Trianon; the Hospital of the Invalids, &c.

MANSFELD, ERNEST OF, a distinguished military officer of the 17th century, was the natural son of count Mansfeld, and was born at Mechlin, in 1586. He was intrepid, skilful, patient, and persevering; and the fame of his exploits will long be remembered in Germany. Died, 1626.

MANSFIELD, WILLIAM MURRAY, earl of, the fourth son of David, lord Stormont, was born at Perth, in Scotland, in 1703. He became a student at Lincoln's Inn, and, after the usual term of probation, was called to the bar, gradually making his way to eminence. In 1742 he was made solicitor-general; two years afterwards he was created chief justice of the king's bench; and in 1776 he was advanced to the dignity of an earl of Great Britain. During the riots in London, June, 1780, his house was attacked by the Anti-Catholic mob, and his valuable collection of books and manuscripts, fell a sacrifice to the fury of the multitude, by whom the mansion was burnt to the ground. He continued for some years longer to exercise his judicial functions, but resigned in 1788, and passed the remainder of his life in retirement. At the commencement of the reign of George III. he was assailed with the utmost virulence by the self-called patriots of the day, particularly in the affair of Wilkes; while Junius poured upon him a torrent of malignant slander, which he bore with dignified silence. As a politician, lord Mansfield inclined to the high maxims of Toryism, but as a judge he was acute, liberal, and disinterested. His lordship died in 1793; leaving behind him the reputation of a great lawyer, an upright man, an elegant scholar, and a sincere Christian.

MANSI, JOHN DOMINIC, a learned Italian prelate, and an indefatigable antiquary, was born at Lucca, in 1692. He was several years professor of divinity at Naples, and in 1765 was made archbishop of Lucca, where he died in 1769. His principal works are, a Latin translation of "Calmet's History of the Bible," with additions; "De Veteri et Nova Ecclesie Disciplina;" "Commentaries on the Bible," 17 vols.; an edition of "Baronius's Annals," 30 vols. folio; another of the "Councils," 30 vols.; an edition of "Æneas Sylvius's Orations," 3 vols.; and one of Fabricius's "Bibliotheca Latina mediæ et infimæ ætatis," 6 vols. 4to.

MANSTEIN, CHRISTOPHER HERMAN DE, a Russian officer, was born at Petersburg, in 1711. At the death of the czarina Anne, he was employed to arrest the Biron, for which he was rewarded with the rank of colonel, and the grant of estates, but was deprived of all by the czarina Elizabeth. He then went into the Prussian service, and died in the war of 1756. He was the author of "Memoirs of Russia," which are much esteemed.

MANTEGNA, ANDREA, an eminent painter, was born at Padua, in 1431; and studied under Squarcione. His chief residence was at Mantua, where he was much employed in oil and fresco; but he worked a great deal at Rome, and produced some admired paintings there. He had great influence on the style of his age, and distinguished himself highly in the art of perspective. Died, 1505.

MANTON, THOMAS, a nonconformist divine, was born at Lawrence Lydiard, in Somersetshire, in 1630; received his university education at Wadham-college, Oxford; and obtained the living of Stoke Newington, which he quitted for that of St. Paul, Covent-garden. At the Restoration he was made chaplain to the king, and offered the deanery of Rochester, but declined it, and was deprived of his rectory by the act of conformity. Died, 1677. His works were printed in 8 vols. folio.

MANTUAN, BAPTIST, an Italian poet, was born at Mantua, in 1448; and was a natural son of Peter Spagnuolo. After receiving an excellent education, he entered among the Carmelites, but quitted the order to devote himself to letters. He wrote eclogues and other poems; and so much was he esteemed by his countrymen at the time he lived, that they placed him next in rank to Virgil. That was, however, an honour infinitely greater than he merited. Died, 1516.

MANUEL, COMNENUS, emperor of the East, was the son of John Comnenus, and born in 1140. He was crowned in 1143, to the prejudice of Isaac, his eldest brother, whom his father had disinherited. Died, 1180.

MANUEL, PALÆOLOGUS, emperor of Constantinople, was the son and successor of John IV. He resigned his sceptre to John VII., his son, and took a religious habit. He died in 1448, aged 75.

MANUEL, PIERRE, a native of Montargis, in France, who made himself conspicuous during the progress of the revolution. In 1789 he had an office under the municipality of Paris, and was, for a time, one of the most active and dangerous enemies of royalty. He was deeply implicated in the massacres which took place in the prisons of Paris in September, 1793; but on the king's trial, he voted for his imprisonment during the continuance of the war, and his banishment afterwards. Through this and some other unpopular measures which he advocated, he was obliged to resign his seat as a deputy. He retired to Montargis; and in a few months after, he was arrested by his former associates, and sent to the guillotine, Nov. 14, 1793.

MANUEL, JACQUES ANTOINE, one of the most eloquent and intrepid defenders of French liberty, was born in 1775, at Barcelonnette, in the department of the Lower Alps. He entered as a volunteer in one of the battalions of the revolution in 1793, and rose to the rank of captain. After the peace of Campo-Formio, he quitted the army, studied law, was admitted to the bar at Aix, and soon acquired a high reputation for talent. In 1815, he was elected to the chamber of deputies which was convoked by Napoleon, and after the abdication of that monarch, strenuously contended for the rights of his son. In 1816, he was elected a member of the chamber of deputies by three departments, and became one of the most formidable opponents of the ministers. He was fervid and ardent in the cause of the party to which he had attached himself; but having used some violent expressions in his first speech, in the session of 1823, on the subject of the Spanish war, his expulsion was loudly demanded, the result of which was that a body of the gendarmes was introduced to arrest him. Manuel was again chosen to the chamber of deputies in 1824; and died in 1837.

MANUTIUS, ALDUS, or MANUZIO, ALDO, a celebrated Italian printer and author, of the 15th and 16th centuries, was born at Bassano, in 1447; became tutor to Alberto Pio, prince of Carpi; and in 1488 established a printing office at Venice. He printed numerous valuable editions of Greek and Latin classics; compiled a Greek and Latin Dictionary and Grammar; and was the inventor of the Italic character, hence called Aldine, for the exclusive use of which, for a term of years, he obtained a patent. Died, 1515.—PAOLO MANUZIO, son of the preceding, distinguished as a classic scholar, no less than as a printer, was born at Venice, in 1512, and died in 1574.—ALDO MANUZIO, the younger, was a son of PAOLO, and equally celebrated as his father and grandfather. He was born in 1547; died in 1597; and with him expired the glory of the Aldine press.

MANVEL, FRANCIS, a celebrated Portuguese lyric poet, born at Lisbon, in 1734. He was the author of many odes, and other poems; was compelled to fly from his country to avoid the inquisition; and died at Versailles, in 1821.

MAPLETOFT, Dr. JOHN, a very learned

English medical and theological writer. Born, 1631; died, 1731.

MARA, ELIZABETH, a celebrated public singer, whose maiden name was Schmelting, was born in 1750, at Cassel, in Germany. She commenced her musical education by playing on the violin, but as she grew up, she cultivated her vocal talents, and attained an almost unrivalled degree of excellence. On her arrival at Berlin she sang before Frederic the Great, and though he had previously declared that he should as soon expect pleasure from the neighing of a horse as from a German singer, yet he was soon convinced of the excellence of the fair vocalist, whom he put to the test, by selecting the most difficult airs in his collection, which she executed at sight, with the utmost facility. She afterwards visited Italy, Switzerland, England, France, and Russia. Madame Mara left England in 1802, and went to reside in Russia; and when that country was invaded by Napoleon in 1812, she became a sufferer, in consequence of the destruction of her property at the conquest of Moscow. About the beginning of 1820 she revisited England, and gave a concert at the Opera-house; but age had weakened her powers, and this once matchless singer exhibited only the relics of her former greatness. She died at Revel, in 1833, aged 82.

MARACCI, JOHN, an historical painter, was born at Lucca, in 1637. His figures were elegantly disposed, and his colouring agreeable. Died, 1704.

MARACCI, LOUIS, a learned ecclesiastic and orientalist, was born at Lucca, in 1612. He acquired a great reputation by his edition of the Koran, printed at Padua, in Arabic and Latin, in 1698, 2 vols. folio. He also assisted in publishing the Arabic Bible, 3 vols. folio, at Rome. Died, 1760.

MARALDI, JAMES PHILIP, a celebrated mathematician, was born in the county of Nice, in 1663. He was employed under Cassini, in constructing the great meridian through France, and died in 1739, leaving behind him a valuable catalogue of the fixed stars.

MARANA, JOHN PAUL, the author of the "Turkish Spy," was born at Genoa, in 1642; and died in 1693.

MARAT, JOHN PAUL, one of those monsters which nature rarely produces, was born in 1744, at Blandy, in the province of Neuchâtel, in Switzerland. In his youth he applied himself to the study of medicine and anatomy; and, settling in Paris, attracted notice as an empiric and vendor of medicines. But his ambition led him to desire a more extensive popularity, and he wrote a work which had for its title, "Man, or Principles and Laws, showing the influence of the Soul and the Body, in their relations to each other." He also published a daily paper, called "L'ami du Peuple," in which he disseminated his venomous hatred towards royalty, while he insulted the nobility, the members of the legislative body, and the most distinguished of the national assembly. Having by every means that a diabolical invention could suggest, corrupted the minds of the populace, this wretch became president of the assembly of deputies in Paris, and in that capacity satisfied his thirst for human blood. He also denounced the generals of the French army as traitors to their country, and next put the members of the convention under arrest. It was at this time that Charlotte Corday resolved to rid the world of its greatest monster, and he was stabbed by this enthusiastic young female, July, 1793.—(See CORDAY.) In appearance he was ill-shaped, low of stature, and, it is said, with features so disgusting, as to excite the fears of children; while such was his cowardice, that he spent his nights in a cave, lest his daily acts should draw upon him the just vengeance his malice excited. Danton and Robespierre granted him their protection secretly, but even they dared not be seen with him in public.

MARATTI, CARLO, an eminent painter, was born in 1625, at Camerino, in the papal territory. He became an early pupil of Andrea Sacchi; and on account of his habit of painting female saints, was nicknamed by Salvator Rosa, Caricaccio della Madonna. He was also a good architect and an engraver; was knighted by Clement XI., who gave him a pension. Died in 1713. His daughter, MARIA, who married J. B. Zappi, was also a good artist and a poetess.

MARBECK, JOHN, a musician of the 16th century, supposed to have been the first composer of the cathedral service of the church of England. He was organist at St. George's chapel, Windsor; and author of a "Concordance of the Bible," "The Lives of the Saints, Prophets, and Patriarchs," &c.

MARCEAU, FRANCIS SEVERIN DESORAYERS, an eminent French general, distinguished alike for his military talents and his virtues, was born at Chartres, in 1769. His skill, courage, and humanity, were attested in La Vendée, at Fleurus, and on the Rhine; and fell at Hochsteinbach, in 1798. He was buried in the entrenched camp of Coblenz; and such was the respect paid to him by both friends and enemies, that the Austrian and French armies joined in honouring the ceremony by volleys of artillery.

MARCELLO, BENEDETTO, son of a Venetian senator, was born in 1696, and became a great proficient in the science of music. His "Psalms," adapted, in English, to suitable words, is an elaborate work, in 8 vols. folio. Died, in 1739.

MARCELLUS, M. CLAUDIUS, the first Roman general who successfully encountered Hannibal, in the second Punic war. Soon after the fatal battle of Cannæ, he was sent against that distinguished commander, and forced the Carthaginians to retreat, with a loss. He afterwards went to Sicily, where the siege of Syracuse was his most remarkable achievement. Marcellus fell in a sanguinary battle with his former opponent, B.C. 209, when Hannibal caused the body to be burnt with distinguished honours, and sent the ashes to his son, in a costly urn.

MARCEY, ALEXANDER, an eminent physician and natural philosopher, was born at Geneva, in 1770; studied at Edinburgh; and settled in London, where he obtained great reputation as a medical practitioner and public lecturer. He was naturalized in England in 1802, but returned to his own country in 1814, and was so well received that he determined on making it his future residence. In 1822 he visited his friends in London, and was about to take his departure, when he died. He was the author of "An Essay on the Chemical History of Calculi," and of many valuable papers in the Philosophical Transactions, &c.

MARCILIUS, THEODORUS, a learned German, was born at Arnheim, in 1548, and died in 1617. He published Pythagoras's Golden Verses, with a Latin version and commentaries, and also some works of his own, as "Historia Strearum," &c.

MARCION, a heretic of the second century, was a native of Synope, on the Euxine. He espoused the notions of Cerdo, to which he added the doctrine of Manes, and some peculiarities of his own.

MARDONIUS, the son-in-law of Darius, and the general of Xerxes. He was slain at the battle of Platæa, B.C. 479.

MARE, NICHOLAS DE LA, principal magistrate of the Chatelet under Louis XIV., who employed him in several important concerns, particularly during the scarcity of corn which prevailed in France. He was the author of an elaborate work on the police, in 4 vols. folio; and died in 1723.

MARE, PHILIBERT DE LA, was a counsellor in the parliament of Dijon, and an elegant Latin writer. He published several works, the chief of which are the "Historicum Burgundie conspectus," and "Commentarius de Bello Burgundie conspectus." Died, 1687.

MARECHAL, GEORGE, an eminent French surgeon, was born at Calais, in 1658. He was distinguished by his skill in lithotomy, and in 1696 attended Louis XIV., who had an abscess in his neck. He became principal surgeon to that monarch, who appointed him maitre de hotel, and gave him a patent of nobility. Died, 1736.

MARECHAL, PETER SYLVANUS, a French writer, born at Paris, in 1750, and brought up to the bar, which he quitted for literary pursuits, and became a voluminous author, though not one of great note. Died, 1805.

MARETS, SAMUEL DE, was a native of Picardy, and surnamed "The Little Preacher," from his diminutive stature. He was an eminent controversialist of the reformed church in the 17th century, and from his erudition and ability made a distinguished figure among the polemics of the day. He wrote a variety of theological works, particularly an excellent "System of Divinity." Died, 1663.

MARGARET OF ANJOU, daughter of René d'Anjou, king of Naples, and wife of Henry VI., king of England, was an ambitious, enterprising, courageous woman. Intrepid in the field, she signalized herself by heading her troops in several battles against the house of York; and if she had not been the instrument of her husband's misfortunes, by putting to death the duke of Gloucester, his uncle, her name would have been immortalized for the fortitude, activity, and policy with which she supported the rights of her husband and son. The fatal defeat at Tewkesbury, however, put an end to all her enterprises; the king being taken prisoner, and prince Edward, their only son, basely murdered, by Richard, duke of York. Margaret was ransomed by her father for 50,000 crowns, and died in Anjou, 1483.

MARGARET OF VALOIS, queen of Naples, and sister to Francis I., king of France, was the daughter of Charles of Orleans, duke of Angouleme, and born in 1492. In 1509 she married Charles duke of Alençon, who died in 1525. Her next husband was Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, by whom she had Joan d'Albret, mother of Henry IV. She wrote a tract, entitled, "The Mirror of the Sinful Soul," which was condemned as heretical by the Sorbonne. Besides the above work, she wrote poetical pieces, under the title of "Marguerites de la Marguerite des Princesses très illustre Reine de Navarre." A volume of tales, entitled "Heptameron, ou sept Journees de la Reine de Navarre," which were written by her during the gaiety of youth, are as free in their tendency as those of Boccaccio; and it certainly, at the present day, appears somewhat extraordinary that a princess so pious and contemplative as Margaret of Valois should be their author. Died, 1549.

MARGARET OF FRANCE, queen of Navarre, daughter of Henry II., was born in 1552, and ranked as one of the greatest beauties of her age, with talents and accomplishments corresponding to the charms of her person. She married Henry, then prince of Bearne, but afterwards king of France. On his accession to that throne, he proposed to dissolve their marriage; to which she consented on condition of receiving a suitable pension, and, having returned to Paris, lived in great splendour and dissipation, till her death, in 1615, at the age of sixty-three. Some very agreeable poems by her are extant, and her "Mémoires" are extremely curious.

MARGARITONE, an Italian painter, was born at Arezzo, in 1190. He invented the art of gilding with leaf gold upon Armenian bole, and painted historical subjects in fresco and distemper. Died, 1775.

MARGON, WILLIAM DE, a French ecclesiastic, who died in 1760. His principal works are, "Memoirs of Marshal Villars," 3 vols.; "Memoirs of the duke of Berwick," 2 vols.; and "Memoirs of Tourville," 3 vols.

MARGRAAF, ANDREW SIGISMUND, an eminent chemist, and director of the academy of Berlin, was born in that city in 1709. He applied assiduously to mineralogy, which science he enriched by the discovery of the semi-metal, called manganese. He also made several important discoveries in chemistry, among which are the formic acid and beet sugar. Died, 1782.

MARIA THERESA, queen of Hungary and Bohemia, archduchess of Austria, and empress of Germany, daughter of the emperor Charles VI., was born at Vienna, 1717, and, in 1736, married duke Francis Stephen of Lorraine, who, in 1737, became grand-duke of Tuscany. The day after her father's death, she ascended the throne of Hungary, Bohemia, and Austria, and declared her husband joint ruler. The elector, Charles Albert of Bavaria, supported by France, laid claim to the Austrian hereditary territories, and the electors of Cologne and the Palatins would likewise not acknowledge her succession. In the meanwhile Maria Theresa threw herself upon her Hungarian subjects; to whom, with her child in her arms, she made this pathetic address: "Abandoned by my friends, persecuted by my enemies, attacked by my nearest relations, I have no other resource than in your fidelity, your courage, and your constancy; I commit to your hands the child of your king." The youth, the beauty, and the misfortune of the queen made a deep impression. The magistrates drew their sabres, and exclaimed, "Moriatur pro rege nostro Maria Theresa." Till then she had preserved a calm, majestic demeanour; but their fidelity and courage overcame her feelings, and she gave way to them in tears. The troops furnished by Hungary, by their mode of warfare and their ferocity, spread terror through the German and French armies. In the meantime the allies quarrelled among themselves; and the king of Prussia made a separate peace with her. The general opinion that the balance of Europe depended upon the continuance of the house of Austria, induced England to arm for Maria Theresa; Holland paid her subsidies; and after the death of cardinal Fleury, in 1743, the cause of Austria triumphed throughout Europe. Reverses, however, followed; and all the belligerents having become desirous of peace, that of Aix-la-Chapelle was at length concluded in 1748, by which Maria Theresa was secured in her rights. In 1756 this calm was disturbed by the king of Prussia, who marched into Saxony and Bohemia. Marshal Brown opposed him under the walls of Prague, but being wounded, he was obliged to retire into that city, which was immediately bombarded. Count Daun, however, forced the Prussians to raise the siege, by gaining the victory of Chotzemitz. In 1765 her husband, the emperor Francis, died, which caused her deep and lasting distress. In 1772 she joined the king of Prussia and the empress Catharine in the dismemberment of Poland. By the death of Maximilian Joseph, elector of Bavaria, in 1777, war was rekindled between Austria and Prussia, but was terminated in 1779, by the peace of Teschen, which added to the former state a small portion of Bavaria. Maria Theresa founded and improved schools, universities, and academies, and granted prizes to the students. She rewarded, also, those who made any important improvements in the art, and turned her attention particularly to agriculture, which was delineated upon a medal that she caused to be struck. She also reformed many abuses in the church; suppressed the Inquisition at Milan; abolished the order of Jesuits, and prohibited the admission of individuals of both sexes as members of convents before the age of twenty-five years. She also abolished the rack in all her states, and died in 1760, aged 63, with a just claim to the reputation of many royal and domestic virtues.

MARIANA, JUAN DE, a celebrated Spanish historian, was born at Talavera, in 1536; entered the society of Jesuits, and was successively professor of theology in their colleges at Rome and at Paris. His chief work, "Historia de Rebus Hispaniæ," entitles him to an honourable place among historical writers; but his treatise, "De Rege," in which he maintains the justice of killing a tyrant, excited great clamour, and was publicly burnt by order of the parliament of Paris. Died, 1621.

MARIGNAN, JOHN JAMES MEDICINO, marquis de, a celebrated commander, was born at Milan, in the beginning of the 16th century. Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, employed him and another officer to murder Visconti, a Milanese nobleman; after which he determined to sacrifice the two instruments, lest he should be discovered as the author of the assassination. The one perished, but Medicino escaped, and obtained the government of Musso. In 1528 he entered into the service of the emperor, and exchanged Musso for Marignan. In 1534 he defeated the French, commanded by marshal Strozzi, in Tuscany, and took the city of Siena, where he committed horrible cruelties. Died, 1556.

MARINI, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian poet, was born at Naples, in 1569. He was bred to the law, which he abandoned for literature; but his life and conduct proved very irregular. While at Turin he had a quarrel with Murtola, a rival poet, who stabbed him, but not mortally. On his recovery, he went to France, where he was patronized by Mary de' Medici; and in 1622 he became president of the Umoristi at Rome. His principal poem is an heroic, entitled "Adone," but he wrote many others. Died, 1625.

MARINO, Sr., a native of Dalmatia, in the fourth century. He was originally a workman employed in building the bridge of Rimini, but his piety having been noticed by the bishop of Brescia, he was made a deacon, and he retired to a hermitage on Mount Titano, where he died. The miracles said to be wrought at the tomb of this ci-devant stone-mason brought a crowd of pilgrims to the spot; houses were built to receive them, an independent community was formed; and thus rose into existence the republic of San Marino, which is the smallest state in Europe.

MARIOTTE, EDMUND, a French mathematician, and experimental philosopher, born at Dijon; became a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, in 1666; and died in 1684. He was a great experimentalist on the motion of fluids, the nature of vision, and the constitution of the air. Among his works are "An Essay on Physics;" treatises on "The Pressure and Motion of Fluids;" the "Movement of Pendulums," &c.

MARIUS, CAIUS, a celebrated Roman general and demagogue, who was seven times consul. He first distinguished himself at the siege of Numantia; afterwards went to Africa as lieutenant to the consul Metellus; superseded his commander, and obtained the consulship himself, when he subdued Jugurtha, king of Numidia, whom he conducted in triumph to Rome. After this he served against the Cimbri and other barbarous nations, who had poured their myriads into Italy. With a very inferior force he completely routed them, for which a pyramid was erected to his honour. But he furnished the glory of his victories by the basest cruelties to the vanquished, especially the women. In his sixth consulate he had Sylla for his rival, who marched to Rome with his army, and a civil war commenced to decide their superiority. Defeated by his rival, Marius wandered about on the coasts of Italy, and, after escaping several times, was found by some horsemen in a marsh. He was conducted naked to Minturnæ, where the magistrate, after some deliberation, resolved to obey the orders of the senate and of Sylla. But the Cimbrian slave, to whom the execution was entrusted, awed by the look and words of Marius, dropped his sword, and the people of Minturnæ, moved with compassion, conducted him to the coast, whence a vessel conveyed him to Africa. Here he remained till his party had once more triumphed in Italy, when he was recalled by Cinna and Sertorius, who making themselves masters of Rome, a terrible proscription took place. Marius enjoyed the dignity of consul for the seventh time, 86 B.C., and died shortly after, aged 80.

MARIUS, THE YOUNGER, had all the ferocious character of his father. He usurped the consular dignity A.C. 82, but was defeated by Sylla, and slew himself at Pre-neste.

MARIUS, MARCUS AURELIUS, a smith and common soldier in the reign of Gallienus, who raised himself to a supreme command in the army, and on the death of Victorinus ascended the imperial throne, but was slain shortly after by a soldier.

MARIVAUX, PETER CARLET DE CHAMBLAIN DE, a celebrated dramatist and novelist, was born at Paris, in 1658. His father, who was director of the mint at Rion, gave him an excellent education, and his own talents and social merits gained him many friends. The drama first attracted his attention, and he was the author of about thirty pieces; but it is as a novelist that he is chiefly known to the world of letters. Of these, "Le Paysan Parvenu," "Marianne," and "Le Philosophe Indigent," are accounted the principal. He also wrote "Le Spectateur François," &c. His works are distinguished by their moral tendency, and his private character was of the most amiable kind. Died, 1763.

MARKHAM, GENYASE, an English author, who lived in the reigns of James I. and Charles I. and who served as a captain in the royal army during the civil wars. He was born at Gotham, in Nottinghamshire, but the exact time of his birth and death is unknown. He wrote "Herod and Antipater," a tragedy, besides several poems; but he was chiefly noted for his treatises on hawking, husbandry, horsemanship, the diseases of cattle, &c.

MERIT, LIKE A VIRGIN'S BLUSHES, IS MOST DISCOVERED WHEN IT LABOURS MOST TO BE CONCEALED.

MEN ARE NOT APT TO ENVY THE GOOD QUALITIES OF OTHERS, WHO HAVE MANY OF THEIR OWN.

MARKLAND, ABRAHAM, a divine and poet, was born in London, in 1645; was educated at St. John's college, Oxford; obtained a prebend at Winchester in 1679; was afterwards master of the hospital of St. Cross; and died in 1720.

MARKLAND, JEREMIAH, an eminent critic and classical scholar, was born at Childwall, in Lancashire, in 1693; was educated at Christ's Hospital, and Peterhouse, Cambridge; and died at Dorking, Surrey, in 1776. His principal works are, an edition of the "Sylva," of Statius; "Remarks on the Epistles of Cicero to Brutus," and of Brutus to Cicero; with a Dissertation on four Orations ascribed to Cicero; "De Græcorum quinta Declinatione imparisyllabica, et inde formata Latinarum tertia."

MARLBOROUGH, JOHN CHURCHILL, duke of, was the son of Sir Winston Churchill, of Ashe, in Devonshire, where he was born, in 1650. At the age of twelve years he was taken from school to be a page to the duke of York, who, in 1666, gave him a pair of colours in the Guards. His first service was at the siege of Tangier; and, at his return to England, he became the favourite of the duchess of Cleveland, who gave him 5000*l.*, with which he purchased an annuity for life. He served afterwards under the great Turenne, and distinguished himself so gallantly at the siege of Maestricht, that the king of France publicly thanked him at the head of the regiment. On his return to England he was made lieutenant-colonel, gentleman of the bed-chamber, and master of the robes to the duke of York, whom he attended to Holland and Scotland; and about this time he married Miss Jennings, maid of honour to the princess, afterwards queen Anne. In 1682 he was shipwrecked with the duke of York, in their passage to Scotland. The same year he was made a peer, by the title of baron Eyemouth; and when James came to the crown, he was sent to France to notify the event. In 1685 he was created lord Churchill, of Sandridge. The same year he suppressed Monmouth's rebellion, and took him prisoner. He continued to serve king James with great fidelity, till the arrival of the prince of Orange, who created him earl of Marlborough in 1689, and appointed him commander-in-chief of the English army in the Low Countries. He next served in Ireland, and reduced Cork, Kinsale, and other strong places. But in 1692, he was suddenly dismissed from his employments, and committed to the Tower, on suspicion, not wholly groundless, of plotting to restore the exiled monarch. After the death of queen Mary he was restored to favour; and at the close of that reign he had the command of the English forces in Holland, and was appointed ambassador extraordinary to the States, who chose him captain-general of their forces. Yet his splendid course of glory appeared now only to begin. On the commencement of queen Anne's reign, he recommended a war with France and Spain, which advice was adopted. In the campaign of 1702, he took a number of strong towns, particularly Liege; and, returning to England the following winter, received the thanks of both houses, and a dukedom. In 1704, he joined prince Eugene, with whom he encountered the French and Bavarians at Hochstedt, and obtained a complete victory, taking marshal Tallard prisoner, whom he afterwards brought to England, with 26 other officers of rank, 121 standards, and 179 colours. He again received the thanks of parliament, and the grant of the manor of Woodstock, with the hundred of Wotton. On the 12th of May, 1706, he fought the famous battle of Ramillies, which accelerated the fall of Louvain, Brussels, and other important places; and arriving in England in November, received fresh honours and grants from the queen and parliament. A bill was passed to settle the titles upon the male and female issue of his daughters; and a pension of 5000*l.* a-year granted him out of the post office. In 1709 he defeated marshal Villars, at Malplaquet; for which victory a general thanksgiving was solemnized. In the winter of 1711, he returned to England, and soon after, through party intrigues, was dismissed from all his employments. To add to this unjust treatment, a prosecution was commenced against him for applying the public money to his private purposes. Stung at this ingratitude, he went into voluntary banishment, accompanied by his duchess, and remained abroad till 1714, when he landed at Dover amidst the acclamations of the people. Queen Anne was just dead, and her successor restored the duke to his military appointments; but his infirmities increasing, he retired from public employment; and died at Windsor lodge, in 1722.

MARLOE, or MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER, an eminent poet and dramatist of the Elizabethan age, was educated at Cambridge; afterwards settled in London, and became an actor, as well as a writer for the stage. Besides six tragedies of his own composition, and one written jointly with Nashe, he left translations from Ovid, Lucan, and others. His powers as a tragic writer were of a high order, and some passages in his plays are fraught with exquisite beauty. He is said to have met his death, about the year 1593, from the hand of a servant man, whom he had attacked on suspicion of being rivalled by him in the favours of a mistress.

MARMION, SHAKERLEY, a dramatic writer, was born at Aythoe, in Northamptonshire, about 1602; was educated at Wadham-college, Oxford; entered the army; and died in 1639. He wrote four comedies, and "Cupid and Psyche," a poem.

MARMONTEL, JOHN FRANCIS, a distinguished French writer, born in 1723, at Bort, in the Limousin, was the eldest son of a large family, in humble life; and was educated in the Jesuits' college at Mauriac. He first settled at Toulouse, but being persuaded by Voltaire to try his fortune at Paris, he went there in 1743. By his tragedies of "Dionysius," and "Aristomenes," and other popular works, he soon gained reputation; and being patronized by Madame de Pompadour, he received the appointment of secretary to the royal buildings. Soon after, he became connected with D'Alembert and Diderot, in the Encyclopédie. He also had a share in the "Mercurius François," in which his "Tales" first appeared; but having written a satire on the duke D'Aumont, he was sent to the Bastille; from which, however, he was liberated in a few days; and in 1763 he obtained a place in the academy, of which he afterwards became perpetual secretary. In the early part of his career he indulged in all the licentiousness of Parisian life; but he at length married, and conducted himself with sense and propriety. He survived the horrors of the Revolution, having, when the political horizon darkened, retired to a cottage in Normandy, where he passed his time in the education of his children, and the composition of a series of tales; together with the amusing Memoirs of his own life. In 1797 he was chosen a representative to the National Assembly for the department of the Eure; but his election being subsequently declared null, he again retired to his cottage, where he died, of apoplexy, in 1799, aged 76. His "Moral Tales;" "Belisarius;" "The Incas;" his own "Memoirs;" and "Elements of Literature," are his most esteemed works; and though as a poet and dramatist he has of late been somewhat disparaged, he still justly holds a high place among modern French authors; and there are few who have more successfully addressed themselves to the imagination, the judgment, or the heart.

MARNIX, PHILIP DE, seigneur du Mont Saint-Aldegonde, was born at Brussels, in 1638. He was a zealous disciple of Calvin, and, being appointed consul at Antwerp, bravely defended that city against the duke of Parma. Among other works, he wrote "The Bee-Hive of the Romish Church," "Controversial Theses," &c.; and drew up the form of the celebrated confederacy, by which several lords of the Netherlands engaged to oppose the Inquisition.

MAROT, CLEMENT, an eminent French poet, was born at Cahors, in 1495. Having accompanied the duke of Alençon to Italy, he was wounded and taken prisoner at the battle of Pavia; was afterwards persecuted for his attachment to the Protestant religion; and died in 1544. As a poet he was superior to any of his countrymen who had gone before him, and greatly excelled all his contemporaries.

MAROT, FRANCIS, a painter, was the pupil of La Fosse, and an associate and professor of the French academy of painting. He died at Paris in 1719, aged 52.

MARPURG, FREDERIC WILLIAM, an eminent German musician, born in 1718. He was the author of many valuable works connected with musical science, some of which are of the most erudite character. Died, 1795.

MARSAIS, CÉSAR CHESNEAU DU, an eminent French writer on various branches of the belles lettres, was born at Marseilles, in 1676. He first entered into the congregation of the Oratory, but quitted it and became an advocate. This he afterwards relinquished, and betook himself to the instruction of youth: he also gave lectures in private, and employed his pen for his support. His works are "An Explanation of the Doctrine of the Gallican Church;" "Method of learning Latin;" a "Treatise on Tropes;" "Logic, or Reflections on the Operations of the Mind," &c. Died, 1756.

MARSDEN, WILLIAM, D.C.L., F.R.S., &c., an orientalist and antiquary, was born in 1754, at Verval, in the county of Wicklow, and went to India at an early age. He contributed many interesting papers printed in the Philosophical Transactions, and the Archæologia, upon subjects connected with the history and learning of Asiatic nations; and among the separate works he published, are, a "History of the Island of Sumatra;" a "Dictionary and Grammar of the Malayan Language;" "Numismata Orientalia Illustrata;" "The Travels of Marco Polo," &c. In 1795 he was appointed second secretary to the Admiralty; and it is worthy of note, that, some years before his death, he voluntarily resigned a pension of 1500*l.* a year, which had been bestowed on him as a reward for his public services. He also presented his valuable collection of Oriental coins to the British Museum, and his extensive library to King's college, London. Since the death of lord Stowell, he was the senior member of the literary club founded by Dr. Johnson, Edmund Burke, and Sir Joshua Reynolds. He died, aged 81, in October, 1836.

MARSH, NARCISSEUS, a learned prelate, who to much learning and piety, added the greatest munificence and private charity. He was born at Hannington, in Wiltshire, in 1638; was appointed principal of Alban hall, in 1673; but in 1678 he went to Ireland, and was made provost of Trinity college, Dublin, to which he presented a valuable library. He was successively bishop of Leighlin and Ferns, Cashel, Dublin, and Armagh. He was the author of "Manuductio ad Logicam;" "Institutiones Logicæ;" and an "Essay on the Doctrine of Sounds." Died, 1703.

MARSHAL, ANDREW, a physician, was born in Fifehire, in 1742. After studying at Glasgow and Edinburgh, he became a regimental surgeon, and at the conclusion of the peace took his doctor's degree, commenced lecturer in anatomy, and obtained considerable eminence in his profession. He died in London in 1813. After his death was published his treatise on "The Morbid Anatomy of the Brain," with his Life prefixed.

MARSHAL, WALTER, a nonconformist minister. He was ejected from the living of Hursley, in Hampshire, in 1662; after which he officiated to a dissenting congregation at Gosport. He died about 1690. His book entitled "The Gospel Mystery of Sanctification," printed first in 1692, was reprinted with a commendatory preface by Harvey, author of "The Meditations."

MARSHALL, THOMAS, an English divine, was born at Barkley, in Leicestershire, about 1621, and died in 1685. On the ruin of the Royal cause he withdrew to the continent; but obtained considerable ecclesiastical preferment at the Restoration. He was the author of "Observationes in Evangeliorum Versiones per antiquas duas, scilicet, Gothicas et Anglo Saxonicas."

MARSHALL, NATHANIEL, an English divine of the 18th century, who was chaplain to George II. and published "The Works of St. Cyprian," "A Defence of our Constitution in Church and State," and three volumes of "Sermons."

MARSHALL, WILLIAM, a distinguished modern writer on agricultural and rural economy. He performed a series of journeys through various parts of the kingdom to procure intelligence concerning the modes of cultivation and management among the farmers in different districts and counties. Among his works are, "Minutes of Agriculture," "Planting and Rural Ornament," "The Rural Economy of the Midland, Southern, and Western Counties," and "Experiments and Observations concerning Agriculture and the Weather." He also aided in the formation of the Board of Agriculture, and made an abstract or review of its "Reports." Born, 1745; died, at Pickering, in Yorkshire, 1818.

MARSHAM, Sir JOHN, a learned writer on ancient history and chronology, was the son of a London alderman, and born in 1602; was educated at Westminster, and St. John's college, Oxford; was a student at the Middle Temple, and was made one of the six clerks in chancery, which place he lost, and suffered greatly in his private estate for his attachment to the cause of royalty during the civil wars. At the accession of Charles II., however, he recovered his office, was knighted, became M.P. for Rochester, and was afterwards created a baronet. His principal work, "Canon Chronicus Ægyptiacus, Ebraicus, Græcus," displays much erudition and ingenuity. Died, 1665.

MARSIGLI, Louis FERDINAND, an Italian writer, was born in 1658, of a noble family, at Bologna. He served with great reputation in the imperial army, but was taken prisoner at the passage of the Raab, and sent to Bosnia. The year following he was ransomed, obtained a colonel's commission, and was afterwards advanced to the rank of marshal; but when the count d'Arco was condemned, for giving up the fortress of Brisac to the duke of Burgundy, Marsigli, who commanded under him, was dismissed the service. He then retired to Bologna, where he formed a museum, and founded the Institute. His most important work is entitled "Danubius Pannonico-Nisicus," 8 vols. folio; he also wrote "A History of the Sea," and "The Military State of the Ottoman Empire." Died, 1730.

MARSTON, JOHN, an English dramatist, who lived in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., and was upon terms of intimacy with Ben Jonson. He was educated at Oxford; became lecturer at the Middle Temple; and died subsequently to 1633. He wrote eight plays, and three books of satires, called the "Scourge of Villany."

MARSY, FRANCIS MARIA DE, a French writer, was expelled the society of Jesuits on account of his opinions; and he was also sent to the Bastille for publishing an "Analysis of Bayle," in which he selected the worst part of that author's dictionary. His other works are, a "History of Mary Stuart," 3 vols.; "Dictionary of Painting and Architecture," 2 vols.; "Le Rabelais Moderne," 8 vols.; "The Modern History," intended as a continuation to Rolin's Ancient History, 26 vols. He also wrote two Latin poems, one on painting, and the other on tragedy. Died, 1763.

MARTELLI, PETER JAMES, an eminent Italian poet, was born at Bologna, in 1665; was at first a professor of belles lettres in the university there, and afterwards secretary to cardinal Aldrovandi. His works consist of several discourses on the art of poetry, "Dialogues on Ancient and Modern Tragedy;" and "Tragedies," in 3 vols. Died, 1727.

MARTHA, SISTER.—ANNE BIGNET, known as Sister Martha, had, previous to 1792, spent many years in a convent at Besançon, as portress, and at that time retired on a pension of 153 francs, and a small dwelling-house, where she resided with another female, devoting their time to the wants of the necessitous. They sought the wounded after an engagement, and by their humane exertions, saved numerous lives. The Spanish prisoners partook largely of their charity; and when they quitted Besançon, the English troops succeeded them in the care and attentions of the good Sister Martha, who declared, the unhappy of all countries were her friends. In the campaign of 1814, though Martha was nearly 70 years of age, yet her energy and activity seemed to receive a new impulse; and the powerful assistance she rendered the wounded French and allied soldiers, caused the duke of Reggion to say to her, "Sister Martha, I was made acquainted with your character on the field of battle, for there I continually heard the wounded exclaim, 'If the good Sister Martha were here, our sufferings would be relieved.'" While blessings followed the name. When the allied sovereigns met in Paris, each was desirous to see this extraordinary woman; nor did they forget to reward her virtues. The emperor of Russia gave her a valuable gold medal, and a sum of money; the emperor of Austria gave her the cross with the order of Merit, and 2000 francs; and the kings of France and Spain also sent her medals, and each added a present of money. Martha had no other ambition than that of doing good; but she rejoiced in her fortune, as it gave her more ample means to exercise her charitable disposition; and she died, regretted and esteemed, at Besançon, in 1824.

MARTIAL, or MARCUS VALERIUS MARTIALIS, a Latin poet, and the most celebrated of all epigrammatists, was a native of Spain, but went to Rome in his 20th year, and obtained the favour of Domitian, who conferred on him many favours, and raised him to the office of tribune. On the death of that emperor he returned to his native country, where he died, A.D. 104.

MARTIGNAC, STEPHEN ALGAI, Sieur DE, a French writer, who translated Terence, Horace, Juvenal, Persius, Virgil, and Ovid into prose, and wrote the "Lives of the Bishops of Paris," of the 17th century. Born, 1628; died, 1699.

room for Polignac, to whom he was politically opposed; yet when that minister was on his trial, before the Chamber of Peers, he was his eloquent and zealous defender. Died, 1832.

MARTIN, ST., was born of heathen parents, in 316, at Sabaria, in Pannonia, now Hungary. He served in the army some years; but being converted to Christianity, he embraced a religious life, and appeared as the model of all virtue. In 374 he was made bishop of Tours, but still retained the simplicity and austerity of the recluse. He erected the monastery of Marmontier, and is considered as the apostle of the Gauls: Died, 397.

MARTIN, DAVID, a French protestant divine, was born at Revel, in the diocese of Lavaur, in 1639. On the revocation of the edict of Nantes, he became pastor of a church at Utrecht, where he died in 1721. He wrote a "History of the Old and New Testament," 2 vols. fol.; and a "Treatise on Revealed Religion," 2 vols. 8vo.

MARTIN, RAYMOND, a Spanish monk of the Dominican order, who wrote an excellent Treatise against the Jews, printed at Paris in 1651, with the title of "Pugio fidei Christianæ." Died 1286.

MARTIN, THOMAS, an English antiquary, was born at Thetford, in Suffolk, in 1697. He wrote "Monumenta Anglicana, a History of Thetford," and was familiarly called "Honest Tom Martin, of Palgrave," where he long resided. Died, 1771.

MARTIN, BENJAMIN, one of the most celebrated mathematicians and opticians of his time, was born at Worplesdon, in Surrey, in 1704. In early life, it is said, he worked as a common labourer, but by dint of perseverance he acquired sufficient learning to become a schoolmaster, and afterwards a lecturer on experimental philosophy. After publishing a variety of ingenious treatises on various branches of mathematical science and natural philosophy, particularly a scientific "Magazine," under his own name, and carrying on for many years a very extensive trade as an optician and globe-maker in Fleet-Street, he died, in 1782.

MARTIN, WILLIAM, a naturalist, was born in 1767, at Marsfield, in Nottinghamshire. Being deserted by his father, and left unprovided for, he took to the stage as a profession; but having married, he established himself at Burton-on-Trent, and, subsequently, at Macclesfield, as a drawing-master; where, devoting much of his time to researches in natural history, he published "Outlines of an Attempt to establish a Knowledge of Extraneous Fossils on Scientific Principles;" "Petrificata Derbiensia," &c. Died, 1810.

MARTINE, GEORGE, a physician, was born in Scotland, in 1702; took his doctor's degree at Leyden, after which he commenced practice at St. Andrew's; but in 1740, he accompanied Lord Cathcart to America, where he died in 1743. He was the author of "Tractatus de similibus animalibus, et animalium colore;" "Essays, Medical and Philosophical," &c.

MARTINI, JOHN BAPTIST, a skilful musical composer, was born at Bologna, in 1706, and died in 1784. He wrote a History of Music," 3 vols. folio; also, an "Essay on Counterpoint," &c. He was chapel master to a convent of Friars Minim; and from the school of Martini issued some of the finest composers in Italy.

MARTINI, MARTIN, a Jesuit and missionary of the 17th century, was a native of Trent. He went as a missionary to China, where he remained many years, and returned to Europe in 1651. The result of his observations are contained in his "Sinica Historiæ Decas prima à gentis origine ap Christum natum;" "China Illustrata," and "De Bello inter Tartaros et Sineses."

MARTINIERE, ANTHONY AUGUSTIN BRUGEN DE LA, a celebrated French author, was born at Dieppe, in 1684; studied at Paris; and was successively patronized by the Duke of Parma, the king of Naples, to whom he was secretary, and the king of Spain to whom he was a geographer. His principal work is entitled "Dictionnaire Geographique, Historique, et Critique," in 10 vols. folio, a work of great value and importance. He was also the author of many other highly useful works, historical and geographical. Died, 1749.

MARTOS, IVAN PETROVITCH, an eminent Russian sculptor, who was for many years director of the Academy of Fine Arts, St. Petersburg, died, April 17, 1835, aged 82. He had attained the highest excellence in his art; rivaling Canova in his draperies, and in subjects of bas-relief being superior to any of his contemporaries. Among his best works may be reckoned the colossal group in bronze of Minin and Pozharsky, at Moscow; the Emperor Alexander, at Taganrog; the duke of Richelieu at Odessa, &c.

MARTYN, JOHN, F.R.S., a skilful botanist and learned writer, was born in 1699, at London. For nearly thirty years he was professor of botany, at Cambridge; wrote many works; and died in 1768. Besides his botanical productions, he published "The Grub-street Journal," 2 vols.; "Virgil's Georgics;" a "Dissertation on the Æneid," and assisted in the abridgment of the Philosophical Transactions.

MARTYN, THOMAS, F.R.S., an eminent antiquarian and natural philosopher, the son of the preceding, was born at Chelsea, in 1736; was educated at Cambridge; and on his father's resignation in 1761, succeeded to the botanical professorship, which he held for sixty-four years; during which time he obtained valuable church preferment; and died in 1825. His philosophical writings, and those by which he is most advantageously known are, "Platæ Cantabrigienses;" "Herbationes Cantabrigienses;" "The English Connoisseur;" "The Antiquities of Herculanum;" "Elements of Natural History;" "Flora Rustica;" and an enlarged edition of "Miller's Gardener's Dictionary."

MARTYN, HENRY, an able missionary, was born in Cornwall, in 1781; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; and in 1805, went to India as a chaplain to the East India Company. When arrived in the East he distinguished himself by his

From India he proceeded to Persia, and there translated the New Testament into the Persian tongue, held several conferences with the learned Mohammedans, and converted some to Christianity. Died, 1812.

MARTYR, PETER, a celebrated reformer, whose family name was Vermigli, was born at Florence, in 1500. He was originally an Augustine monk, and became an eminent preacher, and prior of St. Fridian's, at Lucca; but having read the writings of Luther, Zuinglius, and other reformers, he renounced the Romish faith, and found it necessary to quit his native country. He then, on the invitation of Edward VI., came to England, and was made professor of divinity at Oxford, and canon of Christchurch. But in the succeeding reign he was obliged to leave the kingdom: on which he went to Switzerland, and died at Zurich, in 1562. His wife, who had been a converted nun, died at Oxford, and in the reign of Mary, her remains were taken up and buried beneath a dunghill; but when queen Elizabeth came to the throne, they were re-interred in consecrated ground. Peter Martyr was the author of many works on divinity, including commentaries on some parts of the Old and New Testament, and is said to have excelled Calvin in erudition: his personal character has also been represented as extremely amiable.

MARVELL, ANDREW, a man distinguished by his integrity as a senator, and by his wit as a political writer, was born at Kingston-upon-Hull, in 1630, and was educated at Trinity-college, Cambridge. On the death of his father he spent several years in foreign travel; was appointed secretary to the British legation at Constantinople; and on his return, in 1657, he became assistant to Milton, as Latin secretary. At the Restoration he was elected into parliament for his native place, with a salary from his constituents; and he obtained a high character for diligence, ability, and integrity. He had the character of being the wittest man of his time, and wrote a number of poetical effusions, both humorous and satirical, which were highly effective as party pieces. Among his prose tracts was one, entitled, "An Account of the Growth of Popery, and arbitrary Government in England;" on which a reward was offered for a discovery of the writer and printer. But though Marvell was obnoxious to the ministry, he was somewhat of a favourite with the king, who took great delight in his conversation. One day the lord treasurer Danby was sent to find out his lodgings, which were up two pair of stairs in a court in the Strand; and when his lordship opened the door, the patriot, evidently much surprised, told him, "he believed he had mistaken his way;" but was told by the earl, that he came from the king "to know what his majesty could do to serve him!" To which Marvell replied, that "it was not in his majesty's power to serve him." Lord Danby, finding that no argument could prevail upon him to accept a place, concluded by saying, that "the king had sent him a thousand pounds, as a mark of his private esteem." Thus also he refused without hesitation; though he was obliged, on the departure of the courtier, to send to a friend for the loan of a guinea. He died in 1678. Marvell wrote some pieces against Parker, bishop of Oxford, besides several miscellaneous poems and tracts; which together were published in 3 vols. 4to.

MARY, queen of England, daughter of Henry VIII. by Catharine of Arragon, was born in 1517. During the life of her father she experienced many marks of his brutal temper, and her inflexible opposition to his will made him sometimes form a resolution of putting her to death, from which he was diverted by archbishop Craumer. During the reign of Edward she could not be prevailed with to join in communion with the protestant divines. On this account that amiable prince declared lady Jane Grey his heir. At his death in 1553 that lady was proclaimed queen; but her reign lasted only a few days. The pertinacity of Mary became numerous, and she entered London without opposition. In 1554 she married Philip of Spain, eldest son of Charles V.; but her union with him was equally unpropitious to herself and the nation. The sanguinary laws against heretics were revived, and those shocking scenes of cruelty followed, which have fixed upon this princess the epithet of "bloody." The loss of Calais, which had been in the hands of the English 200 years, sank deep into the heart of Mary; her health rapidly declined, and she died in 1558. With her ended the domination of the papal power in England.

MARY II. queen of England, the wife of William III. was the daughter of James II. by Anne Hyde, daughter of the earl of Clarendon. At the age of 15 she was married to William, prince of Orange, whom she followed to England in 1689. The same year parliament having declared the crown vacant by the abdication of James, conferred it upon William and Mary. She died of the small-pox, in 1695, aged 32.

MARY STUART, queen of Scots, famous for her beauty, her wit, her learning, and her misfortunes, was daughter of James V. king of Scotland, and succeeded her father in 1542, eight days after her birth. In 1558 she married François, dauphin, and afterwards king of France, by which means she became queen of France. This monarch dying in 1560, she returned into Scotland, and married her cousin, Henry Stuart, lord Darnley, in 1565. Being excluded from any share of the government (as he suspected) by the advice of Rizzio, an Italian musician, her favourite and secretary, thinking by the counsel and assistance of some of the principal nobility, suddenly surprised them together, and Rizzio was slain, in the queen's presence, in 1566. An apparent reconciliation afterwards took place, where Darnley, who had continued to reside separately from the queen, was assassinated, and the house he had inhabited was blown up with gunpowder, in February, 1567. This barbarous transaction was but very imperfectly investigated; and in the month of May following, she wedded the earl of Bothwell, who was openly accused as the murderer of the late king. Scotland soon became a scene of confusion and civil discord. Bothwell, a fugitive and an outlaw, took refuge in Denmark; and Mary, made a captive, was treated with insult and contempt, and committed to custody in the castle of Loch Leven. After some months' confinement she effected her escape, and, assisted by the few friends who still remained attached to her, made an effort for the recovery of her power. She was opposed by the earl of Murray, the natural son of James V., who had obtained the regency in the minority of her son. The battle of Langside ensured the triumph of her enemies; and, to avoid falling again into their power, she fled to England, and sought the protection of queen Elizabeth; but that princess treated her as a personal and political rival, and kept her in safe custody. For a period of eighteen years was the unhappy queen of Scotland a state prisoner; and during the whole of that long term she was considered as the head of the Popish party, who wished to see a princess of their persuasion on the throne of England. Mary, despairing of recovering that of Scotland, most assuredly became a dupe to this party, and countenanced, if she was not directly concerned in, their plots. She was accordingly tried for a conspiracy against the life of the queen of England, condemned, and suffered decapitation, Feb. 8, 1567, in the castle of Fotheringhay, where she had been long confined. Her body was interred, with great pomp, in Peterborough cathedral, but subsequently removed by her son, James I. to Henry the Seventh's chapel, Westminster-abbey, where a magnificent monument was erected to her memory. The character and conduct of Mary, queen of Scots, have been made the subject of much controversy; but the fact of her marrying Bothwell, "stained as he was by universal suspicion of Darnley's murder, is a spot upon her character for which we in vain seek an apology."

MASACCIO, or TOMMASO DAS GIOVANNI DI VALDARNO, an eminent painter, born at Valdarno, in 1402, who was admirably skilled in the art of perspective, and of whom it has been said, that while Buonarroti taught all other painters, he learnt from Masaccio alone.

MASCAGNI, PAUL, a celebrated Italian anatomist, was born in Tuscany, in 1753; and became professor of anatomy, physiology, and chemistry, at Florence. He made several important discoveries in human anatomy; and published, among other works, "Historia et scenographia Vasorum Lymphaticorum corporis humani." Died, 1815.

MASCARDI, AUGUSTIN, a learned Italian, was born in the republic of Genoa, in 1591. Pope Urban VIII. founded for him a professorship of rhetoric in the college of Sapienza. He wrote Latin and Italian poems; a "History of the Conspiracy of the Count Fiesco;" and a curious work, entitled, "Dell' Arte Istoria."

MASCARON, JULIUS, an eminent French ecclesiastic, was born at Marseilles, in 1634; entered among the priests of the Oratory; and soon became so popular a preacher, that multitudes thronged from all quarters to hear him. In 1696 he was called to the court, to preach before Louis XIV.; and he successively became bishop of Tulle and Agen. At the latter place he founded an hospital; and died in 1703. A collection of his "Funeral Orations" was published, among which the most admired are those on marshal Turenne, the duke of Beaufort, and the chancellor Seguier.

MASCHERONI, LAURENT, an eminent mathematician, was born at Bergamo, in the Venetian States, in 1750. He published notes on the "Integral Calculus" of Euler, and had a share in the experiments performed by the Institute of Bologna, with a view of proving the figure of the earth by the descent of bodies. The invention, however, which has rendered his name conspicuous, was his celebrated "Geometry of the Compass." He died, at Paris, in 1800.

MASCLEP, FRANCIS, a French theologian and orientalist, who was a canon of Amiens, and died in 1728. His works are, "A Hebrew Grammar," 2 vols.; "Ecclesiastical Conferences of the Diocese of Amiens;" and "The Catechism of Amiens."

MASCOV, or MASCOU, JOHN JAMES, a German publicist, was a native of Danzig; studied at Leipzig; became professor of jurisprudence at Halle; and wrote the "Principles of the Public Law of the German Empire," and "A History of the Germans." Born, 1689; died, 1763.

MASCRIER, JOHN BAPTIST DE, a French abbé, was born in 1697, at Caen; and died at Paris in 1760. Among his works are, "A Description of Egypt;" "A Translation of Cæsar's Commentaries;" "Reflections on the Truths of Faith;" and a "History of the Revolution in the East Indies."

MASDEN, DON JUAN FRANCISCO, a native of Barcelona, and member of the order of the Jesuits; author of "Historia Critica de Espana, y de la Cultura Espanola en todo genero," 30 vols. Died, 1617.

MASENIUS, or MASEN, JAMES, a Jesuit, was born at Dalen, in the duchy of Julliers, in 1606; and died at Cologne in 1681. He wrote a Latin poem, called "Sarcothea, or the Fall of Man;" which Lauder brought into notice by pretending that Milton was indebted to it for part of his Paradise Lost. He was also the author of "The Art of Poetry," 4 vols.; "Palæstra styli Romani;" "The Lives of Charles V. and Ferdinand;" "Notes on the Annals of Treves;" &c.

MASERES, FRANCIS, a sound lawyer and a good mathematician, was born in 1751; was educated at Clare hall, Cambridge, and afterwards studied at the Temple. Being called to the bar, he obtained the situation of attorney-general of Quebec, and on his return to England, was made cursor baron of the exchequer. He published a collection of the "Scriptores Logarithmici," in 6 vols. 4to.; a "Treatise on Life Annuities;" "Elements of Plane Trigonometry," &c. Died, 1824, aged 93.

1770. Being chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, he was appointed, in 1761, to go to St. Helena to observe the transit of Venus; and during the voyage he determined the method of finding the longitude at sea by lunar observations. In 1763 he undertook another voyage to Barbadoes, to ascertain the longitude of that island, as well as to prove the accuracy of Harrison's time-keeper, with other objects of practical science. On his return he succeeded Mr. Bliss as royal astronomer; and in 1767 commenced the publication of "The Nautical Almanack." Dr. Maskelyne was also the author of "The British Mariner's Guide," and "Astronomical Observations;" besides many valuable papers in the Philosophical Transactions. Died, 1811.

MASON, SIR JOHN, an eminent statesman, who was employed by Henry VIII. in several embassies, and made a member of the privy council. He afterwards served Edward VI.; and contrived to hold his places under Mary. Queen Elizabeth made him treasurer of her chamber, and he was chosen chancellor of the university of Oxford. He died in 1566. His favourite maxim was, "Do; and say nothing."

MASON, FRANCIS, a learned divine, was born in the county of Durham about 1566, and died at Oxford, in 1621. His learned work, entitled, "Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ," has been translated into English with a preface and notes by Lindsay.

MASON, JOHN, a dissenting minister, was born at Dunmow, Essex, in 1706. He was the author of an excellent little volume of ethics, entitled, "Self-Knowledge," of which there have been numerous editions; he also wrote "Practical Discourses for the use of Families," 2 vols.; "An Essay on Elocution;" two "Essays on the Power of Poetical and Prosodic Numbers;" "Christian Morals," 2 vols. &c. Died, 1763.

MASON, CHARLES, an English astronomer, was an assistant of Dr. Bradley at the royal observatory at Greenwich. He was employed to examine the lunar tables of Mayer, which, with his improvements, were published by order of the Board of Longitude. He was sent to America, with a grand sector, to determine the limits of Maryland and Pennsylvania; and, in conjunction with Mr. Dixon, he measured a degree of the meridian, which, with other operations, were communicated to the Royal Society, and published in the Philosophical Transactions. Mr. Mason died at Pennsylvania, in 1797.

MASON, WILLIAM, an eminent English poet, was the son of a clergyman in Yorkshire, where he was born in 1725. He studied at Cambridge, and obtained a fellowship in Pembroke-hall. His first appearance as a poet was by the publication of "Isis," in which he satirized the Jacobitism and high-church principles prevalent at Oxford. This was replied to by Thomas Warton in his "Triumph of Isis." In 1752 Mason produced his "Elfrida," a dramatic poem, with choral odes on the ancient Greek model, which was well received, though the attempt to establish it on the stage proved abortive. On entering into orders he was presented to the living of Aston, and appointed one of the king's chaplains; and in 1753 he obtained the prebendship of York, with a canonry annexed. On the commencement of the American war, he became so active an advocate for freedom as to give offence at court, and was consequently dismissed from the chaplainship; but, like many other eager devotees at the shrine of liberty, when the French revolution broke out, he became alarmed, and his zeal considerably abated. Besides the tragedies of "Elfrida," and "Caractacus," he wrote "The English Garden," a poem; "Ode to the Naval Officers of Great Britain;" "Memoirs of Gray," the poet, &c. Died, 1797. Besides his acknowledged works, it is now known that the poet Mason was the author of the "Heroic Epistle to Sir W. Chambers," and other satirical pieces, published under the signature of Mac Gregor.

MASQUE DE FER, or the "Iron Mask," the name of an unknown person in France, who was conveyed in the most secret manner to the castle of Pignerol, from whence he was transferred to the isle of St. Marguerite. He was a man taller than ordinary, extremely well made, and was very attentive to his whole personal appearance. His education appeared to have been carefully attended to; and he amused himself by reading, and playing upon the guitar. He always wore a mask with steel springs, which was so constructed as to allow him free liberty to eat and drink. His keepers treated him with the greatest respect. At Pignerol he was entrusted to the charge of an officer named St. Mars, on whose appointment as lieutenant of the isles, this unknown personage accompanied him, as he finally did to the Bastille, where he died in 1703, and was buried under the name of Marchiali. Conjecture has exhausted itself to discover who this mysterious personage might be. Voltaire observes, that at the period when the prisoner was confined, no person of importance disappeared from Europe; and yet it cannot be doubted that he must have been one. Laborde, first valet de chambre of Louis XV., and who had received from this prince many proofs of confidence, showed a desire to discover him. The king replied, "I pity him, but his detention injures only himself, and has prevented great misfortunes; you cannot know him." The author of "Secret Memoirs," published in 1745, pretends that it was the count of Vermandois, who was arrested, it was said, for having given a blow to the dauphin. Lagrange Chancel, in a letter to Freron, attempts to prove that the prisoner is the duke of Beaufort, and that he was falsely reported to have been killed at the siege of Candia. St. Foix, in 1768, wished to prove that he was the duke of Monmouth, who was said to have been beheaded in London, but who had been withdrawn from punishment. In a dissertation which precedes the romance of "The Man with the Iron Mask," by Regnault Warin, the author endeavours to prove that this mysterious personage was the son of the duke of Buckingham and Anne of Austria, and goes so far as to give the portrait of the prisoner. But still no satisfactory evidence has yet been given to establish any one of the hypotheses, and the secret history of "Masque de Fer" is, perhaps for ever, hidden beneath an impenetrable veil.

MASSENA, ANDRÉ, a victorious general, created prince of Essling, duke of Rivoli, and marshal of France, was born at Nice, in 1758. He went through the regular gradations in an Italian regiment, commencing his military career at the age of seventeen. After fourteen years' service he obtained his discharge; but, in 1792, the revolution presented an enviable field for the display of military talents; and his natural sentiments in favour of liberty caused him to enter the service of the French republic, where he obtained rapid promotion. Napoleon, who was quick to discover genius, formed an intimate friendship with Massena, and, after the successful battle of Loveredo, in 1796, against Beaulieu, called him "the favoured child of victory." He had the chief command in Switzerland in 1799, when he finished the campaign, by completely routing the Austro-Russian army under the archduke Charles and general Korsakoff. In 1800 he commanded in Italy, but with less success than in his former campaigns. He was, however, again successful in the campaigns of 1805 and 1806; taking possession of Naples, and signaling himself in the campaign of Poland, which terminated by the treaty of Tilsit. He was afterwards employed in Germany, and eminently distinguished himself in the memorable engagements of Essling and Wagram. His subsequent conduct in Spain, when advancing against Wellington, was equally skillful; but the prudence and superior tactics of his adversary prevented him from gaining fresh laurels; and the British general having taken up a strong position at Torres Vedras, Massena was at length compelled to retire. At the landing of Napoleon, in 1815, he swore allegiance to him, was made peer, and commander of the national guard at Paris, and contributed much to the preservation of tranquillity in that city, during the turbulent period which preceded the return of the king. He lived afterwards in retirement, and died in 1817.

MASSIEU, JOHN, a person who was deaf and dumb, and a pupil of the abbé Sicard, was born in 1772, of poor parents, who reckoned six of their family who were all born with these afflicting defects. Massieu, who followed the instruction given him by the humane Sicard, became a most interesting person, and could hold conversation with any one who understood his grammar, which was composed for the fingers, and contained every distinct part of speech. He also wrote very well, and expressed his ideas correctly.

MASSILLON, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent French preacher, was born in 1663, at Mezes, in Provence. He entered into the congregation of the Oratory, and became so celebrated for his eloquence, that the general of his order called him to Paris, where he drew crowds of hearers. Louis XIV., who knew the value of a kingly compliment, and seldom passed a bad one, observed to him, "When I hear other preachers, I go away much pleased with them; but when I hear you, I go away displeased with myself." In 1717 he was made bishop of Clermont; and he died in 1742. His discourses were published in 14 vols. 8vo., and are distinguished for simplicity, an artless flow of eloquence, a knowledge of the human heart, and a richness of ideas.

MASSINGER, PHILIP, a distinguished English dramatist, was born at Salisbury, in 1580. He studied at Oxford, but quitted the university without taking a degree, in consequence, it is supposed, of having become a Roman Catholic. Little is known of his personal history, yet he appears to have been intimately connected with the wits and poets of his time, and died in 1639. Some critics rank him next to Shakespeare. In tragedy, however, he is rather eloquent and forcible than pathetic; and, in richness and variety of humour, his comedy can by no means vie with that of his great master. Several of his contemporaries, as Fletcher, Dekker, Middleton, and Rowley, assisted him in the composition of some of his dramas.

MASSON, JOHN PAPYRUS, a French historical writer, born in 1644, and died in 1611. His principal work is entitled "Eulogia Virorum Clarissimorum;" he also wrote "Annals of France," an "Account of Bishops' Sees," &c.

MASSON, JOHN and SAMUEL, brothers, were ministers of the reformed church in France. JOHN settled in Holland, and assisted in the publication of a critical journal, entitled "Histoire Critique de la Republique des Lettres," from 1712 to 1721. He also wrote the lives of Horace, Ovid, and Pliny the younger, in Latin; and "Histoire de Pierre Bayle et de ses Ouvrages." He died in England about 1730.—SAMUEL, officiated as pastor of the English church at Dordrecht, and was the conductor of the Histoire Critique above-mentioned.

MASSUET, RENÉ, a learned French Benedictine, born in 1665; author of the "Lives of the Saints," and "Annals of the Benedictine Order." Died, 1716.

MASTERS, THOMAS, a poet, was born at Cotes, in Gloucestershire, and educated at Winchester and New college, Oxford. He was the author of various Greek poems and orations; assisted lord Herbert of Cherbury in his "Life of Henry VIII.;" and had a share in translating his "De Veritate." Died, 1643.

MATHER, INCREASE, D.D., one of the early presidents of Harvard college, was born at Dorchester, Massachusetts, in 1639. His learning, zeal, and general abilities were of great service to the institution over which he presided, and he was a skillful and efficient servant of the commonwealth. In 1688 he was deputed to England, as agent of the province, to procure redress of grievances. When James II. published his declaration for liberty of conscience, Dr. Mather was again sent to England with an address of thanks to the king; but before his return, the Revolution occurred, and he obtained from William a new charter for the colony of Massachusetts. He was the author of "A History of the War with the Indians;" "An Essay on remarkable Providences," and some other works. Died, 1723.

MATHER, COTTON, D.D., son of the preceding, was born at Boston, in 1663, and died in 1728. He surpassed his father in erudition, influence, and the variety and multitude of his productions; while his piety and benevolence were almost commensurate with his learning. It is, however, to be regretted that his credulity was so great on the score of witchcraft, as to induce him to join in the prosecution of a number of persons on charges the most absurd and cruel. His principal works are "An Ecclesiastical History of New England;" "The Christian Philosopher;" "Psalterium Americanum," and "The Wonders of the Invisible World, or the Trials of Witches."

MATHEWS, CHARLES, a comedian of transcendent ability, and one who was long regarded as the master-mind of the mimic art, was born in 1776. He was the son of a bookseller in the Strand, attached to the Wesleyan connexion, and who had placed him in Merchant-tailors' school, and apprenticed him to learn his own business. The stage, however, proving more attractive to young Mathews than the shop of his father, the latter gave him twenty guineas and his indentures, with a permission to follow the bent of his inclinations; and a promise of twenty guineas more if he would abandon histrionics, and "turn to an honest calling." Like most other actors while in their novitiate, he rambled about with provincial companies for a time; but the great versatility of talent he possessed, soon placed him at the top of his profession, and rendered him a general favourite with the public. He was, however, no stranger to the despotic rule of managers, or the envious rivalry of fellow-actors: his metropolitan engagement grew irksome, and he was determined to "set up for himself," and to depend solely on his own exertions. For sixteen years previous to his death, he was accustomed to entertain whole audiences by his single efforts, in a species of entertainment entitled "Mathews at Home;" and never were admiring crowds more highly delighted than in witnessing the vivid portraits which he so accurately drew. The "At Home" of Mathews were not only well received throughout Great Britain and Ireland, but also in America, where some of his most felicitous portraiture were sketched.—While on his passage from that country he was taken ill, and on arriving at Liverpool his malady rapidly increased. He expired on his birth-day, June 28th, 1835. He was twice married, and had one child only, the present Charles Mathews.

MATHIAS, THOMAS JAMES, the presumed author of that powerful satire, "The Pursuits of Literature," was educated at Eton, and Trinity college, Cambridge. During a long life, spent in literary avocations, he naturally produced much that bore the mark of his superior talents; but though he wrote numerous satires, and displayed an extraordinary knowledge of Italian in the various poems he composed in that harmonious language, it was to the erudite and caustic notes which are scattered with an unsparring hand throughout "The Pursuits of Literature," that he attained his chief celebrity; but for obvious reasons of a personal nature he never owned the authorship. Died, at Naples, 1835.

MATILDA, or MAUD, the daughter of Henry I. king of England, and wife of Henry IV. emperor of Germany, was nominated in 1135 successor to the English throne by her father; but in her absence Stephen usurped the title. Arriving in England with a large army in 1139, she defeated Stephen, and was acknowledged queen in a parliament held in 1141. Stephen afterwards defeated the empress, on which the national synod declared for him, and Matilda was obliged to leave the kingdom. On the death of the emperor, she married Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, by whom she had a son, afterwards Henry II. king of England. Matilda died in 1167, aged 67.

MATSYS, QUINTIN, an eminent painter, was born at Antwerp, in 1660. He was originally a blacksmith, but quitted that business, and by diligent application became such an excellent artist, that, according to the opinion of Sir Joshua Reynolds, some of his heads are not inferior to those of Raphael. One of his best pictures is that of the Two Misers, at Windsor. He died in 1529.—His son, JOHN MATSYS, was also a painter of very considerable merit.

MATTHESON, JOHN, an eminent musical composer and performer, was born at Hamburg, in 1681; and gave such early indications of talent, that at nine years of age he was able to perform compositions of his own at the organ. He composed music for the church and for the theatre, and was always present at the performance of it. Notwithstanding he gave up so much time in the pursuit of his favourite science, producing operas, anthems, and treatises on music, he held the office of secretary to the English resident in Hamburg for several years, and was entrusted with the conduct of various important negotiations; still, however, prosecuting his musical studies amidst the multiplicity of business in which his fiscal situation involved him. Died, 1764.

MATTHEW of Westminster, an English historian of the 14th century. He was a Benedictine monk of the abbey of Westminster; and is highly esteemed for his veracity, acuteness, and diligence.

MATTHEWS, THOMAS, an English admiral, who commanded in the Mediterranean in 1744, and fought an obstinate but indecisive battle off Toulon, with the combined fleets. Owing to his not being supported by Lestock, his second in command, admiral Matthews failed in gaining a complete victory; and yet for this he was dismissed the service, and Lestock was acquitted. Died, 1751.

MATTHIEU, PETER, a French historian, was born in the diocese of Basle, in 1563, and died in 1621. He became an advocate at Lyons, and was made historiographer of France. He wrote Histories of "Henry IV.," "Louis XI.," and "St. Louis;" also the "History of France," 2 vols. folio; and "La Guisarde," a tragedy.

born at Sienna, in 1500; studied at Padua; and after having practised at Rome, Graz, and other places, was appointed physician to Maximilian II. His "Commentary on Dioscorides," was a work which, for the time he lived in, contained a fund of botanico-medical information. Died, 1577.

MATTOCKS, ISABELLA, an eminent actress, born in 1746, was the wife of Mr. Mattocks, an actor at Covent-garden, and the daughter of Mr. Hallam, a theatrical performer, who, as manager of the theatres of New York, Charlestown, and Philadelphia, gained a fortune of 10,000*l*. Her forte lay in such characters as abigails, citizens' wives, &c., and she was an excellent comic singer. She retired from the stage about twenty years before her death, which took place in 1826.

MATURIN, ROBERT CHARLES, an Irish clergyman of the established church, was born at Dublin, and educated in Trinity college of that city. On entering into orders, he obtained the curacy of St. Peter's church, in his native place, but though much followed and admired as a preacher, he never gained any higher preferment; owing, probably to his eccentric manners, which were ill-suited to his profession. "Bertram," a wild but powerful tragedy, was the first production which, by its singular success, brought him into notice as an author. Having anticipated his resources, without contemplating the possibility of a failure, he contracted embarrassments, from which he was seldom entirely free. He was the author of several popular novels, the first three of which, "The Fatal Revenge;" "The Wild Irish Boy;" and "The Millionaire Chief;" were published under the assumed name of Dennis Jasper Murphy. He also wrote the novels of "Melmoth," and "Woman;" "The Universe," a poem; and the tragedies of "Manuel," and "Ferdolpho." He published, in 1824, six "Controversial Sermons," which exhibit him as a well-read scholar, and an acute reasoner. Died, 1825.

MATY, MATTHEW, an eminent physician, critic, and miscellaneous writer, born in Holland in the year 1718, but settled in England, where he became secretary to the Royal Society, and principal librarian of the British Museum. Died, 1776.

MATY, PAUL HENRY, son of the preceding, was born in 1745. He was appointed one of the librarians of the British Museum, and, in 1778, a secretary of the Royal Society; but, in 1784, when there were great divisions in the Society, occasioned by the dismissal of Dr. Hutton from the post of foreign secretary, Mr. Maty resigned his place. Died, 1787.

MAUCROIX, FRANCIS DE, a French ecclesiastic, born at Noyon, in 1619, was a canon of the cathedral of Rheims, where he died in 1708. He translated the Philippics of Demosthenes; the Euthydemus and Hippias of Plato; some of the Orations of Cicero; and other works, into French. He also wrote some pieces in conjunction with La Fontaine; and in 1736 appeared his Miscellaneous Works, including Poems.

MAUPERTUIS, PETER LOUIS MOREAU DES, an eminent mathematician and astro-nomer, was born at St. Malo, in 1698. He studied in the college of La Marche, at Paris; and in 1723 was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, the memoirs of which institution abound with his communications. In 1736 he was sent on an expedition to the polar circle, to ascertain the figure of the earth. In 1740 he was invited to Berlin by the king of Prussia, whom he followed to the field, and was present at the battle of Molwitz, where he was made prisoner, and carried to Vienna. On regaining his liberty, he married and settled at Berlin, and was appointed president of the Royal Academy of Sciences. In this situation, however, he became involved in a quarrel with Voltaire, which embittered his latter days, from the sarcasm with which the latter continued to assail him. The works of Maupertuis form 4 vols.

MAUREPAS, JOHN FREDERIC PHELPEAUX, count DE, a French statesman, born in 1701. He was made minister of marine at the age of twenty-four, and was afterwards at the head of the foreign department. He was hasty in his decisions, amiable in manners, quick in conception, artful, and penetrating; but being accused of writing an epigram on Madame de Pompadour, it led to his banishment from court. After a lapse of thirty years, he was placed at the head of the ministry by Louis XIV., but he was found incapable of performing its duties, and quite destitute of the vigour necessary to avert the troubles which then threatened the kingdom. Died, 1781.

MAURICE OF NASSAU, prince of Orange, youngest son, by a second marriage, of William I., prince of Orange, born at Dillenburg, 1567, was studying at Leyden, in 1584, when his father was assassinated. The provinces of Holland and Zealand, and, soon after, Utrecht, immediately elected the young prince stadtholder; and his talents, as a general, surpassed all expectations. Previous to the truce of twelve years, concluded in 1609, about forty towns, and several fortresses, had fallen into his hands. His life was an almost unbroken series of battles, sieges, and victories. War he understood as a master, and conducted like a hero. Like Montecuculi, he possessed the rare art of conducting a march and pitching a camp; like Vauban, the genius of fortification and defence; like Eugene, the skill to support the most numerous armies in the most unproductive and exhausted country; like Condé, that unerring coup d'œil which determines the issue of a battle; like Charles XII., the power of rendering the troops insensible to cold, hunger, and sufferings; like Turenne, that of sparing human life. In the opinion of Follard, Maurice was the greatest infantry general that had existed since the time of the Romans. He died in 1625, and was succeeded by his brother Frederic Henry.

MAURICE, THOMAS, a learned oriental scholar and historian, was born at Hertford, in 1753; was educated by Dr. Parr, and at St. John's and University colleges, Oxford; and distinguished himself as a writer. In 1791, he published the first two volumes of his "Indian Antiquities;" which were succeeded, at intervals, by five more. In 1793, appeared the first volume of the "History of Hindostan," which was completed in a third volume in 1799. In 1802, he produced the first volume of the "Modern History of Hindostan;" and in 1804 the second volume. In this last year he was presented to the vicarage of Cudham, in Kent; he also obtained the pension that had been bestowed upon Cowper the poet; and he was likewise appointed one of the librarians of the British Museum. Besides the works above mentioned, Mr. Maatze wrote "Poems;" "Sermons;" his own "Memoirs," &c., in all of which are discovered spirit, elegance, and perspicuity. Died, 1824.

MAURUS, TERENTIUS, a Latin poet and grammarian, who flourished under Trajan. He wrote a poem, "De Litteris, Syllabis, Pedibus, et Metris," which is in the Corpus Poetarum of Maittaire, under the title of "De Arte Metrica."

MAURY, JEAN SIFFREIN, a French cardinal, was born in 1746, at Valeras; studied at Lyons; and, on entering into orders, became a celebrated preacher at Paris, where he obtained a place in the academy, and obtained an abbey. When the revolution broke out, he was chosen one of the representatives of the clergy in the states-general, where he distinguished himself by his eloquence in behalf of his order, and also in defence of royalty. On the dissolution of the constituent assembly, he went to Italy, was nominated bishop of Nicæa, and made a cardinal; and in 1808 Napoleon gave him the archbishopric of Paris, but in 1814 he was obliged to quit the archiepiscopal palace, and retire to Rome. He was not only a great orator, but a man of ready wit. On one occasion, when a furious mob was following him with cries of "Hang him on a lamp post;" he turned round, and coolly said, "Do you think you should see clearer if I were there?" which well-timed joke saved his life. He was the author of several works, the best of which is an "Essay on Eloquence." Died, 1817.

MAWE, JOSEPH, an eminent mineralogist and conchologist, was born about 1755; travelled in various parts of South America; and published numerous works on the subject of his researches. Among them are, "Travels in the Interior of Brazil;" a "Treatise on Diamonds and Precious Stones;" "Familiar Lessons on Mineralogy and Geology;" "The Linnæan System of Conchology;" and "The Mineralogy of Derbyshire." Mr. Mawe was a member of the Mineralogical Society of Jena, and of the Geological Society; and for several years during the latter part of his life, kept a shop, for the sale of mineral specimens and other natural curiosities, in the Strand. He died in 1829.

MAXENTIUS, MARCUS AURELIUS VALERIUS, a Roman emperor, was the son of Maximianus Hercules, and declared himself emperor in 305. He was opposed by Galerius Maximianus, who was defeated, and slew himself. Maxentius then marched into Africa, where he became odious by his cruelties. Constantine afterwards defeated him in Italy, and he was drowned in crossing the Tiber, in 312.

MAXIMIANUS, MARCUS AURELIUS VALERIUS HERCULIUS, a Roman emperor, who from being a common soldier, was associated in the government by Diocletian. When that emperor abdicated the crown in 304, he compelled Maximianus, much against his will, to do the same; but about a year afterwards he resumed the dignity, and opposed his son Maxentius. The troops, however, mutinied against Maximianus, who fled into Gaul, where he was put to death by order of Constantine, in 310, aged 60.

MAXIMIANUS, GALERIUS VALERIUS, emperor of the East, was originally a shepherd in Dacia, afterwards a soldier, and raised to the imperial dignity by Diocletian, who also gave him his daughter in marriage. In 305 he compelled Diocletian to abdicate the throne; but his cruelty soon rendered him odious to the Romans, who raised Maxentius to the throne. Died, 311.

MAXIMINUS, CAIUS JULIUS VERUS, emperor of Rome, was the son of a peasant in Thrace. He was a great persecutor; and put to death above four thousand persons, on suspicion of their being concerned in a conspiracy against him; but he was at last assassinated by his own troops, near Aquileia, in 236. Forty pounds of meat and eighteen bottles of wine, were his ordinary allowance for a day; and his strength was such that he is said to have stopped a chariot in full speed with one of his fingers.

MAXIMUS, MAGNUS, a Spaniard, was general of the Roman army in Britain, when he proclaimed himself emperor, in 353. Gratian marched against him, but was defeated, and assassinated. Maximus having made himself master of Gaul, Britain, and Spain, fixed the seat of his empire at Treves. He next marched into Italy, where he committed dreadful cruelties, but was at last besieged in Aquileia, by the emperor Theodosius. His soldiers delivered him up to Theodosius, who caused him to be beheaded, in 386.

MAXIMUS TYRIUS, a celebrated philosopher of the second century, was a native of Tyre, in Phœnicia, whence he took his name. It is generally supposed that he flourished under Antoninus. He appears to have adopted the principles of the Platonic school, with an inclination to scepticism. He left forty-one Dissertations on various philosophical topics, which are still extant.

MAY, THOMAS, a poet and historian, was born in Sussex, in 1594, and educated at Cambridge; after which he entered of Gray's Inn, where he wrote some plays and translated several authors, particularly Lucan. Charles I. employed him in writing two historical poems; one on the life of Henry II., and the other on the reign of Edward III. But in the civil war, May joined the parliament, and was appointed their secretary and historiographer. He published the "History of the Parliament," which began in 1640; and a "Breviary of the History of the Parliament of England," a work which was extremely obnoxious to the royal party. Died, 1650.

MAYENNE, CHARLES OF LORRAINE, duke of, second son of Francis of Lorraine, duke of Guise, was born in 1554. He displayed great courage at the sieges of Poitiers and Rochelle, and at the battle of Montcontour. He also defeated the protestants in Guienne, Dauphiny, and Saintonge. Died, 1611.

MAYER, JOHN FREDERIC, a learned German Lutheran divine, was born at Leipsic, in 1650. He became superintendent of the churches of Pomerania, and professor at Stettin. He died in 1710. He wrote a "Treatise on the Method of Studying the Holy Scriptures;" "Dissertations" on particular Parts of the Bible; and other treatises; but his principal work is the "Bibliotheca Biblica."

MAYER, TOMAS, a celebrated astronomer, was born at Marbach, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, in 1723. He taught himself mathematics, and at the age of fourteen designed machines and instruments with the greatest dexterity and accuracy. His various merits procured him an invitation to Gottingen, as professor of mathematics, in 1750, and the royal society of sciences in that place chose him a member. About this time astronomers were employed in endeavours to find the longitude at sea. Mayer overcame all difficulties, and his theory of the moon, and astronomical tables and precepts, were rewarded by the English board of longitude, with 5000*l.*, which sum was paid to his widow; for, exhausted by his incessant labours, this astronomer died, in 1782, at the early age of thirty-nine. Among his works are, a "Treatise on Curves," and a "Mathematical Atlas."

MAYERNE, THEODORE TURQUET DE, baron d'Asbonne, an eminent physician and chemist, was born at Geneva, in 1773. He was physician to Henry IV.; but on the death of that monarch he came to England, and was appointed physician to James I., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He continued in the same favour with Charles I., to whom he adhered faithfully in the Rebellion. Died, 1655.

MAYNARD, SIR JOHN, an English statesman and lawyer, was born at Tavistock, in Devonshire, about 1602. After having studied at Exeter college, Oxford, he entered at the Middle Temple, and was in due course called to the bar. In the Long Parliament he distinguished himself as one of the prosecutors of Strafford and Laud; but afterwards he opposed the violent proceedings of the army, and the usurpation of Cromwell; for which he was twice sent to the Tower. After the Restoration he was knighted, but refused the honour of being a judge. At the Revolution he displayed great talents in the conference between the lords and commons, on the question of the abdication of the throne by James II., and warmly advocated that measure. When William III., in allusion to serjeant Maynard's great age, remarked that he must have outlived all the lawyers of his time, Sir John happily replied, "Yes; and if your highness had not come over to our assistance, I should have outlived the law too." He was appointed one of the commissioners of the great seal, in 1699; and died in 1690.

MAYNE, JASPER, a dramatic writer of the 17th century, was born at Hatherleigh, in Devonshire, and received his education at Westminster-school, and Christchurch, Oxford, where he took the degree of D.D., and entered into holy orders. His attachment to the royal cause exposed him to suffering during the civil war; but after the Restoration, he rose to be archdeacon of Chichester. His theatrical productions display a considerable deal of broad humour; and, in truth, he gave a remarkable instance of his fondness for a joke even in his will, by leaving an old trunk to his manservant, saying, that he would find in it something to make him drink. When the funeral was over, the poor fellow hastened to enjoy his treasure, and, on opening the trunk, found a red herring! Died, 1672.

MAYNE, JOHN, author of "The Silver Gun;" "Glasgow;" and other poems, the chief of which were national ballads, was a native of Dumfries. For many years he was editor and joint-proprietor of the Star evening paper, in which many of his ballads first appeared. He was a worthy man, universally esteemed, and died, at a very advanced age, in 1836.

MAZARIN, JULIUS, a cardinal, and first minister of Louis XIV., was born of a noble family, at Piacini, in Italy, in 1602. He studied at Alcalá, in Spain, after which he went to Rome, and became attached to the service of cardinal Sacchetti, whom he accompanied on his mission into Lombardy. While in that country Mazarin effected a peace between the French and Spaniards, which procured him the esteem of the cardinals Richelieu and Barbarini, by the latter of whom he was recommended to the pope, who sent him as nuncio-extraordinary to the court of France. In 1641 he was made a cardinal, and on the death of Richelieu succeeded him as prime minister. At first he was rather popular, but in a short time cabals were formed against him with such effect, that he was dismissed from the royal presence, and compelled to leave the kingdom. But though a price was set upon his head, Mazarin contrived to dispel the storm; and he even returned to court with increased éclat, and held the reigns of power till his decease, in 1661. As a politician he displayed great talents; as a man he possessed few virtues; his policy was characterized rather by finesse and forbearance, than by force. The most praiseworthy act of his life was done on his death-bed; and that was the endowing of the college which bears his name.

MAZEPPA, JOHN, bettman of the Cossacks, whom Lord Byron has made the hero of a poem, was born, about the middle of the 17th century, in Podolia, of a poor but noble Polish family, and became page to John Casimir, king of Poland. In this situation, Mazeppa had an opportunity of acquiring various useful accomplishments; but an intrigue was the foundation of his future elevation. A Polish nobleman, having surprised Mazeppa with his wife, ordered him to be tied naked upon a wild horse, and committed to his fate. The animal had been bred in the Ukraine and directed his course thither; where some poor peasants found him half dead, and took care of him. Their warlike roving life suited his disposition; he made himself conspicuous and beloved by his dexterity, bodily strength, and courage; his knowledge and sagacity procured him the post of secretary and adjutant to the hetman Samoilowitz; and, in 1687, he was elected in his place. He gained the confidence of Peter the Great, who loaded him with honours, and he was finally made prince of the Ukraine. But though a prince, he was still a vassal; and his restless spirit made him resolve to throw off the yoke of subordination. He joined with Charles XII., who had just given a king to Poland, and aimed, by his assistance, to throw off the yoke of subordination. For a long time the intrigues of Mazeppa against Peter were disbelieved by the latter; but at length he openly joined the Swedish monarch, who by his advice fought the fatal battle of Pultowa. He then sought refuge at Bender, where he died in 1709.

MAZZA, ANGELO, an eminent Italian poet, born at Parma, in 1740; in the university of which city he was afterwards professor of Greek literature. He translated the odes of Pindar, and Akenside's Pleasures of Imagination; and, having attained a high degree of literary reputation, was admitted into the Arcadian academy at Rome. Died, 1817.

MAZZUCHELLI, GIAMMARIA, count, a Venetian nobleman, was born in 1707, and died in 1763. He was the author of "Notizie Historiche e Critiche intorno alla Vita, alle Invenzioni, ed agli Scritti di Archimedi Siracusano;" "La Vita di Pietro Aretino;" "Gli Scrittori d'Italia," &c.

MAZZUOLI, FRANCIS, a celebrated painter, known by the name of PARMEGGIANO, was born at Parma, in 1503. He became acquainted with Correggio, but owed his eminence to his studying the works of Raphael. His reputation as a painter was very great; and he might have acquired a handsome fortune, had he not lost his time in the delusive labours of alchemy. Died, 1540.

MEAD, MATTHEW, a non-conformist divine, was born in Buckinghamshire in 1629. He became minister of Shadwell, from which place he was ejected at the Restoration; and then went to Holland, but returned in 1674, and erected a large meeting-house at Stepney. He published some religious works, the principal of which is entitled, "The almost Christian tried and cast." Died, 1699.

MEAD, RICHARD, an eminent physician, son of the preceding, was born at Stepney, in 1673; studied at Utrecht, Leyden, and Padua, where he took his doctor's degree, and, on his return to England, was appointed physician to St. Thomas's Hospital. He became very distinguished in his profession; was vice-president of the Royal Society, censor of the college of physicians, and physician to George II. He interested himself much in the introduction of inoculation for the small-pox, and assisted in the preliminary experiments made on criminals. His practice was extremely lucrative; and the riches he made by it enabled him to form a magnificent library and museum, and to assist men of talent who were less fortunate than himself. His works consist of "A Mechanical Account of Poisons;" a "Discourse concerning Pestilential Contagion;" "De Imperiis Solis ac Lunæ, in Corpora humana et Morbis inde oriundis;" "De Morbis Bilibicis;" and "Monita Medica." Died, 1754.

MECHAM, PIERRE FRANÇOIS ANDRÉ, a French astronomer and geonetrician, was born at Laon, in 1774. On settling at Paris in 1772, he was favourably received by Lalande, who procured for him an appointment in the national depository of marine charts. He calculated the orbit of the comet of 1774; and discovered that of 1781; in short, he discovered altogether, in the course of eighteen years, fourteen comets, the orbits of which he calculated. He was also employed with Delambre, in measuring the degree of the meridian between Perpignan and Barcelona; and he edited the "Connaissance des Temps" from 1786 to 1794. Died, 1805.

MEDE, JOSEPH, a learned divine, born in 1586, at Berden, in Essex; author of the "Clavis Apocalyptica," which is considered by biblical critics as the ablest exposition of the obscure prophecies to which it refers. Died, 1638.

MEDICI, COSMO DE', an illustrious Florentine, born in 1389, was the son of John de Medici, a rich and influential merchant, who died in 1426. The vast wealth which Cosmo thus inherited, afforded him the means of displaying his liberality, and of acquiring great influence in the republic. But the splendour and magnificence in which he lived, excited the jealousy and enmity of many of the nobles. The Strozzi, the Albizzi, and many of the first Tuscan families combined against him; but by the most consummate art and prudent management, he extricated himself from the toils of his enemies, and eventually reigned without a rival. His superfluous wealth he expended upon public buildings, and in the encouragement of literature. He was a friend to science, an active merchant, and a sagacious statesman; and, when he died, in 1464, such was the general estimation in which he was held, that the Florentines inscribed on his tomb the title of "Father of his country."

MEDICI, LORENZO DE', surnamed the Magnificent, was born in 1448, and was the grandson of the preceding. He surpassed in wisdom and moderation, in magnanimity and splendour, all of his family who had gone before him, while in active zeal for the arts and sciences he also greatly excelled them. In his political capacity he acquired the respect of foreign potentates, and placed the balance of power in Italy on a footing, which, until his death, insured to her full security and ample scope to extend and confirm her prosperity. Great losses induced him to give up commerce, which the Medici had always carried on; yet when he withdrew his property from trade, he was sufficiently wealthy to purchase princely domains, and not only to adorn them with palaces of regal splendour, but also to ornament Florence with elegant edifices. He revived the academy of Pias, established another at Florence, collected a vast treasure of literature, and founded a gallery of art, where Michael Angelo, under his patronage, pursued his youthful studies, and improved his taste and skill. Nothing, in fact, could exceed the exertions he made for the improvement of literature; and he died in the zenith of his renown, in 1492, honoured by all the princes of Europe, beloved by his fellow-citizens, and almost worshipped by the votaries of learning and the arts at home and abroad. His works, entitled "Opere di Lorenzo de' Medici, detto il Magnifico," were published at Florence, in 1826, in a splendid edition, 4 vols. 4to, at the expense of the grand duke Leopold II., and contain the first complete collection of his poems.

MEDICI, LUIGI, DON, descended from the ducal house of Ottoliano, was duke of Sarto, high steward of the king of Naples, and, for some time, president of the ministry. During the reign of Joseph Buonaparte and Joachim Murat, he resided in England, and returned with the Bourbons to Naples; where he was minister of the police, when Murat, rushing on his own destruction, invaded the Neapolitan territory, was taken and shot. Some of his measures proving highly unpopular, he gave in his resignation, and retired to Rome; but he was afterwards appointed president of the council. Died, 1830.

MEDINA, SIR JOHN, a portrait painter, was born at Brussels, in 1659; came to England in 1686; and after painting a great number of pictures, went to Scotland, where he was knighted by the duke of Queensberry, lord high commissioner, being the last instance of honour so conferred in that kingdom. Died, 1711.

MEHEGAN, WILLIAM ALEXANDER, a French historian, but of Irish extraction, was born at Salle, in the Cevennes, in 1731. He wrote "The Origin of the Guebres;" "Considerations on the Revolutions of Arts;" "The Origin and Progress of Idolatry;" and "A Picture of Modern History," which has been translated into English. Died, 1766.

MEHUL, STEPHEN HENRY, an eminent musical composer, was born at Olivet, in France, in 1763; and was an excellent organist when only ten years old. He settled at Paris in 1779, where he studied with great advantage under Gluck; became inspector at the Conservatory of Music; professor of composition at the Royal School, a member of the Academy and Institute, and a knight of the legion of honour. He produced the operas of "Stratonice," "Irató," "Joseph," "Cora et Alonzo," &c., besides the ballets of "The Judgment of Paris," "Perceus and Andromeda," &c. Died, 1817.

MEIBOMIUS, JOHN HENRY, a physician, was born at Helmstadt, in 1590. He became a professor at his native place, and afterwards physician at Lubeck, where he died in 1656. He wrote some works on medical subjects, and a "Life of Mæcenas," in Latin. HENRY MEIBOMIUS, his son, was born at Lubeck, in 1638. After travelling for improvement, he took his degree of M.D., and became professor of medicine, to which were added the chairs of history and poetry, at Helmstadt, where he died in 1700. He published "Scriptores rerum Germanicarum," 3 vols. folio.

MEIBOMIUS, MARCUS, a learned philologist, was born at Tonnigen, in the duchy of Holstein, in 1611. He resided some time at the Swedish court; but was obliged to leave it in consequence of having struck M. Bourdelot, a physician, at a concert, in the presence of queen Christina. He then went to Denmark, and became a professor at Sorø, a college instituted for the young nobility. Afterwards he removed to Elainour as president of the board of customs; but being dismissed for negligence, he went to Amsterdam, and was appointed professor of history, which place he also lost. After visiting France and England, Meibomius returned to Amsterdam, and died there in 1711. He published several works, the principal of which is an edition of the seven Greek musical writers, Aristoxenus, Euclid, Nichomachus, Alypius, Gaudentius, Bacchius, and Aristides Quintilianus.

MEIN, WILLIAM, a lieutenant-colonel in the army, and a deputy-lieutenant for the county of Dumfries. He commenced his military career as an ensign in the 74th foot, in 1797; exchanged to the 52nd; was senior lieutenant of his company in the action fought before Ferrol, and succeeded to its command on the fall of his superior officer. In 1804 he was promoted to a company; and, after a stay of two years in Sicily, joined the English army in the Peninsula, and was at the battles of Corunna, Busaco, Salamanca, Vittoria, the Pyrenees, and many others. By the duke of Wellington's special recommendation, he obtained, first, the rank of a major, and afterwards that of lieutenant-colonel; and if remuneration be due to those who bleed in their country's service, it must be allowed to have been peculiarly due to him. He was severely wounded by a musket-ball at Casalano, and again at the storming of fort St. Francisco; he also received a musket wound at Badajoz; again, at the heights near Beira, he was desperately wounded in the head; and at the battle of the Nive he was shot in the neck. The medical board recommended his return to England; and in 1815 he was compelled, in consequence of his wounds, to retire upon half-pay. Died, 1836.

MEINERS, CHRISTOPHER, a German historian and miscellaneous writer, was born in 1747, at Warstade, Hanover; studied at Göttingen, where he became professor of philosophy; and died in 1810, pro-rector of that university. Among his numerous works are, "A History of the Origin and Progress of Philosophy among the Greeks;" "On the Origin and Decline of the Sciences among the Greeks and Romans;" and others on kindred subjects.

MEISSNER, AUGUSTUS THEOPHILUS, a German romance writer and dramatist, was born at Bautzen, in Lusatia, in 1757; studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg; and was, successively, keeper of the archives at Dresden, professor of belles lettres at Prague, and director of the superior schools at Fulda. Besides writing a number of historical romances and other works, he translated Hume's History of England into German. Died, 1807.

MELA, POMPONIUS, a Latin geographer, who lived in the first century of the Christian era. His treatise, in three books, "De Situ Orbis," contains a concise state of the world as far it was known to the Romans. By some authors he is supposed to have been related to Seneca and Lucan.

MELANCTHON, PHILIP, a celebrated German divine, coadjutor with Luther in the Reformation, and one of the wisest and greatest men of his age, was born at Brettau, in the palatinate of the Rhine, in 1497. He studied at Heidelberg and Tübingen; and, in 1518, was appointed Greek professor at Wittenberg, where he became the friend of Luther, and a convert to his doctrines. Their personal characters, however, were widely different; Melancthon being as remarkable for suavity of manners as Luther was for coarse impetuosity and unbending firmness. His judgment, ripened by classical study, his acumen, as a philosopher and critic, the uncommon distinctness and order of his ideas, which spread light and grace over whatever he discussed, the caution with which he advanced from doubt to certainty, and the steadfast zeal with which he held and defended the truth when found,—this combination of great qualities and merits, at all times rare, contributed greatly to the progress and success of the reformation. The Augsburg Confession was his work; and under the sanction of the elector of Saxony, he aided in framing a code of ecclesiastical constitutions. Even his theological opponents respected the virtues, the talents, the learning, and the mild temper of Melancthon; though some zealots naturally branded him with opprobrious terms for his tolerant spirit. He wrote numerous theological treatises, Latin poems, works on history, philosophy, &c. and died, at Wittenberg, in 1560.

MELAS, M. de, an Austrian general, who, in 1793 and 1794, served against the French, as major-general, and then as lieutenant field-marshal on the Sambre, and in the country of Treves. In 1795 he was removed to the army of the Rhine, and in March, 1796, to that of Italy, which he commanded for a short time, and afterwards served under different generals, who succeeded him. In 1799 he was at the head of the Austrian army, which acted in concert with the Russian under Suwarrow. He distinguished himself at the battle of Cassano; was present at those of Trebia and Novi; beat Championnet at Genola, and took Conl. Fortune at length turned against him, having, in 1800, lost the battle of Marengo. Though censured for his conduct on this occasion, he was still trusted by his sovereign, who appointed him commander in Bohemia; and he died in 1807.

MELCHTHAL, ARNOLD, OF, (so called from the place of his residence in the canton of Unterwalden), was the son of a rich farmer, who having been cruelly treated by the governor of the district, under Albert of Austria, Arnold conspired with two friends, Furst and Stauffacher, to effect the deliverance of their country; and to the plan which they formed, in 1307, was Switzerland indebted for the restoration of its ancient freedom.

MELDOLA, DR. RAPHAEL, the learned Jewish high rabbi of the ancient and chief synagogue in England, was eminent as a profound theologian and philosopher. At an early age he published an interesting work, called "Korban Minha," a literary comment on the service of high-priest, which is read in every synagogue on the fast day of Kippoor; and in 1796 a work of great importance, entitled "Hupat Hatzanim." This learned and good man was consulted by the rabbis of the nation, on all points of controversy. He died in 1828.

MELEADEZ, DON JUAN, an eminent Spanish poet, was born in 1734, at Ribera. He wrote three volumes of poems, which are distinguished for their graceful harmony, elegant diction, and rich imagery. He filled some public situations during the rule of Joseph Buonaparte; and on the retreat of the French from Spain, he left it with them, having, just as he was about to quit his native land, knelt down and kissed it, exclaiming, "I shall never tread thee more." He died at Montpellier, in 1817.

MELEAGER, a Greek poet, in the first century before the Christian era, was the author of epigrams and other short pieces, which are among the most beautiful relics preserved in the Grecian Anthology.

MELETIUS, a modern Greek geographer, born at Jannina, in Epirus, in 1661. He filled, successively, the archiepiscopal sees of Naupactus, Arta, and Athens; was the author of an "Ancient and Modern Geography," and an "Ecclesiastical History;" and died in 1714.

MELISSUS, a philosopher of Samos, who flourished about 444 B. C., and who is distinguished not only as a teacher of the Eleatic doctrines, but, in the history of his country, as a statesman and naval commander.

MELITUS, a Greek orator and poet, and the principal accuser of Socrates. The Athenians, out of compunction for their unjust treatment of that great man, put Melitus to death, B. C. 400.

MELLI, JOHN, a poet, denominated the Sicilian Anacron, was born at Palermo, in 1740, and destined for the medical profession; but his attachment to the belles lettres was so strong, that he arrived at no great eminence in his profession. At the age of fifteen he published a poem, entitled "The Gallant Fairy;" and among his works are idylls, eclogues, and canzoni. Died, 1813.

MELLON, HARRIET, Duchess of St. ALBAN'S, was born about the year 1773, and was the posthumous daughter of a Mr. Matthew Mellon, who held a commission in the East India Company's service, and whose widow married a Mr. Entwistle, a musician. Mrs. Entwistle, who was an accomplished woman, went on the stage;

her husband became leader of the band in various provincial theatres; and the services of the child, who was destined at a future day to become the wealthy duchess of St. Alban's, were put in requisition at a very tender age, in order to augment a scanty and precarious income. She passed her childhood in performing such characters as Prince Arthur in King John, the Duke of York in Richard the Third, &c.; and when advancing towards maturity, she personated the walking ladies, and occasionally characters of higher pretension. At length, while playing at Stafford, in Stanton's company, she was introduced to Richard Brinsley Sheridan, who had gone thither on an electioneering expedition; and as some of her friends there had both "votes and influence," he thought it worth his while to be no niggard in his promises of future patronage to the lady, whom they regarded as a highly deserving candidate for histrionic fame. She accordingly made her debut, at Drury Lane, in January, 1795, as Lydia Languish, in The Rivals; and although she attracted but little notice at first, she gradually rose in public estimation, and ultimately arrived at a degree of professional celebrity, particularly in characters of a vivacious or boyenish cast. When The Honeymoon came out, in January, 1805, the part of Violante was intended for Mrs. Jordan, but that lady refused to play it, and, at Elliston's recommendation, it was assigned to Miss Melton. Her performance of this character added much to her previous reputation; and as her circumstances soon afterwards suddenly improved in an extraordinary degree, it was asserted that she was the fortunate holder of a 10,000*l.* prize in the lottery. There were, however, some scandal-mongers who did not hesitate to say that the blue-coat-boy who presented it to her admiring eyes was Thomas Coutts, Esq., the wealthy banker. Certain it is, that a strong degree of friendship for years existed between them; and as Mr. Coutts made her his wife almost immediately after the death of his former one, which happened at the latter end of 1814, there can be no doubt of the sincerity of his attachment. In 1822 the venerable banker died, appointing his widow universal legatee, and bequeathing to her his share in the banking-house and business in the Strand, and all benefit and interests to arise therefrom. After her marriage she had to endure every species of abuse which slander and detraction could invent; but she wisely bore it all in silence; and now that she was regarded as a female Cressus, she was assailed by a host of unprincipled scribblers, who thought that by concocting and threatening her with the publication of a mass of prurient anecdotes, &c., some of the widow's loose cash might find its way into their pockets. She was not, however, to be thus intimidated; for, though by nature benevolent in a high degree, and practising true charity without ostentation, she had firmness and spirit enough to resist the attacks of these mercenary marauders. Rumour was soon busy in naming the fortunate savior of the banker's widow; till at length, in June, 1827, the question was put to rest by her marriage with William, duke of St. Alban's, then in the twenty-seventh year of his age. This union was attended throughout with the utmost harmony and affection, and the duchess was cordially received by the most exalted of the nobility. She died, Aug. 6, 1837, leaving the duke 10,000*l.* per annum, the house in Piccadilly, formerly inhabited by Sir Francis Burdett, and the estate at Highgate. This was in addition to the sum settled on him at the time of their marriage. The bulk of her immense property, including the half profits of the banking-house, the mansion in Stratton-street, and all her moveables, plate, diamonds, &c., she bequeathed to Miss Angela Burdett, youngest daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, and grand-daughter of Mr. Coutts, who has in consequence taken the name of Coutts. Independently of various legacies left to other members of Mr. Coutts's family, &c., the residue of property received by Miss Angela Burdett amounted to 1,800,000*l.*

MELMOTH, WILLIAM, an eminent advocate and an excellent writer, was born in 1686. He was a bencher of Lincoln's Inn, and in conjunction with Peere Williams, edited Vernon's Reports; but he is chiefly remembered now as the author of "The Great Importance of a Religious Life," a valuable little book which has gone through numerous editions. Died, 1743.

MELMOTH, WILLIAM, son of the preceding, was born in 1710. He published translations of Phny's and Cicero's Epistles, both of which were well executed. He was also the author of the "Letters," which bear the name of Sir Thomas Fitzosborne; some poems in Doddley's Collection, and Memoirs of his father. He was brought up to the law; became a commissioner of bankrupts; and died in 1790.

MELVIL, Sir JAMES, a statesman and historian, was the son of lord Keith, and born in 1530. He became page to Mary, queen of Scots, whom he attended in her last moments; afterwards he entered into the service of the duke of Montmorency. On his return to Scotland, in 1561, he was appointed privy counsellor, and gentleman of the bed-chamber, and continued her confidential servant until her confinement in Lochleven castle. He died in 1606; but his "Memoirs, containing the most remarkable Affairs of State," lay long unknown in the castle of Edinburgh, and were not published till 1683.

MELVILLE, ROBERT, a British general, was born in 1723, at Monimail, in the county of Fife; entered the army, in 1744, and served in Flanders till the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. In 1758, he was made major of the 38th regiment, then in Andalus, and soon after he was employed in active service, particularly in the invasion of Guadaloupe; for which he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-colonel; and, in 1760, appointed governor of the island. Not long after, he proceeded as second in command with lord Rollo to the capture of Dominica. In 1762, Martinico was taken, chiefly through his exertions; and the fall of that important colony was followed by the surrender of the other French islands. He was now made brigadier-general and governor-in-chief of all the captured possessions in the West Indies. After the general peace, he travelled over Europe, and made numerous observations to ascertain the passage of Hannibal over the Alps. He also traced the sites of many Roman camps in Britain; and he applied his knowledge of antiquity to the improvement of the modern art of war in several inventions. He was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies, and had the degree of doctor of laws conferred on him by the university of Edinburgh. In 1798 he was appointed a full general; and died in 1809.

MELVILLE, HENRY DUNDAS, viscount, the son of lord Armlstone, a Scotch judge, was born in 1740; received his education at the university of Edinburgh; was called to the bar; in 1773 became solicitor-general; and soon after was appointed to the offices of lord advocate, and joint keeper of the signet for Scotland. In 1782 he was made a privy-counsellor and treasurer of the navy; and from that time he took a leading part in all the measures of the Pitt administration. He was appointed president of the board of control, at its formation; in 1791, made secretary for the home department, and in 1794, secretary of war, which latter post he held till Mr. Pitt's retirement from office. He was then created a viscount; and when Mr. Pitt again became premier, he was made first lord of the admiralty. But a variety of charges had been got up against him by the opposition, and in 1805 he was impeached by the Commons; though he was acquitted of the alleged malversations, and only proved to have been negligent of his duty with respect to his agents, he took no further part in public affairs; and died in 1811.

MENAGE, GILLIS, a distinguished man of letters, was born in 1613, at Angers, where his father was king's advocate. He adopted the ecclesiastical character, so far as to be able to hold some benefices, without cure of souls. From this time, he dedicated himself solely to literary pursuits; and, being received into the house of cardinal de Retz, soon made himself known by his wit and erudition. He died in 1692, at the age of seventy-nine, leaving behind him some very able works, of a critical and philological nature. After his death, a "Menagiana" was compiled from notes of his conversation, anecdotes, remarks, &c., forming a most lively and interesting work.

MENANDER, the most celebrated of the Greek writers of comedy, was born at Athens, 342 B.C., and is said to have drowned himself, on account of the success of his rival Philemon, though some accounts attribute his death to accident, B.C. 290, in the harbour of the Piræus. He composed 106 comedies; but there are only a few fragments remaining of the numerous dramas of Menander; from whom, however, Terence is supposed to have copied the whole of his pieces, except the "Phormio," and "Hecyra." Quintilian expresses great admiration for this dramatist, eulogising him for copiousness of invention, elegance of expression, and a general fine feeling of nature.

MENDELSON, MOSES, a celebrated Jewish philosopher, commonly called the "Socrates of the Jews," was born of an honest but poor family, at Dessau, in 1729. He was bred to merchandize, but devoted himself to literature, in which he acquired a distinguished reputation. In 1785 he published his first piece, entitled "Jerusalem," in which he pretended that the principle of the Jewish religion is deism. His next work was "Phædon; or, a Discourse on the Spirituality and Immateriality of the Soul." He also wrote "Philosophical Dialogues," 2 vols.; "Letter to Lavater;" a dissertation "On the Sensation of the Beautiful;" "Morning Hours; or, Discourses on the Existence of God," &c. At one time he was associated with Lessing, Ramler, Abbot, and Nicolai, in conducting a periodical work, entitled "The Library of Belles Lettres," which acquired great distinction in German literature. He was remarkable for the philosophical mildness of his disposition, and for the excellence of his character; and he was accordingly esteemed by persons of the most opposite opinions.

MENDEZ, MOSES, an English poet, born in London of Jewish parentage; received a liberal education at Oxford, and was created M.A. in 1736. He wrote some very popular musical entertainments, and several poems, which were published in one volume. He was the intimate friend of Thomson; and died worth one hundred thousand pounds, in 1782.

MENDEZ-PINTO, FERDINAND, a celebrated traveller, was born in Portugal, of a respectable family. He departed for the Indies in 1537, and, on the voyage, the ship was taken by the Moors, who carried her to Mocha, where he was sold for a slave; but after some adventures he arrived at Ormus, and afterwards pursued his original object. In 1558 he returned to his native country, and published a very curious, but romantic, relation of his voyages, which has been translated into French and English. From his excessive credulity Mendez-Pinto has been classed with Sir John Mandeville; and for extravagant fictions his name has become a by-word.

MENDOZA, JOHN GONZALES, a Spanish divine, who was sent ambassador to the emperor of China, in 1584; and on his return became successively bishop of L'puri, in Italy; of Chiapa, in New Spain; and of Popayan, in the West Indies. He wrote "A History of China," in Spanish.

MENEDEMUS, a Greek philosopher, who was a native of the island of Eubœa. He became a disciple of Plato and Xenocrates; but afterwards joined the Cyrenaic sect. Died, B.C. 264.

MENGES, ANTHONY RAPHAEL, who has been called the Raphael of Germany, was born at Aussig, in Bohemia, in 1724. He studied under his father, who was painter to Augustus III., king of Poland, after which he went to Rome, where he was patronized by Charles III., king of Spain, for whom he executed a number of pictures. The best of his pieces in England is an altar-piece at All Souls' college, Oxford. Menges wrote some works on his art, which have been translated into English, in 3 vols.; and died, at Rome, in 1779.

MENINSKI, or MENIN, FRANCIS A MEXICAN, a learned orientalist, was born, in 1623, in Lorraine; studied at Rome; accompanied the Polish ambassador to Constantinople, in 1652, and acquired the Turkish language; became principal interpreter of the oriental languages at Vienna, and was entrusted with several important commissions. His principal work is a "Turkish, Arabic, and Persian Dictionary." Died, 1696.

MENIPPUS, styled by Lucian "the most snarling of the cynics," was a native of Gadara, in Palestine. He had been originally a slave, but purchased his freedom, and was made a citizen of Thebes. It is said that he hanged himself. His works were of a satiric kind, and written in prose, but none of them are now extant.

MENNES, Sir JOHN, an English poet and wit of the 17th century. He was a native of Sandwich, in Kent, and by profession a naval officer; was knighted by Charles I. and obtained the post of comptroller of the navy, but was removed from his station during the civil war. At the Restoration, however, he regained his appointment, and attained to the rank of admiral. His poetical productions are comprised in a small volume, entitled "Musarum Delicæ." Died, 1671.

MENNO, SIMON, or Simon's son, was the founder of the sect of Mennonites, or Dutch anabaptists. He was born in 1496, and was originally a Catholic priest. He maintained the necessity of rebaptism in adults; and denied that Jesus Christ received a human body from the Virgin. A price was set upon his head by Charles V., but he was fortunate enough to escape. He died at Oldesloe, near Hamburg, in 1563.

MENOCHIVUS, JAMES, an eminent civilian of Pavia, who was called the Baltus and Bartholins of his age. After being professor in several universities, he became president of the council at Milan, where he died in 1607, aged 75. His works are, "De recuperanda possessione, de adquirenda possessione;" "De Presumptionibus," 3 vols.; "De Arbitrariis Judicium questionibus, et causis Conciliorum."—His son, JOHN STEPHEN, became a jesuit, and died in 1656, aged 80. He wrote "Political and Economical Institutions;" a learned Treatise on the Hebrew Republic; and a "Commentary on the Holy Scripture," 2 vols., folio.

MENOU, JACQUES FRANÇOIS, Baron DE, a French revolutionary general, was born in Touraine, in 1780; entered the military service at an early age, and rose rapidly. He also figured as a politician, having, in 1793, been chosen by the noblesse of Touraine as their deputy to the states-general. Menou turned his attention particularly to the new organization of the army, and proposed to substitute a general conscription of the young men, in the room of the old manner of recruiting. In 1793 he resumed his military duties, and was second in command of the troops of the line, stationed near Paris. In 1793 he was sent against the insurgents of La Vendée, as general-in-chief, when he was beaten by La Roche-Jacquelin, and displayed such glaring incapacity, that he was superseded, and returned to Paris. After this, the obliquity of his conduct exposed him to a degree of accusation as a traitor to the Convention. He was, however, acquitted; and, in 1796, he accompanied Buonaparte in his expedition to Egypt, where he distinguished himself by his courage on several occasions. After the return of Buonaparte, he married the daughter of a rich bath-keeper of Rosetta, submitting to all the rites and ceremonies of Islamism, and adopting the name of Abdallah. On the death of general Kleber, he assumed the chief command, and, after gallantly opposing the British army, under Sir Ralph Abercromby, at Alexandria, he was at length obliged to capitulate. He returned to France in May, 1802, when Buonaparte received him favourably, and appointed him governor of Piedmont. He subsequently sent him to Venice in the same capacity; and he died there in 1810.

MENSCHIKOFF, ALEXANDER, a celebrated Russian statesman and general, was the son of a peasant, and born near Moscow, in 1674. Having attracted the notice of Lefort, he took him into his service, and, discerning his great powers, determined to educate him for public affairs. On the death of this patron, Menschikoff succeeded him in the favour of the czar. He was the companion of Peter in his travels; and on several occasions he personated the czar, who appeared as a private person in his train. In the war with Charles XII. of Sweden, Menschikoff was the conqueror of Meyerfeldt, a general of that monarch; he also distinguished himself at Lesnau, in 1708, and at the battle of Pultowa. He became first minister and general field-marshal, baron and prince of the German empire, and received the title of duke of Ingria. On the death of Peter, it was chiefly through the influence of Menschikoff that Catharine was raised to the throne, and that affairs were conducted during her reign. When Peter II. succeeded her on the throne, Menschikoff grasped, with a bold hand, the reins of government; but when his power was raised to its highest pitch, he was suddenly hurled from his elevation. Having embezzled a sum of money which the emperor intended for his sister, he was condemned to perpetual exile to Siberia, and his immense estate was confiscated. He died in 1729, two years after his banishment, having supported the hardships of his situation with great courage, and lived with such frugality, that out of his daily allowance of ten roubles, he saved enough to erect a small wooden church. His children were recalled by the empress Anne, and restored to an honourable rank in society.

MENTZEL, CHRISTIAN, a physician and botanist, was born at Furstenwald, in Germany. His zeal in the cause of science induced him to travel to many parts of the globe; and on his return to Germany he diligently recorded his observations. Among his works are, "Index nomina Plantarum;"

SOME PEOPLE MISTAKE GOOD BREEDING FOR AFFECTATION, AS THEY COMPOUND POPPERY WITH A REASONABLE ATTENTION TO DRESS.

MENZEL, FREDERIC WILLIAM, private secretary in the royal cabinet at Dresden, whose treachery hastened the breaking out of the seven years' war. His dissipated habits had plunged him into embarrassments; and, in consideration of a large sum of money, he delivered to the Prussian ambassador at the court of Saxony copies of the secret correspondence between Saxony, Russia, and Austria, relating to Prussia. He was at length suspected; and though he attempted to save himself by flight, he was arrested at Prague, on the demand of the court of Saxony, and confined in the castle of Konigstein, where he lived thirty-three years in the strictest custody. Towards the latter part of his life his condition was somewhat alleviated, by receiving better food, and permission to take the air occasionally; he was also relieved of the heavy chains which he had worn many years. He died in 1796, aged 70 years.

MENZINI, BENEDICT, an eminent Italian poet, born at Florence, in 1646. He was patronized, at Rome, by Christina of Sweden, and at her death found another protector in cardinal Albani. He died in 1704. Few of his countrymen excel him in Anacreontic odes, sonnets, elegies, or hymns; and his "Art of Poetry" has always had many admirers.

MERCADO, MICHAEL DE, a learned physician, was born in Tuscany, and became first physician to Clement VIII. and other popes; also keeper of the botanical garden of the Vatican, where he formed a fine cabinet of metals and fossils. He was raised to the rank of nobility by Ferdinand, grand duke of Tuscany. He wrote a treatise, "De gli Obelisch di Roma," and other works. Died, 1699.

MERCATOR, GERARD, a mathematician and geographer, born in 1612, at Rupelmonde, in the Netherlands. He published a great number of maps and charts, which he engraved and coloured himself; and is known as the inventor of a method of projection called by his name, in which the meridians and parallels of latitude cut each other at right angles, and are both represented by straight lines, which has the effect of enlarging the degrees of latitude, as they recede from the equator. Died, 1594.

MERCATOR, NICHOLAS, an eminent mathematician, was born at Holstein, about 1640. He settled in England, where he became fellow of the Royal Society; and died about 1690. His works are, "Cosmographia;" "Rationes Mathematicae;" "Hypothesis Astronomica;" "Logarithmothechia;" "Institutionum Astronomicarum," &c.

MERCER, HUGH, a brigadier-general in the American revolutionary army, was a native of Scotland, where he was liberally educated, studied medicine, and acted as a surgeon's assistant in the battle of Culloden. Not long after that event he emigrated to America, and was engaged with Washington in the Indian wars of 1755, &c. In one of the engagements with the Indians, general Mercer was wounded in the right wrist, and being separated from his party, he found there was danger of his being surrounded by hostile Indians, whose war-whoop and yell indicated their near approach. By almost a miracle he escaped, their observation while lying concealed, and afterwards pursued his course through a trackless wild of about one hundred miles, having nothing to subsist on but the body of a rattlesnake, which he met with on his way and killed. He distinguished himself in the war between the colonies and the mother country, and enjoyed the full confidence of Washington. In the affair of the Princetown, he commanded the van of the American army; and, after exerting the utmost valour and activity, had his horse killed under him. Being thus dismounted, he was surrounded by some British soldiers, whom he resisted with great spirit, but was overpowered, and left for dead on the field of battle. He, however, survived this contest about one week, and then died, regretted and honoured by his compatriots.

MERCIER, BARTHOLOMEW, known by the name of the abbé de St. Leger, was born at Lyons, in 1784. He entered into the religious society of St. Genevieve, of which he became librarian. Louis XV. gave him the abbey of St. Leger of Soissons, of which he was deprived and reduced to indigence in the revolution. He was an ingenious writer on bibliography and literary history; and died in 1799.

MERCIER, JOHN, a learned Hebrew critic of the 16th century, was born at Uzez, in Languedoc, and was destined for the profession of jurisprudence; but he relinquished that for the study of divinity and the oriental languages, and succeeded at Vatabulus in the Hebrew professorship at the Royal college, in Paris. He wrote "Commentaries on the Old Testament," and a "Chaldee Grammar." Died, 1573.

MERCIER, LOUIS SEBASTIAN, a French writer, was born at Paris, in 1740. He commenced his literary career as a poet, but soon renounced poetry for criticism. He attacked the reputation of Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire, in his "Essai sur l'Art Dramatique," and published a violent philippic against the comedians for paying no attention to his remarks. In 1781 he published, anonymously, the first volume of his "Tableau de Paris," after which he removed to Switzerland, and printed at Neuchâtel ten more volumes of that work. Returning home at the beginning of the Revolution, he declared himself a friend to liberty, and in concert with Carra he published "Les Annales Politiques," and "Chronique du Mois," two journals displaying both moderation and spirit. He was a member of the Convention, and voted for the detention, instead of the death, of the king; he was also a member of the Institute at its first formation. Died, 1814.

age to Surinam to draw the insects and reptiles peculiar to that country, of which, on her return, she published a description with beautiful coloured plates, in 2 vols. 4to. Her daughter, who accompanied her to Surinam, added a third volume to this work. The mother published another valuable performance "On the Generation and Transformations of the Insects of Surinam." Died, 1717.

MERIAN, JOHN BERNARD, perpetual secretary to the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin, was a native of Leichthal, near Hasi, and was invited from Holland to Berlin, in 1730, on the recommendation of Maupertuis. He enriched the Memoirs of the Berlin Academy with several papers on mathematical and philosophical subjects, one of the most distinguished of which is a parallel between the philosophy of Leibnitz and that of Kant. Died, 1807.

MERLIN, AMBROSE, a British writer, who flourished about the latter end of the fifth century. He was supposed to be an enchanter and a prophet; but the accounts we have of him are so mixed up with fiction, that to disentangle his real life from the mass would be impossible. He was the greatest sage and mathematician of his time, the counsellor and friend of four English kings, Vortigern, Ambrosius, Uther Pendragon, and Arthur. The miracles ascribed to him are numerous; and, instead of dying, it was supposed that he fell into a magic sleep, from which, after a long period, he would awake. In the British Museum is "Le Compté de la Vie de Merlin et de ses Faits et Compté de ses Prophéties," 2 vols. folio, on vellum, without date or place. We have also the "Life of Merlin, surnamed Ambrosius," by T. Heywood.

MERRET, CHRISTOPHER, a physician and naturalist, was born at Winchcombe, in Gloucestershire, in 1614. Having taken his degree of M.D., at Oxford, he settled in London, where he became a fellow of the College of Physicians, and of the Royal Society. Among his works are, "A View of the Frauds and Abuses committed by Apothecaries," and "Pinax rerum naturalium Britannicarum."

MERRICK, JAMES, a divine and poet, was born at Reading in 1720; was educated at Trinity-college, Oxford; and died in 1769. His principal works are, "Poems on Sacred Subjects;" "Annotations on the Psalms," and on the "Gospel of St. John;" "A metrical Version of the Psalms;" and a translation of Tryphiodorus.

MERRY, ROBERT, a dramatic writer, was the son of a merchant, and born in London, in 1755. He received his education at Harrow, and next at Christ's-college, Cambridge, after which he entered at Lincoln's Inn; but instead of being called to the bar, he bought a commission in the Guards, which service he also quitted, and went abroad. While at Florence he became a member of the Della Cruscan academy, and affixed that signature to a number of poems, which being published in the English newspapers, at length became the object of the caustic satire of Gifford, in his well-known "Bacchad and Maviad." In 1791 he married Miss Brunton, an actress, with whom he went to America, where he died in 1798. His dramatic compositions are, "Lorenzo," a tragedy; "The Magician no Conjuror;" "Fehelon;" and "Ambitious Vengeance."

MERSCH, VAN DER, leader of the Brabant patriots in 1789, was born at Menlin, and entered the French service, in which he acquired the title of "the brave Fleming." He afterwards served in the Austrian army, and rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. By a series of successful operations against the imperial troops in the Netherlands, Ghent and Brussels fell into his hands, and the chief command of the Belgian troops was entrusted to him. Through party intrigue, however, he was removed from his command, and thrown into prison, where he remained till the Austrians recovered possession of the country. Died, 1792.

MERSENNE, MARIN, usually called Mersennus, a French philosopher, was born at Oyse, in the province of Maine, in 1588. After studying at the college of La Flèche, he took the habit in the society of Minims, and became an eminent teacher of philosophy and theology in the convent of Nevers. He was warmly attached to Descartes, and corresponded with most of the scientific characters of his time. He wrote a variety of scientific works; and died in 1648.

MERTON, WALTER DE, a learned and magnificent prelate of the 13th century, and founder of the college which bears his name at Oxford, was born at Merton, in Surrey, and educated at the convent of that place. After obtaining several preferments, he became lord chancellor in 1258; was deprived of the seal the same year by the barons, but restored to it in 1261, and in 1274 consecrated bishop of Rochester. Died, 1277.

MESMER, FREDERIC ANTHONY, a German physician, author of the famous doctrine of animal magnetism, which is also called Mesmerism, was born in 1734, at Mersberg, in Suabia. He first made his doctrines known to the world, in 1766, by a thesis on planetary influence, in which he contended that the heavenly bodies diffuse through the universe a subtle fluid which acts on the nervous system of animated beings. He quitted Vienna for Paris, in 1778; gained a number of proselytes, and received a subscription of 340,000 livres. Government at length appointed a committee of physicians, and members of the academy of sciences, among whom was Franklin, to investigate his pretensions; and the result of their inquiries appeared in an admirable memoir, drawn up by Bailly, which completely exposed the fallacy of animal magnetism, and the quackery of its author, who died in 1815. His theory, however, has of late years again excited considerable attention on the continent, and has its advocates even in Great Britain.

MESSIER, CHARLES, a French astronomer, was born in 1730, at Badonviller, in Lorraine. For a considerable period he was an assistant to Delisle; but afterwards became astronomer to the navy. His at-tion was particularly directed to the discovery of comets; and in that he was eminently successful.

MESTON, WILLIAM, a burlesque poet, was born in 1688, and educated at Aberdeen; after which he became tutor to the young earl marshal and his brother, and was appointed professor of philosophy in the Marischal college, which situation he lost in 1713, by joining the Pretender. He was an excellent classical scholar and mathematician; but he is remembered chiefly by the burlesque poems, entitled "Mother Grim's Tales." Died, 1745.

METASTASIO, PIETRO ANTONIO DOMENICO BUONAVENTURA, an eminent Italian poet, born at Assisi, 1698, was the son of a common soldier, named Trapassi. When he was only ten years of age, his talent of extemporizing in verse attracted the notice of the celebrated Gravina, who took him under his protection, called him (by a translation of his name into Greek) Metastasio, paid great attention to his education, and, on his death, in 1717, left him his whole estate. The young poet, being thus placed in an easy condition, devoted himself to his favourite study, and, under the guidance of the celebrated singer Maria Romanina (afterwards Bulgarelli), created the modern Italian opera. Charles VI. invited him to Vienna in 1729, and appointed him poet laureate, with a pension of 4000 guilders. Thenceforward no gala took place at court which was not graced by his verses. The empress Maria Theresa bestowed upon him magnificent presents, as also did Ferdinand VI. king of Spain. Thus honoured and beloved, his life presented a calm uniformity for half a century, during which period he retained the favour of the imperial family undiminished, his extraordinary talents being admirably seconded by the calm tenor of his private character, and his constant observance of the conventional proprieties of high life. He composed no less than twenty-six operas, and eight sacred dramas, besides innumerable minor pieces. The poetical characteristics of Metastasio are sweetness, correctness, purity, gentle pathos, and elevated sentiment. He died in 1782.

METELLI, AUGUSTIN, an eminent painter, was born at Bologna, in 1609. He excelled in painting perspective and architecture; and, in conjunction with Michael Angelo, produced several great works. Metelli died at Madrid in 1650.

METELLUS, Q. CÆCILIVS, an illustrious Roman, who distinguished himself against Jugurtha, king of Numidia, and thence acquired the name of Numidicus.

METIUS, JAMES, a native of Alkmaar, in Holland, who invented telescopes about 1600.—His brother, ADRIAN, was professor of mathematics and medicine at Franeker, where he died in 1636. He wrote "Doctrina Sphærica;" "Astronomie Universæ Institutio;" "Arithmetica et Geometrica practica;" "Geometria per Usum Circuli nova Praxis," &c.

METKERKE, SIR ADOLPHUS, a distinguished classical scholar, was born at Bruges, in 1738. He was sent on an embassy by the United States to queen Elizabeth, and died in London, in 1891. He was the author of "De veteri et recta Pronunciatione Linguae Graecae Commentarius;" and he edited the works of Bion and Moschus, and translated Theocritus into Latin.

METO, or METON, an Athenian mathematician, who flourished 433 years a. C. in the first year of the 67th Olympiad, he observed the solstice at Athens, and invented the cycle of nineteen years, to make the solar and lunar years begin at the same time. This is now called the Golden Number, from its great use in the calendar.

METTRIE, JULIEN OFFRIE DE LA, a French writer, was born at St. Malo, in 1709. He was a surgeon in the French guards, and in that situation wrote an infamous book, called "The Natural History of the Soul;" for which he narrowly escaped prosecution. His next work was a satire against the faculty, under the title of Penelope; or, the Machiavel in Medicine; for which he was obliged to remove to Holland, where he created new enemies by a still more atrocious book, entitled "L'Homme Machine;" which being ordered to be burnt, he retired to Berlin, and was patronized by Frederic the Great, whose opinions were so congenial to the author's, that he composed his funeral eulogy with his own pen. Philosophers in general, however, attributed the notoriety he had acquired to his eccentricity and recklessness, rather than to any superior ability he possessed. Died, 1751.

METZU, GABRIEL, a celebrated painter, born at Leyden, in 1615, who took Gerard Douw, Terbury, and Mieris for his models, but adopted a more finished style. A lady tuning her lute, and another washing her hands in a silver basin held by her woman, are among his best pieces. He usually resided at Amsterdam, and died there in 1658.

MEULEN, ANTONY FRANCIS VAN DER, was born at Brussels, in 1634. By his talents as a painter of battle pieces he was recommended to Louis XIV., who always took him on his expeditions, and often pointed out the subjects which he desired him to represent. The painter had thus an opportunity of perfecting himself in this department of his art, but he had frequently to represent scenes which afforded but little scope for the display of genius. Died, 1690.

MEUNG, or MEUN, a French poet, surnamed, on account of his lameness, Clopinet, was born at Meung sur Loire, about 1250. By his poetical talents and vivacity, he rendered himself a favourite at the court of Philippe Bel. Having exercised his satiric powers upon the ladies of the court, they were so irritated against him, that a party of them seized him, and resolved to give him a severe flogging; but his wit came to his assistance, and he escaped castigation, by desiring the most unchaste to give him the first blow. He died about 1322. He was the author of several works, but his principal one was his continuation of the "Roman de la Rose," begun by William de Lorris, which comprises more than three parts of the whole.

MEURSIUS, JOHN, a learned Dutch critic, historian, and antiquary, was born in 1579, at Loudun, near the Hague; studied at Leyden; travelled over great part of the continent as tutor to the sons of the celebrated Barneveldt; and on his return, after a ten years' absence, was elected professor of history and Greek at Leyden, with the title of historiographer to the States-general. In 1625 he removed to the professorship of history and politics at Sorø, in Denmark, where, also, he was appointed historiographer royal. His works, which are chiefly on Athenian history and manners, form 12 vols. His "Eleusinia, sive de Ceteris Eleusiniæ Sacro et Festo," to which all who have since written upon that subject have been greatly indebted, is a very valuable work. Meursius died in 1639.—His son JOHN, who died at an early age, in 1653, was the author of several valuable antiquarian treatises.

MEUSEL, JOHN GEORGE, a famous German bibliographer, was born in 1743, at Eyrichshof, in Franconia. After completing his studies at the universities of Göttingen and Halle, he was appointed, in 1769, professor of history in the university of Erfurt; and he afterwards held a similar station at Erlangen, where he remained till his death, in 1830. He wrote statistical and historical works, and compiled several collections relating to the history of literature and literary men; but his principal works are, "Bibliotheca Historica," in 22 vols.; and "Gelehrte Teutschland," a bibliographical dictionary of German living authors, in 16 vols.

MEXIA, PEDRO, a chronicler to Charles V., was born at Seville. He was the author of a "History of the Cæsars, including the German emperors;" "Silvia de Varia Lección, &c." Died, 1532.

MEYER, JAMES, a Flemish historian, was born near Baillieu, in Flanders, in 1491, and died in 1552.

MEYER, FELIX, a German painter, was born in 1633. He painted some fine views after nature in Italy and Switzerland, and died in 1713.

MEYER, JEREMIAH, a miniature painter, was born at Tübingen, in 1735. He came to England in 1749, with his father, a portrait painter, who placed him under Zinck, the eminent painter in enamel, but he soon surpassed him. In 1761, the Society of Arts having offered a premium for the best drawing of a profile of the king, the prize was gained by Meyer; and he was afterwards appointed painter in enamel to their majesties. He was one of the founders of the Royal Academy; and died in 1789.

MEZERAI, FRANCIS EUGÈNE DE, a French historian, was born in Lower Normandy, in 1610, and educated at the university of Caen; on leaving which he obtained a military employment, and served two or three campaigns in Flanders. Having left the army, he projected the "History of France," in writing which he was liberally encouraged by cardinal Richelieu, and on its completion, in 1631, he obtained a pension from the king. In 1668 he published an "Abridgment" of his History; and by the freedom of some of his animadversions in it he displeased Colbert, and was deprived of his pension. He died in 1683. Besides his "History of France," he wrote a "Treatise on the Origin of the French;" and a "Continuation of the History of the Turks." As an historian, he is considered more bold than accurate, with a style harsh and incorrect, but clear, energetic, and occasionally exhibiting a vigorous conciseness.

MICHAELIS, JOHN HENRY, a German divine, was born at Kettenberg, in Hohenstein, in 1666. He was educated at Leipzig, and next at Halle, where he taught Greek and Hebrew. In 1699 he succeeded Francke in the Greek professorship, and, in 1707, was made librarian of the university. He afterwards became professor of divinity and the oriental languages. Died in 1736.

MICHAELIS, JOHN DAVID, a learned orientalist and biblical critic, was born at Halle, in Saxony, in 1717, and there educated. He visited England, and for a time was preacher at the German chapel, St. James's palace; and on his return to Germany was made professor of theology at Göttingen; was honoured with the order of the polar star, conferred on him by the king of Sweden; and was made an aulic counsellor of Hanover. Among the most valuable and best known of his works, are his "Introduction to the New Testament," translated into English by bishop Marsh; and his "Commentaries on the Law of Moses." Died, 1791.

MICHAELIS, CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, son of the preceding, was born at Halle, in 1754; studied at Strasburg; took the degree of M.D., and after practising medicine for some time at Paris, became an army physician in the Hessian service. He died in 1814, at Marburg, where he had been for several years chief medical professor.

MICHAUX, ANDRÉ, a French traveller and botanist; author of a "History of North American Oaks," and an "American Flora." He was born, in 1746, at Satory, near Versailles; spent many years in journeying through the United States; and died, in 1802, at Madagascar.

MICHEL, JAMES BARTHOLOMEW, an astronomer and mathematician, was born at Geneva, in 1692. He entered into the military service of France, and became a captain; but on the peace of Utrecht he retired to Switzerland, and devoted himself to the sciences. He constructed a number of charts and invented a new thermometer. Several of his papers on astronomy, meteorology, and mathematics, are in the Memoirs of the Helvetic Society of Basle. Died, 1766.

MICHEL, PETER ANTHONY, a botanist, was born at Florence, in 1679, and died there in 1737. He superintended the botanical garden founded by Cosmo de Medici, and was the institutor of a society of natural history at Florence. He published "Nova plantarum Genera."

MICKLE, WILLIAM JULIUS, a poet, was born, in 1734, at Langholm, in Dumfriesshire. At first he engaged in business as a brewer, but not succeeding, he went to London, and devoted himself to literature.

THE VALUE OF A GOOD NAME IS INESTIMABLE: HOW HIGHLY THEN SHOULD WE PRIZE, AND HOW CAREFULLY KEEP IT:

In 1765 he was employed as corrector of the press in the Clarendon printing-office at Oxford, where he published a poem, called "The Concubine," in imitation of Spenser, which he afterwards re-published under the title of "Sir Martyn." His principal production, a translation of "The Lusad" of Camoens, appeared in 1775; prefixed to which is a historical and critical Introduction, with a life of Camoens; and the work is executed in a highly creditable manner. He was also the author of many of the finest pieces in Evans's Old Ballads. In 1778 he accompanied his friend commodore Johnstone on a mission to Lisbon as secretary; and died in 1788.

MIDDLETON, WILLIAM, a Welsh poet, was born at Gwenynog, in Denbighshire, and died about 1600. He served in the armies of queen Elizabeth, and afterwards commanded a ship of war. He wrote a paraphrase of the book of Psalms in Welsh verse, and was also the author of the "Art of Poetry." Died, 1595.

MIDDLETON, SIR HUON, was the son of Richard Middleton, Esq., governor of Denbigh castle, under Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. He entered into business in London as a goldsmith; and rendered the most important service in supplying the city with water, by uniting two streams in Hertfordshire and Middlesex, and conveying the same through various soils for a course of sixty miles. This junction, called the New River, was begun in 1606, and completed in 1613. Died, 1631.

MIDDLETON, CONYERS, a celebrated divine and critic, was born at York, in 1662, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow. In 1717 he was created D.D. by mandamus, on which occasion he resisted the claim of Dr. Bentley, regius professor, to exorbitant fees. This occasioned a law-suit, in which Middleton triumphed. A personal enmity was the consequence of this affair; and when Bentley printed his proposals for a new edition of the Greek Testament, Middleton attacked them with such force that the design was abandoned. In 1724 he visited Italy, and having a near observation of the ecclesiastical pomp and ceremonies, he wrote his famous "Letter from Rome," to show that the religious rites of popery were very similar to those of paganism. He was subsequently Woodwardian professor of mineralogy, and librarian, at Cambridge. His greatest literary undertaking was "The History of the Life of M. T. Cicero," 2 vols. 4to., which ranks among the classical productions of our literature; but his "Free Inquiry into the Miraculous Powers of the Church," brought on the author the imputation of infidelity, and gave rise to much vehement censure from a host of opponents. He died in 1750.

MIDDLETON, THOMAS FANSHAW, first bishop of Calcutta, was born at Kedleston, in Derbyshire, in 1769; was educated at Christ's hospital, and at Pembroke hall, Cambridge; and, after having held various small livings, was, in 1809, collated to a stall in the cathedral of Lincoln, which was shortly after followed by the rectory of Pottenham, Herts, and the archdeaconry of Huntingdon. The government having determined on providing for the spiritual wants of British subjects in the east, Dr. Middleton was selected as the fittest person to take the important charge of bishop in that part of the world; he was accordingly consecrated at Lambeth, and in November, 1814, he arrived at Calcutta. In 1820 he laid the foundation stone of a church at Calcutta, near to which a school was erected for the Christian poor, and soon after arose, on the bank of the river, a college for the liberal education of youth. But in the midst of his unwearied efforts for the propagation of true religion, he was seized with a fever, and died in 1822. Among his writings are, "Sermons;" an erudite work on the "Greek Article;" and "The Country Spectator." He also for some time edited the new series of "The British Critic."

MIERIS, FRANCIS, a celebrated painter, born at Leyden, in 1635, and died in 1681. He was a pupil of Gerard Dow, whose delicate finish he rivalled, and whose colouring he is thought to excel. He had two sons, JOHN and WILLIAM, both of whom possessed considerable talent, and adopted their father's style.

MIGNARD, PETER, surnamed the Roman, an historical and portrait painter, was born at Troyes, in Champagne, in 1610. He studied at Rome; and, during his residence there of twenty-two years, enjoyed great favour from the popes. At length Louis XIV. sent for him to Paris; appointed him his principal painter, and director of the manufactories of Seve and the Gobelins; and ennobled him. Mignard was on habits of intimacy with the principal French wits, and was beloved by them for his social disposition. Died, 1694.

MIGNON, ABRAHAM, a painter of Frankfurt, was born in 1639, and died in 1673. He excelled in the representation of flowers, insects, and still life, which he painted with exquisite delicacy.

MIGNOT, STEPHEN, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Paris, in 1696. He received his degree of D.D. in 1723; was afterwards admitted a member of the Academy of Inscriptions; and died in 1771. His works consist of various histories relative to ecclesiastical disputes and church government, and an elaborate treatise in 3 vols. entitled, "Des prêtres de Commerce."

MIGNOT, VINCENT, the nephew of Voltaire, was born at Paris about 1730. Without being a priest, he obtained several benefices, among which was the abbey of Sellieres, in Champagne. He wrote "Histoire de l'Empire Ottoman, depuis son Origine jusqu'à la Paix de Belgrade, en 1740," 4 vols., &c. Died, 1790.

MILDMAY, SIR WALTER, a statesman of great integrity, who filled several situations under the Tudors. Under Henry VIII. he was employed in the court of augmentation; under Edward VI. he had an office in the Mint; in queen Mary's reign he sat in parliament as member for Cumberland; and in Elizabeth's, he was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, an office which he held for twenty-three years, and discharged with zeal and impartiality. He was the founder of Emanuel college, Cambridge; and died in 1589.

MILL, JOHN, a learned divine and biblical critic, was born at Shapp, in Westmoreland, in 1645; received his education at Queen's college, Oxford; became rector of Bletchington, in Oxfordshire, prebendary of Canterbury, and chaplain in ordinary to Charles II. He was employed thirty years in preparing his valuable edition of the Greek Testament, with various readings, for which he is said to have consulted upwards of thirty thousand MSS. He survived the execution of this great work only a fortnight, dying of an apoplexy in 1707.

MILL, JAMES, an able writer and political economist, was a native of Kincardineshire, and born in 1774. He first came to London as a tutor in the family of Sir John Stuart, but gave up that employment, and devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits. In 1818 he published his admirable "History of British India," a work of great research and powerful reasoning. He also produced other works connected with legislation and morals, viz. his "Elements of Political Economy;" an "Analysis of the Human Mind;" and another, entitled, "Prison and Prison-discipline, Colonies, Laws of Nations, and Education." He was also the contributor of many excellent articles in the Encyclopedia Britannica, and in the Edinburgh, Westminster, and London Reviews. In morals and legislation he was the powerful auxiliary of Jeremy Bentham; in political economy, the ally of Adam Smith and Ricardo; and in metaphysics he laboured to extend the philosophy of Bacon, Locke, &c. and the promoters of inductive science. He held the office of chief examiner to the East India Company; and his eldest son, who has the reputation of being an accomplished scholar, holds a high situation in the same office. Died, 1836.

MILLAR, JOHN, a learned writer, was born at Shotts, in Lanarkshire, in 1733, and educated at Glasgow, where, by the interest of lord Kames, in whose family he had been a tutor, he obtained, in 1751, the professorship of law, which he held for nearly forty years. He was the author of "The Origin of the Distinction of Ranks in Society;" and "An Historical View of the English Government."

MILLER, EDWARD, Mus. Doc. was the son of a paviour at Norwich, and bred to the same business; but having a dislike to it, he absconded, and became a pupil of Dr. Burney, who was then resident at Lynn. In 1756 he became organist of the church of Doncaster, where he remained till his death, in 1807. Dr. Miller published "Institutes of Music;" "The Elements of Thorough-Bass and Composition;" "The Psalms of David, set to music and arranged for every Sunday in the year;" and "The History and Antiquities of Doncaster."

MILLER, PHILIP, a gardener and botanist, was born in 1691. He succeeded his father as gardener to the company of apothecaries at Chelsea; and soon distinguished himself by his knowledge of plants.

He communicated some papers to the Royal Society, of which he became a member; and in 1730 he published "A Catalogue of Trees, Shrubs, Plants, and Flowers, in the Gardens near London." This was followed by his "Gardener's Dictionary," a work which is highly eulogized by Linnaeus, and through which its author obtained from foreigners the appellation of Hortulanorum Princeps. In 1755 appeared "Figures of Plants," adapted to the dictionary, in 3 vols. folio. His other works are the "Gardener's Kalender;" and "The Gardener's and Florist's Dictionary."

MILLER, JAMES, a political and dramatic writer, was born in Dorsetshire, in 1703. He received his education at Wadham college, Oxford; and while at the university, he wrote a satiric piece, called "The Humours of Oxford," which created him many enemies and hindered his preferment. He also published several political pamphlets against Sir Robert Walpole; and also some plays, the principal of which is the tragedy of "Mahomet." Died, 1744.

MILLER, JOSEPH, a witty actor, was born in 1684, and was a favourite low comedian about the time that Congreve's plays were fashionable, to the success of which, it is said, his humour greatly contributed. He died in 1738. The compilation called "Joe Miller's Jests" was the work of John Motley. The name has, however, not only been used to pass off the original stock, but thousands of other jokes and witticisms, manufactured long since the bones of Joe were deposited in the churchyard of St. Clements, in the Strand; where a stone still exists, with an epitaph written by his friend, Stephen Duck.

MILLES, Dr. JEREMIAH, an eminent English divine and antiquary; born, 1713; died, 1784. He was ardently engaged in the Chattertonian controversy, and published the whole of the supposed Rowley's poems, with a glossary.

MILLEVOYE, CHARLES HUBERT, a French poet, was born at Abbeville, in 1782, and displayed poetical talents at a very early age. Many of his pieces, particularly his elegiac compositions, are expressed by great feeling, elegance, and animation. Died, 1816.

MILLIN, AUBIN LOUIS, an eminent archæologist and naturalist, was born at Paris, in 1739. In the reign of Napoleon he made two antiquarian researches through France and Italy, where he discovered several remains which had been previously overlooked. He edited the "Magazin Encyclopedique" nearly twenty years, and was one of the founders of the Linnaean Society in Paris. His works are very numerous: among them the principal are, "Dictionnaire des Beaux Arts;" and "Galerie Mythologique." His lectures, which were fashionably attended, contributed, with his works, to diffuse a taste for the study of antiquities in France. Died, 1816.

MILLOT, CLAUDE FRANÇOIS XAVIER, a French historian, was born at Besançon, in 1726. He entered into the society of Jesuits, but quitted it in consequence of being illiberally treated, and officiated as a preacher at Vernallies and Luneville. For some time he held the professorship of history at Parma; but relinquished it to become preceptor to the duke of Enghien. His principal works are, "Elements of the History of France," 3 vols.; "Elements of the History of England," 3 vols.; "Elements of Universal History," 9 vols.; "History of the Troubadours," 3 vols.; and "Political and Military Memoirs towards the History of Louis XIV. and Louis XV.," 6 vols.

MILLS, CHARLES, an historian, was born at Greenwich, in 1788. He served his time as clerk to a solicitor, but relinquished his legal pursuits for others more congenial to his tastes. In 1817 he published his "History of Mohammedanism," which was succeeded by the "History of the Crusades;" the "Travels of Theodore Ducas;" and the "History of Chivalry."

MILMAN, Sir FRANCIS, M.D., F.R.S., an eminent physician, was the son of a clergyman in Devonshire, and born in 1746. He was designed for the church, but after taking the degree of M.A. at Oxford, he directed his attention to physic; graduated as M.D.; travelled on Dr. Radcliffe's foundation; and at Rome attended the duke of Gloucester. This circumstance fixed his professional pursuits, and on his return to England, he became a member of the royal society, and a fellow of the college of physicians. He was afterwards nominated physician to the royal household; which procured his elevation to the baronetage. Sir Francis was the author of "Animadversiones de Natura Hydrophis ejusque curatione;" and "A Treatise on the Source of the Scurvy, and Putrid Fever." Died, 1821.

MILNE, COLIN, a divine and naturalist, was born at Aberdeen, and educated at the Marischal college. Having been tutor to lord Algernon Percy, he obtained, through the interest of the Northumberland family, the rectory of North Chapel, in Essex. His "Botanical Dictionary;" "Indigenous Botany;" and "Institutions of Botany," are all in high repute with those who are versed in the science. Died, 1815.

MILNER, JOSEPH, a Calvinistic divine, was born at Leeds, in 1744; received his education there, and at Catharine hall, Cambridge; was successively master of Hull grammar school, evening lecturer, and vicar of the Holy Trinity. He was the author of a "History of the Church of Christ;" and "Sermons." Died, 1797.

MILNER, ISAAC, brother of the preceding, an episcopal divine, a mathematician, and natural philosopher, was born at Leeds, in 1751. In his youth he was a weaver; but availing himself of his leisure hours in acquiring a knowledge of the classics and mathematics, he made such progress as to become usher to his brother, at Hull. He afterwards entered as a sizer at Queen's college, Cambridge; became senior wrangler in 1774, and gained the first mathematical prize. In 1783 he was chosen professor of natural philosophy, president of his college in 1786, and about the same time he obtained the deanery of Carlisle. He was subsequently vice-chancellor of the university, and Lucasian professor of mathematics. Dr. Milner wrote against Marsh, in favour of the Bible Society; and contributed many excellent papers on chemistry and natural philosophy to the Philosophical Transactions.

MILNER, JOHN, a celebrated Catholic divine, and writer on ecclesiastical antiquities and theology, was born in London, in 1752. His education commenced at the schools of Sedgley-park, near Wolverhampton, and Edgbaston, near Birmingham; and he finished his studies at Douay. In 1777 he was ordained a priest, and commenced his pastoral duties, in 1779, at the Catholic chapel, Winchester, whither he had gone to administer spiritual aid to the French prisoners confined there. In 1782 he published a funeral discourse for bishop Challoner, which was his first production; this was followed, in 1785, by "A Letter to the Author of a Book, called a Candid and Impartial Sketch of the Life and Government of Pope Clement XIV." Dr. Milner's attachment to the study of ancient ecclesiastical architecture led him to an attentive observation of the remains of Catholic antiquity with which Winchester abounds; and the learning and skill which he displayed procured for him the honour of admission into the Royal Society of Antiquaries, in 1790. He contributed many valuable communications to the "Archæologia;" and, in 1796, he evinced his zeal for the preservation of the relics of former ages by the publication of a "Dissertation on the modern Style of altering Cathedrals, as exemplified in the Cathedral of Salisbury." The same year he published his "History, Civil and Ecclesiastical, and Survey of the Antiquities of Winchester," 2 vols. 4to.; and subsequently, a "Treatise on the Ecclesiastical Architecture of England during the Middle Ages." Some observations on the character of bishop Hoadley, and other subjects in the "History of Winchester, gave offence to Dr. Sturges, a prebendary of the cathedral, who animadverted on them in a tract entitled "Reflections on Popery." Dr. Milner replied to this attack in his "Letters to a Prebendary," which, like his writings in general, display great learning, ability, and acuteness, with an unflinching zeal for the doctrines of the papal church. In 1803 he was appointed vicar-apostolic in the midland district, with the title of "bishop of Castabala." In 1814 he visited Rome, where he remained about twelve months. In 1818 he published a treatise, entitled "The End of Religious Controversy," containing a defence of those articles of the Catholic faith usually regarded as most objectionable by Protestants; and he continued not only in the active exercise of his prelatical duties, but occasionally to publish theological and controversial treatises till a short time previous to his death, which took place in 1826.

cited, of which one will be sufficient to notice here; viz., that he once carried a bull to the sacrifice on his shoulders, and killed it with a blow of his fist.

MILORADOWITCH, MICHAEL ANDREW-WITCH, count of, a distinguished Russian officer, was born in 1770. He entered the service at an early age, and rose rapidly; in 1799 he commanded the vanguard of Suwarrow's army in Italy; acted as lieutenant-general in the battle of Austerlitz; fought victoriously against the Turks, in 1808; and was of the greatest service in the campaigns of 1812, 1813, and 1814. After the peace, he was appointed military commandant of St. Petersburg; and, in 1825, at the accession of the emperor Nicholas, he was killed by a pistol-shot.

MULTIADES, an Athenian general, who lived about B.C. 500, and has been immortalized by defeating the Persians at Marathon. This hero, who had saved his country, failed in an attack on Paros, was compelled to refund the expenses of the expedition, and died of his wounds in prison.

MILTON, JOHN, the most illustrious of English poets, was the son of a scrivener in London, and born in Bread-street, in 1608. From St. Paul's school he went to Christ's college, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, being designed for the church; but not having an inclination to that calling, he returned to his father, who had retired from business with a good fortune, and settled at Horton, in Buckinghamshire. Here our poet wrote his "Comus," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," and "Lycidas," poems of such merit as would have alone immortalized his name. In 1639 he travelled into France and Italy, and on his return to England, settled in London. The troubles breaking out between the king and parliament, Milton engaged as a political writer on the popular side; and having a great animosity to the hierarchy, he published some virulent pamphlets against the bishops. In 1643 he married the daughter of Richard Powell, Esq., a magistrate in Oxfordshire. The father of the lady being a jovial country gentleman and a royalist, the residence of her husband so disgusted the bride, that, in less than a month, under the pretence of a visit, she left him, and remained for the rest of the summer with her parents. Milton became incensed, and regarding her conduct as a desertion of the marriage contract, he sought to punish it by repudiation; and to this is to be attributed his treatises on the subject of "Divorce." His wife's friends, however, brought about a reconciliation. He continued an ardent champion for the rebellious party, even after the murder of Charles I., which sanguinary deed he vindicated in his "Tenure of Kings and Magistrates;" but he was not disinterested in this; for the parliament rewarded him with one thousand pounds, and soon afterwards nominated him Latin secretary to the new council of state. He also wrote with great asperity against the king's book of prayers and meditations, entitled "Icon Basilike." The treatise of Milton was called "Iconoclastes," or the Image Breaker; in which he calumniated the king for having made use of a prayer taken from "Sidney's Arcadia." He was next employed to answer the treatise of Salmasius, entitled "Defensio Regia," or a Defence of the late King. The reply of Milton had for its title "Defensio pro populo Anglicano;" and it was observed by Hobbes, in regard to the two disputants, that he did not know whose style was best, or whose arguments were worst. About this time he was wholly deprived of his sight, owing to a natural weakness, and intense application to his studies. In 1652 he lost his wife, and soon afterwards took another. Though he was a determined republican, and wrote with energy and intemperance against monarchical government, "the very trappings of which," he said, "would support a commonwealth," yet he readily submitted to the usurpation of Cromwell, to whom he became Latin secretary. Milton endeavoured to prevent the Restoration; which event he had undoubted cause to dread, considering the active part taken by him in the rebellion. And when the ancient constitution was re-established, he was excepted out of the act of indemnity, on which he kept himself concealed for some time. By the kindness, however, of Sir William Davenant, and others, he obtained his pardon; soon after which he lost his second wife, and was not long without another. In the time of the plague he removed with his family to Chalfont, in Buckinghamshire, where he completed his "Paradise Lost," which was printed first in 1667. For this immortal work he had only fifteen pounds, and that by instalments. For the idea of it he is said to have been indebted to an Italian drama on the Fall of Man; and it is certain that he had himself an intention at first of writing only a tragedy on the same subject. As the work grew under his hand, his soaring genius gave it the form and consistence, the variety and elegance, of an epic poem. After this he engaged in another, called "Paradise Regained;" the occasion of which was as follows: John Elwood, the quaker, who was his amanuensis, calling upon him at Chalfont, and the conversation turning upon Milton's great work, Elwood observed, "Thou hast said much upon Paradise Lost, but what hast thou to say upon Paradise Found?" Milton paused, and the next time they met, he showed Elwood the latter poem, saying, "This is owing to you." The "Paradise Regained," though possessing many beauties, is in all respects inferior to the "Paradise Lost;" yet it is remarkable that the author gave it the preference. Milton died at his house in Bunhill-row, in 1674, and lies interred in the parish church of St. Giles, Cripplegate, where there is a monument to his memory, and another in Westminster-abbey, erected by William Benson. Besides the poems mentioned above, Milton wrote a drama on the Greek model, entitled "Samson Agonistes," which possesses uncommon beauties, though not adapted to theatrical representation. He also wrote a "History of England," to the Conquest; and several tracts. In his youth Milton was distinguished for personal beauty; his habits of life were those of a student and philosopher, being strictly sober and temperate; and his chief relaxation consisted of music and conversation. Though warm and acrimonious in controversy, and possessing lordly notions of his rights as the head of a family, he is said to have been of a serene and cheerful temper, and particularly urbane in his intercourse with society. But whatever may be thought of his domestic virtues, there can be but one opinion with regard to the sublimity of his genius, and the extent of his erudition.

MILTON, WILLIAM CHARLES, viscount, eldest son of earl Fitzwilliam. He was elected to parliament for Malton in 1832, and succeeded to the representation of Northamptonshire on his father's accession to the peerage in 1833. Died, Nov. 1835.

MINNERMUS, a Greek amatory poet of the sixth century B.C., who is said to have invented the pentameter measure; but only a few fragments of his poems are in existence.

MINA, Don FRANCISCO EPOZ Y, a distinguished Spanish general, who, for a long time, was commander-in-chief of the Catalan army, was a native of Navarre, and born in 1792, at Ydoxien, near Pampeluna. His nephew, Don Xavier Mina, a student at the university of Saragossa, first attracted notice in the war against the French invaders, by his courageous exploits at the head of a guerilla corps, which he had raised; but being taken prisoner in March, 1810, the command of the corps was transferred to Francisco, who soon rendered his name the terror of the enemy, by the harassing nature of guerilla warfare, and the incessant activity and admirable presence of mind he displayed. All the efforts of the French generals, backed as they were by vastly superior numbers, were unavailing; and though Napoleon had resolved to exterminate his division, and poured into Navarre 25,000 men for the purpose, Mina stood his ground, and eventually remained master of the province. Having co-operated in the blockade of Pampeluna, and recovered Saragossa and several other places, he had the mortification to find that, at the general peace in 1814, he had been labouring only to re-establish the despotic policy of Ferdinand VII., and he made an ineffectual effort in the cause of freedom to gain over the garrison of Pampeluna. He then sought an asylum in France; but whilst resident in the French capital, he was arrested by a commissary of police, employed by the Spanish ambassador. On this occasion the conduct of Louis XVIII. was most honourable: he dismissed the commissary, insisted upon the ambassador being recalled, and not only released Mina, but granted him a pension of 1000 francs. When the army of Cadiz, in 1822, unfurled the standard of freedom, by proclaiming the constitution of 1812, Mina hastened to Navarre, and was advancing against Pampeluna, at the head of a few hundreds of followers, when he was informed that the king had accepted the constitution. He was subsequently appointed captain-general of the three armies of Navarre, Catalonia, and Arragon; but when, by the intervention of France, Ferdinand was again enabled to discard his professed adherence to the constitution, Mina left Spain for England, and arrived at Plymouth, Nov. 30, 1823. After the accession of Christina, he took an active part against Don Carlos; but many of his measures partook of the general sanguinary character of this unnatural warfare, and tended to tarnish the laurels he had formerly so nobly won. He suffered much from illness during the four months previous to his death, which happened in December, 1836. His body was interred at Barcelona, with all the honours due to his military fame. By a royal decree his widow was raised to the rank of a countess, and the Cortes settled a handsome pension both on her and on Mina's mother, who, at the time of his death, was in her 90th year.

MINOT, LAURENCE, an English poet, who flourished in the 14th century, whose works lay in obscurity, as well as his name, till accident discovered them to Mr. Tyrwhitt, while he was preparing his edition of Chaucer. A complete edition of them was published by Ritson, in 1794.

MINUCIUS FELIX, MARCUS, a rhetorician and writer of the third century, who is said to have been a native of Africa, and a lawyer by profession. He lived at Rome, where he wrote a dialogue in defence of Christianity, entitled "Octavia," which possesses very considerable merit, and was long ascribed to Arnobius, till Baudouin discovered the real author, in 1540. Another treatise, "De Fato," has also been ascribed to him.

MIRABAUD, JEAN BAPTISTE DE, perpetual secretary to the French academy, was at first a member of the congregation of the oratory, and afterwards served in the army. His works are, Translations of "Tasso's Jerusalem;" and "Ariosto's Orlando," into French; Alphabet de la Fee Gracieuse; "Le Monde, son Origine, son Antiquite;" "Sentimens des Philosophes sur la Nature de l'Ame." In 1770 was published under his name, but falsely, an atheistical book, entitled the "System of Nature," in 2 vols., the real authors being Diderot and D'Holbach.

MIRABEAU, VICTOR RICHETTI, marquis de, descended from an ancient family in Provence, but originally of Naples. He was one of the principal propagators of the doctrines of the French political economists, and wrote several books in support of them. His chief work is entitled "Ami des Hommes." Born, 1718; died, 1788.

MIRABEAU, HONORE GABRIEL RICHETTI, count de, one of the most celebrated characters of the French revolution, was the son of the preceding, and born at Bignon, in Provence, in 1748. On leaving school, he entered the military service; and his intercourse with young and dissipated officers familiarized him to all their vices. His active mind, however, could not remain idle, and he read all the books which he could on the military art. He also fell in love; and his passion was marked by all the impetuosity of a strong and wild character. His father, who systematically thwarted his inclinations, now procured his confinement in a fortress on the island of

Rhé. After his liberation, he went, as a volunteer, to Corsica, distinguished himself, and obtained a commission as captain of dragoons; but his father refusing to purchase him a regiment, he abandoned, though unwillingly, the military profession. In 1772 he espoused a rich heiress of Aix, but he soon squandered away the fortune he received with her, and plunged himself in debt. He was confined in different prisons, and on obtaining his liberty, eloped to Holland with the wife of the president Moanvier. For this he was afterwards imprisoned in the castle of Vincennes, and remained there three years and a half. He then instituted an ineffectual law-suit against his wife, who obtained a separation from him. In 1784 he visited London, and afterwards Berlin; and he was variously employed in literary quarrels and occupations till the commencement of the French revolution. This offered Mirabeau an ample element for his activity. Imbibing the delusive doctrine of equality, and being disappointed in his attempts to become a deputy to the states-general from the noblesse of Provence, he opened a shop, over the door of which was inscribed, "Mirabeau, dealer in drapery." He was now elected deputy of the third estate of Aix, and by the courtiers he was termed the plebeian count. In this new capacity, his extraordinary eloquence, his talent, and his boldness, soon gave him irresistible weight in the assembly, and rendered him the idol of the people. At length, he entered into a treaty with the court, to use his influence in stopping the progress of republicanism. He required a pension of 40,000 francs a week, and the promise of such a diplomatic or ministerial post as he should select, after the re-establishment of the royal authority. These demands were conceded, and he received the pension for several weeks. It was agreed that a dissolution of the assembly should be effected by an expression of the will of the nation, and that a new assembly should be convoked, composed of men of more moderate opinions. Before, however, he could carry his intentions into effect, a sudden illness terminated his existence, in 1791. His remains were honoured with a public funeral, and deposited in the Pantheon. His principal works are, "A Comparison between the great Condé and Scipio Africanus;" "History of Prussia under Frederic the Great," 8 vols.; "Original Letters containing an account of his Life and Amours," 4 vols.; "Secret History of the Court of Berlin," 2 vols., which book was burnt by the common executioner; "On Lettres de Cachet;" and an "Essay on Despotism." Mirabeau was the creature of his passions; yet he possessed an energy and decision which yielded to no opposition, and an audacity of purpose which shrank before no difficulties.

MIRABEAU, BONTAPPE RIQUETTI, viscount, younger brother of the preceding, was born in 1754; served in the French army against the English in America, but did not imbibe revolutionary principles therefrom. Being chosen a deputy to the states-general from the nobility of Limousin, he constantly resisted the re-union of the three orders, defended the rights of the clergy, and opposed the progress of the revolution. In 1790 he emigrated to Germany, and raising a legion of loyalists, he joined the prince of Condé, and served under him with great reputation; but he was unequal to the fatigues to which he was exposed, and died in 1792.

MIRANDA, DON FRANCESCO, a general in the service of the French republic, and the earliest martyr in the cause of freedom in South America, was born at Caracas, of an ancient Spanish family. He presented to different courts plans for the emancipation of the Spanish American colonies, and with this view went to Paris in 1792, where he connected himself with Petion and the Girondists. While waiting for an opportunity to commence operations in America, Miranda was appointed general of division, under Dumouriez. Some time after, he was imprisoned in consequence of his political intrigues. In 1794 he was liberated; but a few months only had elapsed before he received orders to quit France for renewed machinations. This order he evaded; but a second sentence of deportation, in 1797, obliged him to take refuge in England. In 1803 he returned to Paris, and was again banished, for taking part in an opposition to the first consul. Miranda now devoted himself, with all the energy of his character, to the accomplishment of a long cherished scheme, for overthrowing the Spanish dominion in America. Having procured some secret assistance, he sailed from New York in 1806, with one ship and a number of volunteers, and landed in Venezuela; but his attempts to rouse the inhabitants were altogether unsuccessful, and he found himself compelled to re-embark. In 1810, he renewed his attempt with more success, but was finally obliged to capitulate to the Spanish general Monteverde, who, in violation of the articles of surrender, treated him as a prisoner. Miranda was sent to Spain, and confined in the dungeons of the Inquisition at Cadiz, where, in 1816, he died, after an imprisonment of four years.

MIRANDOLA, GIOVANNI PICO DELLA, count and prince of Concordia, one of the brightest ornaments of literature in the fifteenth century, was born in 1463. In his youth he gave astonishing proofs of his genius; and when little more than twenty, he set up in all the universities of Italy a number of difficult problems in the sciences, which he engaged publicly to defend. This extraordinary young man died in 1494, at Florence, where he had resided some time, on terms of intimacy with the most learned and distinguished men of the age, particularly Lorenzo de' Medici and Politian.

MISSON, MAXIMILIAN, was an eminent French lawyer, who distinguished himself by his pleadings before the parliament of Paris, in behalf of the Protestants. He retired to England on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and afterwards travelled as tutor to an English nobleman. He published "A Voyage to Italy," 3 vols.; "A Tour in England;" and "Le Theatre sacré des Cévennes," in which the author betrayed his credulity and fanaticism by es-

MITAN, JAMES, an historical engraver of some celebrity. Born in London, 1776; died, 1822.

MITCHELL, JOSEPH, a dramatic writer, was born in Scotland, in 1684. He was patronized by Sir Robert Walpole, but died poor, owing to his extravagance and dissipated habits, in 1730. He wrote "The Fatal Extravagance," a tragedy; "The Highland Fair," a ballad opera; and "Poems," in 2 vols.

MITCHELL, Sir DAVID, an eminent naval commander in the reign of William III., was descended from a respectable family in Scotland. He commanded the Elizabeth of 70 guns at the battle of Beachy-head, where he behaved with great gallantry. In 1693 he was made rear-admiral of the blue, and in 1694 had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him. He was employed in bringing over to England and carrying back Peter the Great, czar of Muscovy, and was also sent on a diplomatic mission to Holland. He died, in 1710.

MITCHELL, JAMES, minister of the Scottish Presbyterian church at Wooler for half a century; and in the early part of his life he was private tutor to Sir Walter Scott. Died, 1835.

MITCHELL, ANDREW, a British admiral, born in Scotland, about 1737. In 1776 he accompanied Sir Edward Vernon to India, as a midshipman; and while there his services were such that he was rapidly advanced to the rank of post-captain. On the commencement of hostilities with the French republic, he was appointed to the command of the Asia, of 64 guns, and next to the Impregnable, of 90. In 1795 he was made rear-admiral; and, in 1799, soon after his promotion as vice-admiral of the white, he joined Lord Duncan off the coast of Holland, and entering the Texel, the Dutch fleet surrendered to him without firing a shot. He was now created a knight of the Bath; in 1803 he was appointed commander-in-chief off the coast of America; and he died, at Bermuda, in 1806.

MITFORD, WILLIAM, an eminent historical and philological writer, was born in London, in 1734; studied at Queen's college, Oxford, and then at the Middle Temple; but he early quitted the profession of the law, and obtained a commission in the Hampshire militia, of which he rose to be colonel. He was, successively, M.P. for Newport, in Cornwall, Beeralston, and New Romney. He was professor of ancient history at the Royal Academy; and, besides his principal work, "The History of Greece," he published "An Essay on the Harmony of Language;" "A Treatise on the Military Force, and particularly the Militia of this Kingdom;" "Observations on the History of Christianity," &c. Died, 1827.

MITFORD, JOHN FREEMAN, baron REDDALE, of Reddale, in the county of Northumberland, an eminent English lawyer and statesman, was born in 1748. He was educated at New college, Oxford, and having studied at Lincoln's Inn, he was called to the bar. Devoting himself to chancery practice, he soon obtained a high reputation; and in 1782, he published "A Treatise on Pleadings in Suits in the Court of Chancery." He was afterwards made a Welsh judge. In 1789 he was chosen M.P. for Beeralston; in 1793 he was appointed solicitor-general, and in that capacity he assisted in conducting the state trials of Hardy, Horne Tooke, and Thelwall. He succeeded Sir John Scott (lord Eldon) as attorney-general, in 1799; and in 1801, when he sat in parliament for the borough of East Looe, he was chosen speaker of the House of Commons, on the resignation of Mr. Addington. In 1802 he was raised to the peerage, and made lord chancellor, and a member of the privy council in Ireland; but he resigned the seals in March, 1806, in consequence of the death of Mr. Pitt. He died in 1830.

MITFORD, JOHN, a miscellaneous writer, better known by the familiar appellation of "Jack Mitford," was a striking exemplar of those modern storks, who seem determined to exalt the literary character, by a virtuous self-denial in all matters relating to gastronomy, and by an utter contempt of the vanities of life as regards external adornment. In sober seriousness (and the subject is indeed a serious one for a reflecting mind), Mitford's was a melancholy instance of degradation and penury, consequent on the loss of character and the misapplication of talent; but while we reflect that his misfortunes were the result of his own misconduct, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact, that hundreds of well-educated men, with intellectual endowments not a whit inferior to his, and with characters unstained by prodigality, are compelled to undergo privations scarcely less severe, and drag on their miserable existence, uncheered even by a distant ray of hope. Alas! such is the actual state of many who have sought to depend on but the productions of the brain; and though, for their relief in cases of the utmost emergency, London can boast of a noble institution, and one that is nobly supported too, so little can it effect towards the alleviation of this awfully-increasing calamity, that the task of those who undertake to dispense its bounties, is rendered as perplexing as it is gratifying. But to return from this digression. At an early age John Mitford entered into the royal navy, where he attained the rank of lieutenant; fought under Hood and Nelson; and at the end of the war retired on half-pay. But having, during the early investigation into the conduct of queen Caroline, been detected as the fabricator of some letters, and thereby lost not only his rank and emoluments, but also his station in society, he had to depend for support on his literary talents. It appears that his versatility was such, that it was a matter of little consequence to him, whether his theme were grave or gay, while the facility with which he wrote verse was really extraordinary; thus we find him editing the "Scourge" and "Bon Ton Magazines," and other works of a similar cast, while he edified the world by his contributions to religious periodicals, or charmed it by those lyric effusions, which were graced by the classic typography of a St. Giles's press, and rendered popular by the sweet voices of itinerant vocalists. It is not our intention to lengthen this notice by a recital of a variety of anecdotes illustrative of his erratic career, or the misery of his situation. It is sufficient to describe the method that it was thought necessary to adopt during the composition of his principal work, entitled "Johnny Newcome in the Navy," a poem descriptive of sea life. Johnstone, the publisher of it, well knew, that so long as Mitford had any cash in hand, not a line of the intended work would be written. He, therefore, each morning sent him a shilling, and a certain quantity of paper, which the poet engaged to fill with rhymes, and deliver at night. It was in the summer, and, fortunately for him, the weather was dry; he accordingly took up his lodging in a gravel pit, near the water-works, in Bayswater-fields; and there, having daily supplied himself with some bread and cheese, and as much gin as his finances would permit, he remained, day and night, till he had finished his task. He died in St. Giles's workhouse, December, 1831. [A reviewer, whose flattering notice of this volume deserves our thanks, threw out a hint, in alluding to the foregoing sketch, that the actions of a literary vagabond are no more worthy of biographical record than the exploits of a highwayman. Now this, in the abstract, is true; but we believe that the life of J. Mitford (as we have given it) is likely to operate as a salutary warning to any one, however ardent, vain, or thoughtless he may be, who imagines that literary distinction or independence can be attained by a course of idleness or dissipation.]

MITHRIDATES, king of Pontus, surnamed the Great, ascended the throne at the age of thirteen years, B.C. 134, and when he became of age, travelled through Asia, partly to learn the customs, laws, manners, and languages of the inhabitants, and partly to examine the territories of his neighbours, of which he meditated the conquest. After an absence of three years, he returned, attacked Paphlagonia, and divided it with his ally, the king of Bithynia. The Romans, who had declared the country free, threatened him with a war; but Mithridates was so little alarmed at this menace, that he even possessed himself of Gataia, which had placed itself under the protection of Rome. After various acts of perfidy and aggression, Mithridates declared himself against the Romans, suddenly fell upon Cappadocia and Bithynia at the same time, and was successful at the opening of the war. Sylla and Lucullus, however, prevailed against him, and he acceded to a very humiliating peace, but soon renewed the war against Murena, and though defeated by that general, obtained some ultimate advantages. The war continued to rage with alternate success, till at length Pompey obtained a great victory over him, near the Euphrates, B.C. 66. Mithridates fled to Tigranes, who had before been one of his most efficient allies, but that monarch now refused him an asylum. He then took refuge in the dominions of a Scythian prince, and sent ambassadors to Pompey to sue for peace, but the Romans insisted upon having his person. Meanwhile, an insurrection broke out in his army, and his son Pharnazes was proclaimed king. Unable to reduce the rebels to their duty, and seeing no hope of retrieving his fortunes, he threw himself on his sword B.C. 64, having ruled Pontus fifty-nine years.

MITZLER, LAURENCE CHARLES DE KOLLO, an eminent German musical composer, was born at Vettlesheim, in 1711; received his education at Anspach; and, in 1731, removed to the university of Leipzig, where he not only perfected himself in musical science, but made a considerable proficiency in mathematics and natural philosophy. He afterwards settled at Warsaw, where he became so great a favourite at the court, as to obtain from the king a patent of nobility. His principal works are, "A Musical Library," 3 vols.; and "The Elements of Thorough Bass." Died, 1776.

MOEBIUS, GEORGE, a Lutheran divine, was born at Lancha, in Thuringia, in 1616; became professor of theology at Leipzig; and died there, in 1697. He was the author of a work on the Pagan Oracles, against Vandalæ.

MOEBIUS, GODFREY, professor of medicine at Jena, was born at Lancha, in 1611, and died at Halle, in 1664. He wrote "Physiological Principles of Medicine," and other works.—His son, GODFREY, was also a physician, and published "Synopsis Medicinæ Practicæ."

MOEHSEN, JOHN CHARLES WILLIAM, physician to Frederic the Great, was born at Berlin, in 1732; studied at Jena and Halle; and was a member of various learned institutions. He wrote several works relating to the history of medicine and its professors; and died in 1795.

MOELLENDORF, RICHARD JOACHIM HENRY, Count DE, a Prussian general, born in 1734. His behaviour at the battles of Molwitz and Kotowitz, in the first Silesian war, having attracted the notice of Frederic II., whom he accompanied thither as a page, he was promoted to a company in the guards; became a colonel in 1761, afterwards lieutenant-general, and in 1763 governor of Berlin. During the disgraceful dismemberment of Poland, in 1793, he commanded the Prussian troops, and did everything in his power to alleviate the misfortunes of the Poles. On his return home he was created a field-marshal and governor of South Prussia; and succeeded the duke of Brunswick in the command of the Prussian army on the Rhine, in 1794, when he gained the victory of Kaiserslautern. He was present at the battles of Jena and Auerstadt, where he was wounded; and he died in 1816.

MOESER, JUSTUS, an eminent German advocate and author, was born at Osnaburg, in 1730; was educated at Jena and Göttingen; acquired great popularity on his return to his native place as an advocate, and counsellor of justice; and died in 1794.

MOINE, PETER LE, a French poet, born in 1602; of whom Boileau remarked, "that he was too wrong-headed to be much commended, and too much of a poet to be strongly condemned." His principal work was an epic poem in 18 books, entitled, "Saint Louis, ou la Sainte Couronne reconquise sur les Infidèles." Died, 1672.

MOINE, FRANCIS LE, an eminent painter, was born at Paris, about 1688. He was employed four years on the "Apotheosis of Hercules," in the saloon at Versailles; for which he had a pension of 3000 livres. His designs were generally incorrect, though his heads were always graceful and pleasing. He committed suicide in a fit of melancholy, in 1737.

MOLA, PETER FRANCIS, an eminent painter, born in 1609, at Coldra, in the Milanese. He was a pupil of Albani, and is distinguished both as a landscape and historical painter. Died, 1665.

MOLAI, JAMES DE, the last grand master of the knights templars, was a native of Burgundy. He was admitted into the order about 1265; and, having signalized himself by his valour in Palestine, was unanimously elected grand master on the death of William de Beaufort. The great wealth and power of the templars, their pride and their dissolute manners, created them a multitude of enemies, and led to their destruction. At length, Philippe le Bel, king of France, and pope Clement V., formed a plan for their extermination. They were accused of heresy, impiety, and various crimes revolting to human nature. In 1307, all the templars throughout France were arrested, at the same hour, and they were tried and convicted, some on their own confessions, and others on such evidence as could be procured. Fifty-seven were committed to the flames, in 1311; and after an imprisonment of seven years De Molai shared their fate, at Paris, in 1314, declaring his innocence to the last.

MOLE, MATTHEW, a French magistrate, remarkable for his probity and courage in the most troublesome times, was born at Paris, in 1344; became president of the parliament, and keeper of the seals; and died in 1634.

MOLE, FRANCIS BENE, an eminent French comedian, born at Paris, in 1734. During the progress of the revolution he became an associate of the Jacobins, and impudently officiated in the church of St. Roch, as the priest of the goddess of Reason. Died, 1802.

MOLE, JOHN, an Englishman who was eminent for his skill and knowledge in the science of algebra. Born of poor but respectable parents, Mr. Mole was indebted to a fortuitous circumstance for the discovery of his talent. Having, when a farmer's servant, been sent to a carpenter's shop for a load of timber, a workman asked him whether he could tell how many cubical quarters of larch could be cut out of a solid foot of wood; upon which Mole replied, he could tell how many could be cut out of ten thousand solid feet. He then answered the question,—how many farthings there were in a million of moldores, of the value of twenty-seven shillings each. Hitherto Mole had set down his figures in chalk, and asked his fellow-servants to decipher them; but from that period he applied diligently to acquire a knowledge of figures. He died in 1837.

MOLESWORTH, ROBERT, viscount, an Irish statesman, born at Dublin in 1654, and educated in Trinity college. When James II. landed in Ireland, he caused his estate to be confiscated; but on the settlement of affairs, under William III., he was made a privy-councillor, and sent ambassador to Copenhagen, where he had a dispute with the king, which induced him to return home abruptly. He then published "An Account of Denmark;" which was considered as a libel on the country, and complained of as such by the Danish ambassador in London. In 1714 he was made a commissioner of trade and plantations; and two years afterward raised to the Irish peerage. He died in 1735.

MOLEVILLE, ANTHONY FRANCIS BERTRAND DE, a French statesman, was born at Toulouse, in 1744. He was minister of the marine in the reign of Louis XVI.; and when the revolution broke out he sought an asylum in England; where he resided twenty-two years, and published "Memoirs of the Revolution," and several other works on that subject. During his residence in London he acquired such a command of the English language as to write in it "A History of England." Died, at Paris, 1819.

MOLIERE, JOHN BAPTIST POQUELIN DE, the most celebrated among the French writers of comedy, was born at Paris, in 1622. His father was valet-de-chambre and upholsterer to the king; and when he became infirm, Moliere was obliged to officiate for him in the royal household, in which capacity he attended Louis XIII. to Narbonne, in 1641. On his return to Paris his passion for the stage was unconquerable; he became a provincial actor, and began also to display his dramatic powers as an author. In 1662 he produced his "Eclouidi;" and, having the patronage of the prince de Conti, he finally established himself at Paris. His reputation was carried to its highest summit when the "Tartuffe" appeared; and the piece was played and applauded, after it had been kept back for years by the clamour of false devotees. In this, hypocrisy is fully unveiled; the characters are equally various and true; and the dialogue is elegant and natural. For twenty years Moliere wrote for the stage; and being all the time an actor also, and interrupted by various avocations, his fertility was most extraordinary. His last piece was the celebrated "Le Malade Imaginaire," to the fourth representation of which he fell a sacrifice. He himself acted the imaginary sick man in the piece; but labouring at the time under a pulmonary complaint, and exerting himself with unusual spirit, his efforts brought on the rupture of a blood-vessel, by which he was suffocated. Moliere may be regarded as the true father of French comedy; and Voltaire styles him

"the best comic writer of any nation." He chased away a great share of the coxcombry, false wit, and pedantry of the day; and his works may be considered as a history of the manners, fashions, and tastes of the times. In private life he was humane and benevolent in a high degree; and no one had more friends of rank and talent, or was more lamented by them; but his matrimonial connexion with a young actress, whose conduct subjected him to great annoyances, embittered his domestic enjoyments. He died in 1673.

MOLLERES, JOSEPH PRIVAT DE, a philosophical writer, was born at Tarnacon, in 1677; became a member of the congregation of the Oratory; and was a pupil of Malebranche, on whose death he quitted the society, and devoted himself wholly to physics and mathematics. He was afterwards professor of philosophy at the Royal college; and died in 1742. His works are, "Philosophical Lectures," 4 vols.; "Mathematical Lectures;" and "La Premier Partie des Elements de Geometrie."

MOLIN, JAMES, usually called Dumoulin, a celebrated French physician, was born in 1606; became chief physician to the army in Catalonia, at the age of twenty-six; and on his return to Paris, in 1706, added to his reputation by his cure of the prince of Conde. In his medical practice he was so partial to venesection, that it is supposed Le Sage intended to satirize him under the character of Dr. Sangrado. Died, 1753.

MOLINA, LOUIS DE, a Spanish Jesuit and theologian, was born at Cuenza, in 1535; was professor of theology at Evora for twenty years; and died in 1601. He was the author of a treatise on Free Will, entitled "De Concordia Gratia et Liberi Arbitrii," which gave rise to such a furious contest between the Dominicans and the Jesuits, that the pope found it advisable to issue a bull, in order to suppress it.

MOLINET, CLAUDE DU, canon-regular and procurator-general of the congregation of St. Genevieve, was born at Chalons sur Marne, in 1620, and died in 1687. He was the author of "The Epistles of Stephen, bishop of Tournay, with notes;" "History of the Popes by Medals;" and other works illustrative of ecclesiastical antiquities. He collected a large cabinet of curiosities, and placed the library of St. Genevieve in the state for which it is so celebrated.

MOLINET, JOHN, a French poet, of the 16th century; author of "Faites et Dits," &c. He was almoner and librarian to Margaret of Austria, and historiographer to the house of Burgundy. Died, 1607.

MOLINIER, WILLIAM, a celebrated troubadour of the 11th century, whose "Lays d'Amors" is a curious monument of the state of literature in the south of France at that period.

MOLINOS, MICHAEL, a Spanish theologian, and founder of the sect called Quietists, was born in 1637, at Saragossa, but passed the greater part of his life at Rome, where, in 1673, he published his celebrated "Spiritual Guide," which was condemned by the Inquisition ten years after its first appearance, and the author sentenced to perpetual imprisonment. He died a captive, in 1696. The followers of Molinos, of whom Madame Guyon was the principal, were called Quietists, because they maintained, that religion consists in an abstraction of the mind from external and finite objects.

MOLLER, HENRY, a protestant divine, who distinguished himself as Hebrew professor of Wirtemberg. He died at Hamberg, of which place he was a native, in 1595.

MOLLOY, CHARLES, a political writer and dramatist, was born in Dublin, and educated at Trinity-college. He afterwards became a student of the Middle Temple, and was the editor of a political paper, called "Common Sense." He died in 1707. His plays are, "The Perplexed Couple;" "The Coquet;" and "Half-pay Officers." —Another CHARLES MOLLOY, was a lawyer of the Inner Temple, and the author of a once popular work, entitled "De Jure Maritimo et Navali." He died in 1630.

MOLYNEUX, SIR WILLIAM, a gallant knight in the reign of Henry VIII., who displayed great bravery at the battle of Flodden-field. On his death-bed he gave this advice to his son: "Let the underwood grow; the tenants are the support of a family, and the commonalty are the strength of a kingdom. Improve this fairly; but force not violently, either your bounds, or your rents, above your father's."

MOLYNEUX, WILLIAM, an ingenious mathematician, was born at Dublin, in 1616. The philosophical society, established at Dublin in 1683, owed its origin to his endeavours, and he became the first secretary. Soon after, he was appointed surveyor-general of the works, and chief engineer. In 1685, he was chosen a member of the Royal Society, and in 1689 he settled with his family at Chester, where he employed himself in finishing his "Treatise on Dioptrics," which was published in 1692. In this year he returned to Dublin, and was chosen one of the representatives for that city. Besides the above, he wrote "Scoliothericum Telescopium;" also, "The Case of Ireland stated, in relation to its being bound by Acts of Parliament in England;" and some papers in the Philosophical Transactions. —SAMUEL MOLYNEUX, his son, was born at Chester, in 1680; became secretary to George II., when Prince of Wales, and was distinguished by his skill in astronomy.

MOLZA, FRANCIS MARIA, an Italian poet, was born at Modena, in 1480. He excelled in various kinds of poetry, combining elegance of style with striking imagery and elevated ideas; but he was a man of dissipated manners, and died a victim to his vices and licentiousness, in 1544. —His granddaughter, TARQUINIA MOLZA, who married Paul Porro, was born in 1543, and died in 1617. Her works consist of translations from Plato, and other classical writers; with Latin and Italian poems, for which her family was honoured by the Roman senate with a patent of citizenship.

scian, was born at Seville, and educated at Alcalá; after which he settled in his native place, and died there in 1578. His works are, "De secunda vena in Pleuritis Inter Græcos et Arabes concordia;" "De Rosa, et partibus ejus," and "Dos Libros de las cosas que se truen de las Indias Occidentales, que sirven al uso de Medicina." This last work has been translated into Latin, French, Italian, and English; and the name of Monardes is perpetuated by the botanical genus Monarda, in the class Diandria of Linnæus.

MONBEILLARD, PHILIBERT GURNEAU, a distinguished French naturalist, born at Semur, in 1720. He obtained great reputation in the scientific world, by his continuation of the "Collection Academique," a work consisting of every interesting circumstance in the memoirs of the learned societies of Europe; afterwards became the associate of Buffon, in his great work on natural history; nor was any difference of style in their writings observed, until Buffon himself announced him in his preface. Died, 1785.

MONCONYS, BALTHASAR DE, a traveller, was born at Lyons. After receiving a liberal education at the university of Salamanca, he visited the East, for the purpose of tracing the remains of the philosophy of Trismegistus and Zoroaster; but returned without accomplishing the object of his mission; and died in 1665. His travels were printed in 3 vols.

MONCRIF, FRANCIS AUGUSTIN PARADIS DE, a member of the French academy, was born at Paris, in 1687; became the favourite of fashionable society, by his musical, theatrical, and poetical talents; and died in 1770. His principal works are, "An Essay on the Art of Pleading," and a romance, entitled "Les Ames Rivaux."

MONGAULT, NICHOLAS HUBERT, a French writer, was born at Paris, in 1674. He became a member of the congregation of the Oratory; but after teaching with reputation in the college at Mons, he quitted the society, and went to live with the archbishop of Toulouse, who procured him a priory. He was afterwards tutor to the duke de Chartres, son of the duke of Orleans; was made secretary-general to the French infantry, and obtained other places through the interest of his pupil. He was also a member of the French Academy, and that of Inscriptions. Died, 1746.

MONGE, GASPARD, a celebrated French mathematician and natural philosopher, was born at Beaune, in 1746; taught physics and mathematics at the military school of Mèzières; became a member of the Academy of Sciences, in 1780; was made minister of the marine, in 1792; and was one of the founders of the Polytechnic school. In 1796, he was commissioned to go to Italy, and collect the treasures of art and science from the countries conquered by the French; and, in 1798, he accompanied Buonaparte to Egypt, where he was chosen president of the Institute of Cairo. Napoleon, when emperor, made him a senator, created him count of Pelusium, and gave him an estate in Westphalia, accompanied by a present of two hundred thousand francs. On the return of the Bourbons he was deprived of all his offices and emoluments; and he died in 1818. His principal works are, "Descriptive Geometry;" "The Application of Analysis to the Geometry of Surfaces," and a "Treatise on Statics."

MONGE, Lieut.-colonel, a French officer employed by Napoleon, after his return from Elba, to go secretly to Vienna, to bring off Maria Louisa and her son to France. He succeeded, by various disguises, to reach Vienna, and was very near accomplishing his purpose, when the Austrian police got information of the plan, and Monge was compelled to fly. He got back to France, and fought bravely in the battle of Waterloo; but, was eventually reduced to such distress, as to work as a common labourer, and died in the hospital of St. Louis, in 1829.

MONK, GEORGE, duke of Albemarle, a distinguished military commander, and a great promoter of the restoration of Charles II., was the son of Sir Thomas Monk, of Potheridge, near Torrington, in Devonshire, and born in 1608. Being a younger son, he entered the army as a volunteer, and served under his relation Sir Richard Grenville, in an expedition to Spain and in the Netherlands. On the breaking out of the war between Charles I. and the Scotch in 1639, he obtained a colonel's commission, and attended his majesty in both his expeditions to the north. When the Irish rebellion began in 1641, his services there were so important, that the lords justices thought proper to appoint him governor of Dublin. On his return to England he was sent to relieve Nantwich, where he was taken prisoner by the army belonging to the parliament, and sent to the tower, where he remained till 1646. The royal cause being now ruined, he obtained his liberty on condition of taking a command in Ireland, where he concluded a peace with the rebels, which displeased the parliament, who passed a vote of censure upon him for it. Cromwell, however, who thought highly of his military talents, made him lieutenant-general, and gave him the chief command in Scotland. But the sagacious usurper had strong suspicions of Monk's sincerity; and not long before his death wrote him a letter, to which he added this postscript: "There be that tell me that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland, called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart: I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him and send him up to me." On the decease of the protector, the resignation of power by his son, and the contest of parties which subsequently took place, he availed himself of the commanding situation which he occupied, to crush the republicans, and promote the recall and restoration of the Stuart family to the throne, in the person of Charles II. As the reward of his loyalty, he was created duke of Albemarle, with a pension of seven thousand pounds a-year, made a privy-councillor, and invested with the order of the garter. In 1661, he was appointed admiral of the fleet in conjunction with prince Rupert, and in 1666, obtained a great victory over the Dutch, in a tremendous battle, which lasted three days. He died in 1670, and was buried in Westminster-abbey.

MONK, MARY, daughter of lord Moleworth, and wife of George Monk, esq., was celebrated for her poetical genius. She was well acquainted with the Latin, French, Italian, and Spanish languages. Died, 1715.

MONMOUTH, JAMES, duke of, a natural son of Charles II., was born at Rotterdam, in 1679. He was distinguished by his personal attractions, his affable address, and thoughtless generosity; hence he became very popular. But he was weak-minded and pliant; and had he not resigned himself to the guidance of the restless and ambitious Shaftesbury, who flattered him with the hopes of succeeding to the crown, his popularity would never have become dangerous. He was concerned in various plots, which had for their object the exclusion of the duke of York from the crown; and he was, in consequence, ordered by Charles to quit the kingdom. On the accession of James II., being urged to the act by some of his partisans, he landed at Lynce, with scarcely a hundred followers (June, 1685); but his numbers were soon increased, and he assumed the title of king, and asserted the legitimacy of his birth. His forces were defeated, and the duke himself was made prisoner, having been found in the disguise of a peasant, lying at the bottom of a ditch, overcome with hunger, fatigue, and anxiety. He nobly refused to betray his accomplices, and conducted himself with much firmness on the scaffold, where his head was severed from his body, after four unsuccessful blows. The people, of whom he was still the favourite, believed that the person executed was not Monmouth; and it was probably this belief which has led some to conjecture that the famous "Iron Mask" was the duke of Monmouth.

MONNETT, ANTHONY GRIMOALD, an eminent French chemist, and inspector-general of the mines, was born in Auvergne, in 1734. He was one of the very few who cultivated the science, that rejected the great discoveries and theories of Lavoisier; and it consequently lessened his reputation. He wrote a variety of works, besides analyses and memoirs in the Journal de Physique; and died in 1817.

MONNOYE, BERNARD DE LA, a French poet and miscellaneous writer; born, at Dijon, 1641; died, at Paris, 1727.

MONRO, JOHN, an eminent physician, who devoted his attention to the treatment of insanity, was born at Greenwich, in Kent, in 1715, and was the son of Dr. James Monro, physician to the hospitals of Bridewell and Bethlehem, whom he succeeded. Died, 1791.

MONRO, ALEXANDER, an eminent physician and anatomist, of Scottish descent, was born, in London, in 1697. After studying under Cheselden, and travelling on the continent for improvement, he was, in 1712, appointed professor and demonstrator of anatomy to the company of surgeons at Edinburgh; where, soon after, he instituted that course of instruction for which its medical school is so highly celebrated. This was followed by the foundation of an hospital, where he delivered courses of clinical lectures; and also formed a society for collecting and publishing professional papers; the result of which appeared in six volumes of "Medical Essays;" and two more on "Physical and Literary Subjects." Besides the papers contained in these volumes, the doctor published a work, entitled "Osteology, or a Treatise on the Anatomy of the Bones;" and an "Account of the Success of Inoculation in Scotland." Died, 1767.—His eldest son, Dr. ALEXANDER MONRO, succeeded, on the death of his father, to the anatomical professorship; and published numerous works, among which are, "Observations on the Nervous System;" "The Structure and Physiology of Fishes;" "A Description of the Bursa Mucosa;" "Three Treatises on the Brain, Eye, and Ear;" "Observations on the Crural Hernia;" "Outlines of the Anatomy of the Human Body," 4 vols.—His second son, Dr. DONALD MONRO, became a physician in the army; and wrote "Observations on the Means of preserving the Health of Soldiers," 2 vols.; and a "Treatise on Medical and Pharmaceutical Chemistry," 4 vols. Died, 1802.

MONROE, JAMES, a president of the United States, was born, in 1758, in Westmoreland county, Virginia. He entered the revolutionary army as a cadet, and, being soon after appointed a lieutenant, marched to New York, where he joined the army under Washington. He was engaged in the battle of Harlem Heights, in that of White Plains, in the retreat through the Jerseys, and in the attack on Trenton. In the last, he was in the vanguard, and received a ball through his left shoulder. For his conduct in this action, he was promoted to a captaincy. Subsequently he was attached to the staff of general lord Stirling, with the rank of major, and he fought by the side of Lafayette, when that officer was wounded at the battle of Brandywine. He was afterwards promoted to the rank of colonel; and at the end of the contest, in 1783, he was elected a member of congress. In May, 1794, he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to France, but recalled from this mission in 1796, by president Washington, with strong marks of dissatisfaction, for having succumbed too much to the overbearing policy of the French Directory. He went, however, to London in the same capacity, at a juncture of great importance, and, in 1811, was appointed secretary of state. Six years afterwards, the war department being in a very embarrassed state, he was chosen president, in 1817, as the successor of Mr. Madison, and, in 1821, re-elected by a vote unanimous, with a single exception. He died on the 4th of July, 1831, the anniversary of American independence.

MONSON, Sir WILLIAM, an English naval officer, was born at South Carlton, in Lincolnshire, in 1569; was educated at Balliol college, Oxford; entered the naval service; served in several expeditions in the reign of Elizabeth; and was knighted by the earl of Essex, for his conduct in the expedition to Cadiz. In the reign of James I. he distinguished himself against the Dutch, and died in 1643.

MONSTRELET, ENGERRAND DE, a French chronicler, of the 15th century, born about 1390, and died in 1455. He was provost of Cambrai, and bailiff of Wallin-court; and wrote a chronicle of events, from the year 1400 to 1453, the year in which he died.

MONTAGU, EDWARD, earl of Sandwich, a distinguished naval commander in the reign of Charles II., was born in 1626. At the age of eighteen he raised a regiment in the service of parliament, and was present in several battles; but in the Dutch war he left the army for the navy, and was associated with Blake in the Mediterranean. Afterwards he commanded the fleet in the north sea; but at his return was deprived of it on suspicion of being in the royal interest. Monk, however, procured him to be replaced; and he conveyed the king to England; after which he was created earl of Sandwich. In the war of 1666 he commanded under the duke of York, and had a principal share in the great battle of June 3, 1665. On the renewal of hostilities with the Dutch, he was again employed; and in the battle of Southwold-bay, after he had by his conduct rescued a great part of the fleet from the most imminent danger, and given astonishing proofs of his bravery, his ship caught fire, on which he leaped into the sea and was drowned, in 1672.

MONTAGU, Lady MARY WORTLEY, a lady distinguished for her literary attainments, was the eldest daughter of Evelyn, duke of Kingston, and born, about 1690, at Thoresby, in Nottinghamshire. She made a great proficiency in the Latin and Greek languages, under the superintendence of bishop Burnet. In 1712 she married Mr. Edward Wortley Montagu, whom she accompanied in his embassy to Constantinople, from which place she wrote "Letters" to Mr. Pope, Mr. Addison, and other eminent literati of the time, which are very interesting, and contain many curious facts respecting the manners of the Turks. She is also memorable for having first introduced the practice of inoculation into this country, for which millions have had cause to bless her memory. She closed a life marked by a great variety of adventures, in 1782. Her collected works have been published in six volumes; and her "Letters" certainly place her at the head of female epistolary writers in Great Britain.

MONTAGU, EDWARD WORTLEY, son of the preceding, was born at Werncliffe-fodge, in Yorkshire, about 1714. He received his education at Westminster school, whence he eloped, and became a chimney-sweep. His family had given him up as lost, when a gentleman recognised him in the street, and took him home to his father. He escaped a second time, and engaged with a master of a fishing smack; after which he shipped himself on board a vessel bound to Spain, where he served a mulatto. In this situation he was discovered, and conveyed home to his friends, who placed him under a tutor, with whom he travelled abroad. His father being rather scanty in his remittances, owing probably to the man's extravagance, the tutor is said to have committed a curious fraud to obtain a supply. This was the printing a book, entitled, "Observations on the Rise and Fall of Ancient Republics, by Edward Wortley Montagu, esq." This work, whether the production of the son or not, gave great pleasure to the old gentleman, who acknowledged it in a handsome manner. On his return to England, he obtained a seat in the House of Commons, where he sat in two successive parliaments. His future conduct was marked by eccentricities, not less extraordinary than those by which he had been distinguished in the early part of his life. He went to Italy, where he professed the Roman catholic religion, and from thence he apostatised to Mahometanism. After passing many years in Egypt, and other countries on the Mediterranean coast, he died as he was about to return to England, at Padua, in 1776.

MONTAGU, GEORGE, an eminent naturalist, was a native of Wiltshire. He devoted his particular attention to the study of ornithology and conchology; and was the author of "An Ornithological Dictionary," and "Testacea Britannica, or Natural History of British Shells." Died, at Knowle, near Kingsbridge, Devon, 1815.

MONTAGUE, ELIZABETH, an eminent female writer, was the daughter of Matthew Robinson, esq. of Yorkshire, and was born in 1730. She had an opportunity of prosecuting her studies under the direction of Conyers Middleton, to whom she was probably indebted for the tincture of learning which so remarkably influenced her character and manners. About 1742 she married Edward Montague, a descendant of the first earl of Sandwich. Mrs. Montague published "An Essay on the Writings and Genius of Shakspeare," which obtained a great and deserved reputation. She formed a literary society, known by the name of the "Blue Stocking Club," from the circumstance that Mr. Benjamin Stillingfleet, a gentleman belonging to it, wore stockings of that colour. Mrs. Montague was noticed for another peculiarity, that of giving an annual dinner on May-day to the chimney-sweepers of the metropolis. She died in 1800; and her epistolary correspondence, in four volumes, was afterwards published.

MONTAIGNE, MICHAEL DE, a celebrated French essayist, was born in 1533, at the castle belonging to his family, in Perigord. His father, Pierre Eyquem, seigneur de Montaigne, bestowed the greatest care on the cultivation of his son's promising talents; and after a course of suitable instruction, Montaigne became a parliamentary counsellor, but his aversion to the duties of the station led him to retire from it. The study of man was his favourite occupation, and he therefore devoted himself entirely to philosophical subjects. His quiet, however, was disturbed by the troubles which distracted France in consequence of the cruel persecutions of the Huguenots; his castle was plundered by the leaguers, and he himself was ill-treated by their adversaries. To these causes of distress was added the plague, which broke out in Guienne, in 1586, and compelled him to leave his estate, with his family, and wander through the country, which was then the theatre of all kinds of atrocities. He then resided some time in Paris, but finally returned home, and died in 1602. His celebrated "Essays" contain a treasure of wisdom, and may still be deemed one of the most popular books in the French language. Their style, without being pure or correct, is simple, bold, lively, and energetic. Cardinal du Perron emphatically called them the breviary of honest men; and La Harpe observes, "It is not a book we are read as, but a conversation to which we are listening; and he persuades, because he does not teach."

MONTALVAN, DON LUIS PEREZ DE, an eminent Spanish dramatist in the reign of Philip IV., whose writings are distinguished by good taste and sound judgment. Died, 1638.

MONTELEMBERT, MARK RENÉ, marquis DE, a French general, was born in 1714, at Angoulême; entered the army early in life; and in the seven years' war was attached to the staff of the armies of Russia and Sweden, to give an account of military operations to the French ministry. He published a work on Fortification; besides three volumes of correspondence on military subjects; and papers in the Memoirs of the Academy of Sciences.

MONTANUS, the founder of a new sect, in the second century, was a native of Phrygia. He asserted to be a prophet; and, having deceived two rich ladies, named Priscilla and Maximilla, by his pretended sanctity, and exalted them into prophetesses, he asserted it as an article of faith, that the fulness of the spirit was imparted to these three chosen vessels to complete the mystery of eternal redemption. Among others who fell into this delusion, were Tertullian and Theodotus.

MONTANUS, BENEDICT ARIAS, a Spanish Benedictine, was born at Frexenet, in Estrémadura, in 1527, and educated at Alcalá. He was at the council of Trent; and on his return to Spain was employed in editing a polyglot Bible, in 8 vols. He was one of the most learned divines of the 16th century; and died at Seville, in 1598.

MONTANUS, or DA MONTE, JOHN BAPTIST, an Italian physician, was born at Verona, in 1488. He was sent to study the law at Padua, instead of which he applied to physic, and became professor of medicine. He died in 1551. He translated into Latin the works of Ælius; the poem of Mæneus; the Argonautics of Orpheus; and the Tragopodagra of Lucian.

MONTAUSIER, CHARLES DE ST. MAUR, duke of, was born in Touraine, in 1610, and died in 1690. He was governor to the dauphin, to which office he was appointed in 1686; and such was his character for integrity, and the upright manner in which he always conducted himself, that he was called by the people "the virtuous man who always tells the truth." Died, 1690.

MONTECUCULI, RAYMOND DE, a celebrated general, was born in 1609, of a distinguished family in the Modenese, and entered into the service of the emperor of Germany. In 1634, at the head of two thousand horse, he surprised ten thousand Swedes, and took their baggage and artillery; but he was soon after defeated, and taken prisoner. In 1637 he defeated Rákozzi, prince of Transylvania; in 1664 he gained a splendid victory over the Turks at St. Gothard; and in 1673 and 1676, he commanded on the Rhine, and foiled all the efforts of Turenne and the prince of Condé by his masterly manoeuvres. He died in 1680. Montecuculi wrote some excellent "Memoirs" on the military art, and a treatise on the "Art of Relinquing."

MONTEMAYOR, GEORGE DE, a Castilian poet, was born in 1520, and took his name from the place of his birth. After serving in the army, he was employed at the court of Philip II., where he died in 1562. He wrote "Diana," a pastoral romance, which was continued by Gaspar Polo.

MONTEREUIL, BERNARDIN, a learned Jesuit, born at Paris, in 1589, and died in 1648. His chief works are, "A History of the early State of the Church," and "A Life of Jesus Christ," which is highly esteemed.

MONTEQUIEU, CHARLES DE SECONDAT, baron DE, was born at the castle of Brede, near Bourdeaux, in 1699; and in 1716 became president of the parliament of Bourdeaux. His first appearance as an author was in the publication of the "Persian Letters," a work which gave proofs of a fine genius and a solid judgment. In 1728 he was admitted a member of the academy, on which occasion he delivered an eloquent discourse. Having given up his civil employments he went on his travels, and remained in England three years. After his return he retired to his estate, and there completed his work "On the Causes of the Grandeur and Declension of the Romans," which was published in 1734. His greatest performance, however, is the "Spirit of Laws," which came out in 1748, and, though attacked by some writers, secured its ground in the estimation of the literary world. His other works are, "The Temple of Gnides;" a piece called "Lysimachus;" and an "Essay on Taste." Burke characterizes him as "a genius not born in every country, or every time,—with a Herculean robustness of mind, and nerves not to be broken with labour." He died in 1755.

MONTEZUMA, emperor of Mexico at the time of the Spanish invasion. Having, by his despotic government, made himself many enemies, they willingly joined Cortez, and assisted him in his progress. Seized in the heart of his capital, and kept as a hostage at the Spanish quarters, he was at first treated with respect, which was soon changed into insult, and fetters were put on his legs. He was at length obliged to acknowledge his vassalage to the king of Spain, but he could not be brought to change his religion. He died in 1520, from being struck on the temple with a stone, while persuading his tumultuous subjects to receive the Spanish yoke. Charles V. gave a grant of lands, and the title of count of Montezuma, to one of the sons, who was the founder of a noble family in Spain.

born at the castle of Sontage, in Languedoc, in 1655; became a Benedictine monk, after having engaged in the military service; and died in 1741. He was a voluminous writer; but the most important of his works is that treasure of classical archæology, entitled "L'Antiquité expliquée et représentée en Figures."

MONTFORT, SIMON DE, earl of Leicester, son of the Simon de Montfort who distinguished himself by his zeal and severity in the crusade against the Albigenes, was born in France, and retired to England in 1231, on account of some dispute with queen Blanche. Henry III. received him very kindly, bestowed upon him the earldom of Leicester, which had formerly belonged to his ancestors, and gave him his sister, the countess dowager of Pembroke, in marriage. After this, Henry appointed him seneschal of Gascony; but he ruled so despotically there, that he was recalled; and a violent altercation took place between them, in which the king applied the opprobrious epithet of "traitor," to his subject, and the latter gave him sovereign lie. A reconciliation was, however, effected, and De Montfort was employed on several occasions, in a diplomatic and military capacity. In 1265, he appeared in parliament at the head of the discontented barons, who were all armed, and demanded that the administration should be put in the hands of twenty-four barons, who were empowered to redress grievances, and to reform the state. This was conceded, and for a time submitted to; till at length hostilities commenced between the barons and the royal party; which ended in the triumph of the former, at the battle of Lewes. From what precise cause it does not appear, but probably it was owing to his arrogance and rapacity, that a powerful party was raised up against him among the barons, and, according to some, this was the motive which induced him to summon knights of shires and burgesses to the parliament in 1265. Whatever may have been his motives, however, he thus became the founder of the English House of Commons. In the same year was fought the battle of Evesham, in which the royal forces were led by prince Edward; and there, in attempting to rally his troops, by rushing into the midst of the enemy, he was surrounded and slain.

MONTGOLFIER, JACQUES ETIENNE, the inventor of air-balloons, was born in 1745, at Vidalon-les-Annonal. In conjunction with an elder brother, he devoted himself to scientific pursuits, and was the first who manufactured the vellum paper, still so much admired for its beauty. One day while boiling water in a coffee-pot, the top of which was covered with paper folded in a spherical form, he saw the paper swell and rise—a circumstance that furnished him with the idea of a light machine, made buoyant by inflation, and traversing the air. After various preliminary trials, it being ascertained that a balloon, with a car attached to it, could be kept suspended by a supply of heated air, the experiment was repeated on a large scale at Versailles, when the marquis of d'Orlandes ascended in the presence of the royal family, and a vast concourse of spectators. He died in 1799. His brother, before mentioned, who was the inventor of a hydraulic machine, called the water-ram, died in 1810.

MONTI, VINCENZO, one of the most celebrated poets of modern Italy, was born at Fusignano, near Ferrara, in 1753; and became as notorious for the versatility of his political principles as for his poetic talents. He commenced his career as secretary to Luigi Braschi, nephew of Pope Pius VI., and was then a violent enemy of the French; he afterwards became a republican; next a panegyrist of Napoleon; and ended by eulogizing the emperor of Austria. His "Basvilliana," written on the murder of Hugo Bassville, the French ambassador at Rome, is a close imitation of Dante, and gained him a high reputation; his other chief works were "Bardo della Selva nera," and a translation of Homer's Iliad; and his dramatic writings are the tragedies of "Galeotti Manfredi," "Aristodemo," and "Calisto Gracchus." He was successively appointed professor of the belles lettres, and of rhetoric, in the university of Padua, and historiographer of the kingdom of Italy; and after the destruction of that state, he was fortunate enough to preserve his place and pension under the new government. He was also a knight of the legion of honour, and a member of many learned societies. Died, 1826.

MONTMORENCY, ANNE DE, peer, marshal, and constable of France, born in 1493, was one of the greatest generals of the 16th century. He distinguished himself under Francis I. in the wars against Charles V., and was made prisoner at the battle of Pavia, which was fought against his advice. Owing to the hatred of Catharine de Medici he lost his influence during the reign of Francis II.; but the rising of the Huguenots occasioned his recall to the court of Charles IX., and he joined the duke of Guise, in opposition to Conde, who was at the head of the protestants. In the battle of Dreux, Montmorency was made prisoner by the Huguenots, and Conde was captured by the royal troops. The former was liberated the next year, and in the second civil war gained a decisive victory over his old enemies, at the battle of St. Denis; but died of the wounds received in the action, in 1567, aged 74.

MONTMORENCY, HENRY II., duke de, was born in 1595, and in his eighteenth year was created admiral of France. He defeated the protestants in Languedoc; and in 1629, he gained decided advantages over the duke de Rohan, leader of the Huguenots. In 1630 he held the chief command in Piedmont, and defeated the Spaniards under Doria. His services were at length rewarded with a marshal's baton; and, being jealous of the influence of cardinal Richelieu, he, with Gaston, duke of Orleans, raised the standard of rebellion in Languedoc, where, being opposed by La Force and Schomberg, he was wounded and made prisoner. All France, mindful of his services, his virtues, and his victories, desired that the rigour of the laws might be softened in his favour; but Richelieu was resolved to make an example of so powerful an enemy, and the marshal was condemned to death by the parliament of Toulouse, and executed, in 1632.

MONTPENSIER, ANNE MARIA LOUISA, of Orleans, better known as Mademoiselle de Montpensier, born at Paris, in 1627, was the daughter of Gaston, duke of Orleans, and the niece of Louis XIII. In the civil contests which distinguished the minority of Louis XIV. she was a zealous partisan of Condé; and, in fact, her whole life was a scene of restless ambition and intrigue. She was privately married to count Lauzun; and brought him a fortune of 20,000,000 of francs, four duchies, the seignury of Dombes, and the palace of Luxembourg; but being treated by him with a degree of hauteur which she could not brook, she at length forbade him ever to appear again in her presence. From that time she lived in retirement, and died in 1693. Her "Memoirs," which form eight volumes, are interesting.

MONTROSE, JAMES GRAHAM, marquis of, a distinguished royalist under Charles I., was the son of the earl of Montrose, who gave him an excellent education, which was improved by a residence in France, where he held a commission in the Scotch guards. On his return home he experienced such neglect, through the jealousy of the marquis of Hamilton, as induced him to join the Covenanters; but he afterwards took a very active part on the side of the king; and in a few months gained the battles of Perth, Abernethy, and Inverlochy; for which services he was created a marquis. In 1645 his fortune changed; and after suffering a defeat from Lesley, he was obliged to leave the kingdom, when he landed in Orkney, with a few followers, but was soon overpowered, conveyed to Edinburgh, and there hung and quartered.

MONTUCCI, ANTONIO, a learned philologist, particularly excelling as a Chinese scholar, was born at Siena, in 1762, and studied at the university there, devoting himself to the living languages with almost incredible application. In 1785 he was appointed professor of English in the Tolomei college; and, in 1789, accompanied Sir Wedgwood to England as Italian teacher in his family. Being in London in 1792, when preparations were making for lord Macartney's embassy to China, Montucci took the opportunity of obtaining assistance from some Chinese youths attached to the embassy, in acquiring their language, with which he was before only imperfectly acquainted. The result was, that he projected a Chinese dictionary, the prospectus of which he forwarded to several princes and academies in Europe. In 1806 he went to Berlin, on the invitation of the king of Prussia; but the invasion of the country by Buonaparte for some time interrupted his plans; and, returning to Italy, he died at Siena, in 1829. He is the author of a "Chinese Dictionary;" an "Italian Pocket Dictionary;" and several elementary works in that language; and he edited the "Poesie inedite di Lorenzo de' Medici," published at the expense of Mr. Roscoe.

MONTUCLA, JOHN STEPHEN, an eminent French mathematician, was born at Lyons, in 1725; studied at the Jesuits' college, and acquired legal knowledge at Toulouse; but relinquished the law for the cultivation of mathematical science; was sent to Cayenne, in 1764, as royal astronomer; and died in 1799. His chief work is his "Histoire des Mathématiques," 4 vols.

MOOR, KARL DE, a portrait painter, was born at Leyden, in 1656. He studied under Gerard Douw, and Francis Mieris. His works were greatly admired; and the emperor of Germany conferred on him the honour of knighthood. Died, 1737.

MOORE, SIR JONAS, an eminent mathematician, was born about 1620, at Whitby, in Lancashire. His skill in mathematical learning recommended him to Charles II. by whom he was employed in several works, and made surveyor-general of the ordnance. He was also one of the governors of Christ's hospital, and was the principal means of the above monarch's endowing a mathematical school in that seminary. Sir Jonas compiled, for the use of that institution, a "General System of Mathematics," in 2 vols. 4to., which was published after his death in 1681.

MOORE, JOHN, an English prelate, was born at Market Harborough, in Leicestershire, and educated at Cambridge. He was consecrated bishop of Norwich in 1691; translated to Ely in 1707; and died in 1714. His Sermons were published by his chaplain, Dr. Samuel Clarke; and his library was purchased by George II., who gave it to the University of Cambridge.

MOORE, PHILIP, rector of Kirkbride and Douglas, in the Isle of Man. He reviewed the translation of the Bible into the Manks language. Died, 1783.

MOORE, EDWARD, an English poet and dramatic writer, was the son of a dissenting minister at Abingdon, in Berkshire, and born there in 1712. He was brought up as a linen-draper in London, but quitted business for literary pursuits. In 1744, he published his "Fables for the Female Sex," which became deservedly popular, and procured him friends among the great, particularly lord Lyttleton, whom he afterwards complimented in a piece, entitled "The Trial of Selim." After two ineffectual attempts at dramatic composition, in the comedies of the "Foundling," and "Gil Blas," he succeeded completely in the tragedy of "The Gamester." He next became the editor of a periodical paper, called "The World," in which he was assisted by lords Lyttleton, Chesterfield, and many other men of rank and talent. Died, 1757.

MOORE, JOHN, a physician, and miscellaneous writer of great repute, was born, in 1730, at Stirling; studied medicine and surgery at Glasgow; and was successively a surgeon's mate in the Netherlands, and surgeon to the English ambassador at Paris. In 1772 he took his degree as a physician, and became the partner of Dr. Gordon, an eminent practitioner at Glasgow. After this he spent five years in travelling upon the continent with the duke of Hamilton; and on his return he settled in London. In 1799 he published the fruits of his travels, in "A View of Society and Manners, in France, Switzerland, and Germany," 2 vols. This work was so well received, that, in 1781, he added two volumes more, entitled, "A View of Society and Manners in Italy." After this, he published his "Moral Sketches." His next performance was a novel of a very superior character, entitled, "Zeluco," 2 vols., which abounds with incident, and affords a striking illustration of Italian character and manners. In 1795 he published "A View of the Causes and Progress of the French Revolution," 3 vols.; describing scenes which he had witnessed during his residence at Paris. He subsequently published a novel, entitled "Edward, or various Views of Human Nature;" and "Mordaunt, or Sketches of Life, Character, and Manners in various Countries." Died, 1802.

MOORE, JOHN, archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a grazier at Gloucester, and educated at the grammar school of that city, after which he went to Pembroke college, Oxford. Becoming chaplain to the duke of Marlborough, and tutor to one of his sons, he obtained by that interest a prebendal stall in the cathedral of Durham; in 1771, the deanery of Canterbury; in 1776, the bishopric of Bangor; and in 1783, he was raised to the metropolitan see. Died, 1804.

MOORE, SIR JOHN, a distinguished military commander, was the eldest son of Dr. John Moore, and born at Glasgow, in 1761. Being destined for the military profession, he was educated chiefly on the continent; and whilst his father was abroad in the duke of Hamilton, he entered the army, at the age of fifteen, as ensign in the 51st regiment of foot; of which, in 1790, he became lieutenant-colonel, and served with his corps in Corsica, where he was wounded in storming the Moxello fort at the siege of Calvi. In 1796 he went out as brigadier-general to the West Indies, under Sir Ralph Abercromby, who appointed him to the government of St. Lucia, in the capture of which he had a principal share. On his return home, in 1797, he was employed in Ireland during the rebellion, and was raised to the rank of major-general. In 1799 he went on the expedition to Holland, where he did all that military prudence could accomplish to repair the mistakes of an incompetent commander, and where he was again wounded severely. He soon afterwards went to Egypt, and at the battle of Alexandria received two more wounds. For his skill and valour in that campaign he received the order of the Bath. He was then dispatched on a mission, both military and diplomatic, to the court of Sweden, in which he conducted himself with equal firmness and dexterity. In 1808 he was appointed to command an army in Spain, where, after a skillful and arduous retreat before a very superior force, he fell by a cannon-ball, under the walls of Corunna, January 16, 1809. His death excited a great sensation throughout the country. The house of commons ordered a monument to be erected for him in St. Paul's cathedral; and Glasgow, his native city, also erected one to his memory.

MOORE, SIR LORENZO, a major-general in the British army, entered the service in 1787, as an ensign in the 64th foot, and in 1791 was appointed lieutenant in the 61st foot. He afterwards served at St. Lucia during most of the operations under Sir Ralph Abercromby. On returning to England, in 1797, he obtained a company in the 4th foot, and in the following year was appointed brigade-major to Sir John Moore, with whom he served in Ireland. In 1799 he served with his regiment at the Cape of Good Hope, and remained in that colony till its evacuation by the British in 1802. In 1805 he became major in the 35th foot, and, proceeding to Sicily, was at the reduction of Zante, Cephalonia, &c. In 1809 he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the same regiment; in 1819 he was promoted to the rank of a colonel in the army; and in 1830 he attained that of major-general. He was at Dresden at the time of his death, March, 1837, and his funeral was attended by the Saxon commander-in-chief.

MOORSOM, SIR ROBERT, K.C.B., an English admiral, was born near Whitby, Yorkshire, in 1760; entered the royal navy as a midshipman at the age of 17, under Captain Phipps, afterwards Lord Mulgrave, in the Courageous, which ship bore part in the battle off Ushant, the relief of Gibraltar, and other important services. In 1790 he was made a post captain; and when the war broke out in 1793, he was appointed to the Niger frigate, and sent to ascertain the enemy's force at Brest, which he satisfactorily accomplished. In 1804 he was appointed to the Majestic, 74, and joined Admiral Russell off the Texel. In 1805 he had the command of the Revenge, 74, and was attached to the Channel fleet under Admiral Cornwallis; by whom he was sent, in Sir R. Calder's squadron, to reinforce Lord Collingwood, off Cadiz, where they were soon joined by Nelson, and the memorable battle of Trafalgar followed. In this decisive victory Captain Moorsom bore a most distinguished part, having for two hours engaged a Spanish three-decker, the Prince of Asturias, 112 guns, on one side, and a French 74 on the other, while three more of the enemy's ships partially supported them. In 1805 he resigned the command of the Revenge, and was made private-secretary to Lord Mulgrave, first lord of the admiralty; and on his lordship becoming master-general of the ordnance, Captain Moorsom was appointed to the office of surveyor-general of that department, and became M.P. for Queenborough. Rising by regular steps, he attained, in 1830, the full rank of admiral; and it is no more than justice to observe, that both in his naval and official character he maintained a straightforward policy, and showed an equal degree of scientific skill and manly firmness. Died, 1835.

MORALES, AMBROSE, a learned Spanish Dominican, was born at Cordova, in 1513; became historiographer to Philip II. king of Spain; and died in 1580. He was the author of several works on the History and Antiquities of Spain; but his extreme credulity greatly deteriorates the value of his writings.

MORAND, PETER DE, a poet and dramatist; born, at Arles, 1701; died, 1757.

MORANT, PHILIP, an antiquary and divine, was born in the island of Jersey, and educated at Pembroke college, Oxford. He edited several works, and wrote a "History of Colchester;" "The History of Essex," &c. Born, 1700; died, 1770.

MORATIN, NICOLAS FERNANDEZ DE, a celebrated Spanish dramatic poet; born at Madrid, in 1737; died, 1780. He was well acquainted with the old Castilian chivalry, and made excellent use of them in his lyric poems and plays; but though successful in some degree as a writer, he found it necessary to resume legal practice for the support of his family, and became a distinguished advocate at Madrid. He wrote three tragedies; a comedy; a didactic poem, entitled "Diana, or the Art of Hunting;" and various other works.

MORATIN, LEANDRO FERNANDEZ DE, a son of the preceding, was born about 1760, and is considered superior to his father as a dramatic poet. He was patronized by the minister Godoy, who enabled him to visit the principal theatres of England, France, and Italy, at the royal expense; and on his return home, appointed him to the situation of principal secretary interpreter. Under the government of Joseph Buonaparte he was made royal librarian; but he was subsequently obliged to quit Spain; and died at Paris, in 1828. He took Moliere as his model; and among his dramatic efforts are the comedies of "El Cafe;" "El Baron," &c. He also wrote the "Lecton Poetica;" various satirical pieces, translations from Moliere and Shakespeare, and was engaged, at the time of his death, in writing the history of the Spanish drama, from the earliest period.

MORDAUNT, CHARLES, earl of Peterborough, was born about 1658, and succeeded his father, John, lord Mordaunt, in 1675. He entered into the navy, and distinguished himself at Tangier when it was besieged by the Moors. In 1697, on the death of his uncle, he succeeded to the earldom of Peterborough; was employed as commander of the English army in Spain; and, having greatly distinguished himself by his courage and activity, was subsequently appointed generalissimo of the imperial forces. Died, 1735.

MORE, SIR FRANCIS, an eminent lawyer, was born at East Hiley, in Berkshire, in 1556; was educated at St. John's college, Oxford; on leaving which he entered at the Middle Temple, where he became very eminent in his profession; and died in 1621.

MORE, ANTONIO, a celebrated portrait painter, born at Utrecht, in 1519. He was very successful in his portraits, of which he painted several in England, in the reign of queen Mary; on whose death he accompanied Philip II. to Spain, where he lived on terms of great intimacy with that monarch for some time; but presuming too much on his familiarity, he incurred the displeasure of the king, and quitted the country. He then entered into the service of the duke of Alva, by whom he was made receiver-general of the revenues of West Flanders. Thus patronized, he was able to live in a style of magnificence during the remainder of his life. Died, 1575.

MORE, HENRY, an eminent divine of the church of England, was born at Grantham, in Lincolnshire, in 1614; was educated at Eton, and Christ's college, Cambridge; and while at the latter, profoundly studied the most celebrated systems of philosophy, and finally settled into a decided preference for that of Plato. In 1640 he published "Psycho-Zola, or the Life of the Soul," a philosophical poem, which he republished, with other pieces, in 1647. He refused the highest ecclesiastical preferments; and died, universally beloved, in 1667. That he was a man of great genius and vast erudition there can be no doubt; but his opinions were singular, and deeply tinged with enthusiasm. The most admired of his works are his "Enchiridium Ethicum," and "Divine Dialogues."

MORE, SIR THOMAS, chancellor of England, was the son of Sir John More, judge of the king's bench, and born in London, in 1460. He was educated at Christchurch, then Canterbury college, Oxford; and, in 1490, became a student of Lincoln's Inn. At the age of twenty-one he obtained a seat in parliament, where he opposed a subsidy demanded by Henry VII. with such force that it was refused by the house. At the accession of Henry VIII. he was called to the bar, and in 1508 he was made judge of the sheriff's court, and a justice of peace. In 1518 he published his "Utopia," a political romance; and about this time the friendship began between him and Erasmus, which lasted through life. By the interest of Wolsey he obtained the honour of knighthood, and a place in the privy council. In 1520 he was made treasurer of the exchequer; and in 1523 chosen speaker of the house of commons, where he resisted a motion for an oppressive subsidy, which gave great offence to his former friend, the cardinal. In 1530 he succeeded Wolsey as lord chancellor; and by his indefatigable application in that office, there was in a short time not a cause left undetermined. He resigned the seals, because he could not conscientiously lend his support to the measures of Henry respecting his divorce of queen Catharine; and he was eventually committed to the Tower for refusing the oath of supremacy. After an imprisonment of twelve months, he was brought to his trial in the court of king's bench, where, notwithstanding his eloquent defence, he was found guilty of treason, and sentenced to be beheaded. His behaviour, in the interval, corresponded with the uniform tenor of his life; and, on July 6, 1535, he ascended the scaffold, with his characteristic piety, saying to the lieutenant of the Tower, "I pray you, see me safe up; and as for my coming down, you may let me shift for myself." In the same spirit, when he laid his head on the block, he told the executioner to wait till he had removed his beard, "For that," said he, "hath committed no treason." Thus fell this illustrious Englishman, whose integrity and disinterestedness were on a par with his learning, and who wanted only a

MORE, HANNAH, an eminent moral writer, was born at Stapleton, in Gloucestershire, in 1744. She was one of the five daughters of a village schoolmaster, whose means were not sufficient to give his children many of the advantages of education; but this deficiency was supplied by their own talents and perseverance. The literary abilities of Hannah early attracted notice, and a subscription was formed for establishing her and her sisters in a school of their own. Her first literary production, The "Search after Happiness," a pastoral drama, was written when she was only eighteen years of age, though not published till 1773. By the encouragement of Garrick, she tried her strength in tragic composition, and wrote "The Indescribable Captive," a tragedy, which was printed in 1764. Her tragedy of "Percy," the most popular of her dramatic compositions, was brought out in 1778, and ran fourteen nights successively; and her last tragedy, "The Fatal Falshood," was produced in 1779. Shortly after, her opinions of public theatres underwent a change, and she has stated that she did not consider the stage, in its present state, as "becoming the appearance or countenance of a Christian." Early in life she attracted general notice by a brilliant display of literary talent, and was honoured by the intimate acquaintance of Johnson and Burke, of Reynolds and Garrick, and of many other eminent individuals, who equally appreciated her amiable qualities, and her superior intellect. But she quitted, in the prime of her days, the bright circle of fashion and literature, and retiring into the neighbourhood of Bristol, devoted herself to a life of active Christian benevolence, and to the composition of various works, having for their object the religious improvement of mankind. Her first prose publication was "Thoughts on the Manners of the Great;" this was followed by her "Estimate of the Religion of the Fashionable World." In 1795 she commenced, at Bath, in monthly numbers, "The Cheap Repository," a series of admirable rules for the common people, one of which is the well-known "Shepherd of Salisbury Plain." The success of this seasonable publication was extraordinary; and it is said that the sale reached the number of 1,000,000 copies. She subsequently produced her "Sermons on the Modern System of Female Education;" "Hints towards Forming the Character of a Young Princess;" "Cæcilia in Search of a Wife;" "Practical Piety;" "Christian Morals;" an "Essay on the Character and Writings of St Paul;" and "Moral Sketches of the Prevailing Opinions and Manners, Foreign and Domestic, with Reflections on Prayer." The collection of her works comprises 11 volumes, 8vo. She died at Clifton, in September, 1833, aged 89, having realized upwards of 30,000*l.* by her writings, and leaving in charitable bequests about 10,000*l.*

MOREAU, JAMES NICHOLAS, a French advocate, and historiographer of France, was born at St. Florentine, in 1717. He was employed in collecting and arranging all the charters, edicts, &c., of the French legislature; and was the author of "Mémoire pour servir à l'histoire des Cacosas;" "Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de notre Temps," 2 vols.; "Devoirs d'un Prince;" and "Principes de morale politique et du droit public, ou Discours sur l'Histoire de France," 21 vols. 8vo. It was the maxim of Moreau, that everything should be done for the people—nothing by them.

MOREAU, JEAN MICHEL, an eminent designer and engraver, was born at Paris, 1741. He was a man of extensive information on works of art, and his industry was truly surprising. In 1760 he was commissioned to prepare all the drawings required for the public festivities and those of the court; and he commenced his duties with the sketches for the celebration of the nuptials of the dauphin and the other royal princes. In 1775, he published engravings, executed by himself, of his drawings for the coronation of Louis XVI., and was made member of the academy of painting, and draughtsman of the royal cabinet. Besides what he completed as royal draughtsman, the number of drawings which he executed for engravings amounts to 2400; while, as an engraver also, his labour was prodigious. He prepared 160 plates for the History of France; 80 for the New Testament; 60 for Gesner's works; upwards of 100 for editions of Voltaire and Mollere; and an immense number more for the illustration of the standard works of ancient and modern authors. Died, 1814.

MOREAU, JEAN VICTOR, one of the most celebrated generals of the French republic, was born at Mortain, in 1753. Though destined for the law, he abruptly left his studies, and enlisted in a regiment, before he had attained his eighteenth year; but his father would not allow him to indulge his passion for a military life, and procured his discharge. The revolution, however, enabled him to gratify his wishes; and he became commander of the first battalion of volunteers, raised in the department of Morbihan, at the head of which he joined the army of the north. Having greatly distinguished himself at the head of his battalion, Pichegru, under whom he served, did all he could to befriend him; and, in 1794, being made general of division he was intrusted with a separate force, to act in Flanders, where he took many towns. He was soon after named commander-in-chief of the army of the Rhine, and began that course of arduous operations which terminated in the celebrated retreat, from the extremity of Germany to the French frontier, in the face of a superior force, by which his skill as a consummate tactician was so much exalted. Meantime, the republic being torn with intestine dissensions, he, for a time, retired from active service; but his talents as a general again brought him forward; and Buonaparte, having returned from Egypt, and being now first consul, intrusted him with the command of the armies of the Danube and the Rhine, which, in 1800, was productive of the decisive victory of Hohenlinden. paign, been implicated with Pichegru, Georges, and other royalists, in a plot against the consular government, he was brought to trial, with fifty-four other persons, declared guilty, upon slight evidence, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment. This was, however, commuted to a sort of voluntary banishment; and he accordingly retired to North America, where he bought an estate near Morrisville, on the Delaware. He there resided some years in the enjoyment of ease and tranquillity, until listening to the invitation of the allies, and more especially of Russia, he embarked for Europe in July, 1813. At Prague he found the emperors of Austria and Russia, with the king of Prussia, all of whom received him with great cordiality; and he was induced to aid in the direction of the allied armies against his countrymen. Soon after his arrival, while conversing with the emperor Alexander on horseback, in the battle before Dresden, a cannon ball fractured his right knee and leg. Amputation was immediately performed; but the wound proved mortal; and he died on the 1st of September, 1813. Moreau was brave, generous, and humane; possessing rare merits as a soldier, and highly esteemed by those who served under him, for the affability and simplicity of his manners. It was thought, and probably with truth, that he was looked upon with a jealous eye by Buonaparte, whose fear of finding in Moreau a successful rival, led to his expatriation.

MORELL, THOMAS, an eminent critic and lexicographer, was born at Elton, in 1703. He published valuable editions of Almsworth's Latin Dictionary, and Hedericus's Greek Lexicon, and was the author of "Annotations on Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding." He edited the plays of Euripides and Æschylus; translated the Epistles of Seneca; assisted Hogarth in writing his Analysis of Beauty; and selected the passages of Scripture for Handel's Oratorios. Died, 1784.

MORELLET, ANDREW, a French writer, born at Lyons, in 1729; was a doctor of the Sorbonne; lived in habits of friendship with the most eminent of his countrymen; wrote many political brochures during the revolution; and died in 1819. He published "Literary and Philosophical Miscellanies of the Eighteenth Century;" and his "Memoirs on the Eighteenth Century," appeared after his death.

MORERI, LOTTE, a French ecclesiastic, and the first author of the "Biographical Dictionary," which bears his name, was born in Provence, in 1613; was educated among the Jesuits at Aix; became almoner to the bishop of Apt; and died in 1680. The voluminous compilation which Moreri commenced, owed its origin to the priate before-mentioned: when it was first published by Moreri, it consisted of one folio volume; but the additions made to it by subsequent writers have extended it to ten.

MORES, EDWARD ROWE, an English antiquary, was born, in 1730, at Tunstall, in Kent. He published an ancient fragment, entitled, "Nouina et Insignia Gentilitia Nobilium Equitumque sub Edvardo primo Rege Militantium," &c. In 1772, he was chosen a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries; and he projected the Equitable Society for insurance on lives and survivorship by annuities. He was the author of the "History and Antiquities of Tunstall, in Kent," &c. Died, 1778.

MORETO Y CABANA, DON AUGUSTIN, an eminent Spanish dramatic poet of the 17th century, who after writing two hundred plays, became an ecclesiastic. He was cotemporary with Calderon, and was patronized by Philip IV. He may fairly be called the Spanish Moliere; many of his comedies still keeping possession of the stage, from their racy humour, striking incidents, and characteristic language of the dramatic persona.

MORGAGNI, JOHN BAPTIST, an eminent physician and anatomist, was born at Forlì, in Romagna, in 1682; studied under Valsalva, at Bologna; and, in 1711, became professor of medicine at Padua. In 1715, he was appointed to the first anatomical professorship, in which situation he continued till his death, in 1771. His works form five volumes folio, and are held in high estimation.

MORGAN, WILLIAM, an eminent Welsh prelate, who had a principal concern in the translation of the Bible into Welsh, printed first in 1588. He died in 1604.

MORGAN, SIR HENRY, a celebrated commander of bucaniers in the 17th century, was the son of a Welsh farmer. He took Porto Bello and Panama from the Spaniards, and for several years continued to enrich himself and his followers, by the success of his marauding expeditions against that nation. Having amassed a large fortune, he settled at Jamaica, of which island he was appointed governor by Charles II., and knighted.

MORGAN, WILLIAM, a distinguished mathematician, was a native of Glamorganshire. His father was a surgeon, which profession he intended his son should follow; but his uncle, Dr. R. Price, of Hackney, by whom he was educated, perceiving his strong inclination for the study of the mathematical sciences, persuaded his father to relinquish his original purpose. He obtained the office of actuary to the Equitable Assurance Company, London; and remained connected with that institution fifty-six years. He was the author of "The Doctrine of Annuities and Assurances of Lives;" "A Review of Dr. Crawford's Theory of Heat;" together with various treatises connected with the financial prosperity of Great Britain. Died, 1833.

MORGHEN, RAPHAEL, a celebrated engraver, born at Naples, in 1758. He was invited to Florence in 1782, to engrave the master-pieces of the Florentine gallery; and the reputation he acquired by his labours there, induced the grand duke to employ him in engraving Leonardo da Vinci's noble composition of the Last Supper, which is painted on the wall of the refectory in the Dominicans' convent, at Milan. In 1803 he was chosen an associate of the French Institute; and in 1812, he was invited to Paris by Napoleon, who treated him with the most flattering kindness.

His works are numerous, and include some of the most remarkable productions of the great masters.

MORHOFF, DANIEL GEORGE, a learned German author, born at Wismar, in Mecklenburg, in 1639; was educated at Stettin and Rostock; came to England, and resided for a time at Oxford. On his return he was chosen professor of poetry at Rostock, where he published his "Lexica in Ciconiam Adrianam, carmen juvenile et ludicrum," which was followed by his "Disertatio de enthymismo et furore poetico." In 1661, he accepted the professorship of poetry and eloquence at Kiel. In 1670, he again visited England, and contracted an intimacy with Mr. Boyle, some of whose works he translated into Latin. In 1672, he was made professor of history at Kiel; in 1680, librarian of the university; and died in 1691. His principal work is entitled "Polyhistor, sive de Notitia Auctorum et Rerum Commentarii."

MORICE, SIR WILLIAM, an English gentleman, memorable for the share which he had in bringing about the restoration of Charles II. He was the kinsman of general Monk, who procured him the place of secretary of state, which he resigned in 1666, and died in 1676.

MORIN, JOHN BAPTIST, a French physician, born at Villefranche, in 1583; became regius professor of mathematics at the university of Paris; and died in 1666. He was the author of "Astrologia Gallica," a work which cost him thirty years' labour, and was published after his death at the Hague.

MORIN, JOHN, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Blois, in 1591; entered the congregation of the Oratory; and wrote many theological works. Died, 1660.

MORIN, LOUIS, a physician and botanist, born at Mous, in 1635. After practising, with reputation, many years at Paris, he was appointed physician to the Hotel Dieu, and associate botanist to the academy. Died, 1714.

MORIN, STEPHEN, a French protestant divine, born in 1625, at Caen, in which city he settled as pastor of a congregation, and remained there till the revocation of the edict of Nantes, when he retired to Leyden. He was afterwards appointed professor of oriental languages, at Amsterdam; and died in 1700. His works are chiefly of a philological character, explanatory of the origin, &c., of the primitive languages.

MORISON, ROBERT, an eminent English physician, and professor of botany at Oxford, was born at Aberdeen, in 1620. He studied at the university of his native place till interrupted by the civil wars, in which he displayed great zeal and courage in behalf of the royal cause. After this he went to France, where he took his doctor's degree, and was appointed director of the royal garden at Blois. In 1660, he returned to England, and was nominated physician to Charles II., and regius professor of botany at Oxford. In 1669, he published his "Preludium Botanicum;" in 1690, a portion of his "Historia Plantarum," appeared; but his death, in 1683, prevented him from finishing it, and the second volume was published by Bobart.

MORITZ, CHARLES PHILIP, a German writer, was born at Hameln, in 1757. He travelled in England, Switzerland, and Italy; wrote many works, the chief of which are his "Travels;" "The Antiquities of Rome;" the novels of "Anthony Reiser" and "Andrew Hartkuopf;" and various grammatical treatises. Died, 1793.

MORLAND, SIR SAMUEL, a statesman and an able mechanist, was a native of Berkshire, and born in 1625. He was employed in some diplomatic missions by Cromwell; and afterwards rendered considerable service to Charles II., for which, at the Restoration, he was made a baronet. Among his inventions are reckoned the speaking-trumpet, the fire-engine, the capstan, and the steam-engine; but of some of these, it is presumed, he was rather the improver than the original discoverer. He expended a considerable fortune in the prosecution of his favourite speculations, and like many other projectors, was a benefactor to the public to the detriment of his private concerns. Died, about 1695.

MORLAND, GEORGE, an eminent painter of rustic scenery and low life, was born in London, in 1764. He was instructed by his father, who employed him constantly in making drawings for sale. By this means, he acquired a wonderful facility of invention and rapidity of execution. He had also great skill as a faithful copier of nature, and in the early part of his career confined himself to the delineation of picturesque landscape; but, having contracted irregular habits, and a partiality for the bottle and low company, he forsook the woods and fields for the alehouse; and stage-coachmen, postillions, and drovers drinking, became the favourite subjects of his pencil. Some of his best pieces exhibit farm-yards and stables, with dogs, horses, pigs, and cattle; or scenes at the door of the village alehouse, designed with all the truth and feeling which communicate a charm to the meanest objects, and proclaim the genius of the artist. Many were painted in spunging-houses, to clear him from arrest, or in public-houses, to discharge his reckoning. In one of the former description he died, in 1804, aged 40, a melancholy example of irregular and debasing habits. His wife survived him only two days.

MORLEY, GEORGE, an eminent English prelate, was born in London, in 1597. Charles I. gave him a canonry of Christchurch; but, being deprived of it by the parliament, he left England, and remained abroad till the Restoration, when he was made dean of Christchurch, and, in 1666, consecrated bishop of Worcester. He was next appointed dean of the chapel-royal, and, in 1662, translated to Winchester, to which see he was a great benefactor. He also founded five scholarships in Pembroke college, and gave large sums to various charitable uses. Died, 1684.

MORLEY, THOMAS, an eminent English musician in the reign of Elizabeth. He was distinguished both as a performer and a composer; and among his works are cansonets, madrigals, ballets, and church music. His chief work is entitled, "A plain and easy Introduction to Practical Musick." Died, about 1604

MORNAY, PHILIP DE, sieur de Plessis Morlay, a celebrated French statesman and writer, was born at Buh, Normandy, in 1549. He was a protestant, and after the massacre of St. Bartholomew's, he left the country, and travelled in many parts of the continent, visiting England also, where he was received by Elizabeth with distinguished marks of favour. In 1575, he entered into the service of the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV., whom for thirty years he served in the cabinet and the field with the utmost zeal and activity. After Henry had reconciled himself to the church of Rome, De Mornay sent in his resignation, and, retiring from a public sphere, devoted the remainder of his life to literary pursuits, advocating with his pen the cause which he had defended with his sword. His first work, a "Treatise on the Church," appeared in 1576, and was followed the succeeding year by another, entitled, "The Truth of Christianity." But his most celebrated one was a "Treatise on the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper," in which he opposed the doctrine of transubstantiation. So great was his learning, and such was his influence over the Huguenots, that he acquired from them the appellation of the Protestant Pope; while his constancy and unblemished character obtained the respect even of his opponents. Died, 1623.

MOROSINI, ANDREA, a senator of Venice; born, 1558; died, 1618. He rose to be one of the council of ten, and, in 1598, was appointed historian to the republic, on which he undertook a continuation of Paruta's History of Venice.

MOROSINI, FRANCESCO, a gallant soldier, who, as governor of Candia, about the middle of the 17th century, defended that island, with 30,000 men, against a Turkish force of four times that amount; but was ultimately compelled to surrender. He subsequently, as commander of the Venetian fleet, attacked that of the Turks, near the Dardanelles, and totally defeated it. In 1688 he was elected doge of Venice; and died in 1694.

MORRISON, the Rev. ROBERT, D. D. His ancestors were Scottish husbandmen; but his father, quitting Perthshire and the plough, became a mechanic and a man of substance in Northumberland, where Robert, the youngest of seven children, was born, in 1782. He was bred to last-making by his father, who was also an elder of the Scotch church. But Robert had a propensity for high classical attainments. He obtained the rudiments of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages from the local preacher he attended; and was, at length, sent by the London Missionary Society to China, (having previously studied the language of that country), where he arrived in 1807. In the course of a year or two he had prepared a grammar and dictionary of the Chinese language for the press, besides a Chinese version of the New Testament, which were afterwards printed. He was appointed by the East India Company as their correspondent and interpreter; but never lost sight of the chief object of his toil, namely, to extend and establish the tenets of the Christian doctrine. In 1817, the degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by the university of Glasgow; and in the same year he accompanied Lord Amherst in his embassy to Peking. He afterwards projected an Anglo-Chinese college at Malacca, of which he was a liberal patron, until his death, which took place at Macao, in 1834. In him was lost to the world the greatest Chinese scholar Europe ever produced, and one of the most zealous of Christian labourers.

MORTIER, Marshal, Duke of Treviso, born in 1768, was the son of a merchant, who represented the tiers état of Cambresis at the states-general in 1789. Quitting the mercantile profession, for which he had been designed, he entered the army in 1791, with the rank of captain; and having distinguished himself on various occasions, he was rapidly promoted, and entrusted with the command of the advance-guard, in which situation he was eminently successful, and gained the favour of his superiors. Buonaparte had so high an opinion of his skill and enterprise, that he appointed him to the command of the first army sent against Hanover, in 1803, which soon ended in its occupation by the French. In 1804 he was raised to the rank of a marshal, and decorated with the grand cross of the Legion of Honour. In the campaigns of 1805 and 1806, General Mortier headed one of the divisions of the grand army, commanded in chief by Napoleon in person; and during this period he displayed feats of military enterprise and intrepidity which rendered him dear to the troops of the nation. On one occasion, when at the head of only 4000 men, he fell in with the main body of the Russian army under Kutusoff, and being compelled to fight or surrender, by his superior tactics and valour he resisted them till the arrival of sufficient reinforcements came to his relief. In 1808 he was raised to the imperial dukedom of Treviso, receiving 4000*l.* per annum out of the crown domains of Hanover; and soon after the invasion of Spain, he took the command of the French armies there. He subsequently accompanied Napoleon in his expedition to Russia; and to him was entrusted the hazardous undertaking of blowing up the Kremlin at Moscow. On the restoration of Louis XVIII. he gave in his adhesion, and lived as a private individual in Paris till 1816, when he was appointed to the command of the fifteenth military division, situated at Rouen. He was afterwards elected a member of the Chamber of Deputies, in which he sat till 1819, when he was raised to the peerage. In 1834 Louis Philippe prevailed on him to accept office on the resignation of Marshal Soult, but having neither taste nor the requisite ability for the arena of politics, he soon after resigned. Being among the staff that accompanied the king and princes to the review at Paris, on the 28th of July, 1835, it was the fate of this brave officer to be one of the victims of the assassin Fieschi, whose "infernal machine," sparing the king and princes, for whom it was especially designed, took deadly effect on Marshal Mortier, while it also killed and wounded several who were near him.

MORTIMER, JOHN HAMILTON, an English painter, was born at Eastbourne, in Sussex, in 1739. In 1775, he was appointed by his majesty, a royal academician, without any solicitation; and died the same year. He excelled in sketches of banditti and terrific subjects.

MORTIMER, THOMAS, a miscellaneous writer, was born in 1730, in London. He received a liberal education, and was for some time vice-consul in the Netherlands; but losing that appointment, he became author by profession, and maintained himself by it with great respectability. His principal works are, "The British Plutarch," 6 vols.; a "Dictionary of Trade and Commerce;" "The Elements of Commerce, Politics, and Finances;" a "History of England;" and "The Student's Pocket Dictionary." Died, 1809.

MORTON, THOMAS, a learned English prelate, was born at York, in 1564. He was successively, dean of Gloucester and Winchester; and bishop of Chester, Lichfield, and Durham. He suffered many hardships in the great rebellion from the republican party, notwithstanding his great moderation and piety, which were acknowledged by all. Died, 1639.

MORTON, JAMES, earl of, regent of Scotland, was born at Dalkeith, in 1530, and educated under the famous Buchanan, at Paris. He returned to Scotland in 1554, and greatly promoted the reformation; but being accused of participating in the murder of Lord Darnley, he fled to England. He was afterwards made chancellor of Scotland, and, in 1574, succeeded the earl of Mar as regent, which office he resigned in 1579. He was condemned for high treason in 1581, and beheaded by a machine called the Maiden, greatly resembling the guillotine. Died, 1581.

MORTON, JOHN, archbishop of Canterbury and a cardinal, was born in 1410, at Bere, in Dorsetshire. He received his education at Balliol college, Oxford; after which he became principal of Peckwater Inn, now merged in Christchurch. In 1473 he was appointed master of the rolls, in which situation he adhered faithfully to Henry VI.; notwithstanding which, Edward IV. made him bishop of Ely, and lord chancellor, in 1478. Richard III., however, committed him to the custody of the duke of Buckingham, who confined him in his castle of Brecknock; from which fortress he escaped to Ely, and next to the continent, where he joined the earl of Richmond. In 1466, he was made archbishop of Canterbury, and the next year lord chancellor; in 1493, he was created a cardinal; in 1494, elected chancellor of the university of Oxford; and he died, aged 90, in 1506. He was a prelate of great liberality, learning, and abilities; and a generous promoter of many public works of utility.

MOSCHUS, a Greek pastoral poet, a native of Syracuse, who flourished, with his friend Bion, about 200 years B.C.

MOSELEY, BENJAMIN, a physician, was a native of Essex, and born about 1753. For several years he practised as a surgeon and apothecary at Kingston, in Jamaica; took his degree at Leyden; settled in London, as a physician, in 1783; was appointed physician of Chelsea hospital; and died in 1819. He wrote "Observations on the Dysentery of the West Indies;" two treatises "On Coffee and Sugar," &c.; and made himself very conspicuous by his violent opposition to vaccine inoculation.

MOSHEIM, JOHN LAURENCE, a learned German theologian, was born at Lubek, in 1634; became a member of the faculty of philosophy at Kiel; and was appointed chancellor of the university of Göttingen, where he remained till his death in 1725, lecturing daily on ecclesiastical history and most other departments of theology. His principal work on this subject is the "Institutiones Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ," which was afterwards published under various other forms, and translated into German, with additions; also into English by Dr. MacLaine. Among his other numerous writings are, "De rebus Christianorum ante Constantinum magnum Com. entarii," a "Life of Servetus;" "The Ecclesiastical History of the Tartars;" "Observationes Sacre;" and "Sermons," which were much admired for their pure, elegant, and mellifluous style.

MOSS, ROBERT, an English divine, was born at Gillingham, in Norfolk, about 1666. In 1698 he was chosen preacher to the society of Gray's Inn, and the following year appointed assistant at St. James's, Westminster. In 1708 he became lecturer of St. Lawrence Jewry; in 1712, dean of Ely; and he died in 1729. His sermons were published in 8 vols. 8vo.; besides which he wrote some Latin and English poems.

MOSS, CHARLES, an English prelate, was the nephew of the preceding. He became successively archdeacon of Colchester, prebendary of Salisbury, rector of St. Andrew Undershaft, and of St. George, Hanover square. In 1766 he was consecrated bishop of St. David's, whence he was translated to Bath and Wells; and died in 1802.—His son, Dr. CHARLES MOSS, was bishop of Oxford, and died in 1811.

MOSSOM, ROBERT, a learned Irish prelate, who suffered much in the civil war; but on the Restoration he was made dean of Christchurch, Dublin; with which he held the bishopric of Londonderry, where he died in 1679. His works are, "The Preacher's Tripartite;" "Varie colloquendi Formulae;" "Narrative of George Wild, Bishop of Derry;" and "Zion's Prospect in its first View."

MOSSOP, HENRY, an eminent tragic actor, born in Ireland, in 1739, was the son of a clergyman, and was educated at Trinity college, Dublin. He made his first appearance on the Dublin stage as Zanga, in the Revenge; but soon removed to London, where next to Garrick and Henderson he was esteemed the first tragedian of his time. In 1761 he became manager of one of the Dublin theatres; but the speculation proved his ruin; and he died in absolute poverty, at Chelsea, in 1773.

MOTHE LE VAYER, FRANCIS DE LA, a French philosopher and ingenious writer, was born at Paris, in 1588; relinquished the law for literary pursuits, and in 1630 was admitted a member of the French academy. In 1647 he was appointed preceptor to the duke of Anjou; and he also obtained the titles of historiographer of France, and counsellor of state. He died in 1672. His works, in which there is much acuteness and learning, though mingled with scepticism, form 14 volumes.

MOTHERWELL, WILLIAM, a poet, was born at Glasgow, in 1706; and when a youth he obtained a situation in the sheriff clerk's office at Paisley, where he continued till within a few years of his death. In 1827 he published a very interesting and valuable collection of ballads, entitled "Minstrelsy, Ancient and Modern;" and he was afterwards successively editor of the Paisley Magazine, Paisley Advertiser, and the Glasgow Courier. In 1833 was published a collected edition of his own poems, some of which possess a pathos and an intensity of feeling not often surpassed. He was busily engaged in other literary labours, when his career was suddenly arrested by a fit of apoplexy, Nov. 1, 1835.

MOTTE, ANTHONY HOUDART DE LA, a French poet, was born at Paris, in 1672. He was bred to the law, but deserted it for dramatic composition. In 1710 he obtained admission into the academy, at which time he was nearly blind; and many years before his death he lost his sight entirely. He produced several tragedies and comedies, some of which were very successful, particularly that entitled "Inez de Castro." In 1714 he published a translation of the Iliad, although entirely ignorant of the original language. He also published a volume of "Fables," besides some pastoral eclogues, hymns, &c.; but his prose was much superior to his verse. Died, 1731.

MOTTEUX, PIERRE ANTOINE, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Rouen, in Normandy, in 1660; settled in England after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and embarking his property in trade, opened an East India warehouse in Leadenhall-street, London, and also obtained a situation in the post-office. He wrote nearly twenty dramatic pieces, and translated "Don Quixote," and "Rabelais." Died, 1718.

MOTTLEY, JOHN, a dramatic writer, was the son of colonel Mottley, who followed James II. to France, and was killed at the battle of Turin, in 1706. His son, was born in 1692, and received his education at St. Martin's library school; after which he obtained a place in the excise-office, but was obliged to resign it in 1720. He then had recourse to his pen for support, and wrote five dramatic pieces; also the "Life of the Czar Peter the Great," 3 vols.; and "The History of Catharine of Russia," 2 vols.; but the work of his which obtained by far the greatest popularity, is the well-known collection of fæetie, called "Joe Miller's Jests," of which we have spoken under the notice of its assumed author. Died, 1750.

MOUFET, or MUFFETT, THOMAS, B

physician and naturalist, was born in London, and educated at Cambridge, after which he travelled through several parts of Europe; took the degree of M.D. while abroad; and, on his return, settled in London, where he practised with great reputation. He accompanied lord Willoughby on an embassy to Denmark; was with the earl of Essex when he encamped in Normandy; and died about 1604. His works are, "De jure et præstantia Chemicorum Medicamentorum;" "Ephoræ quinque Medicinales;" "Nosomantica Hippocratica;" "Health's Improvement, or Rules for preparing Food;" "Insectorum, sive minimorum Animalium Theatrum."

MOULIN, CHARLES DU, an eminent jurist, was born at Paris, in 1500. He was educated for the legal profession, and admitted an advocate in the parliament of Paris; but, owing to an impediment in his speech, he gave up pleading for chamber-practice, and devoted much of his time to the composition of legal works. He embraced the Protestant religion, and in 1532 attacked the authority of the pope, which compelled him to seek an asylum in Germany. On his return to France he suffered imprisonment, at the instigation of the Jesuits, and could not recover his liberty without pledging himself to print nothing till he had obtained the royal permission. He afterwards reconciled himself to the Catholic faith; and died in 1566.

MOULIN, PIERRE DU, a Protestant divine, was born at Bechny, in the Vexin, in 1568. He studied first at Sedan, and next at Cambridge, from which university he removed to a professorship of philosophy at Leyden, where he also taught Greek; but in 1599 he returned to France, and became minister at Charenton. On the assassination of Henry IV., Du Moulin charged the guilt of that detestable deed upon the Jesuits, which produced a violent controversy between him and some of that society; and, in 1615, he visited England on the invitation of James I., who gave him a prebend in Canterbury cathedral. He did not continue long in England; but after refusing the divinity professorship at Leyden, he finally settled at Sedan, of which place he became the pastor, filling at the same time the theological chair there. Among his writings are, "A History of Monachism;" a treatise "On the recent Origin of Popery," &c. Died, 1638.—PETER DU MOULIN, his son, was born in 1600, at Paris, and graduated at Leyden; but coming afterwards to England, obtained, like his father, a prebend at Canterbury, and was one of the chaplains to king Charles II. He was the author of "The Peace of the Soul;" "Clamor Regis Sanguinis," which being anonymous, was attributed, by Milton, to Alexander More; and "A Defence of the Protestant Church."—LOUIS DU MOULIN, his brother, became a violent Independent, and wrote "Parænesis ad edificateores Imperii," dedicated to Oliver Cromwell; and "Patronus Bonæ Fidei," a fierce invective against the church of England. Died, 1683.

MOUNIER, JOHN JOSEPH, a distinguished member of the states-general in 1789, was born at Grenoble, in 1738; was brought up to the legal profession; and was successively advocate of the parliament of Grenoble and judge-royal. While he was a member of the national assembly he exerted all his talents and influence to promote the establishment in France of a limited monarchy; but finding his efforts vain, he retired first to his native place, and afterwards removed to Geneva; where he published "Recherches sur les Causes qui ont empêché les Français de devenir Libres." He subsequently visited England, but resided chiefly in Switzerland, Italy, or Germany, till 1801, when he returned to France. In 1804 he was nominated a councillor of state; and died in 1806.

MOUNTFORT, WILLIAM, an English actor and dramatic writer, was born in Staffordshire, in 1649. He was an excellent comic performer; and being in the flower of his age, and one of the handsomest men on the boards, the parts of the lovers were usually allotted to him. In one of these he had captivated the affections of Mrs. Bracegirdle, an actress much admired for her personal charms. This lady had rejected the addresses of a captain Hill, who, in company with lord Mohun, waylaid Mountfort, one night, in the winter of 1697, as he was returning from the theatre to his lodgings, in North-street, Strand; and, before he could draw his sword, ran him through the body, and killed him on the spot. Hill made his escape to the continent, and lord Mohun was tried by his peers for the murder, but for want of sufficient evidence, was acquitted. This nobleman was himself eventually killed by the duke of Hamilton, in a duel fought in Hyde-park. Mountfort was the author of five plays, and was in the zenith of his reputation at the time of his death.

MOURAD BEY, a famous Mameluke chief, was a native of Circassia. After the destruction of Ali Bey, in 1773, he obtained the government of Cairo in conjunction with Ibrahim Bey; which, notwithstanding some severe contests with Ismael Bey and the Turkish government, who tried to dispossess them, they contrived to keep. When Buonaparte invaded Egypt, Mourad opposed the French with great vigour, but he was at length obliged to retreat to Upper Egypt. He subsequently entered into a treaty with general Kleber, and accepted the title of prince of Assouan and Jirgeh, under the protection of France. He died of the plague, in 1801.

MOURADGEA D'OISSON, IGNATIUS, an Armenian by descent, was born at Constantinople, in 1740. At the age of twenty-four he understood most of the Oriental languages; and from having been secretary and first interpreter to the Swedish embassy, was eventually appointed minister of Sweden to the Porte. Died, 1807. He was the author of two valuable works, "A General View of the Ottoman Empire;" and an "Historical View of the East."

MOURGUES, MICHAEL, a French Jesuit, and a man of profound erudition, was born at Auvergne, in 1643; became professor royal of mathematics and rhetoric in the academy of Toulouse; and died there in 1713. Among his best works are, "A Pa- rallel between Christian Morality and that of the Ancient Philosophers;" "An Explanation of the Theology of the Pythagoreans;" "New Elements of Geometry;" and a "Treatise on French Poetry."

MOXON, JOSEPH, hydrographer to Charles II. and a mathematical writer, was born at Wakefield, in Yorkshire, in 1697, and died in London, about 1760. He published several scientific books, taught the mathematics, and carried on the trade of a globe and map-manufacturer.

MOYLE, WALTER, a miscellaneous writer, was born at Cornwall, in 1672; studied at Oxford and the Temple; and died at his seat in Cornwall, in 1731. His works, consisting of an "Essay on the Miracle of the Thundering Legion;" an "Essay on the Lacedemonian Government;" another on the "Roman Constitution;" and "Letters;" were printed after his death, with a Biographical Memoir, in 3 vols.

MOZART, JOHN CHRYSOSTOM WOLFGANG AMADEUS, one of the most eminent musical composers that ever lived, was the son of Leopold Mozart, sub-chapel-master of Salzburg, and himself a respectable musician. He was born in 1756; and the precocity of his musical talent was so extraordinary, that it must be our apology for entering at more length than usual into the history of his early years. His father could not fail to observe his genius and love for the science, and he took every advantage of it, so that before the child was four years' old he could play small pieces on the harpsichord with correctness and taste. In his fifth year he wrote a concerto for the harpsichord, perfectly according to the rules of the art, but which was so difficult that only the most practised performer could have played it. In his sixth year, young Mozart had made such progress, that his father was induced to take him and his sister Maria Anna, who was also a musical genius, to Munich and Vienna, where the little artists were introduced to the emperor's court, and the unequalled execution of the boy excited universal surprise, particularly as he seemed anxious only to please connoisseurs. In 1763, when young Mozart was seven years' old, the family made a journey beyond the borders of Germany, which spread his fame universally. In November of the same year, they arrived in Paris, where they remained six months, and were overwhelmed with attention and applause. Here he published his first sonatas for the harpsichord. In 1764, the family proceeded to England, and performed at court, the son playing on the king's organ with great success. At a public concert, symphonies of his composition only were performed. Here, as well as in Paris, compositions of Bach, Handel, &c., were laid before him, all of which, though exceedingly difficult, he executed with the greatest truth at first sight. During his stay in England, he composed six sonatas, which were published in London, and which he dedicated to the queen. After this he returned to Holland, and assisted at the installation of the stadtholder. The family next visited Paris, and after having been twice at Versailles, proceeded, by way of Lyons, through Switzerland to Munich, where the elector gave young Mozart a theme, on which he composed in his presence, without piano or violin, wrote down the music, and, to the astonishment of all present, executed, after having finished it. In 1766, they returned to Salzburg, where they remained till 1768, and then made a second journey to Vienna. The brother and sister performed in presence of the emperor Joseph, who commissioned young Mozart to write the music for a comic opera, "La Finta Semplice." It was applauded by Haase, the master of the chapel, and Metastasio, but was not performed. At the consecration of the orphan's church, he composed the mass, the offertorium, and a concert for trumpets, and led the solemn performance—a boy of twelve years old—in presence of the imperial court. In 1769, Mozart, who had been made master of the concerts at the court at Salzburg, commenced a journey to Italy, in company with his father. They arrived at Rome during Passion-week, and on the Wednesday evening Mozart went to the Sistine chapel, to hear the celebrated "Miserere," a composition, of which it had been prohibited to give or take a copy, on pain of excommunication. Aware of this prohibition, he listened so attentively, that on his return home he noted down the whole piece. On leaving Rome the pope created him knight of the golden spur. At Bologna he was elected member and master of the chapel of the philharmonic academy; on which occasion an anthem for four voices was given him to compose, and this he accomplished in half an hour. A previous engagement now called him to Milan, where he arrived in October, 1770, and there composed, in his fourteenth year, his serious opera of "Mitridate," which had a run of upwards of twenty nights in succession. When Mozart returned to Salzburg, in 1771, he found a letter, in which he was commissioned, in the name of the empress Maria Theresa, to compose the grand theatrical serenata "Ascanio in Alba," for the celebration of the nuptials of the archduke Ferdinand. He undertook this commission, and, in August, returned to Milan for some months, where, during the festivities of the marriage, Mozart's serenata, and an opera composed by Haase, were performed alternately. In 1773, he went again to Vienna, and, engaging in the service of the emperor, he satisfied the great expectations which were raised by his early genius, and became the Raphael of musicians. Among the works of his which have remained on the German stage, and will always be the delight of every tasteful nation, are "Idomeneo," the "Nozze di Figaro," the "Zauberflöte," the "Clemenza di Tito," and, above all, the splendid "Don Giovanni." The music of this opera was the triumph of dramatic composition; and though its great merits were not appreciated on its first performance, he lived to see justice done to it. He was now in his thirty-sixth year, and in a state of great physical debility. The composition of his sublime "Requiem," in the decline of his bodily powers, and under great mental excitement, hastened his dissolution; he was seized with repeated fainting fits, brought on by his extreme assiduity in writing, in one of which he expired, Dec. 5, 1791.

MUDGE, JOHN, an English physician, and an excellent mechanic, was the son of Mr. Zachary Mudge, vicar of St. Andrew's, Plymouth, and well known by a volume of excellent Sermons, and an ingenious essay for a new version of the Psalms. Dr. John Mudge settled as a physician at Plymouth, where he wrote a Treatise "On the Catarrhus Cough." He improved the construction of reflecting telescopes, and died in 1793. —His brother THOMAS, born in 1715, was an excellent watchmaker, and made great improvements in chronometers, for which he received a parliamentary reward. Died, 1794. —WILLIAM MUDOX, a nephew of the last mentioned, was born in 1762, at Plymouth; rose to the rank of major-general in the army; and died in 1820. He superintended the execution of the grand trigonometrical survey of England and Wales, and wrote an account of the operations.

MULLER, JOHN, called Regiomontanus, from Mons Regius, or Koenigsberg, where he was born in 1436. He made so great a progress in learning, that he was admitted into the academy at Leipsic, long before the usual age. Thence he removed to Vienna, where he studied the mathematics under Purbach, whom he assisted in his observations. At the desire of cardinal Bessarion, Regiomontanus and his master went to Rome, to complete the Latin version of Ptolemy's Almagest; but while there, Purbach died, and the whole task devolved upon his associate. After a long stay in Italy, he went to Buda; but on the breaking out of the war with the Turks he removed to Nuremberg, where he built an observatory, and founded a printing-office. He died in 1476, at Rome, whither he had been called by SIXTUS IV., to assist in reforming the calendar; having been previously raised, for his services, to the archbishopric of Ratisbon. He wrote various astronomical works, and constructed some curious automata.

MULLER, GERARD FREDERIC, a German traveller, was born in 1700, at Herforden, in Westphalia; was educated at Leipsic; and went to reside at St. Petersburg, where he taught Latin, geography, and history. In 1730, he was chosen professor of history, and the year following he visited London, where he was elected a member of the royal society. On his return to Russia, he accompanied Gmelin and De L'Isle in a tour through Siberia, which occupied them ten years. In 1747 Muller obtained the place of historiographer of Russia; in 1754, he was made secretary of the academy of sciences; and, in 1766, keeper of the archives. He died in 1783. His principal work is "A Collection of Russian Histories," in 9 vols.

MULLER, JOHN VON, an eminent Swiss historian, was born in 1752, at Schaffhausen, and studied at Gottingen. In 1780 he published the first part of his "History of the Swiss Confederation;" and shortly after he went to Berlin, where he printed "Historical Essays." His other principal work was a "Course of Universal History;" but he was also the author of several others, which were published collectively at Tübingen, in 27 vols. Muller was successively professor of Greek at Schaffhausen, and of history at Cassel, councillor of the imperial chancery, secretary of state for the ephemeral kingdom of Westphalia, and director-general of public instruction. Died, 1809.

MÜLLER, Louis, a celebrated Prussian engineer. He served in the seven years' war, under Frederic; rose to the rank of major; and died in 1804, aged 70. He was the author of a "View of the Wars of Frederic the Great," and other works relating to the military art.

MUMMIUS, Lucius, a Roman consul, who, for his victories over the Achæans, was called Achæicus. He was afterwards disgraced, and exiled to Delos, where he died.

MUNCER, or MUNTZER, a fanatic, who, in the early part of the sixteenth century, rendered himself for awhile extremely formidable in Germany, where he preached equality and the community of property, and collected 40,000 followers, who committed many enormities. He was at length defeated by the landgrave of Hesse, with the loss of 7000 of his deluded followers, and being chased to Franchhausen, was taken prisoner, and executed at Mulhausen, in 1526.

MUNCHHAUSEN, JEROME CHARLES FREDERIC VON, was a German officer in the Russian service, who served in several campaigns against the Turks. He was a passionate lover of horses and hounds; of which and of his adventures among the Turks, he told the most extravagant stories; till his fancy so completely got the better of his memory, that he really believed his most extravagant fictions, and felt very much offended if any doubt was expressed on the subject. Having become acquainted with Burger at Pyrmont, and related these waking dreams to him, the poet published them in 1767, with his own improvements, under the title of "Wunderbare Abenteuer und Reisen des Herrn Von Munchhausen." The wit and humour of the work gave it great success, and it was translated into several foreign languages. Died, 1797.

MUNDAY, ANTHONY, a dramatic poet of the sixteenth century. He was the author of the City Pageants; enlarged Stowe's Survey of London; and died in 1633.

MUNDEN, JOSEPH SHEPHERD, a celebrated comic actor, who, from 1790 to 1813, delighted the laughter-loving audiences of Covent-garden with his inimitable representations; but from 1813 to 1824, when he retired from the stage, his services were transferred to Drury-lane. His humour was exuberant and racy; and though often verging on caricature, he could melt the heart by touches of true pathos, as readily as he could stir it into mirth by the exquisite drollery of his ever-varying countenance. Born, 1758; died, 1832.

MUNDINO, or MONDINO, a physician, was born at Milan. He became professor of medicine at Bologna, and was the first among the moderns who dissected human bodies. He was the author of a work entitled "Anatomia omnium humani Corporis Interiorum membrorum." Died, 1316.

MUNNICH, BURCHARD CHRISTOPHER, count, a military officer, was born in Oldenburg, in 1683. After distinguishing himself in the German wars, he entered into the Russian service, and rose to the rank of marshal; but in 1741 the empress Elizabeth condemned him to perpetual exile in Siberia. He was, however, recalled from banishment on the accession of Peter III., and, on his arrival at court, made his appearance before the emperor in the sheepskin dress which he had worn during his captivity. Died, 1767.

MUNOZ, JOHN BAPTIST, a Spanish historian, was born in 1745, at Mucron, near Valencia. He was appointed cosmographer of the Indies, and undertook, by order of the king, a history of America, of which he lived to publish only one volume. His other works are, "De recto Philosophæ recentis in Theologia usu, Dissertatio," "De Scriptorum gentium Lectione," "Institutiones Philosophicæ," &c.

MUNSTER, SEBASTIAN, a German divine, was born at Ingelheim, in 1489; entered into the order of Cordeliers; but left them to join Luther. He then settled at Basil, where he succeeded Pellicanus in the Hebrew professorship. He published a Latin version of the Bible, from the Hebrew, with notes; "Universal Cosmography," a Treatise on Dialling; a Latin Translation of Josephus; and several mathematical works. Died, 1562.

MURAT, JOACHIM, one of the most intrepid of the French marshals, and who was placed on the throne of Naples by Buonaparte, was the son of an innkeeper at Cahors, where he was born in 1771. He was intended for the church; but, escaping from the college of Toulouse, he enlisted as a chasseur, but was shortly after dismissed for insubordination. On the formation of the national guard he entered that corps; and displaying an active zeal for revolutionary principles, he was soon advanced to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. The overthrow of the terrorists checked his progress for a time, but the executive directory made him a chief of brigade; and in 1796 he accompanied Buonaparte to Italy as his aid-de-camp. Here he distinguished himself as a cavalry officer, by his impetuous courage, and was employed by his chief as a diplomatist at Turin and at Genoa. He followed the same general to Egypt, where he decided the victory over the Turks at Aboukir, and returned with Buonaparte as general of division. In 1800 he married Marie Caroline, the youngest sister of his patron, who was then first consul; and, in 1804, he was made marshal, grand admiral, and prince of the French empire. His services in the campaign of 1805, against Austria, during which he entered Vienna at the head of the army, were rewarded with the grand dachy of Berg. He continued to follow up the victories of his master, with such distinction, that, in 1808, Napoleon placed him on the throne of Naples, with the title of king Joachim. After reigning peaceably four years, he was called to accompany Napoleon to Russia, as commander of all his cavalry; and after the defeat of Smolensko, he imitated the example of his leader, and left the army for Naples. Once more he fought with Napoleon, in the fatal campaign of Germany; but, after the battle of Leipzig, he withdrew, and, finding that the throne of his patron began to totter, actually concluded an alliance against him. In 1815, however, he again took up arms, and formed a plan to make himself master of Italy as far as the Po, at the very time that Austria and the allies, upon his repeated assurances that he would remain true to them, had determined to recognise him as king of Naples. It was too late. Austria, therefore, took the field against him, and he was soon driven as a fugitive into France. After the overthrow of Napoleon, he escaped, in the midst of continual dangers, to Corsica, from which he sailed with a few adherents, to recover his lost throne. A gale, off the coast of Calabria, dispersed his vessels, but Murat determined to go on shore. He was seized, and carried in chains to Pizzo, brought before a court-martial, and condemned to be shot. This sentence was executed Oct. the 13th, 1815, when Murat met his fate with undaunted courage. He was remarkable for elegance of person; but, though spirited and active, had few mental qualifications, and fell a victim to the most unpardonable rashness.

MURATORI, LOUIS ANTHONY, an eminent Italian historian and antiquary, was born in 1672, at Vignola, in the Modenese territories; was made keeper of the Ambrosian library at Milan, and, subsequently, librarian and archivist to the duke of Modena. His literary productions are numerous and valuable, but his fame chiefly depends on the vast erudition he has shown in editing the works of others. His great historical collection, entitled "Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, ab anno Æræ Christianæ, 39 vols. folio;" "Antiquitates Italicæ, mediæ ævi," 6 vols. folio; "Anecdota Latina," 4 vols. 4to.; "Anecdota Græca," 4 vols. 4to.; "Annali d'Italia," 18 vols. 8vo.; with many others, attest the magnitude of his literary labours. Died, 1750.

MURET, or MURETUS, MARK ANTHONY, a learned French grammarian of the 16th century, who after teaching languages and publicly lecturing at the principal towns in France and Italy, entered the society of Jesuits. His works, consisting of orations, poems, sacred hymns, &c. are written with purity and elegance.

MURILLO, BARTOLOMEO ESTEVEN, one of the greatest of the Spanish painters, was born, in 1618, near Seville. He acquired the rudiments of art from his uncle Juan del Castillo; and being encouraged to visit Madrid, he acquired the countenance and patronage of the celebrated painter Velasquez, then in the height of his reputation. He afterwards returned to Seville, and not only earned a handsome competency by his labours, but also an imperishable fame. While painting the admired picture of St. Catharine, in the church of the Capuchins at Cadix, he fell from the scaffold, and died in consequence of the injuries he received, in 1685.

MURPHY, ARTHUR, a dramatic and miscellaneous writer, was born at Cork, in 1755, and educated at St. Omers. At the relation. But not liking that profession he came to London, and tried his dramatic powers in the farce of "The Apprentice," which was soon followed by that of "The Upholsterer;" and, having a great inclination to the stage, he made an effort in the character of Othello, but without success. He then produced the "Orphan of China," a tragedy, which was well received. He also wrote a weekly paper, called the "Gray's Inn Journal;" and two others, in defence of government, entitled the "Test" and the "Auditor." In these, however, he failed; and some ludicrous mistakes, into which he was indisputably led by his antagonists, exposed him to ridicule. Having studied the law, he was called to the bar by the society of Lincoln's Inn, but never had much practice. His plays of the "Grecian Daughter;" "All in the wrong;" "The Way to Keep Him;" and the "Citizen," had great success, and produced the author wealth and fame. Mr. Murphy also acquired considerable reputation by his "Essay on the Life and Genius of Dr. Johnson," published in 1792; as well as by his translations of Tacitus and Sallust, and the "Life of Garrick." He was zealous in defence of the government measures; and during his latter years he obtained the appointment of a commissioner of bankrupts, and a pension of 300*l.* per annum. He died in 1805, aged 77.

MURPHY, JAMES CAVANAH, an eminent architect, antiquary, and traveller, was a native of Ireland. He published his "Travels in Portugal, in 1769 and 1790;" "Antiquities of the Arabians in Spain;" and "Plans, Elevations, Sections, and Views of Batalha, in Portugal." Died, 1816.

MURR, CHRISTOPHER THEOPHILUS VON, the author of various works on bibliography, literary history, and antiquities; was born at Nuremberg, in 1735; and died in 1811.

MURRAY, WILLIAM VAUS, a distinguished American diplomatist, was born in Maryland, about 1782. He studied the law in England; practised it in his native country; and became a senator of the United States. As minister at the Hague he succeeded in preserving harmony between the American and Batavian republics; and the reconciliation between the United States and France, was effected chiefly through his agency as envoy extraordinary to the French republic. Died, 1803.

MURRAY, JAMES, an American by birth, whose real name was Lillibridge, was a partisan officer in the service of the East India Company. He entered the service of Holkar, the famous Malabar chief, about the year 1790, and soon became noted for his bravery, military skill, and the good offices he performed to certain British officers, who had been taken prisoners, and who but for his humane interference would have been put to the sword. When the war broke out between the British government and Scindia, in which Holkar assisted the latter, Murray joined the British general, Lord Lake, with a body of 7,000 cavalry. The subjects from the service of the native princes, but this order could not extend to Murray, as being an American. He was treated by the British commander with great consideration, and was employed in many dangerous and important services, still retaining the command of the cavalry which he had brought with him. At the siege of Bhurtpore, where the British army lost nearly 10,000 men, in four attempts to take the fort by storm, he was in continual action, and attained the character of being the best partisan officer in the army. Died, 1807.

MURRAY, ALEXANDER, a self-taught linguist, was born in 1775, at Kitterick, in the Highlands of Scotland, and his father being a shepherd, he also was employed, at the age of ten, to assist as a shepherd's boy. By extraordinary application he made himself master of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and French languages; and when, in 1794, the fame of his acquirements gained him admission to the university of Edinburgh, he made a rapid progress also in the Eastern dialects. In 1806 he became assistant to Dr. Muirhead, the minister of the parish of Urr, and soon afterwards he succeeded him in the pastoral charge; but in 1812 he was called from thence, to fill the chair of Oriental languages at Edinburgh, and at the same time received the degree of D.D. This honourable appointment, however, he did not long enjoy; his death, by a consumption, taking place in 1813. He left a "History of the European Languages," which was printed, with his life prefixed, in 2 vols.

MURRAY, JOHN, an eminent physician, was a native of Scotland, and educated at Edinburgh, where he rose to eminence as a lecturer in natural philosophy, chemistry, the materia medica, and pharmacy. He was the author of "Elements of Chemistry," 2 vols.; "Elements of Materia Medica and Pharmacy," 2 vols.; "A System of Chemistry," 4 vols.; and a System of Materia Medica, and Pharmacy," 2 vols. Died, 1820.

MURRAY, CHARLES, a theatrical performer and dramatic writer, was born in 1754, at Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire. He was the son of Sir John Murray of Broughton, who acted as secretary to the Pretender in 1745; was brought up as a surgeon in the naval service, which he quitted for the stage; performed at the chief provincial towns in England; made his debut at Covent garden in 1796, as Shylock; and ultimately became manager of the theatre at Edinburgh, where he spent the latter part of his life. He was the author of "The New Maid of the Oaks," and "The Experiment." Died, 1821.

MURRAY, LINDLEY, a grammarian, and moral writer, was born in 1745, of Quaker parents, at Swatara, near Lancaster, in Pennsylvania. He was originally destined for the mercantile profession; but having been severely chastised for a breach of domestic discipline, he privately left his father, who was then residing at New York, and, taking up his abode in a seminary at Burlington, New Jersey, he there contracted a love of books and study. He afterwards studied the law, and practised as a barrister; but in course of time he quitted the bar for the counting-house, and by mercantile pursuits realized a competency. He then purchased a country-seat on the banks of the river Bellvue, about three miles from New York; but a severe sickness subjected him to a general debility of the muscles, for the cure of which he was induced to go, with his family, to England; and he eventually settled at Holdgate, near York. The local attachments which he there formed, and his bodily infirmities, detained him for the rest of his life; but though the debilitated state of his frame deprived him of all exercise, with the exception of occasional airings in his carriage, his mind continued in full vigour, and the tedium of a protracted confinement was much alleviated by the composition of several instructive works of considerable value and utility. They consist of an "English Grammar;" "English Exercises," and "Key;" the "English Reader," with an "Introduction" and "Sequel" to the same; two French selections, "Le Lecteur François;" and "Introduction au Lecteur François;" "The English Spelling-Book;" "The Power of Religion on the Mind;" and "The Duty and Benefit of Reading the Scriptures." These publications were all lucrative, and deservedly so; and it is no small satisfaction to know, that his private life was as amiable as his labours in the cause of education and morals were successful. He died in 1826, aged 85.

MURRAY, JAMES PATRICK, a major-general in the British army, was the son of James Murray, governor of Minorca, who so nobly defended Fort St. Philip, and who, in 1782, scorned the bribe of a foreign peerage and a million of money, offered by the Duc de Crillon, to betray his trust. His mother was conveyed from the island, during the siege, to Leghorn, where she was delivered of the subject of this notice. After the capitulation of Malta, his father returned to England with his family, where he died in 1794, leaving James Patrick, his only son, heir to his estate, and also to his military ardour. At the age of fourteen young Murray obtained an ensigncy in the 44th, and pursued his military career, until he was appointed aid-de-camp to generals Don and Pitteney. In the campaign in Holland, in 1799, he was wounded, though but slightly; and in the same year he purchased the command of a company in the 9th foot. In 1802 he was returned to parliament for Yarmouth, Isle of Wight. He soon after attained the rank of major, served in the peninsular war, and at the passage of the Douro his right arm was shattered by a musket-ball. Subsequently, he received gradual promotion, until, in 1830, he became a major-general and a companion of the bath. He died in 1834, while stationed at Athlone.

MUSA, ANTONIUS, physician to the emperor Augustus, said to have been the first who prescribed the use of the cold bath; and lived about 20 B.C.

MUSEUS, a philosopher and poet of antiquity, who is said to have been the son of Orpheus, and president of the Eleusinian mysteries at Athens. He versified the oracles, and wrote a poem on the sphere. A hill near Athens was called by his name. He is to be distinguished from Musæus, the grammarian, who wrote a poem, called "The Loves of Hero and Leander."

MUSÆUS, JOHN CHARLES AUGUSTUS, an eminent German writer, born at Jena, in 1735, was professor at the gymnasium of Weimar, and author of "Physiognomical Travels;" "Popular Tales of the Germans," &c. Died, 1787.

MUSCULUS, WOLFGANG, one of the early reformers, born at Dieuze, in Lorraine, in 1497. He was originally a Benedictine monk; and on embracing the doctrines of Luther, he was obliged to fly to Strasburg, from which city he removed to Augsburg; and afterwards went to Berne, where he was appointed professor of divinity. His commentaries on the Scriptures are valuable; besides which he published several translations from the Greek, particularly of the ecclesiastical historians. Died, 1563.

MUSGRAVE, SIR RICHARD, Bart., an Irish historian, was born about 1758. He was a member of parliament, and collector of the excise for Dublin. In 1801 he published "Memoirs of the Rebellions in Ireland," &c., a work which gave great offence to the Roman Catholics, on account of the glowing picture exhibited in it of the atrocities committed by the insurgents in 1798. Sir Richard died in 1818.

MUSGRAVE, WILLIAM, a physician and antiquary, was born at Charlton, in Somersetshire, in 1657, and educated at Winchester school, and New college, Oxford. He became a fellow of the royal college of physicians, and also of the royal society; to which last learned body he acted as secretary. In 1691 he settled at Exeter, and there died in 1721. Besides some Latin tracts on the gout, he published four volumes of dissertations on Roman and British Antiquities.—His grandson, Dr. SAMUEL MUSGRAVE, was also a physician at Exeter, where he died in 1762. He rendered himself notorious in 1763, by charging the ministers with having been bribed to settle a peace advantageous to France. As a scholar he is known by an edition of Euripides, 4 vols. 8vo.; and two dissertations on the Grecian Mythology, and the Olympiads.

MUSHET, ROBERT, an ingenious and active officer belonging to the royal mint, who died in 1825. His statements and suggestions respecting the currency and mint regulations, and the financial state of the country generally, were deduced from a patient investigation of the subject, and displayed great ability.

MUSS, CHARLES, an ingenious painter in enamel, whose "Holy Family" after Parmegiano, is said to be the largest piece of enamel ever painted. Died, 1824.

MUSSATO, ALBERTIN, an historian and poet, was born at Padua, in 1261. He rose from a state of indigence to public employments in his native city; but notwithstanding his services, he became an object of popular fury; and in 1314 an attempt was made to murder him. The ringleaders in this conspiracy were put to death; but Mussato was afterwards banished to Chioggia, where he died in 1330. In his exile he wrote "Historia Augusta Henrici VII. Imp."

MUSSCHENBROEK, PETER VAN, a celebrated Dutch natural philosopher and mathematician, was born at Leyden, in 1692. He applied himself chiefly to natural philosophy; held professorships at various places, and was a member of the Royal Society, and the French Academy of Sciences. His "Course of Natural and Experimental Philosophy" is a valuable work, and has been translated into English by Colson, in 2 vols. Musschenbroek was also the author of "Tentamina Experimentorum;" "Institutiones Physicæ;" and "Compendium Physicæ Experimentalis." Died, 1761.

MUTIANO, GIROLAMO, an Italian painter, born at Braccia. He was a great favourite with Pope Gregory XIII., who employed him to paint a picture of St. Paul the hermit, and another of St. Anthony, for the church of St. Peter. Sixtus V. also held him in esteem, and entrusted to him the designs for the bas-reliefs of the column of Trajan. At the instance of this artist, pope Gregory founded the academy of St. Luke, which Sixtus confirmed by a brief; and Mutiano gave two houses to the institution. Died, 1590.

MUTIUS, CÆLIUS, first named Codrus, and afterwards Scævola, an illustrious Roman, who distinguished himself in the war against Porsenna. When that prince besieged Rome, Mutius entered his camp to assassinate him, and, by mistake, stabbed one of his attendants. Being seized and brought before Porsenna, he said that he was one of three hundred who had engaged, by oath, to slay him, and added, "This hand, which has missed its purpose, ought to suffer." On saying this he thrust it into the coals which were burning upon the altar, and suffered it to be consumed. Porsenna, struck with his intrepidity, made peace with the Romans. The name of Scævola, or left-handed, was given as a mark of distinction to Mutius and his family.

MUTIS, JOSEPH CÆLESTINO, a celebrated naturalist, was born at Cadix, in 1731. In 1760 he accompanied the marquis Deila Vega to New Grenada, and spent nearly half a century in South America, contributing greatly to the spreading of science and the arts of civilization in that country. On his return to Europe he was appointed keeper of the royal garden at Madrid. He was the first botanist who distinguished the various species of cinchona. Died, 1808.

MYCONIUS, FREDERIC, a German divine, originally a Franciscan monk, was born at Lichtenfels, in Franconia, in 1491. When Luther declared against indulgences, Myconius opposed him, but soon changed his sentiments, and became a missionary for the propagation of the principles of the reformation. In 1538 he accompanied the chancellor of Weimar in an embassy to England; and while here, held a disputation with some bishops and other divines. On his return, he was employed to reform the churches of Thuringia; but he protested strongly against the alienation of the ecclesinistical and monastic revenues to secular purposes. Died, 1546.

MYCONIUS, OSWALD, OF GRISCHAUSEN, a reformer, born at Lucerne, in Switzerland, in 1488. He studied at Basle, under Erasmus and Glareanus, after which he became successively master of the schools of St. Theodore and St. Peter. He next removed to Zurich, where he held the office of regent of the college three years; after which he returned to Basle, obtained the head pastorate of the church, and was chosen professor of theology. He wrote several commentaries on the Scripture, a Latin version of the Catechism of Ecolampadius, and a Narrative of the Life and Death of Zuinglius. Died, 1553.

MYLINE, ROBERT, an architect of considerable eminence, was born at Edinburgh, in 1734. While studying at Rome, he gained the chief architectural prize at the academy of St. Luke; of which academy, as well as those of Florence and Bologna, he was a member. Mr. Myline was the builder of Blackfriars' bridge, which was commenced in 1760, and completed in 1770. It was the first work of the kind executed in England, in which arches approaching to the form of an ellipsis were substituted for semicircles. He also obtained the appointment of surveyor of St. Paul's cathedral, and was employed to erect many private edifices in various parts of the kingdom. Died, 1811.

MYRON, a celebrated Greek sculptor, whose works are highly praised by the Greek and Latin poets, was a native of Eleuthera, and is supposed to have flourished about 450. B.C.

MYSON, one of the seven wise men of Greece. Anacharsis the Scythian having inquired of Apollo, who was the wisest man in Greece, was answered, "He who is now ploughing his fields." This was Myson.

MYTENS, ARNOLD, a painter, was born at Brussels, in 1541. He painted several capital pictures for churches in Italy; and died in 1602.

MYIENS, MARTIN, a Swedish painter, was born at Stockholm, in 1693. He fixed his residence at Vienna, and was greatly esteemed by the emperor Charles VI. Died, 1755.

N.

NABIS, a tyrant of Sparta, who commenced his reign about the year 805 B.C. He was surrounded by an armed guard, had a number of secret spies in his service, put to death or banished every suspected person, and indulged in the exercise of every species of cruelty. He contrived an instrument of torture in the form of a beautiful woman, whose rich dress concealed a number of iron spikes in her bosom and arms. When any one, therefore, opposed his demands, he would say, "If I have not talents enough to prevail with you, perhaps my Apega may persuade you." The automaton statue then appeared; which Nabis taking by the hand, led up to the person, who, being embraced by it, was thus tortured into compliance. He plundered Messenia and Argos, and would have continued to extend his dominion still wider over Peloponnesus, had not the Romans, in alliance with the Achæans, declared war against him. He pursued the war with inveterate enmity, and was for a time successful; but he was at length defeated by Philopœmen, at the head of the army of the Achæan league, and was killed while attempting to escape, B.C. 194.

NABONASSAR, the first king of the Chaldeans or Babylonians. He is celebrated by the famous epoch which bears his name, and which commenced in the year 747 B.C.

NABOPOLASSAR, king of Babylon. He united with Assyages against Syria, which country they conquered, and having divided it between them, founded two kingdoms, that of the Medes under Assyages, and that of the Chaldeans under Nabopolassar, B.C. 626.

NÆVIUS, CNEIUS, a celebrated Latin poet, who wrote several comedies, one of which was so displeasing to Metellus, the consul, that he expelled him from Rome. He was born in Campania, and died at Uluca, B.C. 503.

NÆVIUS, a famous augur in the reign of Tarquin, of whom it is related, that, in order to convince the king and the Romans of his supernatural power, he cut a flint with a razor, and thus turned the ridicule of the populace into admiration. Cicero, however, who had himself been an augur, treats this miraculous event as a mere fiction.

NAHL, JOHANN AUGUST, an eminent Prussian sculptor, born at Berlin, in 1710. He executed the admirable colossal statue of the landgrave Frederic, which stands in Frederic's-square. In 1755 he was created professor in the academy of arts at Cassel, and died there in 1781.

NAIN, PETER LE, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Paris, in 1640. He first became a canon regular, and in 1667 entered into priest's orders; but the year following he retired to the abbey of La Trappe. He was the author of several works relative to the monastic orders, &c., and died in 1713.

NAIRONI, ANTHONY FAUSTUS, a learned Maronite, born at Mount Libanus, in 1631; became professor of the Chaldee and Syriac languages in the college of Sapienza at Rome; and died in 1711.

NALDI, SEBASTIANO, a celebrated Italian buffo singer, who came to London early in the present century, and obtained great credit. He was accidentally killed at Paris, in 1819, by the explosion of an apparatus which had been invented for cooking by steam.

NALSON, JOHN, an English divine, was born in 1638, and after having gone through the usual course of a university education at Cambridge, obtained the living of Doddington, and a prebend in Ely cathedral. He was the author of "An Impartial Collection of the Affairs of State, from the Scotch Rebellion to the Murder of Charles the First." He also wrote an account of the trial of that monarch; and died in 1686.

NALSON, VALENTINE, an English divine, born at Malton, in Yorkshire, in 1641; was educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; became a prebendary of York minister; wrote a volume of Sermons; and died in 1731.

NANCEL, NICHOLAS DE, so called from a village of that name near Soissons, was born in 1539. He taught Latin and Greek at Paris, and Douay; after which he studied medicine, and became physician to the princess Eleanor of Bourbon. He was the author of "Sithologia Græca Latinaque Informanda et reformanda;" "De immortalitate Animi," &c.

NANGIS, WILLIAM DE, a French historian of the 14th century, was a Benedictine monk in the abbey of St. Denis. He wrote the Lives of St. Louis and Philip le Hardi; together with two chronicles of France.

NANI, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a Venetian historian, was born in 1616. He distinguished himself as ambassador to the French court, where he obtained succours for the republic to carry on the war against Turkey. He was afterwards employed in other missions of importance, for which he was made proctor of St. Mark, and captain-general of the marine. He was the author of "Istoria della Repubblica Veneta;" and was historiographer and keeper of the archives of the republic. Died, 1678.

NANEK, or NANUK, was a native of Hindostan, and the founder of the sect of Sikhs in India, which has now grown into a powerful nation. He was born at Talwandi, in Lahore, in 1469; propagated his doctrines with great success; and died in 1539.

NANNI, PETER, or NANNIUS, a critic and philologist, was born at Alkmaer, in Holland, in 1500, and died in 1557. He was professor of the learned languages at Louvain, and was regarded as a good critic and Latin poet.

NANNINI, AGNOLO, a celebrated author, born at Florence, in 1493. He entered the order of Valombrosa, became abbot of S. Salvador di Vajano, and wrote several works of a lively and satirical character, which are admired for their purity of style.

NAPIER, or NEPER, JOHN, laird of Merchiston, in Scotland, a celebrated mathematician, was born in 1550, and educated at the university of St. Andrew's. After having travelled in France, Italy, and Germany, he returned to his native country, where he wholly devoted himself to the study of mathematics and theology. Being much attached to astronomy and spherical geometry, he wished to find out a short method of calculating triangles, sines, tangents, &c.; and to the exertions arising out of this desire is to be attributed his admirable invention of logarithms, first made public in 1614, and which alone has immortalized his name. The Napier "bones, or rods," for multiplying and dividing, were invented by him. He also made several improvements in spherical trigonometry, and was regarded by the celebrated Kepler as one of the greatest men of the age. Died, 1617.

NAPIER, WILLIAM JOHN, lord, a British naval officer, was born at Kilsale, in 1747. He entered the service at the age of sixteen, and was a midshipman on board the Defiance at the battle of Trafalgar. Having distinguished himself upon several occasions, he was, in 1803, advanced to the rank of lieutenant, and to that of post captain five years afterwards. In 1816, at the age of twenty-nine, owing to the peace, he retired from active service, and entered the university of Edinburgh. He afterwards turned his attention to agricultural pursuits with success. In 1823, his father dying, he succeeded to the peerage; and in the ensuing year was recalled to his usual duties, and took the command of the Diamond, bound for the South American station, from which, in the course of two or three years, she returned, when lord Napier again retired to his native land. In 1833 he received a commission from the king, appointing him superintendent of the trade and interests of the British nation in China, and he arrived at Macao, in July, 1834. Here, however, the object of his voyage was frustrated by the governor of Canton, who appeared anxious that his lordship should not reach that place until notice should have been sent to the court of Peking, and the answer of the emperor be made known upon the subject. Lord Napier was not inclined to delay the superintendence of those interests which he had been appointed to protect, and, getting into his boat on the 24th of July, sailed up the Canton river, and arrived at the factory (Canton) on the next morning. The orders and edicts of the governor, that his lordship should return to Macao, were replied to by the latter in terms of positive refusal; commercial transactions between the British and Chinese merchants were prohibited by the governor; and his lordship sent the Imogene and Andromache frigates up the Boyne river—which were fired at by the forts, and which, in return, battered the forts about the ears of the Chinese soldiers. This occurred on the 7th of September; but, owing to calms, the ships were obliged to come to an anchor for several days. On the 14th of the same month, lord Napier became seriously indisposed; and, that the interests of the British merchants might not be injured by a farther suspension of their arrangements, the men-of-war were ordered to move out of the river," and he returned to Macao, where, on the 11th of October, 1834, he expired.

NANTEUIL, ROBERT, an eminent French engraver, was born at Rheims, in 1630. His merit obtained him the place of designer and cabinet engraver to Louis XIV., with a pension. Died, 1678.

NANTIGNI, LOUIS CHAZOT DE, a celebrated French genealogist, whose genealogical and chronological tables are regarded as valuable productions. Born, 1693; died, 1765.

NARBONNE LARA, LOUIS, count, born at Parma, in 1733. He was minister of war under Louis XVI.; lieutenant-general of France in the third year of the revolution; and finally, one of Napoleon's aid-de-camps during the imperial government. He attempted to defend the constitutional monarchy; and, after the 10th August, 1793, which decided the king's fate, was outlawed by the triumphant party of "the Mountain." He was saved, partly by the exertions of Madame de Staël, and partly of Dr. Bollman (who subsequently withdrew Lafayette from a similar search of the ultra Jacobins), and retired to England first, and afterwards to Switzerland. Invested with military rank by Napoleon, who greatly esteemed him, he accompanied him in most of his wars with Austria, and was in the fatal Russian campaign, in 1812. In 1813 he was ambassador to Vienna, and died at the end of that year.

NARDI, JACOPO, an eminent Italian historian, was born of an ancient and noble family at Florence, in 1476. Having distinguished himself by his opposition to the Medici, he was imprisoned and exiled; and he retired to Venice, where he passed the rest of his life in the cultivation of literature. He wrote a "History of Florence;" the "Life of Malepini;" &c.; and acquired much reputation by an elegant translation of Livy. Died, about 1555.

NARDINI, PIETRO, one of the first violinists of his time, was born at Leghorn, in 1725; studied under Tartini; and, in 1770, went to Florence, as first violinist in the chapel of the grand duke of Tuscany. Died, 1796.

NARES, JAMES, Mus. Doc., was born at Stanwell, in Middlesex, in 1715. He was one of the children in the royal chapel, and studied under Dr. Pepusch, after which he became organist of York cathedral. In 1755 he succeeded Dr. Green, as organist and composer to the king; and was created doctor of music at Cambridge. In 1757 he was appointed master of the choristers of his majesty's chapel. Dr. Nares published, besides his compositions of sacred music, which are marked by great genius and a thorough knowledge of the science, several books of instructions, and a royal pastoral on his majesty's nuptials. Died, 1763.

NARES, ROBERT, a learned critic and theologian, was the son of the preceding, and received his education at Westminster school, and Christchurch college, Oxford. After entering into holy orders he was presented to the rectory of Starnford, in Leicestershire; he was also chosen preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and obtained the office of assistant-librarian at the British Museum. He was afterwards a prebendary of Lincoln; and at the time of his death, in 1820, he was archdeacon of Stafford, canon of Lichfield, and rector of Allhallows, London. Dr. Nares, in conjunction with Mr. Beloe, established and conducted the "British Critic," a high church literary review; and among his separate works are, "Elements of Orthodoxy;" "A Glossary of Words, Phrases, &c., in the Works of English Authors of the age of Queen Elizabeth;" "A Chronological View of the Prophecies relating to the Christian Church," &c.

NARNI, JEROM MAUTIN DE, a famous Capuchin preacher, who flourished in Italy in the 17th century. After displaying his talents to great advantage in various churches, he was called to Rome, and appointed to preach before the pope and cardinals; on which occasion he struck such terror into his hearers by showing the usefulness of a neglect of duty, that no less than thirty bishops posted the next day to their dioceses. The effects of his oratory upon the people were no less extraordinary, and many went from the church crying for mercy as they walked along the streets. Narni, however, saw so little real fruit produced by his eloquence, that he resolved to give over the profession, and retired to his cell, where he employed himself in writing the history of his order.

NARSES, a celebrated Persian eunuch, who entered into the service of the emperor Justinian at the court of Constantinople; rose by his merit to the highest dignities of the state; and distinguished himself by military exploits. After vanquishing Totila the Goth, he captured Rome; rescued Italy from the Ostrogoths and other barbarians; was appointed governor of the country, and ruled it fifteen years; but was at length deposed; and died in 567.

NARVAEZ, PAMPHILA DE, a native of Valladolid, in Spain, who went to America soon after its discovery, and was appointed commander of the expedition sent against Cortez by Diego de Velasquez, governor of Cuba. He sailed, in 1528, with four hundred men, intending to establish a colony in Florida; discovered the bay of Pensacola; and, having marched into the country, was never heard of more.

NARUSZEWICZ, ADAM STANISLAUS, an eminent historian and poet of Poland, who, from having made an excellent translation of the works of the great Roman historian, obtained the appellation of the Polish Tacitus; but his fame chiefly rests on his elaborate "History of Poland," which he left unfinished at his death, in 1796.

NASH, THOMAS, a satirist and dramatic writer, was born at Lowestoft, in Suffolk, about 1584; educated at St. John's college, Cambridge; and settled in London, where he died in 1601. He wrote three dramatic pieces; but was chiefly distinguished by the virulence and acrimony of his pamphlets against Gabriel Harvey, and the puritan Henry, who assumed the title of Marston Marprelate. His principal performance is "Pierce Penniless," published in 1596.

NASH, TREADWAY RUSSELL, an English divine and antiquary, was educated at Worcester college, Oxford, where he took his degree of D.D. in 1758. He was a man of fortune, and died at his seat in Wootton Bassett, in 1811, aged 57. Dr. Nash published "Collections for a History of Worcestershire," 2 vols. folio; a splendid edition of Hudibras, 3 vols. 4to.; and some papers in the Archæologia.

NASH, RICHARD, commonly called Beau Nash, the once celebrated arbiter of fashion at Bath, was born in 1674, at Swan-sea, in Glamorganshire. He was originally intended for the law, but entered the army, which, however, he soon quitted, and took chambers in the Temple. Here he devoted himself entirely to pleasure and fashion; and when king William visited the Inn, he was chosen master of the pageant with which it was customary to welcome the monarch. So pleased was William with the entertainment, that he offered him the honour of knighthood, which Nash, on account of his narrow circumstances, refused. In 1701, he was appointed master of the ceremonies at Bath, an office for which he was admirably qualified by an elegant taste and uncommon vivacity. He immediately instituted a set of regulations as remarkable for their strictness as for their judicious adaptation to the wants and society of the place; and as he drew the whole beam-monde to Bath, he was justly regarded as a public benefactor there. While in the plenitude of his power and popularity, Nash lived in the most splendid style, supporting his expenses by a long run of success at the gaming table. His dress was covered with expensive lace, and he wore a large white cocked hat. The chariot in which he rode was drawn by six gray horses, and attended by a long retinue of servants, some on horse, others on foot, while his progress through the streets was made known by a band of French horns and other instruments. His common title was the King of Bath; and his reign continued, with undiminished splendour, for more than fifty years. His health then began to decline, and his resources grew less plentiful. As the change in his spirits and circumstances became more evident, his former acquaintances gradually forsook him, and he died, in comparative indigence and solitude, in 1761. His remains, however, were honoured with a splendid funeral, at the expense of the city; and an appropriate epitaph, written by Dr. Harrington, is placed over his tomb in the abbey church.

NASH, JOHN, a celebrated architect, of whose talents a great diversity of opinion exists, and upon whose works an immense deal of envious criticism has been wasted, was one of the architects of the Board of Works, and amassed a large fortune by the extensive speculations in which he engaged for the improvement of the metropolis. Whatever defects there may be in certain buildings, or whether such defects are chargeable to him or to the respective architects under whose special directions they were built, it is not our business to enquire; but whoever views the stately edifices of his creation, and can recollect the wretched hovels and dens of infamy which formed the narrow streets and filthy alleys that have given place to a succession of elegant facades, must feel grateful that an opportunity was given to a man possessing the requisite taste and judgment for accomplishing so undervalued so truly desirable.

Regent-street, Waterloo-place, the Regent's and St. James's Parks, and nearly all the important changes which have taken place in the architecture of London (westward), the aggregate effect of which is really grand and imposing, are due to the mental exertion and indefatigable labour of Mr. Nash. He also built the royal palace at Pimlico, the Haymarket theatre, All Soul's church, &c. &c. He died, aged 82, at his seat, East Cowes Castle, Isle of Wight, May, 1805.

NASMITH, JAMES, a divine, was born at Norwich, in 1740, and educated at Bene't college, Cambridge. He took the degree of D.D. in 1797; and his last preferment was the rectory of Leverington, in the Isle of Ely, where he died in 1806. Dr. Nasmyth published "A Catalogue of Bene't college Library;" an edition of the "Liberaries of Simon and William of Worcester," &c.; a new edition of Tanner's "Notitia Monastica," &c.

NASMYTH, PETER, an eminent landscape painter, was born at Edinburgh, in 1768. At the age of twenty he removed to London, where his talents soon attracted notice, and procured him the appellation of the English Hobbema. His works are deservedly in high repute, and there are few collections of importance, in England, but what contain some of them. Died, 1831.

NATHAN, ISAAC, or MORDECAI, a learned Jewish rabbi, who, about the middle of the fifteenth century, published the first Concordance of the Old Testament in the original tongue. This work, with considerable additions, has been several times reprinted; but little or nothing is known of the personal history of its original author.

NATTIER, JOHN MARK, a French artist, was born at Paris, in 1685, and died in 1766. Louis XIV. appointed him to a professorship in the academy of painting.—Another artist of this name went to Petersburg, where he died in 1763. He was an engraver of intaglios; and published a treatise on gems.

NAUBERT, M^{rs}. BENEDICTA, a celebrated German romance-writer, author of "Herman D'Uuna;" "Elizabeth de Toggenburg;" "Walthea de Montbarry;" "Thekla;" "Conradin of Swabia;" "Vil-loda;" and "Agaria."

NAUDE' or NAUDÆUS, GABRIEL, a French physician and man of letters, was born at Paris, in 1600; studied medicine at Padua; and after a considerable stay in Italy, returned to Paris, and became librarian to cardinal Richelieu, on whose death he entered into the service of Mazarin; but when that minister was banished, Naudé went to Sweden as librarian to queen Christina. He was the author of "Bibliographia Politica;" "An Apology for the Great Men who have been accused of Magic;" "On Liberal Studies," &c. Died, 1653.

NAUDE', PHILIP, a mathematician, was born at Metz, in 1644. Being a protestant he retired to Berlin on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and there became mathematical tutor to the court. He was also chosen a member of the academy in that city, where he died in 1729. He published a work on geometry, and some religious pieces.—His son, who succeeded him in his professorship, was a member of the royal societies of Berlin and London; and died in 1745.

NAUDET, THOMAS CHARLES, a French landscape painter, born, at Paris, in 1774; died, 1810. He left a collection of near three thousand designs, comprehending the most beautiful views, and the finest monuments of ancient and modern times on the continent.

NAUMANN, JOHN GOTTLIEB, or AMADEUS, an eminent German musical composer, was born, in 1741, of very poor parents, at a small village near Dresden; but his talents for music being soon apparent, he was taken to Italy by a Swedish amateur, and finally obtained admission into the number of Tartini's pupils at Padua. He afterwards went to Naples, where his taste for theatrical music was awakened; and having remained in Italy eight years, returned to Dresden, and was appointed composer of sacred music to the elector of Saxony. He subsequently made two journeys to Italy, where he composed several operas, which were performed with brilliant success; and he was eventually made chapel-master. For some time before his death he devoted himself almost entirely to the composition of sacred music; some very valuable pieces of which are preserved in the archives of the chapel at Dresden. Among his operas are, "La Clemenza di Tito;" "Tutto per Amore;" "Armida;" "Amphion;" "Gustavus Vasa;" "Orpheus;" and "Acis and Galatea." Besides these are several oratorios, sonatas, songs, &c. Died, 1801.

NAUNTON, SIR ROBERT, an English statesman, was born at Suffolk, and educated at Cambridge. After having been employed on some diplomatic concerns in Scotland and France, he returned to the university, and in 1601 was elected public orator, in which capacity he attracted the notice of James I., who made him master of the requests, surveyor of the court of wards, and secretary of state. His "Fragmenta Regalia" contains many curious particulars of the court of queen Elizabeth.

NAVAGERO or NAUGERIUS, ANDREA, an Italian poet, orator, and statesman, was born at Venice, in 1483. He embraced the military life, after which he was employed as an ambassador, and in that situation died at Biola, in 1529. His Latin poems were remarkable for their purity, and have been several times printed.

NAVARETE, JUAN FERNANDEZ, a Spanish painter, surnamed El Mudo, from his being deaf and dumb, was born in 1562. He was appointed painter to the king; and his best pieces are preserved in the Escorial. From his fine style of colouring, he obtained the name of the Spanish Titian; but he was so fond of introducing in his pictures a dog, a cat, or a partridge, that scarcely any of his sacred subjects even are without them. Died, 1579.

NAVARETTA, FERNANDEZ, a Spanish missionary, who went to China in 1646, and was expelled at the time when the persecution there took place. He was afterwards consecrated bishop of St. Domingo, and died in 1689. He was the author of an excellent account of the political and religious condition of the Chinese.

NAYLER, JAMES, an enthusiast of the 17th century, was born in 1616, at Ardeley, in York-shire. He served eight years in the parliamentary army, and on his return home, in 1651, became converted to Quakerism by the preaching of George Fox; though at a future period, in consequence of his extravagant conduct, the more formal body of Quakers were led to disown him. Misled by imaginary inspiration, he soon distinguished himself among those of kindred sentiments, both in London and other places, until, in 1656, he was committed to Exeter gaol, for propagating his opinions. On his release from imprisonment, he repaired to Bristol, where his followers formed a procession, and led him into that city in a manner which they intended to resemble the entrance of Christ into Jerusalem. He was declared guilty of blasphemy by parliament, and barbarously sentenced to a double whipping at different times, branding, boring of the tongue with a hot iron, and imprisonment and hard labour during pleasure. This sentence, though illegal, was fully inflicted upon the unhappy man, who, when the delirium of fanaticism was over, humbly acknowledged and lamented the delusion under which he had laboured; and died in 1660.

NEAL, DANIEL, an eminent dissenting divine, was born in London, in 1678, and was educated at the university of Utrecht. On his return he began to officiate as a preacher, and, in 1706, succeeded D. Singleton as minister of a congregation in Aldersgate-street, in which connexion he continued for six-and-thirty years. Although assiduous as a minister, he found leisure for literary labours, and published among other works, a "History of the Puritans," 4 vols.; and a "History of New England," 3 vols. Died, 1743.

NEARCHUS, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, who was employed in conducting his fleet from India by the ocean to the Persian gulf. Fragments of a narrative by this early voyager are extant, and form a curious and valuable record.

NECHAM, or NEQUAM, ALEXANDER, an English monk, of the order of St. Augustine, who was educated in the abbey of St. Alban's. He completed his studies at Paris, and died abbot of Cirencester, in 1317. His principal work is a Latin poem, "De Laude Sapientie Divine."

NECKER, NOEL JOSEPH, a native of the Netherlands, who became botanist and historiographer to the elector palatine. He wrote "Elementa Botanica," and other works relating to his favourite science. Died, 1793.

NECKER, JAMES, a celebrated statesman, noted as the minister of finance to Louis XVI., was the son of Charles Frederic Necker, professor of civil law at Geneva, and born there in 1732. At the age of fifteen, he was placed in a banking-house at Paris, after which he became printer with Thielsson, on whose death he established a house of his own, in conjunction with his brother and two others. Having distinguished himself by his treatise, entitled "Sur la Legislation et le Commerce des Grains," and acquired great reputation as a financier; he was, in 1776, appointed director, and soon after, comptroller-general of the royal treasury. Being refused admission into the council on the score of his religion, as he was a Calvinist, he threatened to resign his official situation. He was in consequence removed, and ordered to retire to his country-seat. After this, he went to Switzerland, where he purchased the barony of Copet, and published his work, "Administration des Finances de la France," 3 vols. 8vo., of which 40,000 copies were sold in a few days. He was recalled in 1788, as comptroller-general, when his convictions led him to support the convocation of the states-general, which was the wish of the nation. He was also in favour of the double representation of the third estate, and may be considered as a spark which kindled the pile of democratic feeling. When the government determined to take measures against the increasing troubles, Necker, who opposed the adoption of those measures, was dismissed, and ordered to leave the kingdom within twenty-four hours. No sooner was his removal known than all Paris was in a ferment. The storming of the Bastille followed, and the symptoms of popular violence became so alarming, that the king found himself compelled to recall the banished minister. Necker's return to Paris resembled a triumphal procession; yet, such is the uncertain tenure of popularity, that he soon became as much an object of antipathy to the people, as he had been of their idolatry, and in 1790 he left France for ever. He died at Copet, in Switzerland, in 1804.

NECKER, SUSANNA, wife of the preceding, and whose maiden name was Curchod, was the daughter of a clergyman in the canton of Berne, and in her youth was the object of the attachment of Gibbon the historian. She received an excellent education, nor was her heart less carefully cultivated than her mind; and on her husband's elevation, she made use of his influence and fortune only for purposes of benevolence. She erected an hospital in the neighbourhood of Paris, at her own expense, and devoted to it her personal care. She wrote "Reflections on Divorce," and other works. Died, 1794.

NEEDHAM, MARCMONT, an active partisan and political writer, was born at Burford, in Oxfordshire, in 1630, and educated at All Souls' college, Oxford. During the civil war he distinguished himself by his political writings, first against the parliament, and afterwards against the king; so that at the restoration he obtained his pardon with difficulty. He conducted periodical journals, somewhat in the manner of newspapers, the titles of which were, "Mercurius Britannicus;" "Mercurius Pragmaticus;" and "Mercurius Politicus;" and when politics no longer afforded him employment, he practised as a physician. Died, 1678.

NEEDHAM, JOHN TURNVILLE, a Roman catholic divine, was born in London, in 1713, and educated at Douay, where he entered into orders. He died rector of the academy of sciences at Brussels, in 1781. Mr. Needham wrote observations inserted in Buffon's Natural History; also, "New Enquiries upon Microscopical Discoveries, and the Generation of Organized Bodies;" "Enquiries concerning Nature and Religion," &c.

NEER, ARNOLD VANDER, an eminent artist, was born at Amsterdam, in 1619. He excelled in painting coast scenery, fishermen's huts, and in his beautiful delineation of moonlight. Died, 1681.—His son, EOLON HENDRICK, was an historical and portrait painter. Born, 1643; died, 1703.

NEEFS, PETER, the elder, a painter of architectural subjects, was born at Antwerp, in 1570, and died in 1631. He studied under Henry Stenwyck, and his favourite subjects were views of the interior of churches, convents, palaces, &c.—His son, known as Young Neefs, followed the same branch of art as his father, but was inferior to him.

NEELE, HENRY, a poet and miscellaneous writer, born in 1708, was the son of an engraver in the Strand, and was educated for the profession of an attorney, which he practised with reputation in the metropolis till his death. He was a young man of amiable disposition and inoffensive manners, and had a decided taste for literary pursuits; but his intense application to study produced a fit of insanity, and he put a period to his existence, February 7, 1828. He was the author of "Poems;" "Dramatic Scenes;" "The Romance of History," 3 vols.; and "Literary Remains," published after his decease.

NELSON, ROBERT, a pious and learned writer, was born in London, in 1636; and received his education at St. Paul's school, and at Trinity college, Cambridge. In 1662 he married lady Lucy, who concealed from him the circumstance of her being a zealous Roman catholic, but which did not lessen their affection for each other. He was strongly attached to James II., and he continued to communicate with the non-jurors till the death of bishop Lloyd, when he returned to the established church. He lived on terms of intimacy with archbishop Tillotson; and was the zealous promoter of all works of charity, having the ability as well as the disposition to give what true benevolence prompted. He was the author of many popular works; among which are, "The Practice of True Devotion;" "A Companion to the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England;" "The Whole Duty of a Christian;" "The Great Duty of Frequenting the Christian Sacrifice," &c. Died, 1714.

NELSON, HORATIO, viscount, duke of BRONTE, &c., a gallant British admiral, was the fourth son of the Rev. Edmund Nelson, rector of Burnham Thorpe, in Norfolk, and born there Sept. 29, 1758. He was educated first at Norwich, and next at North Walsham; but in his twelfth year, he became a midshipman under his uncle, Cap. Sir Suckling, of the Raisonable. Soon after this he sailed to the West Indies in a merchant ship, and on his return was admitted on board the Carcass, one of the vessels sent on an expedition to the North Pole, under the orders of Captain Phipps. He went next to the East Indies. In 1777 he obtained the rank of lieutenant, and in 1779 that of post-captain, when he was appointed to the command of the Hinchinbrooke, in which ship he sailed to the West Indies, where he distinguished himself in an enterprise on the Spanish main. After the peace of 1763, he commanded the Borras frigate, stationed for the protection of trade at the Leeward Islands, and while there he married Mrs. Nesbit, the widow of a physician. At the commencement of the war with France he was nominated to the Aragammon of 64 guns, on board of which he sailed to the Mediterranean, and was at the taking possession of Toulon. He was also present at the siege of Bastia, where he served at the batteries with a body of seamen; as he afterwards did at Calvi; and while employed before that place he lost an eye. While on that station his daring intrepidity and unceasing activity were such, that his name was dreaded throughout the Mediterranean. He was with admiral Hotham in the action with the French fleet, March 13, 1795; and the same year he took the island of Elba. In 1796 he was appointed commodore on board La Minerve, in which frigate he captured La Sabine, a forty gun ship. Soon after this he deserted the Spanish fleet, and steered with the intelligence to Sir John Jervis, off St. Vincent. He had scarcely communicated the news, and shifted his flag on board the Captain of 74 guns, when the enemy bore in sight. A close action ensued, which terminated in a complete victory on the side of the British, who were inferior in numbers. On this occasion Commodore Nelson attacked the Santissima Trinitada of 136 guns; he afterwards boarded and took the San Nicolas of 80 guns, from whence he proceeded in the same manner to the San Josef of 113 guns; both of which surrendered to him. For his share in this glorious victory, the commodore was honoured with the order of the Bath; and having soon afterwards hoisted his flag as rear admiral of the blue, he was appointed to command the inner squadron at the blockade of Cadiz. He there made a bold but unsuccessful attempt to bombard the city, heading his men himself. The next exploit in which he was engaged was an attempt to take possession of Teneriffe, which design also failed, and Nelson lost his right arm by a cannon-shot, and escaped with life by the devotion of his stepson, Captain Nesbit, who carried him off on his back to a boat, after lying senseless and exhausted for several hours upon the ground. In 1799, he rejoined earl St. Vincent, who sent him up the Mediterranean, to watch the progress of the armament at Toulon, destined for the conveyance of Buonaparte and his army to Egypt. Notwithstanding the strictest vigilance, this fleet found means to escape, but was followed by Nelson, and, after various disappointments, traced to the bay of Aboukir. Here he commenced an immediate attack, and by a manoeuvre of equal boldness and ability, sailed between the enemy and the land, though exposed to a double fire. The result was a victory so glorious and decisive, that all the French vessels, with the exception of two men of war and two frigates, were taken or destroyed. This achievement was rewarded with the title of Baron Nelson of the Nile, and an additional pension of 2,000*l.*, besides the estates and dukedom of Brontes in Sicily, and high honours conferred by the Turkish sultan. Soon after this he sailed for Sicily, and from thence to Naples, where he quelled a rebellion and restored the king. Having performed these and other important services, Lord Nelson returned to England, and was received with enthusiastic joy.—And here we are reluctantly compelled to record the fact, that during the admiral's stay at Naples he permitted lady Hamilton, the wife of the English ambassador, to exercise a most pernicious influence over him; that he lived publicly with her after the death of her husband; and, as a natural consequence, that it produced a separation between him and lady Nelson on his return.—But to resume our narrative of his naval glories.—A confederacy of the northern powers having alarmed the government, he was employed to dislodge it. A fleet was fitted out in 1801, the command of which was given to admiral Sir Hyde Parker, assisted by Lord Nelson. On their arrival off the Catligat, and being refused a passage, Lord Nelson offered his services for conducting the attack on the Danish force which was stationed to oppose an entrance. This being accepted, he shifted his flag to the Elephant, and passed the Sound with little loss. On the 2d of April the action commenced at ten o'clock, and after a sharp conflict seventeen sail of the Danes were sunk, burnt, or taken. A negotiation was then entered into between his lordship and the crown prince; in consequence of which the admiral went ashore, and an armistice was settled. He next obtained from the Swedish government an order for taking off the embargo on English ships in the Baltic. Having accomplished these great objects, he returned to England, and was created a viscount. In August, 1801, he bombarded the enemy's flotilla of gun boats at Boulogne, but without any material effect. A treaty suddenly taking place, his lordship retired to his seat at Merton in Surrey; but hostilities recommencing, he sailed for the Mediterranean, and in March, 1803, took the command of that station on board the Victory. Notwithstanding all his vigilance, the French fleet escaped from Toulon, and was joined by that of Cadiz; of which being apprized, he pursued them to the West Indies with a far inferior force. The combined squadrons, however, struck with terror, returned without effecting anything; and after a partial action with Sir Robert Calder, off Ferrol, re-entered Cadiz. Admiral Nelson returned to England, but soon set sail to join his fleet off Cadiz. The French under admiral Villeneuve, and the Spaniards under Gravina, ventured out with a number of troops on board, October 19, 1805, and on the 21st, about noon, the action began off Cape Trafalgar. Lord Nelson ardered his ship, the Victory, to be carried alongside his old antagonist, the Santissima Trinidad, where he was exposed to a severe fire of musketry; and not having the precaution to cover his coat, which was decorated with his star and other badges of distinction, he became an object for the riflemen placed purposely in the tops of the Bucentaur, which lay on his quarter. In the middle of the engagement, a musket-ball struck him on the left shoulder, and passing through the spine, lodged in the muscles of his back. He lived just long enough to be acquainted with the number of ships that had been captured, and his last words were, "I have done my duty, I praise God for it!" The mighty spirit of Nelson was epitomized in the signal which he hoisted on commencing this action—"England expects that every man will do his duty!"—a sentence that not only testified the pure Spartan love of country which animated his own breast, but proved the philosophical act which inspired him to strike upon the strongest chord that could vibrate in every surrounding bosom. His remains were brought to this country, and buried with unprecedented honours in St. Paul's cathedral, where a suitable monument has been erected to his memory.

[Although we have trespassed beyond our accustomed limits in giving the life of England's greatest naval hero, we are tempted to add a description of this unparalleled combat, from a contemporary work, the more especially as the last moments of the dying Nelson are therein graphically narrated.]

The allied fleet formed their line of battle on the larboard tack, the wind being south-west. Trafalgar lay to leeward, and the bay of Cadiz was open for escape. The ships were drawn up in a double line in close order, the intervals of the first line being filled by the ships in the second, with room to fire between. This combined the advantage of a dense, unassailable column, with a sufficient interval to obviate the danger of contact among the ships. Nelson bore down also in a double line, himself leading the left of fourteen ships in the Victory, and Collingwood in the Royal Sovereign, the right line of thirteen ships. His object was to break the line of the enemy in two points, separating and overpowering them in sections inferior to his own. Above all, he directed his captains to remember that his object was a close and decisive action; and that if his signals were not seen, no captain could go wrong in placing himself quickly and closely alongside an enemy. The wind was light, and the British fleet, under a crowd of sail, bore gallantly before it, rising and falling gracefully upon the long swell that rolled towards the bay of Cadiz. Nor was the array of the allies less noble and imposing, as they firmly awaited the approach of their enemies, drawn up in their double line, and with the sun shining full upon their white sails and frowning broadsides. The scene—the purpose—were full of sublimity; and to Nelson, who, independent of his thirst of glory, fancied that in destroying Frenchmen, he was about to serve humanity, this moment must have been the proudest of his life. As he gazed upon his anticipated prize, he asked captain Blackwood what he would esteem a victory. The answer was, that considering the noble manner in which battle was offered, the capture of fourteen sail would be a brilliant result. "I shall not," said he, "be satisfied with less than twenty." Presently Blackwood took leave, to return to his own ship, and expressed the hope soon to congratulate the accomplishment of his wish. Nelson pressed his hand affectionately, and said—God bless you, Blackwood! I shall never see you again." And now from the mast-head of the Victory was unfurled that eloquent signal—"England expects every man to do his duty!" In consequence of the second column being steered more off the wind, at a less acute angle with the enemy's line, Collingwood came much sooner into contact with it, broke through it astern of the Santa Anna, firing raking broadsides on either hand as he passed, and engaging the Spaniard to leeward, at the muzzles of his gun. At the same time three or four gathered together round, pouring their broadsides into the Royal Sovereign. "See," cried Nelson, "how that noble fellow, Collingwood, carries his ship into action!" And Collingwood, on his side, appreciating the feelings of his chief, was just then saying to the captain, notwithstanding the uproar and carnage, "Rotherham, what would Nelson give to be here!" Meantime Nelson was bearing down, exposed to a raking fire from all the ships under his lee, without being able to return a broadside. His secretary was killed beside him; directly after, a double-headed shot struck a party of marines drawn up upon the poop near him, killing eight of them; and in another minute a shot passed the admiral and captain Hardy. Each for an instant believed the other killed. At length the Victory having run between two of the enemy's ships, opened both her broadsides with tremendous effect. Soon after, she ran on board the Redoubtable, which ship was closely engaged by the British Temeraire; and, another enemy having fallen on board of the Temeraire, the whole four lay desperately grappled, broadside to broadside. Whilst to the left, the Victory received and answered the fire of the Bucentaur and Santissima Trinidad, on the right she depressed her guns so as not to send the shot through into the Temeraire. The Redoubtable let down her lower deck ports, for fear of being boarded through them, but kept up a fire from the lower batteries, and from small-armed men stationed in the tops. From a generous, though mistaken, Quixotic sense of humanity, Nelson made no use of small arms in the tops, either to clear the enemy's decks and pick off officers, or to silence the fire of their topmen. To this fault he owed his death; for after he had twice ordered the fire upon the Redoubtable to cease, because she seemed to have struck, a ball, fired from her mizen-top, which was quite close to the poop of the Victory, struck his epaulette and entered his back. He fell with his face on the deck. Hardy turned round as some men were raising him—"They have done for me at last, Hardy," said he. As they carried him down the ladder, he remarked that the tiller ropes had been shot away, and ordered them to be replaced. Then with his handkerchief he covered his features and decorations, desirous now to conceal from his crew, lest they should be disheartened, what he had been unwilling to hide from his enemy. Soon after he reached the cockpit, his wound was discovered to be mortal; he felt it himself, and insisted that the surgeon should leave him, to attend those whom he yet might save. He was in great pain, and intensely anxious to know how the battle went. "Will no one bring Hardy to me?" asked he. "He must be killed! he is surely dead." At length Hardy came, and the two friends shook hands in silence. After a pause, the dying man faintly uttered, "Well, Hardy, how goes the day?" "Very well; ten ships have already struck." Finding that all was well, and that no British ship had yielded, he turned to speak of himself. "I am a dead man, Hardy! I am going fast! It will soon be all over with me!" Hardy hoped that there was yet a chance of recovery. "Oh, no, it is impossible! I feel something rising in my breast that tells me. The surgeon asked him if he suffered much! He answered, so much, that he wished himself dead. "And yet," he added, thinking, perhaps, of the new honours that awaited him, "one would like to live a little longer." Captain Hardy, having been again on deck, returned in an hour to his dying friend. He could not tell, in the confusion, the exact number of the allies that had surrendered; but there were at least fifteen; for the other ships had followed their admiral into action, breaking the enemy's line, and engaging closely to leeward, in the same gallant style as the Victory and Sovereign. Nelson answered, "That is well;—but I bargained for twenty." And his wish was prophetic; he had not miscalculated the superiority of his followers; twenty actually surrendered. Having ordered the fleet to be anchored, he again spoke of himself.—"Don't throw me overboard.—Kiss me, Hardy." Hardy knelt down, and obeyed in silence. "Now I am satisfied.—Thank God, I have done my duty."—Hardy kissed him again, received his blessing, and then took leave of him for ever.

NELSON, the Right Hon. and Rev. WILLIAM, D.D., &c., succeeded to the titles and honours enjoyed by his brother, the Hero of Trafalgar. His death occurred on the 28th of February, 1835, in the 78th year of his age. The titles, &c. descended to Thomas Bolton, of Wells, Norfolk, who was the son of Thomas Bolton, and Susanah (eldest child of the Rev. Edmund Nelson, father of the admiral); but he dying, in his 30th year, in the November following, they descended to his son Horatio, born in 1823, and who is great nephew in the female line to the naval hero.

NELSON, SAMUEL, born in 1759, was one of the most ardent of the "Irish patriots" in 1790; and edited the "Northern Star," which produced great effects. On the rebellion being put down in 1796, he was thrown into prison, where he remained, till set at liberty by French interference, at the treaty of Amiens, in 1802. He then retired to America, where it is understood he died of the plague.

NEMESIUS, a Greek philosopher in the fourth century, who embraced the Christian religion, and was made bishop of Emesa, in Phœnicia, of which place he was a native. He wrote a treatise entitled "De Natura Hominis," in which he asserts the doctrine of pre-existence.

NENNIUS, a British historian, and abbot of Bangor in the seventh century, who, when the monks of his house were massacred, fled for refuge to Chester. His work is entitled "Historia Britonum," and is among the Cottonian MSS. in the British Museum.

NEPOS, CORNELIUS, a Latin historian in the reign of Julius Cæsar and Augustus, whose patronage he enjoyed. Of all his works, we have only his lives of illustrious Greek and Roman generals.

NERI, St. PHILIP DE, founder of the congregation of the Oratory in Italy, was born in 1515, of a noble family at Florence, and died at Rome in 1595. His order obtained its name from the place of its original establishment, which was an oratory of St. Jerome's church at Rome.

NERO, LUCIUS DOMITIUS, called after his adoption CLAUDIUS DRUSUS, a Roman emperor, was the son of Calpurnia Domitia, and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus. He was adopted by Claudius, A. D. 50, and four years after succeeded him on the throne. At the commencement of his reign his conduct excited great hopes in the Romans; he appeared just, liberal, affable, polished, complaisant, and kind; but this was a mask which hid the most depraved mind that ever disgraced a human being. He caused his mother to be assassinated; and vindicated the unnatural act to the senate on a pretence that Agrippina had plotted against him. He also commenced a dreadful persecution of the Christians; and he is even charged with having caused Rome to be set on fire in several places, and during the conflagration to have beheld the scene from a high tower, where he amused himself by singing to his lyre. This atrocity has, however, been denied; and it is needless to swell the catalogue of his crimes by inserting any one of doubtful authority. His cruelties, extravagance, and debauchery, at length roused the public resentment. Piso formed a conspiracy against the tyrant, but it was discovered and defeated. That of Galba, however, proved more successful; and Nero being abandoned by his flatterers, put an end to his existence, A. D. 68.

NERVA, MARCUS COCCURIUS, a Roman emperor, who succeeded Domitian, A. D. 96, at the age of 70; and died after a reign of two years, during which his virtues did honour to the throne.

NESTORIUS, a celebrated patriarch of Constantinople, from whom originated the sect of Nestorians, was born in Syria, in the fifth century. On entering into the priesthood he became so popular for his eloquence, that Theodosius nominated him, in 429, to the archbishopric of Constantinople; in which station he displayed great zeal against the Arians and Novatians. He at length fell under censure himself for affirming that the Virgin Mary is not the mother of God; for which he was condemned in the council of Ephesus, deposed of his see, and banished. He died in 430; but his followers continue to be numerous in the East, and are organized under a patriarch.

NETSCHER, GASPAR, a celebrated painter, was born at Heidelberg, in 1699. Being left destitute by his father, he was taken under the protection of a physician at Arnheim, who, perceiving his genius, placed him with an artist named Terburg. His subjects are conversation-pieces and portraits; the velvet and satin draperies are exquisitely managed, and the whole finished with neatness and brilliancy. He died in 1684. His sons, THEODORS and CONSTANTINE, were both good portrait painters. The first died in 1732, and his brother in 1722.

NETTLEBLADT, CHRISTIAN, baron de, an eminent Swedish lawyer, and author of several works, chiefly relating to the state of science and literature in his native country. Born, 1698; died, 1776.

NETTLEBLADT, DANIEL, a celebrated German jurist, born at Rostock, in 1719. He was professor of the law of nature at Halle; became a member of the privy council in 1763, and subsequently director of the university. He was the author of many learned and valuable works; among which are "Systema elementare universæ Jurisprudentiæ naturalis," and "Initia Historiæ litterariæ jurisdiæ universalis." Died, 1791.

NEUHOF, THEODORE STEPHEN, baron, the son of a Westphalian noble, was born at Metz, about 1690. While a student at Cologne, he unfortunately killed a young man of rank in a duel, and fled to the Hague. But through the mediation of the Spanish minister, he received a lieutenancy in the Spanish regiment of cavalry, destined to march against the Moors, in Africa, and, on account of his good behaviour, was promoted to a captaincy. When the Corsicans, after several unsuccessful attempts to free themselves from the oppressions of Genoa, resolved, in 1735, to form a government of their own, NeuhoFF was crowned king, had silver and copper coins struck, and established an order of knighthood, under the name of the Order of Deliverance. Theodore, however, could not maintain himself against the Genoese and a Corsican opposition. He fled to England. Here his Dutch creditors pursued him, and being arrested, he became a prisoner in the King's Bench for some years. His liberation was at length, however, effected, through the instrumentality of Horace Walpole; but he died soon after, in 1753.

NEUMANN, CASPAR, an eminent German chemist of the 18th century. After pursuing his studies with ardour, and travelling for improvement through England, France, and Italy, he was nominated professor of chemistry at the royal college of Berlin, and afterwards honoured by the king of Prussia with the title of aulic counsellor. His works, which at the time were important, have been translated into English. Died, 1737.

NEVILLE or NEVYLE, ALEXANDER, an English writer, was born in Kent, in 1544. He took his degree of master of arts at Cambridge; after which he became secretary to archbishop Parker and his successor, Grindal. He died in 1614. He paraphrased the "Cælipus" of Seneca, and wrote, in Latin, a narrative of the insurrection under Kett, to which he added an account of Norwich. He published the Cambridge verses on the death of Sir Philip Sidney, &c.—His brother, THOMAS NEVILLE, became dean of Canterbury, and died in 1615.

NEVILLE or NEVILLE, HENRY, a republican writer, was born, in Berkshire, in 1630, and educated at Merton-college, Oxford. In the Rebellion he took the side of parliament, and was elected a member of the council of state; but on the usurpation of Cromwell he gave up his seat. He died in 1694. He published Machiavel's works, and a piece entitled "Plato Redivivus, or a Dialogue concerning Government."

NEWCOME, WILLIAM, archbishop of Armagh, a learned and exemplary prelate, was born, in 1702, at Barton-le-Clay, in Bedfordshire. He completed his studies at Pembroke college, Oxford; was successively bishop of Down, Omory, and Waterford; was raised to the archbishopric of Armagh, in 1793; and died in 1800. His principal works are, "A Harmony of the Gospels;" "An Historical View of the English Biblical Translations;" and "Attempts towards an improved Version of Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets."

NEWCOMEN, THOMAS, a locksmith at Dartmouth, in Devonshire, who towards the close of the 17th century, engaged in scientific researches, and to whom belongs the merit of the first great improvement in steam-engines, by forming a vacuum under the piston, after it had been raised by the expansive force of the elastic vapour, and thus bringing into action the atmospheric pressure.

NEWCOMEN, MATHEW, an eminent non-conformist divine of the 17th century, noted as having been one of the authors of the attack on episcopacy, entitled "Smectymnus," from the initials of the names of its contributors. Died 1766.

NEWDIGATE, SIR ROGER, bart., a munificent patron of learning, was born at Arbury, in Warwickshire, in 1719. He was first placed in Westminster-school, whence he removed to Oxford, as a gentleman commoner of University college. He represented the University in parliament for many years, was a liberal benefactor to it, and bequeathed the sum of 1000*l.* to furnish an annual prize for the best copy of English verses connected with the fine arts, to be written by an under-graduate. Died 1780.

NEWLAND, JOHN, abbot of the monastery of St. Augustine, at Bristol, in the 15th century, was a man of distinguished abilities, and was frequently employed in a diplomatic character by Henry VIII. Died, 1515.

NEWLAND, PETER, an eminent Dutch mathematician, born in 1764. He was suc-reassively professor of mathematics and philosophy at Utrecht and Amsterdam, and was appointed by the Batavian government one of the commissioners of longitude. He wrote several works on astronomy, mathematics, and political economy; and died in 1794.

NEWPORT, Sir JOHN, for many years M.P. for Waterford, was born in that city in 1734, and sent at an early age to Eton, where he contracted a sincere friendship with Lord Grenville. In consequence of which, when the latter became minister in 1806, he obtained the appointment of chancellor of the exchequer for Ireland; but he lost the appointment on his friend and patron going out of power after the death of Fox. From Eton, Sir John Newport went to Queen's college, Oxford, where he took his degrees. In 1788 he was called to the bar; but from ill health was compelled to abandon his professional pursuits; and was returned, as a member of the united parliament, for Waterford, in 1803. No member was better versed in Irish affairs than Sir J. Newport: his zeal, integrity, and indefatigable perseverance, were equalled only by his tact and great practical knowledge. For several years he held the situation of comptroller of the exchequer. Having seen the Reform Bill carried, he retired from public life in 1837, declaring, in an address to the electors of Waterford, that having lived to see that measure effected, he should leave to younger and more active men the important duties that every honest and zealous member of parliament would have to perform.

NEWTON, THOMAS, a schoolmaster and physician, was born at Butley, in Cheshire; studied at Trinity college, Oxford, and Queen's college, Cambridge; became master of Macclesfield school, where he also practised physic; but, having entered into orders, in 1583 he obtained the living of Little Ilford, in Essex. His principal works are, a "History of the Saracens;" "An Elegiac Poem on the Death of Queen Elizabeth;" and "The Herbal to the Bible, translated from Lemnius."

NEWTON, Sir ISAAC, the most distinguished philosopher, mathematician, and astronomer of modern times, was born at Woolsthorpe, in Lincolnshire, on Christmas-day, 1642. Losing his father in his childhood, the care of him devolved on his mother, who gave him an excellent education. In 1654 he was sent to Grantham school, and at the age of eighteen removed to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he had the learned Mr. (afterwards Dr.) Isaac Barrow for his tutor. After going through Euclid's Elements, he proceeded to the study of Descartes's Geometry, with Oughtred's Clavis, and Kepler's Optics, in all of which he made marginal notes as he went along. It was in this early course that he invented the method of series and fluxions, which he afterwards brought to perfection, though his claim to the discovery was unjustly contested by Leibnitz. At the age of twenty-two, Mr. Newton took his degree of bachelor of arts, and about the same time he applied to the grinding of optic glasses for telescopes; and having procured a glass prism in order to try the phenomena of colours lately discovered by Grimaldi, the result of his observations was his new theory of light and colours. It was not long after this, that he made his grand discovery of the laws of gravitation, to which his attention was first turned by his seeing an apple fall from a tree; but it was not till 1667 that the important principle which forms the foundation of the Newtonian philosophy was first published under the title of "Philosophiæ Naturalis principia Mathematica." On his return to the university, in 1667, he was chosen fellow of his college, and took his degree of master of arts. Two years afterwards he succeeded Dr. Barrow in the mathematical professorship, on which occasion he read a course of optical lectures in Latin. He had not finished them in 1671, when he was chosen fellow of the Royal Society, to which learned body he communicated his theory of light and colours, which was followed by his account of a new telescope invented by him, and other interesting papers. When the privileges of the university of Cambridge were attacked by James II., Mr. Newton was appointed to appear as one of his delegates in the high commission court, where he pleaded with so much strength, that the king thought proper to stop his proceedings. He was next chosen a member of the convention parliament, in which he sat till it was dissolved. In 1696 he was made warden of the mint, and afterwards master of that office; which place he discharged with the greatest honour till his death. On his last promotion he nominated Mr. Whiston to fill his chair at Cambridge, with all the profits of the place, and resigned it entirely to him in 1703. During the same year he was chosen president of the Royal Society, in which station he continued twenty-five years. He was also a member of the academy of sciences at Paris, having been chosen in 1699. In 1704 he published his treatise on "The Reflections, Refractions, Inflections, and Colours of Light;" but the whole merit of this extraordinary work has not been fully appreciated till lately. In 1705 he received the honour of knighthood from queen Anne; and he died March 20, 1727. On the 24th his body lay in state in the Jerusalem chamber, from whence it was conveyed to Westminster abbey, the pall being borne by the lord chancellor, two dukes, and three earls. A monument was afterwards erected to his memory; and his statue, by Kneller, has been placed in Trinity college. He enjoyed his faculties to the close of his long life. His temper also was remarkably even, and he might almost be said to have carried patience too far; particularly in suffering other men to run away with the merit of his discoveries. This would have been the case in regard to the invention of fluxions, if some of his friends had not interposed, and asserted the claim of their illustrious countryman. Sir Isaac was not only a philosopher, but a Christian, and spent much of his time in elucidating the Sacred Scriptures; nor could any thing decompose his mind so much as light and irreverent expressions on the subject of religion. his friends expressed their admiration of his discoveries, he said, "To myself I seem to have been as a child playing on the sea-shore, while the immense ocean of truth lay unexplored before me." The following is Pope's well-known epitaph on this prince of philosophers:—

Isaacus Newton hic jacet,

Nature and all her works lay hid in night;
God said, Let Newton be,—and all was light.

NEWTON, THOMAS, an eminent English prelate, was born at Lichfield, in 1704. After finishing his education at Westminster, he was elected to Trinity college, Cambridge, where he obtained a fellowship; and in 1744 he was presented to the rectory of St. Mary-le-Bow, Chancery-lane. In 1749 he published an edition of "Milton's Paradise Lost, with Notes, and the Life of the Author;" which was followed by the "Paradise Regained," in a similar form. But his literary reputation rests chiefly on his "Dissertations on the Prophecies," which he completed in 1758. He was made a prebendary of Westminster in 1757, and soon after precentor of York; both which preferments he resigned in 1761, on his promotion to the see of Bristol. In 1768 he was made dean of St. Paul's; and died in 1792.

NEWTON, RICHARD, an eminent divine, was born in Buckinghamshire, about 1676. He was educated at Westminster-school, and Christ-church, Oxford; became principal of Hart-hall, in 1710, and took his degree of D.D.; obtained a canonry of Christ-church, in 1732; and died the year following. Dr. Newton, at a great expense, erected Hart-hall into a college in 1740. His works are, "University Education;" "Pluralities Indefensible;" "Sermons," &c.

NEWTON, JOHN, an episcopal clergyman of Calvinistic principles, was born in London, in 1725. He did not enjoy the advantages of a regular education, having been bred to the sea under his father, who was master of a merchant vessel. Afterwards he sailed in the Guinea trade, and led a very irregular life for some years; but at last he grew both serious and studious. By indefatigable diligence he attained a knowledge of the Latin and Greek languages; and in 1764 was ordained on the curacy of Olney, in Buckinghamshire, where he became intimately acquainted with Cowper, the poet, conjointly with whom he produced the "Olney Hymns." In 1779 Mr. Newton obtained the rectory of St. Mary Woolnoth, London, which he held till his death, in 1807. He was the author of several works, among which may be numbered a "Review of Ecclesiastical History;" "Cardiphonia, or the Utterance of the Heart;" "The Messiah, a series of Discourses," &c. forming altogether 6 volumes 8vo.

NEWTON, GILBERT STUART, a painter of considerable merit, was born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1794; visited Italy, about 1820; and on his return to England, entered himself a student of the Royal Academy. He confined himself chiefly to small pictures, and illustrated many subjects in the "Annals" and other elegant publications, in a highly creditable manner. His female figures are strikingly expressive of innocence as well as beauty. Died, 1835.

NEY, MICHAEL, duke of Eichingen, and prince of Moskwa, a peer and marshal of France, and one of its greatest military heroes, was born at Sarre-Louis, in 1768. His early years were devoted to the study of the law, but disliking the confinement, he entered the army, as a private hussar, in 1787. His intrepid courage rendered him a distinguished object in the first years of the revolutionary war, when serving with the army of the Rhine, and in 1796 he rose to the rank of brigadier-general. On his marriage with Mlle. Angèle, the friend of Hortense de Beauharnois, Napoleon presented him with a magnificent Egyptian sabre, and named him his envoy and minister plenipotentiary to the Helvetic republic; but in 1803 he was recalled to take the command of the army intended to make a descent upon England. In the following year, when Napoleon received the title of Emperor, he saw the necessity of restoring titles and decorations. Ney was then created a marshal, and also received other distinctions of merit, whilst he was with one accord denominated by the army, "the bravest of the brave." After a succession of victories, during which Ney never relaxed in his course of unceasing exertion and personal fatigue, he obtained the additional title of prince of Moskwa; and in June, 1814, he was invested with the dignity of a peer of France. He retired to his seat in the country, from which he was recalled in March, 1815, by information that Napoleon had quitted Elba. Hitherto one motive alone, the love of country, impelled his every action; personal or family interest had never appeared throughout his conduct; he would have considered a bare attempt at deception degrading. He thought the return of Napoleon would prove injurious to France, and maintained that the mischief ought to be prevented. On taking leave of Louis XVIII. he therefore made many protestations of his zeal and fidelity to the king, and expressed his determination to stay the progress of the invader. Arrived at Beaumont, the marshal found the whole country hastening to meet the returning emperor; at Lyons the dukes d'Artois and d'Orleans acknowledged the fruitlessness of resistance; the troops which he commanded shared the delirium; and Ney himself yielded his opinion, and went over with his army to his former friend and master. He again fought under his banner, at the battle of Waterloo, where he had five horses killed under him, and his cloak was perforated with balls. After the conclusion of that eventful day, and the second abdication of Napoleon, Ney was advised to quit France; for which money and every facility of escape were afforded him. He refused them all, and retired to the residence of a near relative; but he was soon arrested, brought to trial, and, his colleagues and companions in arms having declared themselves incompetent to form a court martial whereby to judge him, the affair was carried to the court of peers, by whom he was condemned; though the duke of Wellington nobly affirmed that it was in defiance of the true construction of the article of amnesty made at the capitulation of Paris. Every avenue to the royal presence was purposely closed against his unhappy wife, who anxiously sought his pardon; and Ney suffered with firmness, declaring with his last breath that he had never acted treacherously to his country. He was shot, Dec. 7, 1815.

NICEPHORUS, CALLISTUS, a native of Constantinople, was an ecclesiastical historian, of the 14th century; author of a "History of the Church," and other works of a similar description.

NICEPHORUS, GREGORIAS, a Byzantine historian, who flourished in the 14th century. He was a great favourite of Andronicus Paleologus the elder, who made him librarian of the Constantinopolitan church, and employed him as his ambassador to the prince of Servia.

NICERON, JOHN PETER, an eminent biographer, was born at Paris, in 1683. He entered into the religious order of the Barnabites, and became a celebrated preacher. He was also successively professor of philosophy and theology, and librarian to his society. Died, 1738. His principal work is entitled, "Memoirs of Men illustrious in the Republic of Letters, with an Account of their Works," 44 vols.

NICETAS, DAVID, a Greek historian of the 9th century, who wrote the Life of St. Ignatius.—ACHOMINATES NICETAS, another Greek historian, died at Nice, in 1206. He wrote Annals from 1118 to 1205.—A third, surnamed SEKRON, was bishop of Heraclea, in the 11th century; and was the author of "Panegyrics on St. Gregory Nazianzen;" "Commentaries on the Scriptures;" and other works.

NICHOLLS, WILLIAM, an English divine of great learning and piety, was born at Dornington, Bucks, in 1664, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford, after which he became fellow of Merton college, and took his degree of D.D. in 1693; at which time he was rector of Selby, in Sussex. He died about 1712. Dr. Nicholls published several valuable works: the principal of which were, "A Conference with a Heretic;" "A Defence of the Church of England;" and "A Commentary on the Book of Common Prayer."

NICHOLLS, FRANK, M.D., F.R.S., an eminent English physician, was born, in London, in 1699. He was educated at Westminster school, whence he removed to Christchurch, Oxford, where he took his degrees, and became reader of anatomy. On leaving the university he settled in London, and in 1743 married a daughter of Dr. Mead. He succeeded Sir Hans Sloane as physician to George II., an account of whose death he published in the Philosophical Transactions. Died, 1779. His works are, "De Anima Medica;" "De Mortu Cordis et Sanguinis, &c.;" and a tract against man-and-wifery.

NICHOLS, JOHN, an antiquary and miscellaneous writer, who for nearly half a century conducted the Gentleman's Magazine, was born, at Islington, in 1744. Having received a liberal education, he became apprentice, at an early age, to Bowyer, the learned printer, and was subsequently admitted into partnership with his master, on whose death he succeeded to the management of one of the first typographical establishments in London. Among his numerous publications are, "The History and Antiquities of Leicestershire;" "Anecdotes of Bowyer;" "Literary Anecdotes of the Eighteenth Century;" 9 vols.; "Illustrations of the Literature of the Eighteenth Century," 6 vols. His personal exertions, as well as his pen were frequently used to promote charitable purposes, and he had sometimes the gratification of being able to assist the indigent sons of genius in his office of registrar of the Literary Fund. Died, 1826.

NICHOLSON, WILLIAM, an eminent writer on chemistry and natural philosophy, was born in London, in 1758, and went to India at an early age, in the maritime service. In 1776 he became agent, on the continent, for Mr. Wedgwood, and afterwards settled in the metropolis as a mathematical teacher. He published an "Introduction to Natural Philosophy;" a "Dictionary of Chemistry;" a "Journal of Natural Philosophy, Chemistry, and the Arts," which was continued for several years; and various valuable compilations. He also took out patents for several inventions; but he was singularly unfortunate in his speculations, and died in indigent circumstances, in 1813.

NICIAS, an Athenian commander, who by his merit rose to the highest offices in his country. He was put to death by the Syracusans, B.C. 413.

NICOLAI, CHRISTOPHER FREDERIC, a German author and bookseller, of some note in the history of German literature, was born at Berlin, in 1733, and died there in 1811. After studying at the university of Frankfurt, to which city he was first sent, in order to learn the book trade, he returned to Berlin, and wrote his "Letters on the Present State of Belles Lettres," in 1756. With the aid of other literati, he produced his "Letters on Modern Literature;" and in 1763 executed his plan of the "General German Library," a work which was continued forty years, though he ceased to edit it at the end of the 107th volume, in 1792. Among his other numerous works are, "The Life and Opinions of Sebastian Nothander;" "A Tour in Germany and Switzerland;" "Characteristic Anecdotes of Frederic II.," &c. His criticisms were often severe, and not always just; hence he was frequently involved in disputes with his literary brethren, by some of whom he was treated very unceremoniously. Died, 1811.

NICOLAUS, DAMASCENUS, a native of Damascus, in Syria, who lived in the time of Augustus. He wrote "A Universal History;" "Memoirs of Augustus," &c.

NICOLE, FRANCIS, a mathematician, was born at Paris, in 1663. He distinguished himself by detecting the falsehood of a pretended quadrature of the circle, and thereby gained a prize of three thousand livres, which he gave to the hospital of Lyons. Died, 1748.

NICOLE, PETER, an eminent French divine and moralist, was born at Chartres, in

IF OTHERS FEAR YOUR WIT, YOU HAVE REASON TO FEAR THEIR MEMORY.

1625. He became a member of the society of Port Royal, where he taught youth with great reputation, and assisted Arnauld in many of his works. In his latter years he espoused the cause of Bonnet against the Quietists, and was engaged in other controversies. His principal works are, "Moral Essays," 23 vols.; "The Perpetuity of the Faith;" and a "Treatise on the Unity of the Church." Died, 1695.

NICOLÒ, DEL ABRATE, an eminent painter, was born at Modena, in 1512. He obtained his surname from being patronized by Primaticci, abbot of St. Martin, who took him to France in 1542, and employed him in several works. The style of Nicolo approached to that of Julio Romano, and of Parmesan.

NICOLÒ, properly NICOLÒ ISOUARD, one of the most favourite theatrical composers of France, was born at Malta, in 1777. At Naples he completed his study of composition, under the famous Guglielmi. When the French evacuated Italy, general Vauchoir took him to Paris as his private secretary. Here he formed himself on the compositions of Monsigny and Gretry, and produced the popular opera of "Cendrillon," in 1810. In light dramatical composition, he is distinguished for the ease and sweetness of his melodies, the fertility of his imagination, and the happy combination of the modern Italian school with the French. He died at Paris, in 1818.

NICOLSON, WILLIAM, a learned English prelate, was born at Orton, in Cumberland, in 1633; was educated at Queen's college, Oxford; became, successively, bishop of Carlisle, Derry, and archbishop of Cashel: but died suddenly a few days after he was raised to the archiepiscopal dignity, in 1727. He published "The English, Scotch, and Irish Historical Library," the "Leges Marchiarum, or Border Laws," and several other works. He also distinguished himself by the zeal and ability with which he entered into the Bangorian controversy.

NICON, a Russian prelate, was born in 1613. He led a retired life, some years, in an island of the White Sea, where he instituted an order of Anchorites; but was called from thence, and made first archbishop of Novogorod, and afterwards patriarch of Russia. He was, however, deprived of that office in 1638, and died in 1661.

NICOT, JOHN, a French statesman, who being sent by Francis I. ambassador to Portugal, brought from thence the tobacco plant, which out of compliment to him received its Latin name of Nicotiana. He was the author of a "French and Latin Dictionary;" "Traité de la Marine," &c. Born, 1530; died, 1600.

NIEBUHR, CARSTEN, a celebrated traveller, was born at Ludensworth, in Hanover, in 1733. At the age of twenty-two he went to Hamburg for the purpose of studying geometry, after which he devoted several years to the study of the mathematics at Göttingen. Count Bernstorff, the Danish minister, having determined to send a scientific expedition for the purpose of exploring Arabia, Niebuhr went as geographer to it, in March, 1761, and, after touching at Constantinople, proceeded to Egypt. Here they remained a year, and reached Yemen, their point of destination, in 1762. In September, 1761, he sailed for Brønby, and, in December, 1764, set out on his return overland, through Persia and Turkey. He arrived at Copenhagen, in November, 1767, and laid the fruits of his researches before the world, in his "Description of Arabia," and his "Travels in Arabia," both of which have been translated into English and other languages. He was the only one that returned from the mission; was liberally rewarded by the Danish monarch; and died in 1815.

NIEBUHR, BERTHOLD GEORGE, the celebrated historian of Rome, was a son of the preceding, and was born at Copenhagen, in 1776. When nineteen years old, he went to the university of Edinburgh, in order to study the natural sciences, remained there one year and a half, and then travelled over England, to obtain a knowledge of its institutions. In 1806, he entered the Prussian service; was made privy-counsellor of state, and a temporary officer in the department of finances. In 1810, when the university of Berlin was established, his friends persuaded him to deliver his first lectures on Roman history; which were received with such interest by the hearers, and so much commended by eminent men, that he published, in 1811 and 1812, two volumes of his "Roman History." This he afterwards remodelled and enlarged; and though it tends to inculcate a great degree of scepticism with regard to many hitherto received facts, throws more light on the genuine annals of Rome than any of his predecessors. Died, 1831.

NIELD, JAMES, a man who, like the philanthropist Howard, devoted a great part of his life to the amelioration of human wretchedness, was born at Knutsford, in Cheshire, in 1744; and, coming to London as an apprentice to a goldsmith, afterwards realized a good fortune in that business. In 1773, by his exertions, a society was formed in the metropolis, having for its object the relief and discharge of persons confined for small debts. Of this benevolent institution Mr. Nield was unanimously chosen treasurer, and he continued to discharge that office through life, much to the advantage of the charity, and with great trouble to himself. He travelled not so much to, for pleasure or profit, but to gauge the depths of human misery, and to alleviate the sufferings of his fellow-men. It was his constant practice in his prison excursions, as he called them, during thirty years, to wait upon the magistrates in cities and boroughs, and respectfully to represent what he saw amiss in their goals. By these means, he was the instrument of producing many substantial improvements, and of diffusing a kindred spirit of beneficence far and wide; so that it would be difficult to estimate the extent of his services in the humane cause to which he cheerfully and perseveringly devoted his time and fortune. He died, universally lamented, in 1814.

NIEMEYER, AUGUSTUS HERMANN, a German theologian and miscellaneous writer, was born at Halle, in 1754, and died there in 1806. He first began to give instructions in the university of Halle in 1777; was appointed professor of theology in 1780; and continued to receive various appointments till 1806, when he was made a member of the estates of the kingdom of Westphalia, chancellor, and rector of the university. In 1813 the university was abolished by Napoleon; but when the Prussian government restored it he was reappointed. He produced a great number of works, particularly on the subject of education, the bare titles of which would occupy a very considerable space; besides others on theology, ethics, history, &c. Died, 1828.

NIEREMBERG, JOHN EVSEVICH, a celebrated Spanish Jesuit, and a distinguished writer. He was born at Madrid, in 1580; took the habit of St. Ignatius; paid great attention to the study of natural history; and was appointed professor at Madrid, where he remained fourteen years. His works are both numerous and important. Died, 1654.

NIEUHOFF, JOHN DE, a Dutch voyager of the 17th century, who wrote a curious account of his embassy from the Dutch East India company to the emperor of China.

NIEUPORT, C. F. A. F. le PRUD'HOMME D'HAILLY, viscount de, a French diplomatist, was born at Paris, in 1746. He was early in life admitted into the order of Malta; and after having served in the Austrian army, and in the Maltese expedition, became chargé d'affaires at the court of the Netherlands; and eventually received from the prince of Orange the title of chamberlain, and the decoration of the Belgic legion. He was the author of "Mélanges des Mathématiques," &c. &c. Died, 1827.

NIEUWENTYT, BERNARD, an eminent Dutch philosopher and mathematician, was born at Westruydyck, in North Holland, in 1651, and died in 1730. His works are, "Considerations on the Analysis of Quantities infinitely small;" "Considerations on the Principles of the Differential Calculus;" "Contemplations on the Universe;" this has been translated into English, under the title of the "Religious Philosopher," in 3 vols. 8vo.

NIGHTINGALE, JOSEPH, a dissenting minister of very considerable talent, was born, in 1773, at Chowbent, in Lancashire; settled in London, and became an author; left the Methodist connexion for Unitarianism; and died in 1824. Among his writings are, "A Portraiture of Catholicism;" "A Portraiture of Methodism;" several volumes of the "Beauties of England and Wales;" "English Topography;" and "Sermons."

NIGHTINGALL, Sir MILES, K.C.B., &c., began his military career in 1787, and proceeded to India, where he was employed under Sir W. Meadows, and in the campaigns of 1791 and 1792. In 1796 he sailed for St. Domingo; and having executed a commission to Toussaint, the black chief, he returned to England, and afterwards wore a principal part in the continental war. In 1815 he once more visited Bengal; but in 1820 he fixed his residence in England, and was several years a member of parliament for the borough of Eye, in Suffolk. He died in 1829.

NISBET, JOSEPH, a captain in the royal navy, was step-son to Lord Nelson, under whom he served in many engagements, and whose patronage obtained him some advantages, until he offended his lordship by remonstrating with him on his attachment to lady Hamilton. Died, 1830.

NIGIDIUS FIGULUS, PUBLIUS, a Roman senator and orator, and friend of Cicero, whom he assisted in defeating the conspiracy of Catiline. He revived the Pythagorean philosophy; was banished for his attachment to Pompey; and died B.C. 45.

NIVERNIS, LOUIS JULIUS MARCINI MAZARINI, duke de, was born at Paris, in 1716. He was, successively, ambassador at Rome, Berlin, and London, in which latter city he negotiated the peace of 1763. On his return to France he produced several poetical imitations of Virgil, Horace, Tibullus, Ovid, Ariosto, and Milton. He also wrote "Letters on the Use of the Mind;" "Dialogues of the Dead;" "Reflections on the Genius of Horace, Boileau, and Rousseau;" "Fables in Verse;" "Dramas," &c. He was imprisoned by the republicans in 1793; and died in 1798.

NIPHUS, AUGUSTINE, a learned Italian, was born at Sessa, in Naples, in 1472. He became professor of philosophy, first at Padua, and afterwards at Pisa, where his reputation was so great, that Leo X. made him count palatine. He wrote "Commentaries on Aristotle and Averroes," 14 vols. folio; "De Intellectu et Demonibus;" "A Treatise on the Immortality of the Soul;" and other works. Died, 1557.

NIVELLE DE LA CHAUSSEE, PETER CLAUDE, a French dramatist, was born at Paris, in 1692, and died in 1734. He was the first who introduced sentimental comedy on the French stage.

NIZAM AL MULK, an enlightened Persian, who, in the 11th century, rose from obscurity to be vizier to the sultan Alp Arslan. He was an able statesman, and a consummate general; but, above all, a zealous patron of learning; having founded and endowed the once famous college of Bagdad, and numerous other seminaries of education; while his palace was always open to men of genius, many of whom he pensioned. He was also distinguished as the historian of his own times. At the age of ninety he met his death from the hand of an assassin, while reading a petition which his treacherous foe had just presented to him.

NIZAMI, or NIDHAMI, a celebrated Persian poet; author of some esteemed poems, among which is "The Loves of Leila and Mejnoun." Died, 1160.

NOAILLES, LOUIS ANTOINE DE, a cardinal and archbishop of Paris, was the son of the duke of Noailles, and born in 1651. He studied at the Sorbonne; and in 1695 obtained the archbishopric of Paris, where he distinguished himself by his zeal against the Quietists and Jansenists; for which, in 1700, he was created a cardinal. he opposed the bull Unigenitus; but afterwards made his submission to the pope. Died, 1729.

NOAILLES, ADRIAN MAURICE, duke of, was president of the council of France during the minority of Louis XV.; but was exiled through the influence of cardinal Dubois, whose elevation he had opposed. On the death of that intriguing priest, however, he was reinstated in his former offices; obtained a marshal's staff, and displayed great skill as a commander during the Austrian war of succession. In 1744, by the unreasonable impetuosity of his nephew, the count of Grammont, he lost the battle of Dettingen, and, by this means, the fruits of the wise measures by which he brought the British army to the verge of ruin. When his age no longer permitted him to fight at the head of armies, he entered the ministry, and gave proof of his statesmanlike talents, though he was by no means free from the faults which stained the characters of the generality of courtiers in that age. His two sons were, in 1775, made marshals of France.

NOAILLES, Louis, viscount, born in 1753, was one of the nobles, who, on the 12th of July, 1790, resolved to divest themselves of their exclusive privileges, and sit with the tiers état. After the dissolution of the constituent assembly he went into the army, and was killed in 1796, while withdrawing from St. Domingo, in an action with an English frigate off Cuba.—His son, ALEXIS, count of Noailles, has figured both in the army and the cabinet. The princes of the house of Bourbon sent him on important missions to the different continental courts, after which he repaired to the residence of Louis, at Hartwell, in England. He accompanied the allied army to France; was afterwards the plenipotentiary of Louis XVIII. to the congress of Vienna; and has since held office as a minister.

NOBLE, MARK, an industrious writer on history and biography, was a clergyman of the church of England, and presented to the rectory of Barning, in Kent, in 1764, at which place he died in 1827. He was the author of "Memoirs of the Protectorate House of Cromwell," 2 vols.; "Memoirs of the illustrious House of Medici, with Genealogical Tables;" "The Lives of the English Regicides," 2 vols.; a "History of the College of Arms; and a supplementary continuation of "Granger's Biographical History of England," 3 vols. He also wrote several papers in the Archæologia, and was F.S.A. Lond. et Edin.

NOEHDEN, GEORGE HENRY, a learned German writer, who for many years resided in England, was born in 1770, at Göttingen, where he received his education. Being introduced to the late Sir William Milner, in 1793, he attended his son to Eton in the capacity of private tutor. Here he obtained the friendship of Jacob Bryant, Herschell, &c. till the education of his young pupil being completed, he accompanied a younger son of the same family to Göttingen, where he wrote a dissertation "De Porphyrio Scholastic in Homerum." After visiting the courts of Brunswick and Berlin, they returned to Eton, and in 1800

Noehden published his admirable "German and English Grammar." He was an excellent numismatologist, and some years before his death obtained the chief situation in that department of the British Museum. He died in 1826, leaving unpublished his "Essay on the Northwick Coins," an "Introduction to Numismatology," &c.

NOEL DE LA MORINIÈRE, SIMON BARTHOLOMEW JOSEPH, a French traveller and naturalist, was born at Dieppe, in 1763. He was inspector-general of fisheries, and a member of the scientific academies of Petersburg, Turin, New York, &c.; was the author of some scientific works; and died on his return from a voyage to Cape North, in 1822.

NOLAN, MICHAEL, an eminent lawyer, a native of Ireland, who after distinguishing himself at the English bar, obtained the office of chief justice of the Brecon circuit, in Wales. He published "Reports of Cases relating to the Duty and Office of a Justice of the Peace," and other practical law books; and was particularly conversant with the poor laws, tithe laws, &c. Died, 1827.

NOLLEKENS, JOSEPH FRANCIS, was a native of Antwerp, who settled in London, where he obtained considerable reputation as a painter, and died in 1748. His style resembled that of Watteau, whom he closely imitated.

NOLLEKENS, JOSEPH, son of the preceding, was a celebrated sculptor, and born in London, in 1737. He was placed under Scheemakers, the sculptor, on leaving whom he went to Italy, and studied there some time under Ciavetti. While at Rome, he gained a gold medal from the academy of painting, sculpture, and architecture; and on his return to England in 1770, he became a royal academician, executed many works of great beauty, and was so extensively employed, particularly on busts, that he realized a fortune of 200,000*l*. Nollekens was chiefly distinguished by his careful and accurate imitation of nature, and by the absence of a peculiarity of manner. He was a great favourite with George III., and possessed many peculiarities of character, of which his inordinate love of money was not the least. Died, 1823.

NOLLET, JOHN ANTOINE, a French natural philosopher, was born in 1770, at Pimbre, near Noyon. He was lecturer on experimental philosophy to the duke of Savoy, and afterwards to the royal family in his native country; he also held the professorship of physics in the college of Navarre at Paris; and was a member of the Royal Society and other learned bodies. He wrote "Leçons du Physique Expérimentale," 6 vols.; besides some work on electricity, and other scientific subjects. Died, 1770.

NONNUS, a Greek poet, was a native of Panopolis, in Egypt, in the 5th century. He wrote an account of his embassy to Ethiopia and among the Saracens; also a work entitled, "Dionysiacs," and a paraphrase in Greek verse, on the gospel of St. John.

NOODT, GERARD, a famous civilian, was born in 1647, at Nimeguen, where he was chosen professor of law in 1671. He afterwards settled at Leyden, of which university he became rector; and died in 1725. He published a collection of his works in 1713; which are wholly on subjects of jurisprudence, and are esteemed of high authority.

NORDEN, FRIDERICK LOUIS, an eminent Danish traveller, was born at Glückstadt, in Holstein, in 1708. He was a volunteer in the English fleet under Sir John Norris in the Mediterranean; and was subsequently sent by the king of Denmark to Egypt, to make drawings and observations of the ancient monuments of that country. These he executed with great fidelity, and his "Travels in Egypt and Nubia," with plates, were splendidly printed in 2 volumes folio. Being elected a member of the Royal Society of London, he presented to that learned body his drawings of Ruins and Colossal Statues at Thebes, of which he also published a memoir. Died, 1743.

NORDEN, JOHN, an old English writer, who is conjectured by Wood to have been a native of Wilts. He received his education at Oxford, and wrote some strange books in divinity, with very whimsical titles, as, "The Sinner Man's Solace," "Antithesis, or Contrariety between the Wicked and Godly set forth in a pair of Gloves fit for every man to wear," &c. He was also the author of the "Surveyor's Dialogue;" "Labyrinth of Man's Life," a poem; "England, or a Guide for Travellers;" and "Topographical Descriptions of Middlesex, Hertfordshire, and Cornwall. He was surveyor of the king's lands, and died about 1635.

NORDENFLEICHT, CHERERIO CHARLOTTE DE, a Swedish lady, who wrote an esteemed and elegant poem "On the Passage of the Belts," two straits in the Baltic; and "An Apology for Women." Died, 1793.

NORGATE, EDWARD, an English artist, was born at Cambridge, where his father was master of Bene't college. He was employed by the earl of Arundel to purchase pictures in Italy; but not being supplied with remittances, he was compelled to return without executing his commissions; and was afterwards made one of the clerks of the signet, and Windsor Herald. He died in 1650; and was considered one of the finest illuminators of his age.

NORIS, HENRY, a cardinal, was born at Verona, in 1631; quitted the Jesuits for the order of Augustines; and published the "History of Pelagianism." In 1700 he was appointed chief librarian of the Vatican; and died in 1704.

NORMANN EHRENFELS, CHARLES FREDERIC LEBRUCHT, count de, a distinguished military officer, born at Stuttgart, in 1764. He entered the Austrian service at the age of eighteen; in 1809 he became a colonel; and in 1813 commanded the light cavalry of the guard of Napoleon during the campaign of Russia. After the battle of Lützen he refused to serve against the French, and sought refuge in Saxony. On the insurrection taking place in Greece, in 1822, he embarked at Marseilles, with a number of German officers, and on arriving at Greece, he was appointed by the government commandant of the fort of Navarino. After organizing a battalion of Philhellenes at Corinth, he joined Mavrocordato, and had a share in the brilliant victory of Comotini, was severely wounded at Peta, and died during the same year, at Missolonghi.

NORRIS, SIR JOHN, a brave naval officer, who served his country nearly sixty years, commencing in 1689, and terminating, with his life, in 1749. The frequent accidents and misfortunes which befel the ships and squadrons under his command, and which could not be warded off by any human prudence or sagacity, procured him the appellation of "Foul-weather Jack;" yet in the duties of his profession no man could be more assiduous; and so well did he second the exertions of his friend Sir Clowdeston Shovel in the Mediterranean, that the queen knighted him, and otherwise handsomely rewarded him.

NORRIS, JOHN, an eminent divine and Platonist, was born in 1657, at Collingbourne Kingston, in Wiltshire; was educated at Winchester school, and at Exeter college, Oxford; and became rector of Bemerton, near Salisbury, where he died in 1711. He ranks as one of the most eminent of the English Platonists, and was a good man, though a visionary. Among his works are, "The Theory and Regulation of Love;" "Reflections upon the Conduct of Human Life;" "Practical Discourses," 4 vols.; "An Essay towards the Theory of the Ideal or Ineligible World;" and "A Philosophical Discourse concerning the natural Immortality of the Soul."

NORRIS, JOHN, born in 1734, was a native of Norfolk; and having been educated at King's college, Cambridge, bequeathed to the university of which he had been a member property to the value of 1900. per annum, for the endowment of a divinity professorship and a theological prize essay, both of which bear his name. He was a gentleman of good fortune, and the intimate friend of Porson. Died, 1777.

NORRIS, JAMES, (of Nonwuch House, Devizes), an eccentric miser, who, though possessing great wealth, lived the life of a secluded pauper, and died, without a friend to solace him in his last moments, January, 1835.

NORTH, SIR EDWARD, an eminent lawyer in the reigns of Henry VIII. and queen Mary, by the latter of whom he was created baron North, of Catlidge, in Cambridgeshire.

NORTH, DUDLEY, lord, great grandson of the preceding, was born in 1581, and succeeded to the title in 1600. In the civil war he espoused the cause of the parliament; and died in 1686.—His son, of the same name, wrote a "History of the Life of Edward Lord North," &c., and in classed by Walpole among the "Royal and Noble Authors." He left four sons, all of whom attained political or literary eminence; and are described in the next article.

NORTH, FRANCIS, baron Guildford, lord keeper of the great seal, under Charles II. and James II., was the eldest son of the last-mentioned lord Dudley North. After studying at the Middle Temple, and being regularly called to the bar, he became solicitor-general in 1671, when he received the honour of knighthood; in 1673, he was made attorney-general; the next year, chief-justice of the common-pleas; and, in 1683, he was appointed lord-keeper, and raised to the peerage. He was the author of "A Philosophical Essay on Music," which has been highly praised as a scientific performance, and was the first of its kind. He died in 1685.—SIR DUDLEY NORTH, brother of the lord-keeper, engaged in commercial pursuits, and became an eminent Turkey merchant. He was afterwards one of the lords of the treasury in the reign of Charles II.; wrote "Observations on the Manners, Customs, and Jurisprudence of the Turks;" and died in 1691.—DR. JOHN NORTH, was born in 1645, and educated at Jesus college, Cambridge, where he obtained a professorship of the Greek language, and was created D.D. He was a man of considerable erudition, and is said to have been a great admirer of the writings of Plato, a selection from which he published in Greek and Latin. Died, 1683.—ROBERT NORTH, a lawyer and miscellaneous writer, was the youngest brother of the preceding; became attorney-general under James II.; and died in 1733. He wrote the lives of his three brothers; also "Examen, or Inquiry into the Credit and Veracity of Kennet's History of England," a work, which though obviously written in defence of the Stuarts, abounds with curious information and anecdotes.

NORTH, FREDERIC, earl of Guildford, better known as Lord North, was of the same family as the foregoing, and was born in 1732. He was educated at Eton, and at Trinity college, Oxford. After having held several less important offices, he was, in 1767, appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and, in 1770, first lord of the treasury. His administration continued through the whole of the American war, a period of peculiar difficulty and danger, during which he was incessantly assailed by the opposition, and was often threatened with impeachment. On his resignation of office, however, in 1782, instead of instituting against him that impeachment which they had so long threatened, a coalition was formed between him and the Whigs; but this heterogeneous administration lasted only a few months, after which lord North held no responsible station in the state. He was distinguished for urbanity of manners, and a turn for repartee. For several years previous to his death his lordship was afflicted with blindness. Died, 1792.

NORTH, GEORGE, an English antiquary and writer on numismatics, was born in London, in 1710; received his education at St. Paul's school, and Bene't college, Cambridge; became rector of Codicote, in Hertfordshire; and died in 1773.

NORTON, THOMAS, an English writer, of the 16th century, was a native of Bedfordshire. He was a zealous Calvinist, and wrote an "Epistle to the Queen's poor deceived Subjects of the North Country;" a "Warning against the dangerous Practices of the Papists;" and other tracts against Popery. He was also the author of twenty-seven of the Psalms of David, in the version of Sternhold and Hopkins; and he assisted Thomas Sackville in his tragedy of "Ferrex and Porrex." Died, 1584.

NORTON, JOHN, a writer in the reign of Charles II. who published a curious book, called "The Scholar's Vade-mecum," in which he endeavoured to alter the orthography of the English language.

NORTHCOTE, JAMES, an eminent portrait and historical painter, was born in 1746, at Plymouth, where his father was a watchmaker. Having a taste for the fine arts, and being flattered by praises bestowed on his early productions, he pursued the practice of drawing and painting with so much assiduity, that Dr. Mudge, a physician of Plymouth, recommended him as a scholar to Sir Joshua Reynolds, with whom he remained five years; and on leaving that great artist he commenced business on his own account with great success as a portrait painter. Aspiring, however, to the loftier, though less lucrative department of historical painting, he visited Italy in 1777, and, remaining there three years, he returned to London with a vastly increased reputation. In 1787 he became a royal academician; and for a period of thirty years his productions formed a conspicuous part of the exhibitions at Somerset House. He studied deeply, was an acute observer of human nature, and possessed a sound judgment, a quick perception, and great conversational powers. He wrote "The Life of Sir Joshua Reynolds;" also "Fables," "Conversations," and "The Life of Titian;" in all of which he was assisted by Mr. Hazlitt. He amassed a large fortune by his profession, and his habits, like those of Nolletens, were too penurious to dissipate it. He died, aged 85, in 1831.

NORWOOD, RICHARD, an English geometer of the 17th century, was the first person who measured a degree of the meridian in England. This was executed in 1633, the operations being carried on between London and York. He wrote Treatises on Navigation, Trigonometry, and Fortification; but no particulars of his life are recorded.

NOSTRADAMUS, MICHAEL, a celebrated astrologer and empiric of the 16th century, was born in 1503, at St. Remy, in Provence. After graduating in physic at Montpellier, in 1529, he acquired the reputation of a skilful physician by successfully arresting the progress of a pestilential disease. But he aimed at the higher character of an astrologer and adept in the occult sciences, and published a volume of obscure metrical rhapsodies in 1555, under the title of "Prophetic Centuries." Though some persons regarded these with contempt, and the author as an impostor, there were not wanting persons of distinction who had faith in these prognostics; one of which bore so remarkable an allusion to the death of Henry II., that Nostradamus received many presents, and was appointed first physician to Charles IX., who came himself in person to Salon, where Nostradamus then resided, for the purpose of visiting him. Died, 1566.

NOTT, JOHN, M.D. an elegant poet and oriental scholar, was born at Worcester, in 1751. After studying surgery at Birmingham, he visited Paris for further instruction, and subsequently went out to China, as surgeon in an East India man. In 1788 he graduated in medicine, and soon after attended the duchess of Devonshire to the continent, in quality of family physician; in 1793 he returned to England, and settled at Clifton, where he continued to reside till his death, in 1826. Among his numerous writings are, "Alonso, a poetic Tale;" "Poema from the Italian of Petrarch;" the "Cynthia" of Propertius; some elegant translations of the odes of Hafis; an edition of "Catullus," with the Latin text rendered into English verse, and Classical notes, 2 vols.; "The Odes of Horace," 2 vols.; a translation of the "Basia" of Johannes Secundus;" "Sappho, after a Greek Romance," &c. He also published some professional works; viz. "A Chemical Dissertation on the Springs of Pisa and Asclano;" "A Nosological Companion to the London Pharmacopœia," &c.

NOUE, FRANCIS DE LA, surnamed Bras de Fer, or the arm of Iron, a French soldier and a zealous Calvinist, was born in Brittany, in 1531. He took Orleans in 1567, and had a principal share in the battle of Jarnac in 1569. His left arm being amputated in consequence of a wound he received at the capture of Fontenoy, he had another constructed of iron, whence he derived his surname. In 1571 he surprised Valenciennes, and on his return the king gave him the command of the troops against Rochelle; but his indignation at the massacre of St. Bartholomew overcoming his fidelity, he used the forces for its defence. In 1578 he entered into the service of the States-general in the Low Countries, where he took the count Egmont prisoner; but he was taken himself in 1580, and did not gain his liberty till five years after. In the time of the league he rendered signal service to Henry IV., and was killed by a musket shot at the siege of Launalle, in 1591.

NOUE, STANISLAUS LOUIS DE LA, count de Vair, was of the same family as the preceding, and born in 1729. He was slain in the action of Saxenhausen in 1760. Louis XV. said, on hearing of his death, that "he had lost the Lion of France."

NOVATIAN, or NOVATIANUS, a Greek philosopher, who embraced Christianity, and was admitted a member of the priesthood. He started the doctrine, that it was sinful to admit persons who had once eluded to idolatry, to communion; a practice then universal in the church. This produced a schism, in which Novatian had many partisans, who called themselves Catharites (puritans) or Novatians, from their founder. This sect, after the council of Nice, fell into disrepute in the Western empire, though they continued to prevail for a much longer period in the East.

NOVERRE, JOHN GEORGE, a great master of the art of dancing, was born at Paris, in 1727. He was destined by his father, who was an adjutant in the army of Charles XII., for the military profession; but his taste led him to prefer the graceful movements of Terpsichore. In 1746 he composed for the comic opera his noted Chinese ballet, which made an extraordinary sensation; and he acquired so much celebrity, that Garrick invited him to England, where his talents attracted great admiration. After adding to his fame, and receiving honours and rewards from several princes on the continent, he entered into the service of Marie Antoinette, queen of France, who appointed him chief ballet-master of the royal academy of music; but he suffered greatly at the revolution, and passed the latter years of his life in indifferent circumstances. In his "Lettres sur la Danse" he proposed a radical reformation of his art; and at the time of his death he was engaged on a Dictionary of the Art of Dancing, intending to rectify the errors of the Encyclopedia on the subject. Died, 1810.

NOVES, LAURA DE, the female who has been immortalized by the pen of Petrarch. She was born near Avignon, in 1307; married Hugh de Sade in 1325; and died in 1348.

NOWELL, ALEXANDER, an English divine, was born at Readhall, in Lancashire, about 1507. In 1551 he was installed prebendary of Westminster; and in the first parliament of queen Mary he was returned for Loo in Cornwall; but the election was declared void on account of his being a dignitary of the church. Soon after this he went to Strasburgh, where he remained till the accession of Elizabeth, when he returned; and in 1560 was made dean of St. Paul's. He was prolocutor of the convocation in which the articles of religion were settled; and he published his "Greater" and "Lesser" Catechisms, in Latin, the latter being an abridgment of the former. He is also supposed to have written the chief part of the Church Catechism. Besides founding a free grammar-school at Middleton, he endowed thirteen fellowships in Brasenose college. Died, 1602.—His brother, LAURENCE NOWELL, became dean of Lichfield, and died in 1576. He was particularly skilled in the Saxon language; of which he compiled a dictionary, still extant in the Bodleian library.

NOY, WILLIAM, a celebrated lawyer of the 17th century, who may be considered as one of the main authors of the civil war between Charles and his subjects, inasmuch as the fatal project of attempting to raise supplies, by what was called ship-money, is said to have been advised by him. He had originally laboured to abridge the royal prerogative; but, being made attorney-general, he suddenly veered about, and became his most strenuous supporter. Died, 1634. Among his works are, "A Treatise on the Grounds and Maxims of the Law of England;" "The Perfect Conveyancer;" and "The Complete Lawyer."

NUCK, ANTHONY, a skilful Dutch anatomist, who was professor of anatomy, and president of the college of surgeons, at Leyden, where he died in 1692. He was the discoverer of a new salivary duct, of the communication between the red veins and the lymphatics, and of a mode of making preparations of the lungs by inflation. His principal works are, "De Vasis aquosis Oculi;" "De Ductu Salivari novo;" and "Operationes et Experimenta Chirurgica."

NUGENT, ROBERT CRAOOS, earl, a native of Westmeath, in Ireland, was bred in the Roman Catholic faith, but quitted it for that of the established church; and then became a member of the English parliament. He was three times returned for Bristol. In 1767, he was created viscount Clare, and in 1776, earl Nugent. He was the author of a volume of poems, some of which possess considerable merit.

NUGENT, THOMAS, was a native of Ireland, but settled in London, where he produced numerous works. He was an LL.D. and F.S.A.; and occupied himself in writing and compiling a variety of publications, several of which possess much merit. Among them are, "A French and English Dictionary," which has been often reprinted; "Travels through Germany," 2 vols.; "Observations on Italy and its Inhabitants," 2 vols.; "The Tour of Europe," 4 vols.; "Condillac's Essay on the Origin of Human Knowledge;" "Hemault's History of France," &c. Died, 1772.

NUGENT, CHRISTOPHER, F.R.S., a native of Ireland, was a physician, whose daughter was married to the celebrated Edmund Burke. He practised with much reputation as a physician in the metropolis, wrote "An Essay on Hydrophobia," and died in 1778.

NUGENT, Lieut.-colonel EDWARD, entered His Majesty's service, as a midshipman, in the Hawk sloop of war, when only thirteen years of age; but he soon left the navy for an emency in the army of the East India Company. He first distinguished himself at the siege of Tannah, in 1774, where he was appointed to act as a lieutenant with the 2nd European grenadier company, in storming the place. In the following year he commanded a detachment on board the Revenge, in a successful action with the Mahrattah fleet. In 1779 he was appointed secretary and aid-de-camp to col. Hartley, with whom he served at the siege of Ahmedabad, and in several severe actions. He was next promoted to the command of the 1st battalion of native troops, at Bombay, which he held six years, and commanded his battalion during the siege of Mangalore. The state of his health having rendered it necessary that he should repair to Europe in 1786, and fearing that a return to a hot climate would prove fatal to him, he was employed in Ireland on the recruiting service, first for the company, and afterwards for the king's service: for the former he raised 2000 men; and for the latter 6000, four-fifths of whom were obtained in one year. Lieut.-colonel Nugent subsequently resided at Lillies, in Buckinghamshire, for which county he served the office of high-sheriff in 1805; and he was lieutenant-colonel of the Bucks local militia, which he resigned in 1813. Died, 1836.

NUMA POMPILIUS, the second king of Rome, was chosen by the people after the death of Romulus, and, during a reign of forty-three years, introduced many salutary reformations among them. He was not, like Romulus, a warrior, but possessed all the qualities of a lawgiver, and a just and wise ruler; and he greatly strengthened the institutions of Rome, by uniting them with religious ceremonies. He was the fourth son of Pompilius Pompo, a distinguished Sabine, and the husband of Tatla, the daughter of the Tanius who for a long period shared the kingdom with Romulus. He reigned from 714 to 757 B.C., and left an only daughter, who married Numa Martius, and became the mother of Ancus Martius, the fourth king of Rome.

NUMERIAN, MARCUS AURELIUS, a Roman emperor, who succeeded to the throne on the death of Carus, his father, A.D. 282; but was murdered by his father-in-law, after a reign of eight months. He displayed considerable talent both as a writer, and an orator.

NUNEZ, FERNAN DE GUZMAN, a knight and commander of the order of Santiago, in the 16th century; was born at Valladolid; studied at Bologna; and on his return home was appointed Greek professor at the university of Alcalá, by its founder, cardinal Ximenes, who also employed him on his celebrated Polyglott. He afterwards removed to Salamanca, where he was also appointed Greek professor; and died in 1533. His writings chiefly consist of Annotations on the works of Seneca, Pliny, and other classic authors.

NUVOLONE, CHARLES FRANCIS, a celebrated painter, born in 1608, at Milan, where his father was an eminent artist, and directed his studies with great success. He adopted Guido's style, and his Madonnas are highly valued. Died, 1651.—His brother, JOSEPH NUVOLONE, also executed several fine pictures, particularly one of St. Dominic, raising a dead man to life. He died, aged 84, in 1703.

NUZZI, MARIO, commonly called Mario da Fiori, a celebrated flower painter, was born in 1603, at Penos, in the kingdom of Naples. His pictures were highly esteemed, and he was chosen a member of the academy of St. Luke. Died, 1673.

NYE, PHILIP, an eminent nonconformist divine, was born, in Sussex, in 1596, and took his degrees in arts at Magdalen hall, Oxford. He became minister of St. Michael's church, Cornhill; but in 1633 he went to Holland, and remained there till the rebellion, when he obtained the living of Kimbolton, in Huntingdonshire. He was also one of the assembly of divines, and rector of St. Bartholomew behind the Exchange. In 1647 he was appointed one of the chaplains who attended the commissioners empowered to treat with Charles I. in the Isle of Wight; and he lost no opportunity of showing his enmity to the cause of royalty. His conduct, in fact, had been so violent, that he was not only deprived of his living at the Restoration, but an act was passed, restraining him from holding any office in future. Died, 1672.

NYERUP, ERASMUS, an eminent Danish author; librarian and professor of the history of literature to the university of Copenhagen. He wrote several works relating to the history and literary antiquities of Denmark; and died, aged 71, in 1829.

NYSTEN, PETER HUBERT, an eminent physiologist, and physician to the Foundling Hospital at Paris, was born at Leige, in 1771. He was the author of "Recherches de Physiologie et de Chimie Pathologique," and other medical works. Died, 1818.

OATES, TITUS, an infamous character, born about 1618, was the son of an Anabaptist preacher; received his education at Merchant Tailors' school, and at Cambridge; and afterwards entered into holy orders. In 1677 he pretended to be a convert to the Roman Catholic religion, and was admitted into the society of Jesuits; but subsequently declared himself a Protestant, and, in conjunction with one Dr. Tongue, gave information of a pretended popish plot, for the destruction of the Protestant faith; falsely accused several Catholic lords, and other persons of quality, of being concerned in it; and, having excited a popular ferment, brought lord Stafford, among other innocent individuals, to the scaffold. Such was the credulity of the times, that he was rewarded with a pension of 1200*l.* per annum, and lodged for safety at the palace of Whitehall. On the accession of James II., however, he was thrown into prison, and indicted for perjury; and, being convicted, was sentenced to stand in the pillory five times a-year during his life, and to be whipped from Aldgate to Newgate, and thence to Tyburn. Though the whipping was very severely inflicted, he recovered from its effects; and in the reign of William III. this execrable tool of faction obtained his liberty and a pension of 400*l.* a-year. He died in 1708.

O'BEIRNE, THOMAS LEWIS, a learned Irish private, was born in 1748, in the county of Longford, in Ireland; was educated at St. Omer's, for the priesthood, but renounced the creed in which he had been brought up, and at the commencement of the American war sailed with lord Howe as chaplain to the fleet. In 1782 he accompanied the duke of Portland to Ireland as private secretary, and obtained from his grace two valuable livings in Northumberland and Cumberland. The new lord-lieutenant, earl Fitzwilliam, to whom he was afterwards chaplain, promoted him to the see of Upper Ossory; and on the death of Dr. Maxwell, he was translated to that of Meath. He wrote several political pamphlets, sermons, and charges on various occasions; "The Generous Impostor," a comedy; and "The Crucifixion," a poem. Died, 1823.

OBBERKAMPF, C. P., born in 1736, died in 1818; founder of the great French manufacture of printed cottons at Jouy, and of cotton thread of Emone.

OBERLIN, JEREMIAH JAMES, a German antiquary and philologist, was born at Strasburg, in 1735. He began his career as teacher in the gymnasium of his native place; and after he had extended his knowledge and reputation by his travels, he was transferred to the university; in 1782 he obtained the chair of logic and metaphysics; to which, in 1787, was added the office of director of the gymnasium. The French revolution interrupted his learned labours; and in 1793 he was imprisoned at Metz, and treated with great cruelty; but at the termination of Robespierre's tyranny he was liberated, and resumed his literary occupations. He published valuable editions of Tacitus, Cæsar, Ovid, and Horace; and produced a number of works on archaeology, statistics, &c. Died, 1806.

OBRECHT, ULRIC, professor of history and rhetoric in the university of Strasburg, of which city he was a native; enjoyed such a vast reputation for the variety and extent of his learning, that he was termed the epitome of human science. He wrote many works; was also employed in state affairs; and died in 1701.

OBREGON - Y - CEVALLOS, a Spanish vice-admiral, born in 1751. In 1806, at Bayonne, he declared for Ferdinand; but subsequently he adhered to Joseph Napoleon, and quitted Spain with him when driven out by the English victories. He died, in France, in 1816.

OBSEQUENS, JULIUS, a Latin writer, who flourished about A.D. 393. He was the author of a treatise "De Prodigia."

OCARIZ, or OCARITZ, DON JOSEPH, chevalier d', a Spanish diplomatist, who distinguished himself by his attempts to prevent the execution of Louis XVI. In 1788 he was sent to Paris as consul-general; and in 1792 he held the post of chargé d'affaires. He addressed two letters to the National Convention, offering the mediation of his sovereign to engage Prussia and Austria to terminate the war with France, on condition of the suspension of judgment against the king. He afterwards occupied other diplomatic situations; and died on his way to Constantinople, in 1806.

OCCAM, or OCKHAM, WILLIAM, an English scholastic divine, of the 14th century, was a native of Ockham, in Surrey; studied at Merton college, Oxford, under the celebrated Duns Scotus; and obtained the name of "the invincible doctor." He wrote against pope John XXII., whom he treated as a heretic, and joined the anti-pope, Nicholas V., set up by the emperor of Bavaria. For this he was excommunicated; and he died in 1347.

OCELLUS LUCANUS, so called from being a native of Lucania, was a Pythagorean philosopher, and flourished A.C. 500. His treatise "On the Universe" is still extant.

OCHINUS, or OCHIN, BERNARDIN, an Italian monk, was born at Sienna, in 1487. His eloquence was so much admired, that pope Paul III. made him his confessor. Ochinus, however, on meeting with the works of Luther, turned protestant, and went first to Geneva, and next to England, where he obtained a prebend in Canterbury cathedral; but on the accession of Mary he retired to Strasburg, whence he removed to Zurich, and became minister of the Italian church; but was banished in 1603, for writing his dialogues in defence of polygamy. He then went to Moravia, where he joined the Socinians, but died of the plague the year following. His "Sermons," in Italian, 3 vols. 8vo., are scarce. He also wrote several controversial books.

OCHS, PIERRE, chevalier and grand tribune of the state of Basle, was born in 1749; and having finished his academical studies, was soon distinguished for his legal and political knowledge. In 1793 he was chosen by his fellow-citizens to negotiate with M. Barthelemy, agent of the French directory; and he at length became president of the assembly convened to organize a constitution for the state of Basle, under the influence of France. Being subsequently displaced, he went to Paris; and, after remaining there some years, was appointed by Buonaparte a member of the council of state, under the new Helvetic government, which subsisted till the return of the Bourbons, in 1814. He was the author of "Histoire de la Ville et du Pays du Basle," 5 vols.; "Projet de Constitution Helvétique;" and some dramatic pieces. Died, 1821.

OCHTERLONY, SIR DAVID, bart., of the East India company's service, was born at Boston, in New England, in 1758. At the age of eighteen he went to India as a cadet, and rose, by regular gradation, to the rank of major-general, in 1814. In the Nepaless war he distinguished himself by a series of skillful operations and brilliant successes, and was rewarded with the order of the Bath, the dignity of baronet, and a pension of 1000*l.* per annum. Died, 1825.

OCKLEY, SIMON, a learned divine, and eminent Orientalist, was born at Exeter, in 1678, and educated at Queen's college, Cambridge. In 1703 he was presented to the vicarage of Swavesey, in Cambridgeshire; in 1711 he was chosen professor of Arabic; and died in indigence, in 1720. His principal works are, "Introductio ad Linguas Orientales;" "The History of the present Jews throughout the World;" "The Improvement of Human Reason, or the Life of Hai Ebn Yok'dhan," translated from the Arabic; "Sermons;" a "Life of Mahomet," 2 vols.; and "The History of the Saracens," 2 vols. 8vo. which is by far the most important of all his works.

O'CONNOR, CHARLES, a learned catholic clergyman, who for many years was a resident in the family of the duke of Buckingham, at Stowe, as librarian to that nobleman. He was the author of "Columbanus's Letters," 2 vols.; a "Narrative of the most interesting Events in Modern Irish History;" and a collection of the ancient Irish chronicles; his studies having been chiefly directed to the elucidation of the history and antiquities of Ireland. He died in 1829, at Ballynagar, the seat of his brother, the O'Connor Don.

ODENATUS, SEPTIMIUS, an Arabian prince, the husband of queen Zenobia, and who reigned in Palmyra. He espoused the cause of the Romans in their contests with Persia; defeated Sapor; and was admitted by Gallienus to participate in the imperial authority. He was assassinated A.D. 267.

ODERIC OF PORTENAU, a celebrated traveller of the 14th century, who visited as a missionary many parts of Asia, then almost unknown, and returned to Europe, after an absence of sixteen years, about 1330.

ODERICO, GASPAR LOUIS, a learned antiquary and medalist, was born at Genoa, in 1735, and entered into the society of the Jesuits. His love, however, for coins, medals, and other relics of antiquity, prevailed over theological studies, and he was admitted a member of the Etruscan academy of Cortona, under the name of Theodemo Ostracino. On the suppression of the order, he was made conservator of the library of Genoa, and was subsequently chosen a member of the Institute. He published some valuable works on numismatics and ancient inscriptions; and died in 1803.

ODESCALCHI, MARC ANTONIO, an Italian of high rank, who devoted his time and fortune to acts of philanthropy. He was cousin to pope Innocent XI., who offered him many high dignities in the church, which he refused to accept, lest his episcopal obligations might interfere with his habits of active benevolence. Observing that though Rome contained several hospitals for the relief of the poor of different nations, there were many strangers who could find no asylum in any of them, but were obliged to take shelter in the porches of churches, the porticos of palaces, or the ancient ruins of the city, he converted his house into an hospital for the reception of these outcasts, without distinction. Here he fitted up one thousand beds, and employed a number of tailors constantly in making clothes for the objects of his bounty. If in his rides he chanced to observe a forlorn wanderer, he would stop, take him into his carriage, and convey him to his mansion. At his death, in 1670, he left all his property to the support of the hospital, of which his relation, the cardinal, became the patron, and greatly enlarged it by building an asylum for children.

ODESCALCHI, THOMAS, another member of the same family, who was almoner to pope Innocent XI. In imitation of the preceding, he gave himself up to works of charity. Perceiving that in the hospital of St. Gale there were a number of children, destitute of education, he conceived the idea of erecting an asylum for their reception; which he carried into execution, beginning with thirty-eight children, who were instructed, and brought up to industry. The number soon increased, through the liberality of pope Innocent, to seventy; and, in 1685, Thomas Odescalchi laid the foundation of a large hospital, for the education and employment of poor children in weaving cloth. This pious prelate died in 1691, and left considerable funds for the support of his institution, to which he gave the name of St. Michael de Ripgrande.

ODIER, LOUIS, an eminent Genevese physician, was born in 1740; studied at Edinburgh, Leyden, and Paris; and, returning to Geneva, commenced a course of lectures on chemistry. He practised medicine with great reputation in his native city; filled several public offices; distinguided himself by his successful endeavours to introduce vaccine inoculation on the continent; and was the author of a "Manual of Practical Medicine." Died, 1817.

ODDINGTON, WALTER, called Walter of Evesham, was a monk of that monastery in Worcestershire, and lived in the reign of Henry VIII. He was an astronomer, mathematician, and musician; on each of which subjects he wrote treatises. "De Motibus Planetarum et de Mutatione Aeris" is attributed to him; and, Dr. Burney observes of his treatise, entitled, "Of the Speculation of Music," which is preserved in the library of Bene't college, Cambridge, "that if all other musical tracts, from the time of Boethius to Franco and John Cotton were lost, with this MS. our knowledge would not be much diminished."

ODO, St., a celebrated abbot of Clugni, in France, was born at Tours, in 879, and died about 943. He introduced the most rigorous discipline into his order; obtained a high reputation for sanctity and wisdom; and wrote several books, full of superstitious notions and legendary tales.—Another of this name, called ODO or KENT, was a Benedictine monk, who became abbot of Battle, and died in 1000.

ECOLAMPADIUS, JOHN, an eminent reformer, was born in Franconia, in 1462. He studied at Heidelberg, after which he became tutor to the son of the elector palatine, and was presented to a benefice. In 1520 he entered into a monastery, but on reading the books of Luther, he quitted his cell, and went to Basil, where he was made professor of divinity. He embraced the doctrine of Zuinglius on the sacrament, but conducted himself with great moderation. In 1528 he married the widow of Cellarius. His works evince considerable learning, and he appears to have been held in great estimation even by his opponents. He died of the plague in 1531.

OCUMENIUS, an ancient Greek commentator upon the Scriptures, was bishop of Trica, in Thessaly, in the 10th century.

OEDER, GEORGE CHRISTIAN, an eminent physician and botanist, was born at Anspach, in 1728. He studied at Gottingen, under Haller, by whose interest he became professor of botany at Copenhagen; but on account of his intimacy with the unfortunate Struensee, he was obliged to retire to Oldenburgh, where he died in 1791. His works are, "Flora Danica," 3 vols. fol.; "Elementa Botanica;" "Nomenclator Botanica;" and "Enumeratio Plantarum Flora Danicae."

OELRICHS, JOHN CHARLES CONRAD, a German historian and bibliographer, was born at Berlin, in 1722; became professor of history and civil law at the academy of Stettin; published many valuable works in Latin and German; obtained the post of counsellor of legation, and resident of the duke of Deux Ponts, at the court of Berlin, in 1784; and died in 1798.

OFFA, king of Mercia, succeeded Ethelbald in 755. He murdered Ethelbert, king of the East Angles, and took possession of his kingdom. Died, 794.

ODGEN, SAMUEL, an eminent divine, was born at Manchester, in 1716, and educated at the grammar-school there, from which he was removed to King's college, Cambridge, and next to St. John's, where he obtained a fellowship. In 1744 he became master of the school at Halifax; but resigned that situation in 1753, and, returning to Cambridge, took his degree of D.D., and was presented to the vicarage of Damerham, in Wiltshire. In 1764 he was appointed Woodwardian professor, and in 1766 obtained the rectories of Lawford, in Essex, and Stansfeld, in Suffolk. He published two volumes of sermons, which, from their pithy and animated character, obtained considerable celebrity. Died, 1778.

OGE, a creole of St. Domingo, who, at the commencement of the French revolution, having occasion to visit Paris on mercantile affairs, was there admitted into the society of Amis des Noirs, or Friends of the Negroes, and warmly solicited, though ineffectually, the National Assembly to grant to men of colour the rights of equality. Returning to his native island in 1790, with a determination to effect by force what was denied to his solicitations, he issued a proclamation, inviting all the people of colour, as well as the negro slaves, to join him. At first the insurgents demanded nothing but what was just—freedom and political equality; but their cause was soon disgraced by crimes of the most atrocious description. These, however, were not attributable so much to Oge, as to his lieutenant, Chavannes, a sanguinary wretch, who delighted in deeds of violence. At length they were overpowered by the regular troops sent against them; and Oge and Chavannes were condemned to be broken on the wheel. When the former heard his doom, he took a quantity of black seeds in the hollow of his hand, and covered them with a small quantity which were white; he then shook them together, and the former remaining uppermost, he exclaimed to his judges, "Where are the whites!"—an impressive allegory, which was fatally verified in the subsequent revolution in that colony.

OGILBY, JOHN, a multifarious writer, was born at Edinburgh, in 1600. He became a teacher of dancing, in the practice of which he contracted a lameness, but still continued to give instruction in families. On going to Ireland with the earl of Strafford, he was made deputy master of the revels in that kingdom, and he also built a theatre at Dublin; but in the rebellion, he lost all his property. After suffering great vicissitudes, he returned to England, and settled at Cambridge, where he published a translation of Virgil. At the age of fifty-four he learnt Greek, and gave a specimen of his proficiency in the translation of the Iliad, published in 1650, which was followed by the Odyssey in 1653. While at Cambridge, he edited a superb impression of the Bible, for which he was remunerated by the House of Lords; and in 1651, he was appointed to conduct the poetical part of the coronation pageantry. He was also restored to his place of master of the revels in Ireland, where he again built a theatre. In London, after the great fire, he erected a printing-office, and was appointed king's cosmographer; in which capacity he published several volumes of a large Atlas, and an account of the great and cross-roads of the kingdom, from his own actual survey. Died, 1676.

OGILVIE, JOHN, an able and pious Scotch divine and poet, was born in 1733; received his education at the university of Aberdeen; was for more than half a century minister of Midmar, in Aberdeenshire; and died in 1814. Among his works are, "Britannia," an epic poem; "Philosophical and Critical Observations on Composition;" "An Examination of the Evidence of Prophecy;" and "Sermons."

OGLETHORPE, JAMES EDWARD, an English general, was the son of Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, of Godalming, Surrey, and born in London, in 1698. He served under prince Eugene, and, in 1733, distinguished himself by his exertions to found the colony of Georgia, for which he obtained the royal charter. In 1745 he was promoted to the rank of major-general, and was sent against the rebels, but did not overtake them, for which he was brought to a court-martial, and honourably acquitted. He died in 1785, at the advanced age of 97, being the oldest general in the service. The private character of Oglethorpe was extremely amiable, and he has been eulogized by Thomson, Pope, and Johnson.

O'HARA, KANE, an Irish dramatist, who had much musical taste, and a happy talent of adapting verses to old airs. His chief productions are, "Midas," which was extremely well received, and is still a favourite; "The Golden Pippin;" "The Two Misers;" "April Day;" and "Tom Thumb." Died, 1782.

OKOLSKI, SIMON, a native of Russia, who was provincial of the Dominicans in Poland in 1649. He published a curious and rare work entitled "Orbis Polonus," 3 vols. folio; also "Preco divini verbis Albertus Episcopus Ratisbonensis."

OLAFSEN, ROBERT, a learned Icelandic, who studied at Copenhagen, after which he returned to his native island, which he travelled over repeatedly in company with his fellow-student Blarne Paulsen. The result of their observations was printed at Copenhagen in 2 vols. 4to. 1772. Olafsen was then appointed a magistrate in Iceland, where he devoted much of his time to natural history and poetry; but about four years before his death, he applied almost wholly to the study of the Scriptures. He was drowned with his wife in crossing the Breidafjord in 1776.

OLAHUS, NICHOLAS, archbishop of Strigonia, in Hungary, and chancellor of that kingdom, was born at Hermenstadt, in 1493, and died in 1568. He was a liberal prelate, and published a "Chronicle of his own Times;" a "History of Attila;" and a "Description of Hungary."

OLAVIDES, PAUL ANTHONY JOSEPH, count de, was born in 1725, at Lima, in Peru, but was educated at Madrid. Charles III. created him a count, and appointed him lieutenant of the province of Andalusia. He undertook the great work of fertilizing the Sierra Morena, or the Black Mountain; and by his perseverance, and the colonies of Germans he brought thither, it became the seat of agricultural and commercial industry. Notwithstanding the benefits which this worthy man had thus rendered his country, he fell into disgrace, was charged with heresy, tried by the merciless tribunal of the Inquisition, and condemned to eight years' imprisonment in a monastery, and to be incapable of all public employment ever after. He contrived to escape from the convent, and took refuge in France, whither monastic hate pursued him, and he was forced to seek an asylum at Geneva. After the death of Charles III. he was permitted to return to France. He resided there at the Revolution; and under the reign of terror he was imprisoned at Orleans, but was released after the fall of Robespierre. He employed the period of his confinement, and his subsequent leisure, in writing an excellent work, entitled "The Triumph of the Gospel;" and the zealots who had persecuted the author assuming the merit of having converted him, obtained his recall to Spain, and he retired to his estates in Andalusia, where he died in 1803.

OLDCASTLE, SIR JOHN, lord Cobham, the first martyr among our nobility, was born in the reign of Edward III. He was an adherent of Wickliffe, whose doctrines he propagated with such zeal, that in the reign of Henry V. he was sent to the Tower, whence he made his escape into Wales. A report was then circulated by the clergy, and sent to the king, that 20,000 Lollards were assembled in St. Giles's for his destruction, with lord Cobham at their head; upon which, a bill of attainder was passed against him, and he was burnt alive in St. Giles's fields, in 1417. He was a man of high spirit and extensive acquirements; and was the author of "Twelve Conclusions, addressed to the Parliament of England."

OLDFIELD, ANN, a celebrated English actress, was born in London, in 1683. Sir John Vanburgh recommended her to Mr. Rich, patentee of the king's theatre, by whom she was engaged. Her great excellence lay in comedy, though she often appeared with great effect in tragic parts; and having the advantages of a good figure and a fine voice, she soon became a general favourite. She was at first the mistress of Mr. Arthur Maynwaring, and after his death of general Churchill; yet she was much esteemed in private life. She died in 1730, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

OLDHAM, JOHN, an English poet, was born at Shipton, in Gloucestershire, in 1653. He was appointed tutor to the grandsons of Sir Edmund Thurland, and afterwards to a son of Sir William Hicks. He next resided with the earl of Kingston, and died of the small pox in 1683. His poems were published in 4 vols., and there is much force and spirit in many of them, though they partake largely of the licentious sentiments which disgraced the age in which he lived.

OLDSWORTH, WILLIAM, an English writer, who was one of the original authors of a periodical paper called the "Examiner." He also published a volume, called "State Tracts;" and another, entitled OLDYS, WILLIAM, an antiquary and miscellaneous writer, the natural son of Dr. Oldys, a civilian, was born in 1696; became librarian to lord Oxford, and was employed in the selection of the "Harleian Miscellany;" was appointed Norroy king at arms; and died in 1761. He was the author of many works, of which the following are the principal: "The Life of Sir Walter Raleigh;" "The British Librarian;" "The Scarborough Miscellany;" "The Universal Spectator;" besides several lives in the "Biographia Britannica," "General Dictionary," &c.

OLEARIUS, or GELSCHLAGER, ADAM, an eminent traveller, was born in 1599, at Aschersleben, in Anhalt. He received his education at Leipsic; after which he became secretary to an embassy sent to Russia and Persia, by the duke of Holstein. On his return the prince made him his librarian and keeper of his museum. He was an able mathematician; wrote an account of his "Travels;" a "Chronicle of Holstein;" and other works. Died, 1671.

OLEARIUS, GODFREY, a learned divine, was born at Leipsic, in 1672. After studying in his own country and Holland, he visited Oxford; and on his return home was appointed professor of Greek. In 1708 he succeeded to the chair of divinity; and died in 1715. He wrote several works, historical and theological.

O'LEARY, ARTHUR, a Roman Catholic divine, was born at Cork, and educated at St. Maloes, where he became a Franciscan. On his return to his native place he distinguished himself by persuading his brethren to take the oath of allegiance; for which, and his other exertions in the cause of loyalty, he obtained a pension, and won the esteem of moderate men of all parties. He afterwards settled in London, and officiated as principal minister in the Roman Catholic chapel in Soho-square. He died in 1802. His addresses to the Catholics of Ireland, and other tracts, were collected into one volume, 8vo.; besides which he published "A Defence of his Conduct and Writings," in reply to the bishop of Cloyne. O'Leary was an acute and spirited writer, and was remarkable for his powers of wit and humour.

OLIVA, ALEXANDER, a celebrated Italian cardinal, was born at Sassoterrato, in 1408. He became a monk of the order of St. Augustine, of which he rose to be general; and in 1460 he was created a cardinal. He died in 1463. His principal works are, "De Cona cum Apostolis Facta;" "De Elegantes," OLIVA, JOHN, an eminent antiquary, was born in 1689, at Rovigo, in the state of Venice. He became, successively, professor of ethics at Azzolo; secretary to the conclave at Rome; and librarian to cardinal de Rohan, at Paris; where he died in 1757. He published a treatise "On the Study of Medals;" and another "On the Progress and Decay of Learning among the Romans;" besides a dissertation, entitled "De Antiqua in Romanis Scholis Grammaticorum Disciplina," &c.

OLIVAREZ, GASPARD GUZMAN, count d'uke d', an eminent Spanish statesman, was born at Rome, where his father had been sent on an embassy to pope Sixtus V. When Philip IV. succeeded to the crown, the management of public affairs was intrusted wholly to Olivarez, and he enjoyed, during a period of twenty-two years, almost unbounded authority. The domestic regulations of the kingdom he conducted with much success; but in foreign affairs he was constantly thwarted by the bolder genius of the French minister Richelieu, and had the mortification to witness the dismemberment of Portugal from the crown of Spain, and the loss of Brazil and other foreign colonies, which fell into the hands of the Dutch. In consequence of these misfortunes the king was reluctantly forced to dismiss him in 1643, when he was succeeded by his nephew Don Louis de Haro.

OLIVER OF MALMESBURY, a Benedictine monk of the 11th century, chiefly memorable as the first Englishman who attempted to travel through the aerial regions. He is said to have been well skilled in mechanics; but in attempting to fly from a lofty tower, with wings of his own construction, fastened to his hands and feet, he fell, and broke both his legs.

OLIVER, ISAAC, an English painter, was born in 1556. His miniatures were painted in a style of exquisite beauty, and he also executed some good historical pictures. Died, 1617.—His son, PETER OLIVER, who died about 1654, was also an admirable artist in the same line, and much employed by Charles I.

OLIVET, JOSEPH THOUILLER D', a learned critic, was born at Salins, in France, in 1682. He entered into the society of Jesuits, but left them to lead a retired life at Paris, where he was admitted a member of the academy, whose history he continued, in 3 vols. His greatest work, however, is his edition of Cicero, in 9 vols. 4to. or 10 vols. 8vo. The abbé Olivet also published translations from Cicero and Demosthenes, executed in a spirited and elegant manner. Died, 1768.

O'KEEFE, JOHN, a celebrated dramatist, was born at Dublin, in 1748, and was originally intended for the profession of a painter; but his taste for theatrical amusements interfered with his studies, and he soon forsook the easel for the sock and buskin. Having been introduced to Mr. Mossop, he obtained an engagement at the Dublin theatre; and he continued to perform in that city, and in the towns to which the company made summer excursions, for twelve years, as a comedian, with considerable success. His ambition to figure as an author was coeval with his theatrical taste; for, at the age of fifteen, he attempted a comedy in five acts. Among his early productions which attracted notice, was a kind of histrionic monologue, called "Tony Lumpkin's Rambles through Dublin," which afforded him abundant scope for the exhibition of broad humour, and was received with applause, not only in Dublin, but at the Haymarket theatre, London. He at length left Ireland, about 1780, with the view of obtaining an engagement in London; but, as he did not see ceed in his endeavour, he applied himself with great assiduity to dramatic composition; and between 1781 and 1798 he produced nearly fifty comedies, comic operas, and farces. Many of these acquired a flattering popularity, and some still keep possession of the stage; among which are, "Wild Oats," the "Castle of Andalusia," the "Agreeable Surprise," the "Poor Soldier," "Peeping Tom," the "Young Quaker," &c. In 1800, O'Keefe, who was then blind, and had been reduced by misfortunes to a state of great embarrassment, had a benefit at Covent-garden theatre, when, between the acts of his comedy of "The Lie of the Day," which was performed on that occasion, he was led on the stage to deliver a poetical address of his own composition, in which humour and pathos were very happily blended. He subsequently published his "Recollections, or Biographical Memoirs;" and died, at Southampton, in his 86th year, in 1833.

OLIVEIRA, FRANCIS XAVIER DE, a Portuguese knight, and gentleman of the household to the king, was born at Lisbon, in 1702. On going to Vienna, as secretary to the embassy, he became a convert to the protestant faith; to profess which he came to England in 1746. He published "Memoirs of his Travels," "Familiar Letters," "A Pathetic Discourse to his Countrymen, on the Earthquake at Lisbon in 1755;" "The Chevalier d'Oliveira burnt in Effigy as an Heretic, why and wherefore?" &c.; and he left at his death, which happened at Hackney, in 1783, a great number of MSS. including "Oliveiriana, or Memoirs, historical and literary," 27 vols. 4to.

OLIVETAN, ROBERT, a French reformer, who was the first that translated the Scriptures into French immediately from the Hebrew and Greek. Some writers, however, allege, that he made his version from that of St. Jerome; while others assert, that Calvin, who was related to Olivetan, polished and revised the whole work, which was printed at Neuchâtel in 1535, but is now exceedingly rare. It is called the Bible of the Sword, on account of that emblem being adopted by the printer. Olivetan being banished from Geneva, went to Rome, where he died, as is supposed from poison, in 1539.

OLIVIER, GUILLAUME ANTOINE, an eminent French naturalist and traveller, was born in 1736, at Fréjus. He made botany and entomology his especial study; went on a scientific mission to Persia in 1793; returned with a valuable collection after an absence of six years; and died in 1814. He published the result of his researches in the East, under the title of "Voyage dans l'Empire Ottoman, l'Egypte, et la Perse," 3 vols. 4to. with an atlas and plates; also, a "Natural History of Coleopterous Insects;" &c.

OLIVIERI, ANNIBAL, a learned Italian antiquary, born at Pesaro, in 1708; author of "Marmora Pesarienti a Notis illustrata," 3 vols.; "Memoirs of the ancient Port of Pesaro;" and "Memoirs of the Chevalier Passeri." He was honorary chamberlain to pope Clement XIII., and perpetual secretary of the academy of Pesaro.

OLYMPIODORUS, an Alexandrian philosopher of the fifth century, celebrated for his knowledge of the Aristotelian doctrine. — Another OLYMPIODORUS, was a Platonist, who wrote a "Life" of, and "Commentary" on, Plato. — A third, who flourished in a later age, was a peripatetic, who wrote "A Commentary on the Meteorology of Aristotle."

OLYMPIAS, wife of Philip, king of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of Neoptolemus, king of Epirus. Her haughtiness, and, more probably, her infidelity, induced Philip to repudiate her; and as Philip's murder soon followed this disgrace, some have attributed it to her intrigues. Antipater, the successor of Alexander on the Macedonian throne, left the administration of the country to Polyperchon, who, to confirm his power, recalled Olympias from Epirus, whither she had fled, and confided to her the guardianship of the young son of Alexander. She now cruelly put to death Arrideus, son of Philip, with his wife Eurydice, as also Nicano, the brother of Cassander, with one hundred leading men of Macedonia, who were inimical to her interest. But such barbarities did not long remain unpunished. Cassander besieged her in Pydna, where she had retired with her family; and being obliged to surrender, after an obstinate siege, she was put to death.

OMAR I., caliph of the Saracens, was the successor of Abubeker, and father-in-law of Mahomet. He began his reign A.D. 634, and is conspicuous among the conquerors who have desolated the face of the earth. His generals, Kaled and Abu Obekdah, drove the Greeks out of Syria and Phœnicia, and the caliph himself took possession of Jerusalem in 636, which city remained in the hands of the infidels till it was reconquered by Godfrey of Bouillon, at the end of the 11th century. Amr, one of his generals, defeated the troops of Heraclius, near Antioch, in 638; Memphis and Alexandria surrendered; all Egypt, and a part of Libya, were conquered from the Romans; and the famous library, which had been founded at Alexandria by Ptolemy Philadelphus, was burnt by the express orders of Omar. Having fixed his residence at Jerusalem, he was there assassinated by a Persian slave, in the tenth year of his government, A.D. 643. He refused to appoint a successor, and thus the caliphate became elective.

OMAR, called likewise EBN PHARED, a poet, was born in Egypt. The Arabs hold him in high estimation, and many of their most learned men have written commentaries on his works, the principal of which is entitled "Spiritual Wine, and Divine Love."

O'MEARA, BARRY EDWARD, the confidential medical attendant of the emperor Napoleon in his last days, and author of "A Voice from St. Helena," was a native of Ireland, and born about 1778. He was originally a surgeon in the British navy, and was on board the Bellerophon in that capacity, on the 7th of August, 1815, when Napoleon went on board. Napoleon having observed Dr. O'Meara's skill in attend-ling to some of the crew, and his knowledge of Italian, made overtures to him, on being transferred to the Northumberland, to accompany him to St. Helena, as his surgeon, his own not being able to go with him. Having obtained admiral Keith's permission, Dr. O'Meara assented, and remained with the ex-emperor till July, 1818, when he was recalled, and deprived of his rank. He was latterly an active partisan of O'Connell's, at one of whose agitation meetings he is said to have caught the illness, which terminated fatally, June 3, 1836. In the following month a sale of his effects took place; and it is surprising what competition there was for such articles as had been the property of the French emperor. A few lines in his hand-writing sold for 11 guineas; a lock of his hair, 9l. 10s.; one of his teeth, 7 guineas and a half; and the instrument used by O'Meara in extracting it, 3 guineas!

O'MEARA, THEODOSIA BEAUCHAMP, wife of the preceding Barry O'Meara, but who styled herself Lady Leigh, died in 1830. She was the widow of captain John Donellan, who was hung at Warwick, in 1781, for poisoning Sir Theodosius Boughton; she next married Sir Egerton Leigh, bart., and at his death, in 1815, she gave her hand to the author of "A Voice from St. Helena."

OPIE, JOHN, an eminent historical painter, was born, in 1761, at St. Agnes, near Truro, in Cornwall. At the age of twelve he was considered a phenomenon of learning; he had mastered Euclid, and commenced teacher to the peasants in that immediate neighbourhood. His father, who was a carpenter, saw his dwelling-house hung with likenesses and sketches of landscapes, with anger, at what he thought a mere idle propensity; but his uncle witnessed these efforts of early genius with pleasure. His talents at length attracted the notice of Dr. Wolcot, the satirist, whose instructions greatly served him. He commenced as a portrait-painter, and visited the neighbouring towns in quest of employment; and on one of these occasions he returned home well-dressed, with twenty guineas in his pocket. This money he gave to his mother, of whom he was excessively fond, and told her that in future he should maintain himself. He accordingly removed to London, and was introduced to Sir J. Reynolds. Wolcot was impatient to see his progress; and as his fame had preceded him, the London connoisseurs were all eager to behold the Cornish wonder. He was then twenty years of age; people of distinction crowded his door; and it became the fashion to sit to him; but as the novelty wore off, so did the fashion; and, by the time he was forty, though he gradually improved, he was comparatively deserted. The first specimen he gave of his literary ability was in a life of Sir Joshua Reynolds, in Dr. Wolcot's edition of Pilkington's Dictionary. He then published "An Enquiry into the requisite Cultivation of the Arts of Design in England;" and he delivered lectures at the Royal Institution. On Fuseli's death, he was appointed to succeed him as professor of painting to the Royal Academy. He died in 1807, and was interred near Sir

Joshua Reynolds, in St. Paul's cathedral.—His wife, AMELIA OPIE, born in 1771, at Harwich, was highly distinguished for her literary abilities, and was the author of "A Life of Opie;" "Adeline Mowbray;" "Simple Tales;" "The Eve of St. Valentine," &c.

OPITS, or OPITIOS, MARTIN, a German poet, was born at Bunzlau, in Silesia, in 1597. He became schoolmaster at Weissenberg, and afterwards secretary to a nobleman, at whose expense he travelled to Paris, where he formed an acquaintance with Grotius. He is called the father of German poetry. Died, 1680.

OPORINUS, JOHN, a printer, was born at Haul, in 1507; and having received a learned education at Strassburgh, was appointed master of the school in the abbey of St. Urban, in Lucerne. Returning to his native place, he applied to the study of medicine, but soon quitted that profession, and became a printer, in partnership with Robert Winter. He wrote notes on Cicero and Demosthenes; and published an edition of the Bucolic poets. Died, 1568.

OPPIAN, a Greek poet, who lived under Caracalla, in the beginning of the third century, wrote poems distinguished for elegance and sublimity, two only of which are now extant, his "Halieuticon," or five books on fishing, and four books on hunting, entitled "Cynageticon." He died in his thirtieth year, A.D. 213.

ORD, CRAVEN, F.R.S. and F.S.A., was born in 1756; was for many years an active and useful member of the Antiquarian Society; and contributed a variety of papers to the Archaeologia. He also furnished important assistance to Gough for his Sepulchral Monuments; and to Mr. John Nichols and Mr. W. Bray, for their respective histories of Leicestershire and Surrey. He held a situation in the King's Remembrancer's Office; and died in 1822.

O'REILLY, ALEXANDER, a native of Ireland, who entered into the Spanish army, where he obtained the favour of Charles III., and was raised to the highest military rank for his eminent services. Born, 1735; died, 1794.

O'REILLY, ANDREW, count, a general of cavalry in the Austrian service, was a native of Ireland. He was a brave and skilful officer, and had filled in succession all the military grades in the Austrian army, with the exception of that of field-marshal. At the battle of Austerlitz, so fatal to their cause, the remnant of the army was preserved from destruction by his courage and skill; and when, in 1806, he held the post of governor of Vienna, the difficult task of making an honourable capitulation with the French emperor devolved on him. He died in the 91st year of his age.

OREILANA, FRANCIS, a Spanish officer, who is regarded as the discoverer of the river Amazons, in South America. At least, he was the first European that navigated that mighty stream, and it still bears his name. Died, 1549.

ORGAGNA, ANDREW, an Italian painter, was born, at Florence, in 1599. He was also a sculptor and architect. In a picture of the Last Day, he represented his friends in paradise, and his enemies in hell. Died, 1389.

ORIGEN, a father of the church, and one of the most learned ecclesiastical writers, was born at Alexandria, A.D. 183, of Christian parents, who early instructed him in religious knowledge and in the sciences. At the age of seventeen he lost his father, who was beheaded for his profession of Christianity. Origen had now recourse to the teaching of grammar for the support of himself, his mother, and brethren; but this occupation he relinquished, on being appointed professor of sacred learning in the church of Alexandria. In this situation he distinguished himself by the austerity of his life; and taking the Scripture in the most rigid sense, he carried it so far as to put in practice the passage of the gospel, "There be some who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven." From Alexandria he went to Rome, where he began his famous "Hexapla," or the Bible in different languages. At the command of his bishop he returned to Alexandria, and was ordained. Soon after this he began his "Commentaries on the Scriptures;" but Demetrius, who envied his reputation, persecuted him with violence, and in a council assembled in 231, it was decreed that Origen should desist from preaching, and quit the city. On this he went to Caesarea, where he was well received by the bishop, and permitted to preach. He was consulted in several episcopal synods; but in the persecution under Decius he was thrown into prison, and put to the torture. On his release he applied himself to his ministerial labours, and to writing. He died in 254. In his Commentaries he indulged too much the fancy for allegory; and in his other works he advanced notions more agreeable to the Platonic philosophy than the Scriptures. The most offensive of his doctrines related to the pre-existence of souls, and the finite duration of future punishment.

ORIGNY, PIERRE ADAM DE, a learned writer on classical antiquities, was a native of Rheims, and died there in 1774.

ORLANDI, PIERREGRINE ANTHONY, a learned bibliographer and writer on the history of the arts, was professor of theology at Bologna, where he died in 1730.

ORLEANS, CHARLES, duke of, was made prisoner at the battle of Agincourt, in 1415. He remained in England twenty-five years; and on his return to France he undertook the conquest of the duchy of Milan, to which he conceived himself entitled in right of his mother. He was not, however, successful in this enterprise; and died in 1465.

ORLEANS, LOUIS, duke of, was the son of Philip the regent of France, and born at Versailles, in 1703. In study, devotion, and acts of charity, he spent his life. In 1733 he saved numbers from perishing by famine in the Orleannois; as he again did throughout France, in the dearth of 1740. He also extended his benevolence to distant countries; while in his own he founded schools, professorships, hospitals, and colleges. But his charitable occupations did not draw him aside from his studies, which he pursued with such diligence as to become master of the oriental languages, and most of the sciences. He died in 1752, leaving many works in manuscript, the chief of which were "Commentaries on the Scriptures."

ORLEANS, LOUIS JOSEPH PHILIP, duke of, (better known by his republican appellation of Egalité) was the brother of Louis XVI., and father of Louis Philip, the present king of the French. He was born at St. Cloud, in 1747; married the daughter of the duke of Penthièvre, grand admiral of France, in 1769; was from his youth guilty of the most unbridled licentiousness; and acquired a base notoriety by his conduct during the French revolution. After the death of his father, in 1797, he became possessed of the hereditary title and estates; and, having indulged to satiety in all sensual pleasures, he found a new kind of excitement for his palied appetites in the storms of the revolution, and a new source of pleasure in the gratifications of revenge. He had entered the navy, and was entitled by his birth to the place of grand-admiral; but having been accused of cowardice while in command of a division of the fleet against Keppel, in the action off Ushant, in 1778, instead of receiving promotion in the navy, the post of colonel-general of the hussars was created and bestowed on him. From this time may be dated his hatred of Louis XVI.; and he subsequently adopted every method to obtain popularity, with a view to political power. In the disputes between the court and the parliaments, he constantly opposed the royal authority. His object evidently was to reduce the king to a state of tutelage, and procure for himself the formidable office of lieutenant-general of the kingdom. He caused scandalous libels against the queen, whom he pursued with the most bitter hatred, to be distributed; and his bust was carried in triumph through the streets by the populace. He was chosen a member of the National Convention, with Marat, Danton, and Robespierre, in September, 1792, at which time the commune of Paris authorised him to adopt for himself and his descendants the appellation of Egalité, instead of the name and titles of his family; and he not only voted for the death of the king, but was present at his execution. But he was not qualified to profit by the commotions he had promoted; he was as weak as he was wicked; as indecisive as he was ambitious. The Jacobins had no longer any occasion for him; he was struck from their rolls, and included in the general proscription of the Bourbons; and was committed to prison at Marseilles, with other members of the family. Being brought before the criminal tribunal of the department, he was declared innocent of the charges of conspiracy that were preferred against him; but the committee of public safety forbade his liberation, and after six months' detention, he was transferred to Paris, tried, and condemned to suffer by the guillotine; to which he submitted with firmness and courage, on the same day, Nov. 6, 1793. His widow returned to Paris after the restoration, and died there in 1821.

ORLEANS, PETER JOSEPH, a Jesuit, was born at Bourges, in 1641. He was professor of the belles lettres in his society, and died at Paris, in 1698. He wrote a "History of the Revolutions of England," 3 vols.; a "History of the Revolutions of Portugal," 5 vols.; "History of the two Tartar Conquerors, Chinghi and Canbi;" "Lives of Lewis de Gouza, and other Jesuits," &c.

ORLOFF, GREGORY, a favourite of Catharine II. of Russia. He had a principal share in the revolution that placed his mistress on the throne of Russia; after which he was made grand master of the artillery, and raised to the first dignities in the state, and was allowed to wear the picture of the empress in his button-hole. His ambition prompted him to aim at sharing the throne with the empress, who would have submitted to a private marriage. This he imprudently refused to accept, and he was supplanted by a new favourite. He was then ordered to travel, but was gratified with magnificent presents, and received the title of prince of the German empire, which Catharine procured for him. Died, 1783.

ORLOFF, ALEXIS, brother of the preceding, was remarkable for his gigantic stature and Herculean strength. He was one of the chief instruments in effecting the revolution that ended in the murder of Peter III., and is said to have been the person who strangled him in prison. He rose to high dignities in the army; and, in 1766, was made admiral of the Russian fleet in the Archipelago, with unlimited power, against the Turks, whom he defeated off Tchesme; for which exploit he was called Tschemenskoi. On the accession of Paul I. he was disgraced, and banished from Russia; but after the death of that emperor, he returned to Moscow, and died there in 1808.

ORLOFF, GREGORY VLADIMIROVITZ, a Russian nobleman, distinguished by his attachment to literature and the sciences, was born in 1777, and died in 1826. His chief works are, "Memoires Historique, Politiques et Littéraires sur le Royaume de Naples," 5 vols.; and "Histoire des Arts en Italie."

ORME, ROBERT, an historian, was born in 1728, at Anjengo, in the East Indies, where his father was a physician in the Company's service. He was educated at Harrow; obtained a civil appointment in India; became a member of the council at Fort St. George, and was a commissary and accountant-general. In 1758 he returned to England, and employed himself in writing "The History of the Military Transactions of the British Nation in Hindostan," the first volume of which was published in 1763, and the second in 1778. The author compiled also a work, entitled "Historical Fragments of the Mogul Empire of the Mahrattas," &c. Died, 1801.

ORMOND, JAMES BUTLER, duke of, an eminent statesman, was born in 1610, in London, and succeeded to the earldom of Ormond in 1632. During the wars between Charles I. and the parliament he strenuously laboured, though with very inadequate force, to uphold the king's authority in Ireland; and on the ruin of the royal cause, he retired to the continent, and exerted himself to promote the re-establishment of monarchy in England. After the restoration of Charles II. he was created a duke, and was twice appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland. In 1670 he narrowly escaped with his life from a plot formed against him by the desperado colonel Blood. Died, 1688.

OROBIO, BALTHASAR, a Spanish Jew, who became professor of metaphysics at Salamanca, and afterwards a physician at Seville, where his family were nominally Christians. Orobio at last fell under the suspicion of the holy office, and was tortured and imprisoned. At the expiration of three years he obtained his release, and then went to Toulouse; from which place he removed to Amsterdam, where he made an open profession of Judaism, submitted to the rite of circumcision, took the name of Isaac, and practised as a physician. He wrote a book against Spinoza, entitled "Certamen Philosophicum." Limborch had a conference with him on the subject of the Christian religion, of which he published a celebrated book, entitled "Amica Collatio cum erudito Judeo."

ORSATO, SEXTONIO, an Italian writer, was born at Padua, in 1617. He wrote several volumes of lyric poetry in Italian; the "History of Padua," and some works on antiquarian subjects. Died, 1678.

ORTON, JOE, an eminent dissenting minister, was born at Shrewsbury, in 1717. He was the author of a "Life of Dr. Doddridge;" "Sacramental Meditations;" "Discourses on Christian Worship;" "Discourses on Practical Subjects," &c. After his death, which happened in 1783, was printed his "Practical Exposition of the Old Testament," 6 vols. 8vo.

OSBORNE, FRANCIS, an English gentleman, was born in Bedfordshire, about 1588. He became master of the horse to the earl of Pembroke, and in the civil wars he joined the parliament. Mr. Osborne wrote, "Advice to a Son," and "Letters and Poems," 2 vols.; "Historical Memoirs on the Reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James;" "Plea for a free State compared with Monarchy," &c. Died, 1658.

ORTE, VISCOUNT D', whose name deserves to be recorded as an instance of mainly integrity and true honour, was governor of Bayonne, at the time of the infamous massacre of St. Bartholomew. Having received an order from Charles IX. to put to death all the Protestants in his government, he replied in the following words, "Sire, I have communicated your majesty's letter to the garrison and inhabitants of this city. I have found only brave soldiers and good citizens, and not a single executioner."

ORTELL, or ORTELIUS, ABRAHAM, a learned geographer, born at Antwerp, in 1527. After travelling on the continent and in Great Britain, he published an Atlas, which gained for him the appointment of geographer to Philip II. of Spain. His principal works are, "Thesaurus Geographicus," and "Theatri Orbis Terrarum." Died, 1606.

ORVILLE, JAMES PHILIP D', an eminent writer on classical literature, was born at Amsterdam, in 1696. He travelled in England, Italy, France, and Germany, visiting every where the public libraries, and forming an acquaintance with the most celebrated classical scholars of the age. He occupied the chair of history, rhetoric, and Greek literature at Amsterdam, from 1730 to 1742; published several critical works; and died in 1751.

OSIANDER, ANDREW, a celebrated German protestant theologian, was born at Guntzenhausen, in Franconia, in 1498. He early adopted the opinions of Luther, and took an active part in forming the Confession of Augsburg; became minister and professor at Königsberg, in Prussia; and died in 1552. He was the author of "Harmonia Evangelice."—There were several others of this family, all Protestant divines, and similarly distinguished.

OSMAN BEY, NEMSEY, a colonel in the Austrian service, who having been accused of robbing the regimental chest, and received for it a year's imprisonment, determined to go to Constantinople, and turn Mahometan. He accordingly arrived there in 1779, made profession of the Moslem faith, and received from the grand seignor a handsome pension, with an estate in Magnesia, in Asia Minor. He possessed a taste for the fine arts, and for the study of archaeology and numismatics; and he amused himself in adding to his collection all the scarce coins and medals he could collect. He had continued thus to employ himself for some years, when he was murdered by two of his servants, who were tempted to the deed by the hope of obtaining a large booty, a considerable sum of money being in his possession at the time. This happened in 1785.

OSMUND, St., bishop of Salisbury in the 11th century, accompanied William the Norman to England, and was not less distinguished for military renown in the early part of his life, than for his learning and piety at a subsequent period. He erected a cathedral at Old Sarum, in which he was interred, but his ashes were afterwards taken up and enshrined. He wrote a "Missal," or service-book, which became the most popular manual of public devotion among the English clergy, and has principally contributed to hand down his name to posterity.

OSSIAN, an ancient Gaelic bard, is supposed to have lived in the third century, and to have been the son of Fingal, a Caledonian hero, whom he accompanied in various military expeditions. His name has derived its celebrity from the publications of Macpherson, which comprise a remarkable series of ballads, on the deliverance of Eris from the haughty Swaran, king of Lochlin, by Fingal. They have been translated into all the European languages, and please by their successful delineation of the passions, picturesque expressions, bold, but lovely images and comparisons, deep pathos, and tender melancholy tone.

OSTADE, ADRIAN VAN, a painter of the Flemish school, was born at Lubeck, in 1610, and studied under Francis Hals. His pictures are characterized by an exact imitation of nature, and usually consist of alehouse interiors, with Dutch peasants smoking, quarrelling, or drinking. His colouring is rich and clear, his touch spirited and free, and all his works are highly finished. Died, 1685.

OSTERVALD, JOHN FREDERIC, a Swiss protestant divine, was born at Neufchatel, in 1663; became pastor of the church in that place in 1698; and died in 1747. His chief works are, "A Catechism of the Christian Religion;" "Arguments and Reflections on all the Books of the Bible," 2 vols.; "Treatise against Uncleaness;" "Treatise on the Sources of Corruption;" and "Sermons."

OSTERWICK, MARIA VAN, who is ranked among the most celebrated flower painters, was born at Nootdorp, near Delft, in 1630, and died in 1693. She was patronized by the emperor Leopold, William III. and Louis XIV.; and her pictures were eagerly sought after, and admitted into the choicest collections.

OSWALD, king of Northumberland, was obliged, after the death of Ethelfred his father, to take refuge in Ireland; his uncle, Edwin, having usurped the throne. He became a Christian in his retreat; and returning to his own country, defeated Cerdwalla, king of the Britons, who lost his life. Oswald reunited the two kingdoms of Northumberland; but was slain in a battle with Penda, king of Mercia, in 643.

OSYMANDYAS, an ancient king of Egypt, who flourished about 1500 years B.C., or as some authors conjecture, 3300 years. He erected the gigantic works of Thebes, built the Memnonium in the city of the hundred gates, and, according to Diodorus, inscribed on his colossus, "I am Osymandias, king of kings; if any man will know my greatness and my resting-place, let him destroy one of my works."

OTHO, MARCUS SALVIUS, a Roman emperor, was born at Rome, A.D. 32, of a family which descended from the ancient kings of Tuscany. After Nero's death he attached himself to Galba, but that emperor having adopted Piso as his heir, Otho excited an insurrection, murdered Galba and Piso, and ascended the throne in 62. He was opposed by Vitellius, who was supported by the German army, and, in a battle between the two rivals near Cremona, Otho was defeated, on which he slew himself, after reigning three months.

OTHO I. emperor of Germany, called the Great, was the eldest son of Henry the Fowler, and crowned in 936, at the age of fourteen. Berenger having usurped the title of emperor in Italy, Otho entered Rome, where he was crowned by John XII. That pontiff afterwards leagueed with Berenger, on which Otho caused him to be deposed, and put Leo XIII. in his place in 963. On the emperor's return to Germany, the Romans revolted, and imprisoned Leo; for which Otho again visited Rome, where he severely exercised his vengeance on the senate. He next turned his arms against Nicephorus, emperor of the East, whose army he defeated, and, after cutting off their noses, sent the prisoners to Constantinople. John Zimisce, the successor of Nicephorus, made peace with Otho, who died in 973.

OTHO, VENIUS, a painter, and the instructor of Rubens, was born at Leyden, in 1556. After residing at Rome several years, he went to Germany, where he was employed by the emperor. Died, 1634.

OTTLEY, WM. YOUNG, F.R.S., F.S.A., and keeper of the prints in the British Museum. During the whole of his life Mr. Otley devoted himself to the fine arts, and was known as an artist, a collector, and an author. When scarcely twenty years of age he proceeded to Italy; where, wrapt in admiration of the endless treasures of art, he not only employed his own talents, but the talents of others, in taking copies of the most esteemed paintings, and in collecting whatever appeared most interesting and valuable. There he remained about ten years; and on his return to England he produced a series of fac-similes of the original drawings of the best masters, under the title of the "Italian School of Design," a magnificent work, consisting of eighty-four plates. His other principal works are "The Florentine School;" the "Origin and Early History of Engraving," 2 vols.; "The Stafford Gallery;" and "The Critical Catalogue of the National Gallery." Born, 1772; died, 1836.

OTTO, LOUIS WILLIAM, count de Mosloy, an eminent French diplomatist, was born in Baden, in 1754, and educated at the university of Straasburg. He was employed in 1779 as secretary and chargé d'affaires to the United States in America, where he remained till 1793. He was then employed by the committee of public safety in the foreign department of the state; but on the fall of the Girondists, shortly after, he was sent to the Luxembourg prison, where he remained till the revolution of the 9th of Thermidor. In 1800 he was sent to England, and he remained there, as minister-plenipotentiary, till the peace of Amiens, when he was succeeded by general Andreossi. In 1809 he was sent ambassador to Vienna, where he negotiated the marriage of Buonaparte with Maria Louisa, the archduchess; and remained there till 1813, where, on his return in Paris, he became minister of state. At the restoration, in 1814, he was unemployed; and, in 1815, during the Hundred Days, was made secretary for foreign affairs. He was, after the battle of Waterloo, employed by Napoleon to negotiate for his personal security with the English government; but the object failed, though not receiving passports.

OTWAY, THOMAS, an English dramatic writer, was born in 1651, at Trotting, in Sussex; was educated at Winchester, and Christ church, college, Oxford; and after having made some attempts as an actor, he became a writer for the stage. In 1675 he produced his first tragedy of "Alcibiades," and the following year appeared his "Don Carlos," which proved extremely successful. His theatrical reputation introduced him to the patronage of the earl of Plymouth, a natural son of Charles II., who procured him a cornetcy in a regiment of cavalry, destined for Flanders, in which country he served for a short time, and then returned, pursued by habitual poverty. He continued to write for the stage, but found it a very scanty means of subsistence, and died, during 1685, in his 34th year, at a public-house on Tower-hill, where he had secreted himself from his creditors, in a state of great destitution. As a tragic writer he stands high, and no one has touched scenes of domestic distress with more force and feeling.

OUDET, JAMES JOSEPH, a French republican officer, of distinguished merit, who was supposed to have been concerned in the formation of a secret society, directed against the imperial power of Napoleon. His movements were accordingly watched by the government with great suspicion; and after having been alternately employed and exiled, he had the command of a division at the battle of Wagram, where he highly signalled himself, and soon after died of the wounds he received on that occasion.

UDIN, CASIMIR, a French monk, was born at Mezieres, in 1638. He entered among the Premonstrés, and, while in the abbey of Bucilly, in Champagne, attracted the notice of Louis XIV. so much by his talents and genius, that his superiors employed him to make collections for a history of their order. He afterwards embraced the protestant religion at Leyden, and was made librarian of the university. His works are, "History of Ecclesiastical Writers;" "Commentarius de Scripturis Ecclesie antiquis, illorumque scriptis, &c.," 3 vols.; "Veterum aliquot Gallie et Belgie Scriptorum opuscula Sacra."

UDIN, FRANCIS, a learned French Jesuit, was born in 1673, at Vignory, in Champagne. He was professor of theology and rhetoric, at Dijon; and was employed by the general of his order in writing a History of the Authors belonging to his society. He had also a taste for polite literature, and wrote a Latin poem, entitled "Somnia;" "Orations;" &c.

UDINEF, MARC ANTHONY, a learned French Jesuit; professor of law in the university of Rheims, and author of several esteemed works on medallic history and antiquities. Born, 1643; died, 1712.

UDRY, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French painter of portraits and historical subjects. His skill in animals, particularly dogs, was such, that Louis XV. is said to have recognized his favourite ones whenever he saw them in the groupes of Oudry, who was pensioned by that monarch, and had apartments in the Tuilleries. Born, 1685; became a member of the academy in 1717; and died in 1755.

OUGHTRED, WILLIAM, an English divine and mathematician, was born in 1574, at Eton; was educated there, and at King's college, Cambridge; obtained the living of Shalford, in Surrey; which he exchanged for that of Albury; and died in 1660, as it is said, of joy, at hearing of Charles's restoration. Though a profound mathematician, his method of treating his subjects was both dry and obscure. He wrote treetices on Trigonometry, Arithmetic, Conic Sections, &c.

OUVILLE, ANTHONY LE METEL D', the brother of Boisrobert, the favourite of cardinal Richelieu. He was the author of some dramas and tales, the latter of which rivalled those of La Fontaine in licentiousness, but were far inferior to them in wit and humour. Died, 1657.

OUVRARD, RENÉ, a French divine, was born at Chinon, in Touraine. He was a poet, musician, divine, and mathematician; published several works in each capacity; became music-master of the holy chapel at Paris, and afterwards canon of Tours, where he died in 1694.

OUVRARD, JULIAN, was born at Nantes, in 1772, and was a grocer at the era of the revolution. Being an excellent calculator, and of great address and boldness, he soon made a rapid fortune. He was a contractor under the republican, the imperial, and the restored Bourbon regime: he had the provisioning of the foreign armies during their occupation of France by the allied troops in 1816, and of the French army in Spain during the war in 1823. He was often denounced for his contracts during the revolution, and escaped the guillotine in 1794, by General Boivin concealing him in his house at Nantes. Under the successive regimes, he owed many an escape to the influence of his friend Fouché. In 1810, he was sent on a secret mission by the latter to England, while Napoleon also sent a mission to negotiate a peace. The two ambassadors counteracted each other—the British government evaded what it considered as a trap—they were dismissed; and on their return, Fouché was disgraced, and Ouvrard imprisoned by Napoleon. He subsequently became bankrupt; but he lived in such extraordinary luxury in prison, that his creditors held him confined there for a long time. Great complaints were made in the Chamber of Deputies in 1834, of the intrigues, extravagance, and material deficiencies of his contract for supplying the French army in Spain; but it was supposed he was protected by the strong arm of authority, as no inquiry into these financial operations was made.

OVERALL, JOHN, an English prelate, was born in 1559; and, after taking his degrees, became master of Catherine hall. Through the patronage of queen Elizabeth he was made dean of St. Paul's, afterwards bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, and in 1618, he was translated to the see of Norwich. He compiled a work, called "The Convocation Book;" in which he maintained the divine origin of government. He had also some concern in the present translation of the Bible, and wrote the sacramental part of the Church Catechism.

OVERBURY, SIR THOMAS, an English gentleman, principally known by the tragic circumstance of his death, was born at Ilmington, in Warwickshire, in 1581, and educated at Queen's college, Oxford, after which he became a student of the Middle Temple. The intimacy which he formed with Robert Carr, the worthless favourite brought from Scotland by James I., and who was afterwards earl of Somerset, proved his ruin. In 1608 he was knighted, and his father was made one of the judges for Wales; but at length, Overbury, by venturing to dissuade his friend from marrying the divorced countess of Essex, provoked the anger of both, and, through their contrivance, he was sent to the Tower, where he was poisoned, Sept. 15, 1613. This iniquitous deed was not discovered till two years afterwards, when Sir Gervase Elways, lieutenant of the Tower, and some others, were tried and executed; but the principals, to the eternal disgrace of the king, were pardoned, from no assignable cause that will not add to the ignominy of the proceeding. Sir Thomas Overbury wrote a poem, entitled "The Wife;" which, with his piece called "Characters," went through many editions.

—His nephew, SIR THOMAS OVERBURY, published "An Account of the Trial of Joan Perry and her two Sons for the Murder of William Harrison;" a most remarkable case, the parties who were executed having confessed themselves guilty of the murder, although innocent: "Queries on Persecution in Religion," &c.

OVID, or OVIDIUS, PUBLIUS NASO, a celebrated Latin poet of the Augustan age, was of the equestrian order, and born at Sulmo, now called Abruzzo, B.C. 43. He studied the law, and pleaded with eloquence in the court of the centumviri; he was also constituted one of the triumviri, whose authority extended to the trial of capital causes; but his decided predilection for polite literature, and particularly poetry, led him to neglect severer studies; and on succeeding to the paternal estate, he quitted the bar for poetry and pleasure. His writings and his morals, however, appear to have coincided; for he indulged in a prurient fancy, and repudiated two of his wives soon after marriage. Virgil, Horace, Tibullus, and Propertius were his friends, and Augustus was a liberal patron to him; but he at length fell under the displeasure of the emperor, who, for some cause never explained, banished him from Rome, and sent him to live among the Gætes, or Goths, on the Euxine. It is probable, that the political intrigues of the empress Livina and her son Tiberius, contributed to the removal of the poet; while the licentiousness of his writings, and the irregularities of his life afforded plausible pretexts for the infliction of this punishment. His chief works consist of "De Arte Amandi," "Heroic Epistles," the "Fasti," and "Metamorphoses." He in vain solicited his recall to Rome; and died at Tomos, A.D. 17.

OVIDIO, a Spanish jesuit, was born at Illescas. In 1554 he was consecrated bishop of Heliopolis, and went to Abyssinia, where he obtained the title of patriarch; translated several works into Ethiopic; and died there in 1557.

OVIDIO Y VALDES, GONZALVO HERNAÑDEZ D', a Spanish military officer, who was intendant or inspector general of commerce in America, in the reign of the emperor Charles V. He wrote a complete "History of the Indies;" from which succeeding writers have drawn much of their information relative to the intercourse of the Spaniards with America.

OVIDIO, JOHN GONZALEZ, a Spaniard, who soon after the discovery of America visited the West Indies, to examine the natural productions of that part of the world. He published the result of his researches; and, according to Fallopius, was the first who discovered the virtues of guaiacum in the cure of syphilis. Died, 1540.

OWEN, JOHN, an epigrammatist, was born in Caernarvonshire; was educated at Winchester, and New college, Oxford; after which he became master of Warwick school; and died in 1622. His Latin epigrams possess great point, and several of them are inferior only to those of Martial.

OWEN, JOHN, D.D., a learned independent divine, was born at Stadham, in Oxfordshire in 1616, and educated at Queen's college. In the civil wars he was a zealous advocate for the parliament against the king; and the very day after the murder of Charles I. he preached a sermon before the House of Commons, making himself so acceptable to those in power, that Cromwell made him his chaplain, and gave him the deanery of Christ Church, Oxford, where he served the office of vice-chancellor in 1652. At the restoration he was deprived of his deanery; on which he retired to his estate in Essex. He died in 1683. Dr. Owen was a very voluminous writer. His principal works are, "An Exposition of the Hebrews," 4 vols.; a "Discourse concerning the Holy Spirit;" a "Treatise on Original Sin;" "Vindiciæ Evangelicæ;" "Tracts and Sermons," &c.

OWEN, HENRY, a learned divine of the church of England, was born in Monmouthshire, and educated first at Ruthin school, and next at Jesus college, Oxford, where he took his degree of M.D. but afterwards entered into orders, and obtained the vicarage of Edmonton, in Middlesex, and St. Olave, Hart-street. He died in 1795, aged 80. His chief works are, "Observations on the Scripture Miracles;" "Remarks on the four Gospels;" "An Enquiry into the Septuagint Version;" "Sermons preached at Boyle's Lecture," 2 vols.; and "An Introduction to Hebrew Criticism."

OWEN, THOMAS, a learned judge, was born at Conover, in Shropshire, and educated at Oxford; from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, where he became Lent reader to the Society, in 1583. In 1590 he was made serjeant at law, and afterwards a judge of the Common Pleas. Died, 1598.

OWEN, JOHN, a divine of the church of England, was born in London, about 1765, and received his education at St. Paul's school, and at Cambridge. Having taken orders, he became a popular preacher at Fulham, and obtained from bishop Porteus the living of Paglesham, in Essex. Dr. Randolph, the successor of the bishop in the see of London, insisting upon Mr. Owen's residence at his rectory, he was obliged to relinquish the curacy of Fulham; the inhabitants of which parish presented him with a purse of near 700*l*. He was one of the earliest members of the Bible Society, of which institution he continued to be the principal secretary till his death in 1822. Besides various tracts and sermons, he was the author of "The Retrospect, or Reflections on the State of Religion and Politics in France and Great Britain;" "The Christian Monitor for the Last Days;" "Vindication of the Bible Society," its "History," &c.

OWEN, WILLIAM, an eminent English artist, was a native of Shropshire. After studying under Charles Catton, and receiving considerable attention from Sir Joshua Reynolds, he made great progress in the art, and in 1813 was appointed principal portrait painter to the prince regent, who offered to knight him, but he modestly declined the honour. He executed some admirable portraits of distinguished statesmen, &c., and also employed himself occasionally on historical subjects, some of which were of a first-rate character. Born, 1769; died, 1824.

OWTRAM, WILLIAM, a learned English divine. He was prebendary of Westminster in the reign of Charles II. and wrote an excellent treatise "De Sacrificiis." He died in 1679.

OXENSTIERN, AXEL, an eminent Swedish statesman, distinguished for profound sagacity, patriotism, and political honesty, was born in 1583. He was the favourite of Gustavus Adolphus, after whose death he conducted the affairs of the kingdom with equal ability and integrity. Died, 1654.—His sons JOHN and ERIC, both distinguished themselves as diplomatists.

OZANAM, JAMES, an eminent French mathematician, was born at Bolligues, in Brescia, in 1640. He was educated for the church; but on the death of his father he relinquished that pursuit, and, applying to the study of the sciences, was for many years in high repute as a mathematical teacher. Died, 1717. He wrote a great number of useful works, the principal of which are, "Dictionnaire des Mathematiques;" "Cours des Mathematiques," 5 vols.; "Recreations Mathematiques et Physiques," 4 vols.; "Da Perspective Theoretique et Pratique," &c.

OZAROUSKI, PETER, born in 1768, herman of the crown of Poland; was one of the most zealous of the partizans of Russia in destroying the new constitution of 1792. In the insurrection at Warsaw in 1794, his hotel was plundered, and himself hung before his door by the people. His two sons remained faithful to the patriot cause, and served in the Polish army.

OZELL, JOHN, a miscellaneous writer, was born in England, of a French family, and was intended for the church, which profession he declined; and obtained the offices of auditor-general of the city and bridge accounts, of the accounts of St. Paul's cathedral, and of St. Thomas's hospital. His principal works are translations from the French, Italian, and Spanish, among which are Rabelais, Don Quixote, and Moliere. He is described by Pope, in the Dunciad, as a man of consummate vanity; which he resented by an extraordinary advertisement, signed with his name, in a paper, called "The Weekly Medley," wherein he drew a comparison between Pope and himself, of course very unfavourable to the former, with regard to their general learning and poetical genius. Died, 1743.

THAT POLICY WHICH CAN STRIKE ONLY WHILE THE IRON IS HOT, WILL BE OVERTHROWN BY THAT WHICH USES MARCH IS HOT BY STRIKING.

OZERETSKOFFSKY, NICHOLAS YAKOVLEVICH, one of the earliest members of the Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg; author of "Memoirs of the Progress of the Sciences in Russia, from 1803 to 1810;" "Elements of Natural History;" and various other publications serviceable to the advancement of science and literature. Born, 1751; died, 1827.

OZEROFF, VLADISLAV ALEXANDROVITCH, a celebrated Russian tragic poet, was born in 1707; entered the army, in which he attained the rank of major-general, and afterwards obtained a civil appointment. He wrote the tragedies of "Fingal," "Demetrius Donskoi," "Œdipus," and "Polyxena," which exhibit beauties of a high order; he also wrote some lyric poems. Died, 1816.

P.

PAAW, PETER, an eminent Dutch physician and botanist, born at Amsterdam, in 1564. He was appointed professor of medicine at Leyden, where he founded the botanical garden, and published several works on anatomical and botanical subjects, which, though surpassed by subsequent productions, are still esteemed. Died, 1617.

PACATIANUS, TITUS JULIUS MARINUS, an usurper, who excited the Gauls to revolt in his favour in the reign of the emperor Philip; but he was defeated and put to death by the troops which raised Decius to the throne, A.D. 249.

PACATUS, LATINUS DREPANUS, a Latin poet and orator of the fourth century, who was sent from Gaul to offer congratulations to Theodosius the Great after the defeat of Maximus; for which he was rewarded with a proconsulship in Africa; and in 393 with the office of superintendent of the imperial lands. His poems are lost; but his panegyric on Theodosius was printed at Amsterdam, in 1783.

PACCHIONI, ANTHONY, an eminent Italian anatomist, born at Reggio, in 1664; died at Rome, in 1736.

PACE, RICHARD, a learned and eloquent divine and statesman, was born in Hampshire, in 1462; studied at Padua, and on his return became a member of Queen's college, Oxford; but soon afterwards accompanied cardinal Bambridge to Rome. In 1515 he was sent to the court of Vienna; and in 1522 was made dean of Exeter. He was also dean of St. Paul's; but falling under the displeasure of Wolsey, he lost his preferments, and retired to Stepney, where he died in 1532. He wrote a book on the lawfulness of Henry's marriage with Catharine of Arragon; "De Fructu Scientiarum," &c.; and he enjoyed the friendship of Erasmus, Sir Thomas More, and cardinal Pole.

PACHYMERAS, GEORGE, a Greek historian of the 14th century, was born at Nice, of a noble family, and rose to high offices in state and church. He died in 1310. He wrote a "History of Michael Palæologus and Andronicus," published in Greek and Latin, at Rome, in 1666, in 2 vols. folio; and a compendium of Aristotelic philosophy was published from his MSS. at Oxford in 1666.

PACIANDI, PAUL MARIA, an Italian ecclesiastic, antiquary, and historian, was born at Turin, in 1710. He studied at Bologna; became professor of philosophy at Genoa; and in 1761 he settled at Parma as librarian to the grand duke, who also appointed him his antiquary, and director of some public works; besides which, he was historiographer of the order of Malta. He died in 1785. His principal works are, "A Series of Medals representing the most remarkable Events of the Government of Malta;" "Monumenta Peloponnesia," 2 vols. 4to.; and "Memoirs of the Grand Masters of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem," 3 vols. 4to.

PACIUS, JULIUS, an eminent jurist, was born at Vicenza, in 1550. He was remarkable for precocity of talent, and is said to have written a treatise on arithmetic, at thirteen; after which he studied at Padua, where he took his degree of doctor of civil law; but having embraced the reformed religion, he was obliged to seek an asylum at Geneva. In 1585 he became professor of law at Heidelberg; thence he removed to Sedan, next to Montpellier, and lastly to Valence, where he died, in 1635. He was the author of several works on jurisprudence.

PACUVIUS, MARCUS, a tragic Latin poet, was a native of Brundisium, and flourished at Rome about 154 B.C. He obtained great reputation by his tragedies, and was much esteemed by Lælius and Cicero, who placed him above Sophocles; but we have nothing of his left by which to judge of his merits, except a few fragments in the "Corpus Poetarum." He died, aged 69, at Tarentum.

PADILLA, DON JOHN DE, a noble Spaniard, who espoused the cause of the people during their arduous struggle for liberty, from 1420 to 1422. Being defeated and taken prisoner at the battle of Villalar, he was put to death on the following day, and met his fate with the heroism of a true patriot. — DONNA MARIA, his heroic wife, participated in all his labours, and after his death gained several advantages at the head of her troops, and defended Toledo for several months. She was at length deserted by the citizens, and retired to Portugal, where she died.

PAGAN, BLAISE FRANÇOIS, count de, an eminent French military engineer, was born at Avignon, in 1604. He entered into the army at an early age, and lost an eye, in 1621, at the siege of Montauban. After this he distinguished himself on several occa-alone, particularly at the passage of the Alps, and the barricade of Suza, where he was the first to lead the way over a dangerous height. In 1642 he lost his sight entirely; notwithstanding which he pursued his military studies; and in 1645 published an excellent work, entitled "Traité de Fortification." This was followed by his "Theoremes Geometrique;" "Theorie des Planetes;" "Tables Astronomiques," &c. Died, 1665.

PAGANEL, PETER, a member of the French Legislative Assembly and Convention, was born in 1745. He was chosen a deputy in 1791; and when, on the 10th of August, 1792, the unfortunate Louis XVI. sought an asylum in the hall of the representatives, he was one of the first to join in a deputation to the people, in order to restrain their violence; yet he afterwards voted for the king's death. He was consequently obliged to quit France in 1816; and he died at Brussels in 1826. Paganel was the author of "Essai Historique et Critique sur la Révolution Française," 3 vols., and some other works of minor importance.

PAGANO, FRANCIS, a distinguished Neapolitan jurist, born in 1748; died in 1800, on the scaffold, for taking a leading part in the Neapolitan revolution of 1799. He was the author of "Considerazione sul Processo Criminale;" "Saggi Politici Del Principi e Progressi delle Società;" "Progetto di Costituzione per la Repubblica Napolitana." The former raised him enemies among the ultra party, but the last caused his death.

PAGANACCI, JEAN, born at Lyons, in 1720; died in 1797. His great work, the "Manuel des Negocians," a commercial encyclopædia, is justly esteemed in France.

PAGES, FRANCIS XAVIER, an indefatigable French romance writer, &c., was born at Aurillac, in 1745; and died at Paris in 1802. Among his numerous works are, "Histoire secrete de la Revolution Française," 6 vols. 8vo., and "Nouveau Voyage autour du monde, en Asie, en Amérique, et en Afrique, précédé d'un Voyage en Italie."

PAGES, PIERRE MARIE FRANÇOIS, vicount de, a celebrated French navigator, was born at Toulouse, in 1746. He sailed from Cape François, in St. Domingo, in 1797, with a view to explore the Indian Seas, and travel through China and Tartary to the Northern Ocean; but on arriving at the Philippine Islands in October, 1768, and finding it impossible to penetrate China, he went by sea to Bassora, and travelling through the desert to Syria, he reached France in December, 1771. He afterwards sailed in Kerguelin's expedition to the South Pole, and on his return proceeded as far as 81 degrees and a half of north latitude. He served in the American war; after which he retired to his estate in St. Domingo, where he was murdered during a revolt of the negroes in 1793.

PAGI, ANTHONY, a famous cordelier, who was four times provincial of his order. Born, 1624; died, 1689. He was the author of a "Critique on Baronius's Annals," 4 vols. folio, and a "Dissertation on the Consulates."—His nephew, FRANCIS PAGI, also a cordelier, assisted his uncle in his great work on Baronius, and was the author of "Breviarium Historico-chronologico-criticum," 4 vols. Died, 1731.

PAGNINUS, SANCTUS, a Dominican friar, born at Lucca, in 1408. He was an able classic and oriental scholar; and was employed twenty-five years in translating the Scriptures. Leo X. furnishing him with all necessary expenses. He was also the author of a "Hebrew Lexicon and Grammar."

PAINE, THOMAS, a deistical and political writer, was born in 1737, at Thetford, in Norfolk, where his father, who was a Quaker, carried on the business of a stay-maker, and brought up his son to it. He, however, subsequently became an exciseman, and was living at Lewes, in Sussex, when he lost his situation in consequence of keeping a tobacco-shop, which was considered incompatible with his duties. His literary abilities having appeared in a pamphlet composed by him in order to show the necessity of advancing the salaries of excisemen, he was introduced to Dr. Franklin, who urged him to go to America, and use his pen in behalf of the colonies. He accordingly went there, and reached Philadelphia in 1774. At first he conducted the Pennsylvania Gazette, which from the boldness of its arguments attracted considerable notice. He then published his celebrated pamphlet, entitled "Common Sense," which being written with great vigour, and addressed to a highly excited population, had a prodigious sale, and undoubtedly accelerated the famous Declaration of Independence. For this production the legislature of Pennsylvania voted him 500*l*. He was afterwards also rewarded with a grant of 500 acres of well cultivated land from the state of New York, and made clerk to the committee for foreign affairs. While in this office he published a series of political pamphlets on what he termed the "Crisis." In 1787 he embarked for France, and, after visiting Paris, went to England, with a view to the prosecution of a project relative to the construction of an iron bridge, of his own invention, at Rotherham, in Yorkshire. This scheme involved him in considerable difficulties; but his writings, in which he foretold, or rather recommended, the change that was approaching in France, brought him a supply of money. On the appearance of Burke's Reflections on the French Revolution, he wrote the first part of his celebrated "Rights of Man," in answer to that work. The second part was published early in 1792; and, May the 21st, in that year, a proclamation was issued against wicked and seditious publications, evidently alluding to, though it did not name, the Rights of Man. On the same day, the attorney-general commenced a prosecution against Paine as the author of that work. While the trial was pending, he was chosen member of the national convention for the department of Calais; and, making his escape, he set off for France, and arrived there in September, 1792. The garrison at Calais were under arms to receive this "friend of Liberty," the tri-coloured cockade was presented to him by the mayor, and the handsomest woman in the town was selected to place it in his hat. Meantime Paine had been declared in Paris worthy of the honours of citizenship, and he proceeded thither, where he was received with every demonstration of extravagant joy. On the trial of Louis XVI., he voted against the sentence of death, proposing his imprisonment during the war, and his banishment afterwards. This conduct offended the Jacobins, and, towards the close of 1793, he was excluded from the convention, on the ground of his being a foreigner (though naturalized); and, immediately after, he was arrested, and committed to the Luxembourg. Just before his confinement, he had finished the first part of his infamous work, entitled the "Age of Reason;" and, having confided it to the care of his friend Joel Barlow, it was published. On the fall of Robespierre he was released; in 1793 he published the second part of his "Age of Reason;" and, in May, 1796, he addressed to the council of five hundred, a work, entitled the "Decline and Fall of the System of Finance in England," and also published his pamphlet entitled "Agrarian Justice." Fearful of being captured by English cruisers, he remained in France till August, 1802, when he embarked for America, and reached Baltimore the following October. His subsequent life was by no means happy; for, although occupied in various mechanical speculations, and other engrossing pursuits, and possessed of decent competence, his attacks upon religion had exceedingly narrowed his circle of acquaintance; and his habitual intemperance tended to the injury of his health, and the ultimate production of a complication of disorders, to which he fell a victim in 1809. The Quakers refused to admit his remains among their dead, and he was buried on his own farm. Cobbett boasted of having disinterred him in 1817, and brought his body to England; many, however, assert that Cobbett did not take that trouble, but brought over from America the remains of a criminal, who had been executed.

PAISIELLO, GIOVANNI, a celebrated singer and composer, was the son of a veterinary surgeon of Tarento, in Italy, and born in 1741. He was put under the care of the celebrated Durante, and, in 1763, produced his first opera, "La Papilla," with great applause, at the Marigli theatre, in Bologna. From this period commenced a long career of success; and his works were not only applauded in Italy, but extended his fame over the whole continent. In 1794 he was induced to enter the service of Catherine II. of Russia, who settled upon him a pension of 4000 roubles, and he remained there nine years. He next settled at Naples; and on the French revolution extending to that country, he received from the republican government the appointment of composer to the nation. In 1801 he went to Paris at the request of Buonaparte; but, after having been there three years, he returned to Naples, where he died in 1816. His operas, serious and comic, exceed seventy, besides a great variety of ballets, cantatas, &c. Simplicity, elegance, and correctness are the characteristics of his style.

PAJOU, AUGUSTIN, an eminent French sculptor, was born at Paris, in 1730; gained the prize at the academy when eighteen years of age; studied at Rome, where he remained for twelve years; and obtained on his return a first-rate reputation from his countrymen, who called him the restorer of the art. Died, 1809.

PAKENHAM, the Hon. Sir THOMAS, G.C.B., a British admiral, was born in 1738; entered the navy in 1770; and after serving under various commanders, and in different parts of the globe, and distinguishing himself by his coolness, judgment, and valour, was promoted to the rank of post-captain. When, in consequence of the French revolution, hostilities were renewed, captain Pakenham had the command of the Invincible, 74, and bore a distinguished part in the victory obtained by lord Howe on the 1st of June, 1794; and the choice of the captured ship being offered him, he chose the Justice, the one he had himself taken. In 1795 he was made colonel of marines, and served under admirals Waldegrave, Cornwallis, and Alan Gardner. In 1799 he was advanced to the rank of rear-admiral; in 1804 to that of vice-admiral; and in 1810 to that of admiral. Died, Feb. 1836, aged 78.

PALEMOM, QUINTUS RHEMMIUS, a grammarian, who lived at Rome in the reign of Tiberius. He was the son of a slave at Vicenza, and acquired his learning by attending on the son of his master at school, in consequence of which he was rewarded with his freedom, and became a teacher at Rome. There are extant, under his name, "Ars Grammatica;" and "De Ponderibus et Mensuris."

PALAFIX Y MENDOZA, JUAN DE, bishop of Angelopolis, in New Spain, where he became viceroy in the absence of the duke de Escalona. His principal work is a "History of the Conquest of China by the Tartars." Died, 1659.

PAIAPRAT, JOHN DE BROOT, a French dramatist, was born in 1650, at Toulouse; of which city he became chief magistrate, and head of the consistory. Died, 1721. Many of his comedies were written in conjunction with the abbe Bruyere.

PALEOTTI, GABRIEL, a learned cardinal, was born at Bologna, in 1524. He became professor of civil law at his native place; was appointed auditor of the rota at Rome; and at the council of Trent he acted as proctor and counsellor to the papal legates. He was raised to the purple in 1585; and afterwards made archbishop of Bologna, being the first who held that title. His history of the proceedings of the council of Trent is still preserved at Rome in manuscript. Died, 1597.

PALESTRINA, GIOVANNI PIETRO ALOISI, the most celebrated master of the old Roman school of music, was born at Palestrina, the ancient Preneste, about the beginning of the 16th century. He died in 1594. Some of his pieces are still performed in the Sistine chapel at Rome.

PALEY, WILLIAM, an eminent divine of the English church, was born at Peterborough, in 1743; and was educated as a sizar at Christ's college, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1766. For ten subsequent years he resided at the university; but in 1776 he obtained the vicarage of Dalton, in Cumberland, and Appleby,

In Westmoreland. In 1780 he was collated to a prebend in the cathedral of Carlisle; of which diocese he became archdeacon in 1782; and in 1785 he was appointed chancellor. In that year he published his great work, "The Elements of Moral and Political Philosophy," in one vol. 4to. His next publication was entitled "Horæ Paulinæ." In 1793 he vacated Dalton, on being presented to the vicarage of Stanwix, near Carlisle; and the year following he printed "A View of the Evidences of Christianity," 2 vols. 8vo. The same year he was instituted to the prebend of St. Pancras in the diocese of London: and soon afterwards was promoted to the sub-deanery of Lincoln. In 1795 he took his doctor's degree on being presented to the living of Bishop's Wearmouth, where he wrote his last work, entitled "Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity." Besides the above excellent productions, Dr. Paley published some smaller works; and a volume of sermons appeared, after his death, which took place in 1805.

PALFIN, JOHN, an eminent surgeon, was a native of Ghent, where he obtained great reputation as a lecturer. His principal works are, "On Osteology," which is much esteemed; and "On the Anatomy of the Human Body."

PALISSY, BERNARD DE, a celebrated French potter and chemist, was born at Agen, and for his ingenuity in painting on glass and other works was patronized by Henry III. He made considerable discoveries in natural history, and is said to have been the first who gave a true theory of fountains. Palissy was a zealous Calvinist; and during the fury of the league under Henry III. in 1584, he was committed to the Bastille. Died, 1590.

PALLADINO, JAMES, an Italian prelate, who was also called James de Teramo, from the place of his birth. He became successively archbishop of Tarento, Florence, and Spoleto; and in 1417 was sent legate to Poland, where he died the same year. He wrote a religious romance, entitled "Consolatio Peccatorum."

PALISSOT DE BEAUVOIS, AMBROISE MARIE FRANÇOIS JOSEPH, an eminent naturalist, was born at Arras, in the French Netherlands, in 1752. After studying at the college of Harcourt, at Paris, he was, in 1772, admitted a counsel of the parliament of that city; and subsequently became receiver-general of territorial imposts, till the suppression of that office in 1777. He then devoted himself to the study of natural history, and he undertook a voyage to the coast of Guinea, with an intention to travel across the African continent to Egypt; but being unable to execute that design, he sailed for St. Domingo, in 1788, and there occupied some official situations. Having opposed the revolutionary attempts of the negroes, he with difficulty effected his escape to America, purposing to return to France, when he learnt that he had been proscribed as an emigrant. He occupied languages and as a musician, but he did not neglect his favourite pursuits; and on the proscribed list, he returned to his native country, taking with him the rich collection of natural curiosities which he had formed. He died in 1820.

PALISSOT DE MONTENOY, CHARLES, a French dramatist, born at Nancy, in 1730. Having given great offence to the philosophical party of the French literati, by ridiculing Rousseau, he was engaged in a series of controversies, and in 1764 he published his "Dunciade," in imitation of the satire of Pope. He wrote "Le Cercle," "Les Philosophes," and some other comedies; besides "Mémoires sur la Littérature Française," &c., and died in 1814.

PALLADIO, ANDREA, one of the greatest classical architects of modern Italy, was born at Vicenza, in 1518, and learnt the principles of his art from Trissino. He went to Rome, where he acquired a maturity of skill and science from an examination of the productions of ancient and modern art which that capital afforded. Returning to his native country, he established his fame by his designs for many noble edifices both there and in other parts of Italy, which have afforded models for many beautiful structures in most parts of Europe. He wrote a "Treatise on Architecture," which has been many times reprinted. He was likewise the author of a work, entitled "Le Antichità di Roma," and an illustration of Caesar's Commentaries. Died, 1580.

PALLAS, the freedman of the emperor Claudius, over whom he had so great an ascendancy as to persuade him to espouse Agrippina his niece, and to adopt Nero for his successor. Nero caused him to be put to death secretly, but erected a superb monument to his memory. Pallas was brother to the Felix before whom St. Paul pleaded.

PALLAS, PETER SIMON, a celebrated traveller and naturalist, was born at Bertin, in 1741; and studied at Halle, Göttingen, and Leyden. The empress Catharine, seeking for a naturalist to explore her immense empire, invited Pallas to Petersburg, and, in 1777, he became a member of the committee for the measurement and topography of Russia. As it was his desire to reside in the Crimea, the empress gave him several estates in the most fertile part of it. There he remained fifteen years; but at length he quitted Russia, and settled at Berlin, where he died in 1811. Among his numerous works are his "Travels," which Saussure denominated an inexhaustible mine for the naturalist and statesman; "Historical Documents on the Mongols;" and a "Physical and Topographical Description of the Taurida."

PALLAVICINO, FERRANTE, an Italian writer, was born at Piacenza, in 1616. Though he indulged in gross sensuality in after life, it appears that he acquired great reputation when young, not only for his learning, but for propriety of conduct. He became a canon regular of the order of St. Augustine, but having written some lampoons, he found it expedient to retire from the coming storm to Germany. The familiars of the Inquisition were, however, determined to make an example of him; and one Morfu, a Frenchman, who pretended to be his friend, persuaded him to go to France, with the offer of great advantages. Ferrante followed his advice, but was no sooner out of the Venetian territory, than he was seized and conducted to Avignon, where he was beheaded, in 1644. The traitor who inveigled him to his fate, though richly rewarded at the time, fell afterwards by the point of a companion of his victim.

PALLAVICINO, Sforza, a learned and pious cardinal, was born at Rome, in 1647. He was employed by pope Innocent X. in various important affairs, and obtained a cardinal's hat in 1657. He wrote a "History of the Council of Trent," 2 vols.; and died, 1667.

PALLISER, Sir HUGH, an English admiral, was born in 1721. He entered into the navy early in life, and distinguished himself on many occasions, particularly at the taking of Quebec. In 1773 he was made a baronet; but being second in command to admiral Keppel, in the memorable battle off Ushant, July 27, 1778, some misunderstanding took place, and these two officers preferred charges against each other. Keppel was acquitted, and Palliser censured. This sentence, however, was considered as more the effect of party than of justice; and he was made governor of Greenwich hospital, where he died in 1796.

PALM, JAMES PHILIP, a citizen and bookseller of Nuremberg, who, in 1806, being accused of having distributed a pamphlet against Buonaparte, entitled "Germany in her deepest Humiliation," was arbitrarily arrested, by virtue of an order sent from Paris, and conducted to Brennan, where he was arraigned before a military commission, pronounced guilty, and shot. This act of tyranny was everywhere regarded with horror. Palm was considered throughout Germany as a martyr, and public subscriptions were entered into for his widow and children.

PALMA, JACOB, a painter, was a native of Scrinialto, in the territory of Bergamo, and the disciple of Titian, to whose style he also added that of Giorgioni. His pictures are very fine and rare. Died, 1588.—His great nephew, JACOB PALMA, who resided at Venice, and whose paintings are also much admired, was born in 1544, and died in 1628.

PALMER, SAMUEL, an English printer of considerable eminence; author of a "General History of Printing," and a "Printer's Grammar." Died, 1732.

PALMER, JOHN, a Unitarian minister, many years resident in London, who died in 1790. He was the author of many works illustrative of his tenets and opinions.

PALMER, JOHN, an eminent English actor, was born in London, about 1743, and made his first appearance in the metropolis at the Haymarket theatre. He was afterwards engaged by Garrick at Drury-lane, and gradually rose to eminence in his profession, both in comedy and tragedy. He unfortunately involved himself in great pecuniary difficulties, by engaging in the building of a new theatre near Wellclose-square, for which a license could not be obtained; and his career was closed by a truly tragic catastrophe. While performing the principal character in "The Stranger," at Liverpool, Aug. 2, 1798, he fell on the stage in a state of exhaustion, and almost immediately expired, having just exclaimed, in the words of the drama, "There is another and a better world!"

PALMER, JOHN, the first projector of mail-coaches, was a native of Bath, where he was brought up as a brewer, but subsequently solicited and obtained a patent for a theatre in his native city; which concern proved eminently successful under his management. Being much in the habit of travelling from place to place, for the purpose of securing rising performers, the idea occurred to him that a better mode of conveying the mails was most desirable, and he accordingly matured the plan which at present exists, of transmitting letters by coaches with guards. He succeeded in his object, though not without great opposition; but the utility of the plan soon became manifest, and he was made comptroller-general of the post-office, with a salary of 1500*l.* a-year. Some disputes, however, occurring, he lost his situation in 1792; and though he afterwards, through petitions, was reimbursed by parliament, the compensation was very inadequate to the per centage he was to have received, in case his plan succeeded. Died, 1816.

PALOMINO DE VELASCO, ACISLES ANTONIO, an eminent Spanish painter, was born near Cordova, in 1653, and was a pupil of Valdes. He was appointed royal painter, with a pension; and he distinguished himself also as an author, having written a work on the theory and practice of painting, with the lives of the most celebrated artists, &c. Died, 1726.

PAMPHILIUS, an ancient painter, who flourished in the time of Philip, king of Macedon. He was the first who taught the art on mathematical principles, in his school at Sicily; and Apelles was one of his scholars.

PANARD, CHARLES FRANCIS, a French poet and dramatist, born at Courville, near Chartres, in 1691; died, at Paris, in 1761. He was the author of numerous comedies, operas, and songs.

PANCIROLUS, GUY, an eminent Italian civilian, was born, at Reggio, in 1523. He became professor of the Institutes at Padua; and after filling that chair seven years, was appointed to that of the Roman law, but resigned it in 1571, to go to Turin, where he obtained the professorship of civil law. In 1582 he returned to Padua, where he died, in 1599; having given to the world several excellent works on jurisprudence, besides a curious treatise on the ancient inventions which are lost, and on those inventions which belong to the moderns.

PANCOUCKE, CHARLES JOSEPH, an eminent bookseller, and also a man of literary talent, was born, in 1736, at Lisle, where his father had carried on a highly respectable business, and likewise distinguished himself as an author. He settled at Paris; became connected with the most able writers; and published many magnificent works. He established "The Monteur," projected the "Encyclopédie Méthodique," and was himself the author of "De l'Homme et de la Reproduction des differentia Individui," and other works. Died, 1798.

PANETIUS, a stoic philosopher, was a native of Rhodes, and flourished 150 B.C. He studied at Athens with such credit as to be offered the rights of citizenship, which he refused, saying, "a modest man is content with one country."

PANIN, NAKITA IVANOWITZ, count de, a Russian statesman, was born in 1718. His father, who was a lieutenant-general in the service of Peter I., was originally of Lucca, in Italy. Young Panin, by his artful address, gained the favour of his sovereign, who sent him, in 1747, to Copenhagen, and afterwards to Stockholm, with the title of minister plenipotentiary. On his return he was made governor of the grand duke, and, lastly, prime minister to Catharine II. Died, 1763.

PANTÆNUS, a Christian philosopher of the Stoic sect, in the second century. He is supposed to have been a native of Alexandria, and to have taught philosophy there about A.D. 140. He went on a mission to Ethiopia, from whence he is said to have brought the Gospel of St. Matthew, written in Hebrew. Died, 213.

PANTALEON, HENRY, a learned physician and historian, was born at Basil, in 1522. He was at first a divine; but afterwards taught dialectics and natural philosophy; and at an advanced age took his doctor's degree in medicine. He composed various works, the most useful of which now is an account of the eminent men of Germany; which he dedicated to the emperor Maximilian II., who gave him the title of count Palatin. Died, 1585.

PANZER, GEORGE WOLFGANG FRANCIS, an eminent bibliographer, born at Sulzbach, in 1729. He became pastor of the church of St. Sebald, at Nuremberg, where he introduced the custom of public confession. He wrote on subjects illustrative of the history of printing; and died in 1804.

PAOLI, HYACINTH, a native of Corsica, who was elected one of the chief magistrates of the island in 1785. On account of the revolutions which distracted his country, and the oppressions of the Genoese, he retired to Naples, where he died.

PAOLI, PASCAL, a Corsican patriot and general, son of the preceding, was born in 1726, at Stratta, in Corsica; followed his father into exile; and was educated at the Jesuit's college, at Naples. In 1775, his countrymen having elected him their generalissimo, he returned to Corsica, where he acted with such vigour against the Genoese, that he confined their dominion within the narrow limits of the fortified seaports; while he exerted himself in promoting such objects as were best calculated to secure the independence of the republic. The Genoese, however, having made a transfer of the island to France, that power sent such an overwhelming force into it as compelled Paoli again to be an exile; and, embarking on board an English vessel, went to England, where he obtained from the government a pension of 1200*l.* a year. In 1789, the island was recognised, by a decree of the National Assembly, as a department of France; and Paoli, being invited to resume his station at the head of affairs, resigned his pension, took his departure from England, and, in 1790, attended by deputies from Corsica, presented himself at the bar of the National Assembly at Paris, where he was received with enthusiasm, and took the oath of fidelity to the French government. The progress of the revolution disappointed the hopes which he had conceived; but he continued the connexion with France till after the execution of Louis XVI., when he abandoned his allegiance, and was invested with his original dignities of the president of the national council, and commander-in-chief of the island. He was encouraged to adopt these measures by the promise of assistance from Great Britain; and, in Feb., 1794, an English army landed in Corsica. On the 14th of June following, a meeting took place of deputies from the different parts of the island, when, through the influence of Paoli, a decree was made declaring the separation of Corsica from France, and its union to the British empire. Shortly after, Paoli revisited London; and, being in embarrassed circumstances, owing to a commercial failure at Leghorn, the English government restored his pension; and he continued to reside in the metropolis till his death, in 1807.

PAPIN, DENYS, an eminent natural philosopher and physician, was born at Blois, in France. After taking the degree of M.D., he visited England; and, in 1680, became a fellow of the Royal Society. While here he made many attempts to bring the steam-engine to perfection, and published an account of an invention, which still bears his name. His work is entitled "The New Digester, or Engine for the softening of Bones," &c. Papin assisted Mr. Boyle in his pneumatic experiments; and on leaving England, he went to Marburg, where he was made mathematical professor in 1687; and died in 1710.

PAPINIAN, ÆMILIUS, a celebrated Roman lawyer, was born in the year 175; and became advocate of the treasury, and afterwards prætorian prefect under the emperor Severus, who recommended his sons, Caracalla and Geta, to his care. When the former murdered his brother, he ordered Papinian to justify the deed, which he not only refused, but nobly observed, that it was easier to commit a parricide than to excuse it, and that slander of innocence was a second parricide. He was accordingly soon after put to death, A.D. 212.

PAPIRIUS PRÆTEXTATUS, a Roman youth, who, on his return from the senate, when his mother was importunate to know the debate, informed her it was whether it would not be more advantageous to the republic for every man to have two wives instead of one! The mother immediately revealed this important secret to several Roman ladies, who assembled in a great body, and besieged the senate, uttering violent complaints. The senators were surprised, but on being acquainted with the stratagem made use of by Papius, they passed a decree that no youths should be admitted into their assembly for the future, except himself.

PAPON, JOHN PETER, an ingenious writer, was born in Puget, near Nice, in 1736. He was a priest of the congregation of the Oratory; but he quitted that society to become keeper of the library at Marseilles. During the stormy era of the Revolution, he removed to the Pay de Dôme; and after remaining there some years, he returned to Paris, where he died in 1803. His principal works are, "Histoire generale de Provence," 4 vols.; for which he obtained a pension; and "Histoire de la Revolution de France," 6 vols., which was a posthumous publication.

PARACELSUS, PHILIPPUS AUREOLUS THEOPHRASTUS, a celebrated Swiss empiric and alchymist, was born at Einsiedeln, near Zurich, in 1493. He travelled through France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, with a view to improvement in medicine, and the arts and sciences connected with it, especially chemistry. In the course of his travels he became acquainted with some remedies not in common use among the faculty, by means of which he performed extraordinary cures, and obtained great reputation. Yet it is evident that he was an impudent charlatan; for, not contented with the fame he had acquired by the boldness of his practice, he boasted of an intercourse with spirits, the possession of the philosopher's stone, the elixir of life, &c. He died, at Salzburg, in 1541.

PARADISI, Count JOHN, born in Modena, in 1760. He was a director of the Cisalpine republic, and president of the senate of Napoleon's kingdom of Italy. Author of "Recherche Sulla Vibrazione delle Lamine Elastiche;" "Il Vitalizio, Commedia," &c.

PARE, AMBROSE, called the father of French surgery, was born at Laval, about the beginning of the 16th century. He was a bold and successful operator, particularly in the practice of tying divided arteries, and in his treatment of gun-shot wounds. He was successively surgeon to Henry II., Francis II., Charles IX., and Henry III.; and died in 1580.

PAREJA, JUAN DE, a painter, was born in the West Indies, in 1610, and became the slave of Diego Valasquez. In the absence of his master, Pareja amused himself in drawing and copying his works, but secretly, for fear of giving offence. Philip IV. king of Spain, coming one day to visit Valasquez, Pareja contrived to place one of his own pictures in his way, with which his majesty was extremely pleased. The slave then fell on his knees, and besought the king to ask his master to forgive him. Philip not only did this, but obtained him his liberty; but the faithful Pareja would not quit Valasquez till his death. His portraits are very fine. He died in 1670.

PARINI, JOSEPH, an eminent Italian poet, was born in 1729, at Basiglio, in the Milanese. He raised himself to eminence by his talents, which he employed in satirizing the vices and follies of the age. He first exerted his poetical abilities to procure the means of support for himself and his widowed mother; but he was obliged to struggle through nearly twenty years of obscurity and indigence, ere he emerged into reputation and competence. He was professor of belles lettres, eloquence, and the fine arts, at Milan; and died in 1799. His works form 6 vols. 8vo.

PARIS, MATTHEW, a Benedictine monk of St. Alban's. He was a mathematician, poet, divine, and historian; and is said to have been a man of great accomplishments, and of rare integrity. His principal work is "A History of the World, from the Creation to the Conquest;" which he afterwards continued to 1250, the year in which he died.

PARIS, FRANCIS, commonly called the abbé Paris, was born in the French capital, where his father was counsellor to the parliament; but the son embraced the ecclesiastical life, and devoted himself to devotion and charity. He died in 1777, and was buried in the cemetery of St. Medard, where the Jansenists pretended that miracles were wrought at his tomb; in consequence of which such crowds resorted to the place, that the government caused the church-yard to be walled up in 1732.

PARIS, FELIX, born in 1769; notary to the revolutionary tribunal. When La Peltetier was assassinated by Paris, he took the name of Fabricius, and attached himself to Danton. When Robespierre wanted to destroy the latter, Paris exerted every effort to save him, by giving timely warning to the latter's naturally bold inconstancy. He told him that he would be arrested in the night; and even went to meet him at the opera, to prevent his going home; but Danton's fate prevailed. Paris was directly after sentenced to the guillotine, but escaped.

PARISEAU, N. DE, born in 1753; a celebrated victim of the "mistakes" of the guillotine. Pariseau was director of the opera ballets at Paris, and ardently espoused the cause of the revolution, in "La Feuille du Jour." He was arrested by the Revolutionary Tribunal in 1793, and beheaded by mistake, instead of Parisot, a captain of the king's guard.

PARISOT, or NORBERT, PETER, a Capuchin, was born at Bar-le-Duc, in 1697. In 1736 he went as a missionary to the East Indies; but having quarrelled with the Jesuits, they had him removed to America. He returned to Europe in 1744; and soon after published a work, entitled "Historical Memoirs relative to the Missions in the Indies," which, giving offence to his own order, as well as the Jesuits, he withdrew to England, where he established two manufactories of tapestry. After visiting part of Germany and the Peninsula, he at length returned to his native country, became reconciled to his order, and again abjured it. His most important work is a "History of the Society of Jesus, from its first foundation by Ignatius Loyola." Died, 1770.

PARK, MUNGO, the celebrated African traveller, was born in 1771, at Fowlsheils, near Selkirk, Scotland, and brought up to the medical profession. After having made a voyage to the East Indies, as a ship's surgeon, he was engaged, in 1796, by the African Society, to penetrate into the Interior of Africa, and explore the course of the Niger. He arrived on the coasts of Senegal in June, 1793, and in December proceeded from Pissania on his adventurous journey. On the 20th of July following he came in sight of the long sought river; but after tracing it for a considerable distance, he was under the necessity of desisting from his enterprise, owing to the state of destitution to which he had been reduced. He accordingly returned towards the coast, and arrived in England at the end of the year 1797. Of his interesting discoveries he published an account in his "Travels in the Interior of Africa." He then returned to Scotland, married, and entered upon the practice of his profession, at Peebles; nor would he, in all probability, have again exposed himself to fresh perils, but for the extraordinary inducement held out to him by government to take the command of a second expedition. He took with him thirty-six Europeans, of whom thirty were soldiers, and the rest mechanics; and he was liberally provided with presents and merchandise. Some time having elapsed without any intelligence being received of him, Isaac, his interpreter (who had been sent back with communications from the Niger), was despatched to procure information. He succeeded in finding the person who had taken his place as interpreter, and from him received a journal, containing an account of the voyage, from which it appeared that the party was attacked by the natives at Boussa, and all killed, with the exception of one slave. This account has been subsequently confirmed by Clapperton and the Landers. The Journal of Park's second Expedition was published in 1815.

PARK, THOMAS, a celebrated bibliographer, who, after having published many works, and been admitted a fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, withdrew his name from its roll, and retired to Hampstead; where he devoted his latter days to affairs of a purely local nature. He died in 1834, aged 76.

PARKE, JOHN, a celebrated musician, born in 1745, was the best hautboy player of his time, and succeeded Fischer, at Vauxhall, in 1770. About the same time Garrick engaged him, on very liberal terms, to play at Drury-lane, and in 1783 he was attached to the Carlton-house band at a yearly salary of 100*l*. He was now in the highest reputation; he performed at the concert of ancient music, at the best private concerts, and was also regularly engaged at the great provincial music meetings. Died, 1829.

PARKER, HENRY, lord Morley, a nobleman of the 16th century, was one of the barons who signed the declaration to pope Clement VII., threatening him with the loss of his supremacy if he refused his consent in the divorce of Henry VIII. He wrote "A Declaration of the 94th Psalm," and is said to have been the author of several tragedies and comedies, but not even the names of them are on record.

PARKER, MATTHEW, archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Norwich, in 1504, and received his education at Corpus Christi college, Cambridge. He was a prelate of great learning and accomplishments; and was zealous in promoting the Reformation, and in restraining the encroachments of the puritans. During the reign of Mary he narrowly escaped being burnt; but when Elizabeth came to the throne he was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury, in which high station he conducted himself with great prudence and firmness. He died May 17, 1575, and was buried in the chapel at Lambeth; but during the Cromwellian usurpation his tomb was demolished, and his bones lay scattered about, till Dugdale deposited them in the midst of the chapel. The archbishop published a sermon preached at the funeral of Bucer; and besides his share in the reformed Liturgy, he was principally concerned in the Bishop's Bible. He was also an eminent antiquary, as appears in his editions of the old English historians, and his work "De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ."

PARKER, SAMUEL, bishop of Oxford in the reign of James II., was born at Northampton, in 1640. He was educated at Wadham college, Oxford; from whence he removed to Trinity college. In 1665 he became a fellow of the Royal Society, and published a work, in Latin, entitled "Tentamina Physico-Theologica de Deo;" for which archbishop Sheldon made him one of his chaplains, and gave him the archdeaconry of Canterbury. He also obtained a prebend in that church, and other preferments; in return for which he displayed his zeal by writing against the nonconformists, in a "Discourse of Ecclesiastical Polity." At the commencement of the next reign he was made bishop of Oxford, and constituted by mandamus president of Magdalen college, Oxford. He wrote many works; among others a "Demonstration of the Divine Authority of the Law of Nature and the Christian Religion;" but though he was a prelate of considerable learning, he was contemptible from his versatility and time-serving disposition. Died, 1667.

PARKER, RICHARD, an English sailor, notorious as the ringleader of the mutineers on board admiral Bridport's squadron, lying at the Nore, in 1797. He was born at Exeter about 1760, received a decent education, and entered into the navy. Being on board the fleet at the Nore at the time of the mutiny, he took a very active part in it, was made principal of the delegates, and so far acquired the confidence of the men by his boldness and talent, that they appointed him admiral of the fleet. He ruled with great authority for some time; but the revolt having at length been suppressed, through the prudent management and firmness of lord Howe, Parker was tried at Sheerness, condemned, and hanged on board the Sandwich, to which ship he had belonged, June 30, 1797.

PARKES, SAMUEL, an ingenious and scientific chemist, was born in 1759, at Stourbridge, in Worcester-shire; and was educated at Market Harborough, under Dr. Addington. He was an eminent experimental chemist; belonged to several literary and philosophical institutions; and was the author of some very useful works, viz., a "Chemical Caterhism;" "Rudiments of Chemistry;" an "Essay on the Utility of Chemistry in the Arts and Manufactures;" and "Chemical Essays." He died in 1825.

PARKHURST, JOHN, a learned divine, was born at Catesby, in Northamptonshire, and educated at Clare hall, Cambridge. He published a "Greek and English Lexicon," also a "Hebrew and English Lexicon," and a tract in defence of the divinity of Jesus Christ. Though he was in holy orders, he held no preferment; and being possessed of an independent fortune, he devoted himself entirely to literary pursuits. He died at Epsom, in Surrey, in 1797.

PARKINSON, THOMAS, an eminent mathematician, was born at Kirkham, in Lancashire, in 1745, and educated at Christ's college, Cambridge. He became rector of Kegworth, archdeacon of Leicester, chancellor of Chester, and a prebendary of St. Paul's, London. In 1789 he published "A System of Mechanics and Hydrostatics," a work of great value; and while at college, he was employed by the Board of Longitude, in the laborious calculation of tables of the series of parallax and refraction. Died, 1830.

PARMENIDES, a Greek philosopher of the Eleatic school, in the fifth century B.C. He was highly esteemed by the ancients, not merely as a speculative philosopher, but as the wise lawgiver of Elea.

PARNELL, THOMAS, a poet and divine, was born in Dublin in 1679; educated at Trinity college; and, in 1705, presented to the archdeaconry of Clogher. He was connected with Addison, Congreve, Steele, and other Whigs in power; but later in life he was the friend of Swift and Pope, the latter of whom gave the works of Parnell to the press. His poems are pleasing, sprightly, and harmonious; while in sentiment they are elegant, and pure in morals. He obtained a prebend in Dublin cathedral, and the vicarage of Finglass. Died, 1717.

PARNY, EVARISTE DESREZ VOIRES, viccount de, a French poet, was born in 1753, at the Isle of Bourbon; was educated at the college of Rennes; and entered into the army. His "Elegies," which appeared in 1775, gave him a conspicuous place among poets, and subsequent works sustained his reputation; but in his latter years he evinced the baseness of his nature by the production of several pieces of an impious and licentious description. Died, 1814.

PARR, THOMAS, an extraordinary instance of longevity, was born in Shropshire in 1483. He was bred to husbandry, in which he laboured after he was one hundred and thirty years old. Ten years before this he married a widow; and he exhibited every sign of health, when, in 1635, the earl of Arundel took him to the court of Charles I., where he died through the change of air and mode of living, at the age of one hundred and fifty-two years, and nine months. His body was opened by Dr. Harvey, who discovered no internal marks of decay.—A grandson of Parr died in Shropshire, at the age of one hundred and twenty.

PARR, CATHARINE, the sixth and last wife of Henry VIII. In 1547 she married Sir Thomas Seymour, lord admiral of England, who is said to have treated her so ill that she died of it the year following. She wrote Prayers, Meditations, and other religious pieces.

PARR, SAMUEL, a learned divine and a profound scholar, was born in 1746, at Harrow-on-the-Hill, Middlesex, and was educated at the grammar-school of that place, and at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He accepted the situation of usher at Harrow, under Dr. Sumner; at whose death he offered himself as a candidate for the mastership, but without success. He first opened an academy at Stanmore, which commenced under very promising appearances, but which, ultimately failing, he gave up in 1776, and then became master of the grammar-school at Colchester; whence, in 1778, he removed to that of Norwich. In 1783 he obtained the perpetual curacy of Hatton, in Warwickshire, and a prebend in St. Paul's cathedral. In 1790 he exchanged Hatton for the rectory of Wadenhoe, in Northamptonshire, though he still continued to live at the former place, to which he was much attached, and the parish church of which he greatly ornamented. In 1802, Sir Francis Burdett gave him the rectory of Grafton, in the county of Huntingdon, and this completed the course of his church preferment. As an elegant classical scholar Dr. Parr stood pre-eminent among his cotemporaries; his prodigious memory and extent of research, rendered him astonishingly powerful in conversation; and it is to be regretted that the greater part of his labours as an author had reference to topics which were of a temporary nature, and therefore, though written with vigour, are fast sinking into oblivion. He died in 1825.

PARRHASIUS, a painter of antiquity, who was a native of Ephesus, though others say he was an Athenian, where he flourished in the time of Socrates, and was the rival of Zenxis. He was so excessively vain as to wear a crown of gold, and to carry a staff studded with gold nails, to indicate that he was the prince of painters.

PARRY, RICHARD, a learned divine, was educated at Oxford, and in 1604 made bishop of St. Asaph. He revised the first edition of the Welsh Bible published in 1620.

PARRY, CALED HILLIER, M.D., F.R.S., a physician and naturalist, was born in 1756, and after graduating in the university of Edinburgh, settled for some time at Norwich, and there married a sister of Dr. Rigby. From thence he removed to Bath, and resided there above forty years, with great reputation, as one of the physicians of the hospital. He was the author of a "Treatise on Angina Pectoris;" another upon "Wool;" and a work on "Hydrophobia;" but his greatest performance is entitled "The Elements of Pathology," published in 1816. He died in 1822, leaving two sons; the eldest, a physician at Bath, and the other, Sir Edward Parry, the distinguished commander of the arctic expedition.

PARSONS, JAMES, an eminent English

physician and medical writer, was born at Barnstaple, in Devonshire, in 1708. Physic, anatomy, natural history, antiquities, &c. are indebted to his skill and industry, for many important truths discovered in their support, or errors detected, with which they were obscured. His most remarkable production is his "Remains of Japhet," being historical inquiries into the Affinities and Origin of the European Languages." Died, 1770.

PARSONS, WILLIAM, an eminent English comic actor, was born in 1736, and made his first appearance on the stage at Edinburgh, where he soon established a high reputation as a representative of old men. In 1763 he made his debut at Drury-lane, and was a great favourite with the public, particularly in low comedy. To his theatrical talents he added considerable skill as a painter. Died, 1795.

PAS, ANTHONY DE, marquis de Feuquieres, one of the greatest generals of his age. He was so severe a disciplinarian, that it was usually said, "He must be the bravest man living, since he slept every night in the midst of one hundred thousand enemies." He died in 1711.

PASCAL, BLAISE, a Frenchman, highly eminent as a mathematical genius, was born at Clermont, in Auvergne, in 1623. As a writer he is celebrated for his "Provincial Letters," published in 1656, under the name of Louis de Montalte, which are a caustic satire upon the lax morality of the Jesuits, and, as Voltaire says, may be considered as models of eloquence and humour. Died, 1662.

PASCHAL, CHARLES, an eminent writer on ethics, antiquities, and jurisprudence, in the 17th century, was a native of France. He was the author of an elaborate work, in ten books, entitled "De Corona," and another, called "Virtutum et Vitorum Characteres." Died, 1625.

PASCHASIUS RABERTUS, a Benedictine of the ninth century, born at Soissons. He became abbot of Corbey; which situation he resigned some time before his death, in 865. Paschasius first introduced the doctrine of transubstantiation; and his treatise "De Corpore Christi" was opposed by Erigena and others.

PASOR, GEORGE, a learned divine, who was professor of theology and Hebrew, first at Herborn, and next at Franeker, where he died in 1637.

PASQUIER, STEPHEN, an eminent French civilian, born at Paris, in 1539, who first rose into reputation, as an advocate, by pleading against the Jesuits before the parliament. In his writings also he proved himself a formidable adversary of that dangerous and encroaching order. Died, 1615.

PASSEMANT, CLAUDE SIMON, a mathematician, was born at Paris in 1702. He published an account of a large reflecting telescope made by him in 1738. He also constructed an astronomical pendulum surmounted on a celestial sphere, which he presented to Louis XV. Died, 1769.

PASSERI, JOHN BAPTIST, a painter and poet, was the disciple of Dominichino. He wrote "Lives of the Painters, Sculptors, and Architects" of his time. Died, 1679.

PASSIONEI, DOMINIC, a cardinal, was born at Fossombrone, in the duchy of Urbino, in 1692; and studied in the Clementine college at Rome. In 1706 he went with Qualterio, the nuncio, to Paris; and in 1708, he became a secret agent for the pope in Holland. He was also employed on several other missions, particularly in Switzerland, of which he published an account, entitled "Acta Legationis Helvetice," folio. Innocent XIII. made him archbishop of Ephesus; Clement XII. raised him to the purple; and Benedict XIV. appointed him librarian of the Vatican; in which situation he promoted Dr. Kennicott's great undertaking, by causing the Hebrew manuscripts to be collated for his use. Died, 1761.

PASSWAN OGLOU, OSMAN, a celebrated Turkish rebel, was born in 1754, at Widdin, in Bulgaria. His father having been put to death by the Porte, Passwan took refuge in the mountains, and gathered round him a considerable body of partisans; and having seized upon Widdin, he held the fortress for several years, in spite of all the efforts which were made to dispossess him; so that the sultan at length felt it necessary to confirm him in the government. Died, 1807.

PATERCULUS, CAIUS VELLEIUS, an ancient historian, was born in the year of Rome 735; served under Tiberius in Germany, as commander of the cavalry; and, in the first year of that emperor's reign, was nominated prætor. He died in his fiftieth year, leaving an abridgment of Roman history in ten books, of which the greater part is lost.

PATERSON, SAMUEL, a bibliographer, was born in London, in 1728. He became an orphan at the age of twelve years, and was sent, by a dishonest guardian, to France, where he acquired such a knowledge of books as induced him to open a shop in the Strand; but without success. He next turned auctioneer; and, in 1757, sold the manuscript collections of Sir Julius Cæsar, which circumstance brought his talents into notice, and he was employed in the formation of catalogues, and the sale of libraries. His principal performance in this line is the "Bibliotheca Universalis Selecta." He also wrote "Cursorio Remarks on a Journey through the Netherlands, by Coriat, junior," 3 vols. Died, 1802.

PATIN, GUY, a French physician, memorable for the inveterate hatred he professed for all antimonial preparations, was born near Beauvois, in 1601; chosen dean of the faculty of medicine at Paris, in 1650; and died in 1672. His works, which form seven volumes, chiefly consist of "Letters," and are remarkable for their caustic satire.—His son CHARLES, who was also a physician, wrote some clever treatises on medals; and died in 1693.

PATKUL, JOHN REINHOLD, count, a Livonian, who endeavoured to shake off the Swedish yoke; but, being unsuccessful, went to Saxony, where he resided as agent for Peter the Great. On being delivered up to Charles XII., he was executed on the charge of treason, in 1706.

have been a native of Cornwall, whose zeal prompted him to cross the channel for the conversion of the pagan Irish. By others, however, he is said to have been a native of Kirkpatrick, on the Clyde: and that his name was Sacrothus, until changed by pape Celestine. Others again assert, that he was born in Brittany, and carried by some freebooters to Ireland, where he was at first employed in keeping sheep. Be this as it may, it is allowed by all that his endeavours were crowned with great success, and that he established there a number of schools and monasteries. Nennius states that his missions continued forty years, and his various miracles are attributed to him, particularly the often-repeated assertion of the absence of all venomous creatures from Ireland, ascribed by the superstitious to his holy benediction. We can no more reconcile the conflicting testimonies relative to the place of his birth, than we could determine the validity of his miraculous powers; and, perhaps, for the sake of truth, the least that is said of either the better. It would seem that the latter years of his life were devoted to acts of piety and religious meditation; and that he died, at an advanced age, about the year 493. His works, or at least those ascribed to him, were published, with remarks, by Sir James Ware, in 1658.

PATRICK, SIMON, an English prelate, born in 1626, at Gainsborough, in Lincolnshire. He was educated at Queen's college, Cambridge; became vicar of Battersea, in 1638; obtained the living of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, in 1662; and endeared himself much to his parishioners by remaining with them during the plague. He was afterwards, successively, a prebendary of Westminster, dean of Peterborough, bishop of Chichester, and, lastly, bishop of Ely, where he died, in 1707, in high reputation for learning, talent, and piety. During the reign of James II. he was one of the ablest defenders of the Protestant religion; and among his works are, "Christian Sacrifice;" "The Devout Christian;" "Jesus and the Resurrection Justified;" a "History of the Church of Peterborough;" "Commentaries" and "Paraphrases" on the principal books of the Old Testament; and some others of less note.

PATRICK, SAMUEL, a learned critic, editor of a number of useful works relating to classical literature; viz. "Planti Comedie quatuor, cum Notis Operarii;" "Hederici Lexicon Manuale Græcum;" "Clavis Homerica," &c. Died, 1748.

PATRIN, EUGENE LOUIS MELCHIOR, a celebrated French geologist, was born at Lyons, in 1742. After ten years' travelling through the North of Europe, for the purpose of forming a collection of mineral specimens, he revisited France, and was chosen a member of the National Convention for his native city. Having voted for the banishment of Louis XVI., he was proscribed, and obliged to conceal himself during the reign of terror. On the creation of the School of Mines, he presented his museum of minerals to that institution, of which he was made librarian. His principal work, "Histoire Naturelle des Mine-raux," in 5 vols., forms a sequel to the works of Buffon. Died, 1815.

PATRIZI, or PATRICIO, FRANCISCO, an Italian writer, eminent for his acquaintance with classical literature, and a sincere Platonist, was born in Istria, in 1530; and died at Rome, in 1597.

PATTISON, WILLIAM, born at Pease-march, in Sussex, in 1706, was an English poet of great genius, but whose imprudence made his life miserable, and his death premature. Having quarrelled with his tutor at Sidney college, Cambridge, and fearing an expulsion, he came to London, where he plunged into all the pleasures of the metropolis, was soon reduced to indigence, and died of the small-pox in his 21st year.

PAUL OF BURGOS, a converted Jew, who became patriarch of Aquileia; and died in 1435. He wrote "Scrutinium Scripturarum," and other works.—His son ALPHONSO, was bishop of Burgos, and wrote an abridgment of the Spanish history.

PAUL THE DEACON, or PAULUS DIACONUS, was a native of Friuli, and a monk in the abbey of Monte Cassino, where he wrote a "History of the Lombards." Died, 743.

PAUL OF SAMOSATA, so named from the place of his birth, flourished in the third century. In 260 he was chosen bishop of Antioch; but having preached against the divinity of Christ, he was deposed in 270. The queen Zenobia took his part, but the emperor Aurelian expelled him from Antioch in 273, and what became of him afterwards is unknown. His followers were called Paulinists for a long time after his death.

PAUL, ST. VINCENT DE, an ecclesiastic of the church of Rome, was born in 1576. In a voyage which he made from Marseilles, his ship was taken by the Turks, and he remained in slavery some years; but having made a convert of his master, he obtained his liberty, and returned to France. Louis XIII. made him abbot of St. Leonard de Chaline, and he also had the living of Clichy, where he built a church at his own expense. He was next placed at the head of the council of conscience, and chief of the house of St. Lazare, in which situations his zeal and charity knew no bounds. He projected missions into all parts of the world, and instituted a number of benevolent establishments. He died in 1660, and was afterwards canonized.

PAULIAN, AIME HENRI, a French Jesuit, was born, in 1722, at Nîmes, and was distinguished as the author of several works on natural philosophy. Died, 1802.

PAULIN DE ST. BARTHELEMI, or JOHN PHILIP WERDIN, was a monk of the Carmelite order, born in Austria, in 1746, and having studied the Oriental languages, went as a missionary to the East Indies, where he passed fourteen years, and was honoured with the title of apostolic visitor. He was then recalled to Rome, to give an account of the eastern missions, and to correct the catechisms, &c. then printing for the use of the missionaries. When the French invaded Italy in 1798, he removed to Vienna; but he returned to Rome in 1800; was patronized by Pius VII.; wrote an account of his travels, and the state of Christianity in India; and died in 1806.

PAULINUS, patriarch of Aquileia in the eighth century, was born near Friuli, in 726. He was a zealous defender of the doctrine of the Trinity, and died in 804.—Another PAULINUS, born at Bourdeaux, in 353, having married a Spanish lady, who converted him, settled at Nola, of which he became bishop, and died in 439. He was a learned and liberal prelate, much esteemed by his contemporaries.

PAULLI, SIMON, a physician and naturalist, was born at Rostock, in 1603, and died at Copenhagen, in 1680. He wrote "Quadrupartitum Botanicum;" "Flora Danica;" "A Treatise against Tobacco and Tea," translated into English by Dr. James.

PAULMY, MARK ANTONY RENE DE VOYER, marquis de, minister of state, and a member of the French academy, was born at Valenciennes, in 1732. He collected one of the most magnificent libraries in Europe, which was sold to the count d'Artois, brother to Louis XVI. M. de Paulmy published "Melanges d'une grande Bibliothèque," 69 vols. 8vo., and a work entitled "Essays in the Style of those of Montaigne," 9 vols. 8vo. Died, 1787.

PAULUS, JULIUS, a celebrated Roman lawyer, of the third century, who, being made an Imperial counsellor, under Severus and Caracalla, distinguished himself by the boldness with which he delivered his opinions. Under Heliogabalus he was banished; but the emperor Alexander Severus recalled him, raised him to the consular dignity, and appointed him prætorian prefect, after the death of Ulpian.

PAULUS, PETER, grand pensionary of Holland, was born in 1734. As a minister of the marine department he displayed great activity and intelligence; but having offended the stadtholder's government, he was removed from his situation in 1787, and retired into France. He afterwards returned, and held very important offices in the state. Died, 1796. Paulus was the author of a "Commentary on the Treaty of Utrecht," 3 vols.; a "Memoir on the Equality of Mankind;" and other works.

PAUSANIAS, the son of Cleombrotus, king of Sparta, governed the kingdom for his nephew during his minority. Being discontented with his country, he entered into a secret treaty with the king of Persia; but this being discovered by the ephori, to avoid the punishment due to his treason, he fled into the temple of Minerva, which being held sacred, the Lacedæmonians blocked it up with stones, the first of which was placed by Pausanias's mother. He was there starved to death, B. C. 474.

PAUSANIUS, a Greek topographical writer, who flourished during the reigns of Adrian and the Antonines. He taught at Athens, and afterwards at Rome, where he died. His "Description Græciæ," a kind of journal of his travels, in which he describes every thing remarkable in Greece, is still extant, and is a valuable work for the antiquarian.

PAUSIAS, a painter of Sicily, and the disciple of Pamphilus, flourished about 322 B. C. He was the first who applied colours to wood and ivory by fire, now called encaustic painting.

PAUW, CORNELIUS DE, a Dutch writer, was born at Amsterdam, in 1739. He was an ecclesiastic, and had a canonry in Germany, where he died in 1799. He was uncle to Anacharsis Cloots, who figured at the French Revolution, and his opinions were in some respects as singular. His principal work is entitled "Recherches Philosophiques, sur les Grecs, les Américains, les Égyptiens et les Chinois," 7 vols. 8vo., a work of talent, but full of paradoxes and free opinions.

PEACHAM, HENRY, an ingenious writer of the 17th century, was born at North Mims, in Hertfordshire, and educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. He afterwards went to Italy, and while in that country studied painting, music, and the fine arts generally. His principal work, entitled "The Complete Gentleman," was once extremely popular. Besides this, he published "Minerva Britannica;" "Theatrum Banquet;" "The Valley of Variety;" "The Worth of a Penny;" and "The Gentleman's Exercise." Died, about 1640.

PEACOCK, ROBINALD, a learned and worthy prelate, was successively bishop of St. Asaph and Chichester, by the favour of Humphrey, the good duke of Gloucester. But he was deposed for resisting the papal authority, and denying transubstantiation, with other articles of the Roman catholic faith. He was obliged to recant his notions, and his books were publicly burnt; after which he was confined in Thorney abbey, where he died, in 1460.

PEARCE, ZACHARY, bishop of Rochester, a prelate of great learning and piety, was born in London, in 1690; was educated at Westminster school, and Trinity college, Cambridge; became, successively, vicar of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, dean of Winchester, bishop of Bangor, and bishop of Rochester. His principal works are, erudite editions of Longinus and Cicero; a "Review of Paradise Lost;" a "Commentary on the Four Evangelists," &c. 2 vols.; and "Sermons," 4 vols. He left among other charitable bequests, 5000*l.* to the college for clergymen's widows at Bromley.

PEARCE, NATHANIEL, a sailor, was born, in 1780, at Acton, near London. In 1805 he accompanied lord Valentin to Abyssinia; and being, by his own desire, left there, married, and enjoyed for many years the favour of the king. He died, on his journey to England, in 1830, at Alexandria. Though an uneducated man, Pearce was a shrewd observer, and has contributed much to our knowledge of the present state of the country in which he was domiciled.

PEARSON, JOHN, an eminent English prelate, was born at Suaring, in Norfolk, in 1612, and died bishop of Chester, in 1666. He is principally known by his valuable "Exposition of the Creed." He also wrote "Vindictæ Ignatii, or a Defence of the Epistles of St. Ignatius," and other learned works.

PEARSON, MARGARET BOLINGTON, a lady distinguished for her skill in the art of enamelling, or painting on glass, was the daughter of Samuel Paterson, the bibliographer, and married an artist named Pearson, with whom she established a manufactory of stained glass at Hampstead. Some of her productions have scarcely ever been equalled, particularly her copies of Raphael's cartoons. Died, 1823.

PEARSON, GEORGE, M.D., F.R.S., was a native of Rotherham, in Yorkshire. He studied medicine in London, Edinburgh, and Leyden; was one of the physicians of St. George's hospital; and rendered essential benefit to the lovers of chemistry, by his experimental knowledge of the science. The component parts of Dr. James's febrifuge powder having been kept a profound secret, Dr. Pearson analysed the composition, and proved them to be composed solely of antimony and phosphate of lime. Died, 1828.

PECK, FRANCIS, a learned antiquary, was born at Stamford, in 1662. He took his several degrees in arts at Trinity college, Cambridge; became rector of Godeby, in Lincolnshire; obtained a prebend in the cathedral of Lincoln; and died in 1743. His principal publications are, "The Antiquarian Annals of Stamford;" "Desiderata Curiosa;" "Memoirs of Oliver Cromwell;" and "Memoirs of John Milton."

PECQUET, JOHN, a celebrated anatomist and physician, was born at Dieppe, and died at Paris in 1674. He discovered the thoracic duct, and the receptacle of the chyle, and traced the progress of the chyle into the left subclavian vein. He wrote "Experimenta Nova Anatomica," and other works.

PEDRO I., ANTONIO JOSE D'ALCANTARA, Dom, ex-emperor of Brazil, was the eldest son of John VI. king of Portugal, elder brother of Dom Miguel, and nephew to Ferdinand VII. king of Spain. He was born in 1798, and was taken in 1808, with the rest of the royal family, to Brazil. In 1817 he married Leopoldine, archduchess of Austria, daughter of the emperor Francis I., by whom he had five children, among whom was the present queen, Donna Maria. Leopoldine died in 1826; and in 1829 he married Amelia, princess of Leuchtenberg, the daughter of Eugene Beauharnois. On account of the events which led to Pedro's abdication of the crown of Brazil, in favour of his son, Pedro II., he embarked on board an English ship of war for Europe, in the spring of 1831, and arrived in London in July, as a private gentleman, bearing the title of duke of Braganza. Operations immediately commenced for displacing his brother, Dom Miguel, from the throne of Portugal, and many severe conflicts took place; at length, in July, 1832, the fleet of Pedro, under the command of admiral Napier, signally defeated that of Miguel; which event, with other successes of the Pedroite party, led to his brother's abandonment of the throne, and the accession of Donna Maria. Dom Pedro died in 1834.

PEEL, Sir ROBERT, bart., third son of Mr. Peel, of Peel-cross, Lancashire, and father of the celebrated statesman who inherits his name and title, was born in 1750. This gentleman evinced, at a very early age, a quickness of perception and a spirit of enterprise which led to distinguished acts in the course of his useful life. In 1770 he devoted a great portion of his time to the improvement of machinery, and succeeded in the application of mechanical power to an extent which caused the abridgment of human labour, and added greatly to the facilities of commerce. Sir Robert embarked in the cotton trade in 1773, and carried on a manufactory at Bury with great success. From his earliest years he had encouraged a belief that a person had it in his power to attain eminence by industry and perseverance, and he spent many of his youthful nights in reading and study; so that he acquired a thorough knowledge of commercial and manufacturing subjects. In politics he adopted the sentiments of Mr. Pitt, and was a strenuous supporter of every measure which had for its object the commercial prosperity or the internal peace of the country. He was created a baronet in 1801. In the following year he brought a bill into parliament for ameliorating the condition of apprentices employed in the cotton and woollen trades. Sir Robert filled the office of vice-president of the Literary Fund, and was a governor of Christ's Hospital. He died, at his seat, Drayton Park, Staffordshire, in 1830.

PEELE, GEORGE, a dramatist and poet of the Elizabethan age, was a native of Devonshire, and was educated at Oxford, where he completed his degrees in arts in 1579. On coming to London he formed an acquaintance with Shakespeare, Johnson, and other dramatic writers, and wrote for the stage. He wrote five plays, which were well received; also, some pastoral and other poems. There is a scarce book still extant, entitled, "The merry conceited Jests of George Peele, &c." He died about 1596.

PEGGE, SAMUEL, LL.D. an eminent divine and antiquary, was born at Chesterfield, in 1704, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. In 1731 he was presented to the living of Godmersham, in Kent, and in 1751, to Whittington, in Staffordshire, to which was added the rectory of Brindley, in Lancashire, which he exchanged for that of Heath. He obtained also two prebends, one in Lichfield cathedral, and the other in Lincoln. His principal works are "Dissertations on Anglo-Saxon Remains;" "The Life of Robert Grosseteste, bishop of Lincoln;" "Anonymiana; or ten centuries of observations." He also contributed numerous papers to the Archæologia and the Gentleman's Magazine. Died, 1796.—His son, SAMUEL, a barrister, was born in 1731, and died in 1800, groom of the King's bedchamber. He was the author of "Curialia," and "Anecdotes of the English Language."—Sir CHRISTOPHER PEGGE, the son of the last-mentioned, practised many PEIRESC, NICHOLAS CLAUDE FABRI, a learned Frenchman, was born at Beaugency, in 1580, and distinguished himself by his application to the study of antiquities, and a display of extraordinary abilities, while at the Jesuit's college, at Avignon. He afterwards fixed his residence at Padua, and made himself master of the mathematics, and of the Hebrew, Samaritan, Syriac, and Arabic languages. In 1605 he visited England, and became acquainted with Camden, and other English literati. In 1607 he was admitted a senator at Aix, and in 1618 he obtained the abbey of Guîtres, in Guienne, where he continued to employ himself in literary and scientific pursuits till his death, in 1637.

PEIROUS, PHILIP PICOT, baron de la, an eminent naturalist, was born at Toulouse, in 1744. Until the breaking out of the Revolution he had employed himself in travelling and making scientific researches, which he communicated to the public in a work on fossils, &c., and in various memoirs on the plants and minerals of the Pyrenean mountains. In 1750 he was appointed one of the administrators of the district of Toulouse; but during the tyranny of Robespierre he suffered eighteen months' imprisonment. He subsequently resumed his scientific labours; and was successively nominated inspector of mines, and professor of natural history at the central school of Toulouse. In 1800 he was appointed mayor of Toulouse, which office he held till 1808; and during his administration he founded a botanic garden, public libraries, a museum, and other important establishments. Died, 1818.

PELAGIUS, a British ecclesiastic of the fifth century, whose real name was MORGAN, which he changed for the corresponding Greek term, signifying "born of the sea." He is said to have been abbot of Bangor; and, about the year 400, he went to Rome, where he opposed the doctrines of St. Augustine, respecting original sin, irresistible grace, and eternal election; asserting the possibility of man's being saved by his own merits. Accompanied by his countryman, Celestius, he went to Palestine, and met with a kind reception from the bishop of Jerusalem. In the meantime, Augustine and Jerome attacked his tenets with great severity, and the council of Carthage condemned his opinions as heretical. At the accession of pope Zosimus he took Pelagius and Celestius under his protection, but he afterwards turned against them, and instigated the emperor to persecute their followers. The time and place of his death are alike uncertain.

PELL, JOHN, an English divine and very eminent mathematician; born, 1610; died, 1685; leaving very numerous and valuable treatises on the mathematics.

PELLEGRIN, SIMON JOSEPH, a French poet and ecclesiastic, was born at Marseilles, in 1663, and died in 1745. He wrote several pieces for the stage, and some poems.

PELLERIN, JOSEPH, a French antiquary, who was commissary-general, and clerk of the marine, at Paris, where he died at the age of ninety-nine, in 1782. He published ten volumes in quarto on the subject of medals; and his cabinet, which was one of the richest in Europe, was purchased by the king of France.

PELLETIER, CLAUDE LE, a French financier, was born at Paris, in 1630. He succeeded Colbert as controller of the finances in 1683. Six years afterwards he resigned his place, and in 1697 he retired from court to lead a life of study and devotion. The quay at Paris which bears his name was built by him. Died, 1711.

PELLETIER, BERNARD, an ingenious French chemist, was born at Bayonne, in 1761, and died of a consumption, brought on by inhaling oxymuriatic acid gas, in 1797. He made a number of discoveries, the particulars of which were communicated to the public in the Journal of Natural History, of which he was the principal conductor.

PELLISSON-FONTANIER, PAUL, an eminent French writer, was born at Beziers, in 1624. He was bred to the law, and, at the age of twenty-one, published, "A Commentary on the Institutes of Justinian." In 1652 he became secretary to the king, and in the same year he published the "History of the French Academy," which procured him the extraordinary honour of being admitted a member of that learned body, though at the time there was no vacancy. The minister Fouquet appointed him master of the accounts at Montpellier; but when that statesman was disgraced, Pellisson was sent to the Bastille, where he remained four years. On recovering his liberty, he attended the king, as historiographer, in his expedition against Holland. After this, he abjured the protestant religion, entered into orders, and obtained several benefices. He was the author of Reflexions sur les differences de la Religion; and other works. Died, 1693.

PELLOUTIER, SIMON, an historian, was born at Lelpais, in 1634. He became pastor of the French church at Berlin, counsellor to the consistory, and librarian of the academy. He wrote a work replete with curious and learned research, entitled "Histoire des Celtes."

PELOPIDAS, a valiant and patriotic Theban general, was the friend of Epaminondas and the associate of his victories. When the Spartans conquered Thebes, Pelopidas went to Athens, where he assembled his exiled countrymen; with whom he returned, seized upon Thebes, and expelled the invaders. Afterwards he defeated the Lacedemonians at Tegyra, and shared with Epaminondas the victory of Leuctra. Pelopidas being sent ambassador to Alexander, the tyrant of Phœria, was thrown into prison; but on the appearance of Epaminondas he obtained his release. He went next to the court of Persia; and, after his return, commanded the forces sent to the relief of Thessaly, where he fell, B.C. 364.

PEMBERTON, HENRY, a learned physician and mathematician, was born in London, in 1694; studied under Boerhaave, at Leyden; became intimately acquainted with Sir Isaac Newton and other eminent men, and was himself much distinguished for his scientific acquirements. He became professor of medicine in Gresham college, and an active member of the Royal Society. His principal works are, "A View of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy," "Lectures on Chemistry," and "Observations on Poetry." Died, 1771.

PENN, WILLIAM, an English admiral, was born at Bristol, in 1621. He commanded the fleet, and Venables the land forces, at the taking of Jamaica in 1655. After the restoration he served under the duke of York, in the successful battle with the Dutch fleet in 1664, for which he was knighted. He died at Wanstead, in Essex, in 1670.

PENN, WILLIAM, the founder and legislator of Pennsylvania, was the son of the preceding, and born in London, in 1644. He was educated at Christchurch college, Oxford, and there imbibed the principles of Quakerism, which he afterwards publicly professed. This was considered by Sir William as a heinous offence; and, finding his son inflexibly adhered to that plainness of speech and deportment, which are the distinguishing characteristics of the sect, he on two occasions drove him from his family; yet after awhile, becoming convinced of his integrity, he permitted him to return; though he never openly countenanced him, neither would he use his interest to get him released, when imprisoned for his attendance at religious meetings. In the twenty-fourth year of his age, Penn first appeared as a minister and an author; and it was on account of his second essay, entitled the "Sandy Foundation Shaken," that he was imprisoned in the Tower, where he remained seven months, during which time he wrote his most celebrated work, "No Cross, no Crown," and finally obtained his release from confinement by an exculpatory vindication, under the title of "Innocency with her open Face." In 1670 Sir William died, fully reconciled to his son, and leaving him a plentiful estate. Penn now devoted himself to a steady perseverance in the propagation of his opinions; and from that time published a great variety of tracts, and travelled much in Holland and Germany to support the cause of Quakerism. In 1681 Charles II. in consideration of the services of his father, and sundry debts due to him from the crown at the time of his decease, granted Mr. Penn and his heirs, by letters-patent, the province lying on the west side of the river Delaware, in North America, and made them absolute proprietors and governors of that country. The name too was changed, in honour of Penn, from the New Netherlands to Pennsylvania. Upon this, he published "A Brief Account of the Province of Pennsylvania," proposing an easy purchase of lands, and good terms of settlement to such as were inclined to remove thither. In 1682 he embarked for his new colony; in the following year he founded Philadelphia; nor did he cease to watch over its interests with a paternal eye till his death, which happened in 1718.

PENNANT, THOMAS, an eminent naturalist and antiquary, was born at Downing, the family seat in Flintshire, in 1726. After travelling over England, he went abroad, and was introduced to Voltaire, Buffon, Linnæus, and other eminent men. In 1750 he published the "British Zoology," a work of considerable merit. In 1771 appeared his "Tour in Scotland," which was followed, at different periods, by a great number of ingenious performances, as, "Arctic Zoology;" "A View of Hindostan;" "An Account of London," various Tours, &c. He also published his "Literary Memoirs;" and at the time of his death, in 1798, was engaged on a description of India, of which one volume was printed.

PENNICUIK, ALEXANDER, a Scotch physician, was born in 1632, at New-hall near Edinburgh, and after spending his youth abroad, returned and died in his own country, in 1732. He wrote a "Topographical Description of Tweeddale," and a number of poems characteristic of the manners of the gentry and peasantry in his time. He is also said to have given to Allan Ramsay the plot of his Gentle Shepherd, the scenes of which were laid on his estate of New-hall.

PENRY, or AP HENRY, JOHN, a violent puritan, better known by his assumed name, Martin Marprelate, was born in Wales in 1559, and educated at Peter-house, Cambridge, from whence he removed to Oxford, where he took his degree of master of arts, and entered into orders. In the controversy between the puritans and the hierarchy, he wrote some scandalous libels against the church, under the assumed name of Martin Marprelate, for which he was tried, condemned, and executed, in 1593.

PEPUSCH, JOHN CHRISTOPHER, a musician, was born at Berlin, in 1667, and gave early proofs of his genius for the science. After obtaining considerable reputation in his native place, he came to England, took his doctor's degree in music at Oxford, and was very successful as a composer for the stage. Though he had the good fortune to acquire a handsome competency by marrying Signora de l'Epine, an opera singer, he continued to follow music as a profession till his death, in 1732. He was the author of a very valuable treatise "On Harmony."

PEPYS, SAMUEL, secretary to the admiralty in the reigns of Charles II. and James II., was born at Bampton, in Huntingdonshire; received his education at St. Paul's school and at Magdalen college, Cambridge; and being patronized by Montagu, afterwards the earl of Sandwich, accompanied him as secretary, in the fleet that was sent to bring back Charles II. He was in high favour with the monarch, and introduced many important improvements into the navy. On the accession of William and Mary he resigned, and published his "Memoirs" relating to the navy, which is a very valuable work. But, independent of his great skill and experience in naval affairs, he was well informed in history, painting, sculpture, architecture, &c.; such indeed was his reputation, that in 1684 he was elected president of the Royal Society. But that which has most contributed to give an interest to the name of Pepys of late years, is the recent publication of his very amusing and instructive "Diary," which, besides illustrating his own prudent and wary character with extreme fidelity and naïveté, affords a most curious and instructive picture of the court of Charles II., and the habits, manners, and conduct of the people at large. He died in 1703.

PERCEVAL, JOHN, first earl of Egmont, was born at Barton, in Yorkshire, in 1683. At the accession of George I. he was created baron Perceval, and in 1733 was made earl of Egmont. He was a principal promoter of the settlement of Georgia, in America; and died in 1748.—His son, JOHN, second earl of Egmont, was born at Westminster, in 1711; filled a situation in the household of the prince of Wales, and that of joint postmaster-general; was in 1762 created an English peer by the title of lord Lovel and Holland; was made first lord of the admiralty in 1763; and died in 1770.

PERCEVAL, the Right Hon. SPENCER, second son of the preceding, was born in 1762; was educated at Harrow and Cambridge; practised as a chancery barrister; and attached himself at his onset in political life to the system of Mr. Pitt, who brought him into parliament for Northampton. Mr. Perceval's knowledge of finance opened to him a field for promotion; he was appointed one of the counsellors for the crown, and soon became solicitor-general, and, in 1803, attorney-general. He advocated the union of England with Ireland, but was against concession to the Catholics—in short, he was a firm supporter of the measures of ministers during the life of Pitt, and sat on the opposition side during the administration of Fox; at whose decease, in 1807, he obtained a place in the cabinet as chancellor of the exchequer, and also that of chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster. He was supposed to have the lead in the cabinet, although he did not then hold the office of first lord of the treasury, but to this he succeeded at the death of the duke of Portland in 1809. It was very generally considered that he held the office pro tempore, until the marquis Wellesley should return from his embassy to Spain; but when the latter did return, Mr. Perceval still managed to retain his place. When the prince regent took the reins of government into his own hands, he confirmed Mr. Perceval in his office, and the marquis Wellesley resigned that of minister for foreign affairs, telling the prince he would willingly act with Perceval, but not under him. Mr. Perceval kept his exalted station only a short period; for on the 11th of May, 1812, he was shot on entering the lobby of the House of Commons, by a person named Bellingham, who avowed that he had been waiting with the view of destroying lord Leveson Gower, late ambassador to the court of St. Petersburg. Thus the unfortunate minister fell a victim to the misdirected vengeance of a man who conceived himself injured by the conduct of another member of the government, for whom he had mistaken him. The assassin was found guilty, and executed on the 18th of the same month.

PERCIVAL, THOMAS, an eminent physician and miscellaneous writer, was born at Warrington, in Lancashire, in 1740. After studying at Edinburgh and Leyden, he settled at Manchester, and there founded a literary and philosophical society, of which he was chosen president. Among his works are, "Medical Ethics;" "Moral and Literary Dissertations;" and "A Father's Instructions to his Children." Died, 1804.

PERCY, THOMAS, an eminent prelate, related to the Northumberland family, was born in 1738, at Bridgenorth, in Shropshire; was educated at Christchurch college, Oxford; became chaplain in ordinary to the king; was next promoted to the deanery of Carlisle; and, in 1782, advanced to the bishopric of Dromore, in Ireland, where he died in 1811. His principal works are, "The Hermit of Warkworth," a poem; "The Reliques of English Poetry;" some translations from the Chinese; a translation of Mallet's Northern Antiquities, &c.

PERDICCAS, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, after whose death he aspired to the crown of Macedonia, to accomplish which design he divorced his wife, and espoused Cleopatra, sister of Alexander. His project being discovered by Antigonus, he entered into a league with Craterus and Ptolemy, governor of Egypt, against Perdiccas, who marched to Memphis, but was slain in his tent by some of his soldiers, B.C. 322.

PERGOLESİ, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, a distinguished musician, was born at Casoria, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1704, and died in 1737. He is called the Domenichino of music, and according to the opinion of his countrymen, no one ever excelled him in musical expression. Among his most celebrated works are, the "Stabat Mater;" "Olimpiade," an opera; "Orfeo e Euridice;" and "Salva Regina."

PEREFIXE, HARDOUIN DE BEAUMONT, a French historian and divine, was born at Paris, in 1603; studied at Poitiers and his native city; acquired great popularity as a preacher; and was appointed preceptor to Louis XIV. In 1648 he was raised to the see of Rhodéz; in 1662 he was made archbishop of Paris; and he died in 1670. His "Life of Henry IV." is a work of great merit.

PEREIRE, JACOB RODRIGUEZ, a native of Estremadura, in Spain, was the first who practised in France the art of teaching the deaf and dumb. His method of instruction was quite different to that of the abbe l'Epée; but it was considered so good, that Louis XV. bestowed on him a pension of 500 francs. He wrote several treatises on the subject; and died in 1780.

PERICLES, one of the most illustrious statesmen of Greece, was a native of Athens, who flourished about five centuries before Christ. Having gained the confidence of the people, he effected a revolution in the state, by reducing the authority of the Areopagus, and banishing Cimon, with some other powerful men of the republic. He then led the Athenians against the Sicyonians, the Samians, and Lacedæmonians; but at last the people, forgetful of their obligations to Pericles, condemned him to pay an exorbitant fine, for having advised the war in which they had gained so much glory. He was, however, soon reinstated, and maintained himself at the head of public affairs till his death, B. C. 429.

PERIER, JAMES CONSTANTINE and CHARLES, brothers, two eminent French mechanics. They were natives of Paris; and being engaged in hydraulic inventions, the former made repeated visits to England to examine the steam engines, and other important machines invented or improved in this country. During the revolutionary war 1200 pieces of cannon were cast at their establishment at Chaillot, under the direction of Monge: they also erected a foundry of cannon for the navy, at Liege; and at one period no less than ninety-three establishments were owned by them. They were, in fact, the greatest manufacturers in France, particularly of steam-engines; and J. C. Perier, who was a member of the Academy, wrote an "Essay on Steam Engines." He died in 1818.

PERIER, CASIMIR, a celebrated French banker, and subsequently a statesman, was born at Grenoble in 1777. He at first entered the army, and served with reputation in the campaigns of Italy (1799 and 1800), but on the death of his father, a respectable merchant, abandoned the profession of arms for commercial business. In 1802 he established a banking-house in company with his brother, Sulpice Perier, in the management of which he acquired an intimate acquaintance with the most difficult and important questions of public credit and finance. At the revolution of 1830, he took a decided part in favour of the national liberties; was subsequently chosen president of the chambers, and finally formed one of the first cabinet of the new king, without holding the portfolio of any department. In March, 1831, he succeeded Laflotte as president of the council; and died, of cholera, in May, 1832.

PERIGNON, DOMINIQUE CATHERINE DE, a peer and marshal of France, was born at Grenoble, in 1754. He succeeded Dugommier as commander of the army of the Eastern Pyrenees; and on the conclusion of the peace with Spain he was nominated ambassador at Madrid, where he signed an offensive and defensive treaty of alliance between France and Spain in 1796. He subsequently distinguished himself in the army of Italy, and in 1806 he replaced Jourdan as commander of the French at Naples. After the second restoration of Louis XVIII. he was appointed to the first military division, and was made a peer of France. Died, 1819.

PERON, FRANCIS, a French voyager and naturalist, was born in 1775, at Cerilly; entered the army in 1792, but having lost an eye in the service, quitted it in 1795; studied natural history after his discharge; was appointed, in 1800, zoologist to the expedition which was sent to the Australian ocean; and died in 1810. He was the author of "Observations sur l'Anthropologie," and "Voyage de Decouvertes aux Terres Australes."

PEROUSE, JOHN FRANCIS GALAUF DE LA, a French circumnavigator, was born in 1741, at Albi, in Languedoc, and entered at an early age into the naval service of his country. In 1782 he commanded an expedition against the British settlements in Hudson's Bay, and destroyed the trading establishments there. The French government having resolved on the prosecution of a voyage of discovery, fitted out two vessels for that purpose, and in 1785 M. de la Perouse proceeded with them to the South Sea; and in March, 1788, he sent home an account of his progress. From that period, however, nothing more was heard of him, though every pains were taken to gain some clue relative to the course they had taken, and if possible, what catastrophe had befallen the ships and their crews. Till within these few years the whole was a perfect mystery; but it is now known that both vessels were lost on different islands of the New Hebrides, and that every soul on board perished.

PERRAULT, CLAUDE, a celebrated French architect, was born at Paris in 1618. He forsook the practice of physic to study the fine arts, particularly architecture, in which he rose to great eminence, and constructed many noble works, the principal of which is the facade of the Louvre. He published a translation of Vitruvius, with notes; a work "On the five Orders of Architecture;" "Medical Essays," and "Memoirs of the Natural History of Animals." Died, 1688.

PERRAULT, CHARLES, brother of the preceding, was born in 1628. He for some time practised as a barrister, but afterwards became comptroller-general of the royal buildings, in which situation he contributed to the foundation of the Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture. He was admitted into the French academy in 1671; soon after which he had a famous controversy with Boileau, respecting the comparative merits of the ancients and moderns; Perrault maintaining the superiority of the latter, and Boileau as vigorously asserting that of the former. This dispute was carried on with great asperity and personal rudeness, on both sides. The work by which Perrault is best known, is entitled "The History of illustrious Men of the Age of Louis XIV." Died, 1703.

PERRIER, FRANCIS, a French painter and engraver, celebrated for his antique statues and bas-reliefs. Died, 1660.

PERRIER, CHARLES, a French writer, called by Menage "The prince of Lyric poets." Died, 1692.

PERRIN, P. N., an eminent merchant, of Troyes, born in 1751. In 1780 he was member for De l'Aube to the National Convention, where he exhibited a true but moderated love of liberty. He contracted to supply the republic with five millions of francs' worth of cotton cloth. Being accused, in 1793, of jobbing, he was condemned to be exposed publicly for six hours, and finally to the galleys for twelve years. This unjust sentence (reversed with reparation to his surviving family, after the fall of Robespierre), caused him to die with grief.

PERRON, JAMES DAVY DU, a cardinal eminent for great natural abilities and acquired knowledge, was born in 1556. His studies were theological and polemical, and his controversial talents so great, that none durst dispute with him. He obtained at length the place of reader to Henry III., and distinguished himself greatly by his speeches and his writings till his death in 1618.

PERRONET, JOHN RODOLPHUS, director of the bridges and roads of France, was born in 1708, and died at Paris in 1794. To him France is indebted for the construction of many noble bridges, particularly those of Neuilly, Nemours, Pont St. Mayence, and Louis XVI. at Paris; and while under his management, the roads and canals of France were also greatly improved.

PERROT, NICHOLAS, sieur d' Ablancourt, celebrated for his excellent translations into French of the Greek and Latin classics. Born 1606; died, 1664.

PERRY, JOHN, an English engineer, who, after having been in the navy, went to Russia on the invitation of Peter the Great, but in 1713 returned to England, and was engaged in stopping the Dagenham breach in Essex; of which he published an account. He was also the author of the "Present State of Russia." Died, 1733.

PERRY, JAMES, an able political writer, known for many years as the editor and proprietor of the "Morning Chronicle," was born at Aberdeen, in 1756, and educated at the high-school and university of that city. He came to London in 1777, and was engaged as a writer in "The General Advertiser" and "London Evening Post." In 1782 he projected, and for a time edited, the "European Magazine;" but this he quitted for the "Gazetteer," with an express stipulation that he was to be left to the free exercise of his own judgment and political opinions in the conducting of it. Up to this period it had been the custom for a single person to furnish an abstract of the nightly parliamentary debates; but Mr. Perry employed a succession of reporters for that purpose, and thus introduced the practice which is at present adopted. He subsequently became sole editor and proprietor of "The Morning Chronicle," which he conducted in such a manner, that Mr. Pitt and Lord Shelburne, in order to make use of his influence, offered him a seat in parliament. This, however, he refused; and continued to edit his paper (which was regarded as a sort of official organ of the Whig opposition) till the illness which preceded his death, in 1821.

PERSEUS or PERSES, son of Philip, king of Macedon. He declared war against the Romans, but was defeated, near Padua, by Paulus Æmilius, in 168 B.C. From thence he fled to Samothrace, where he was taken prisoner, and brought to Rome in triumph.

PERSIUS, FLACCUS AULUS, a Roman satirical poet, was born A.D. 34, at Volterra, in Etruria, and died in 62, aged twenty-eight. His six "Satires," which present a picture of prevailing corruption, are distinguished for vigour, conciseness, and austerity of tone. They have been frequently translated into English.

PERUGINO, PIETRO VANUCCI, founder of the Roman school of painting, was born in 1446, and received the rights of citizenship in Perugia, whence his surname. He was the pupil of Andrea Verrocchio, and the master of Raphael. His pictures have more grace, and are particularly successful in female and youthful figures, but his outlines are often incorrect. Died, 1534.

PERUZZI, BALTHASAR, an eminent painter and architect, born in 1441, at Accajano. He went to Rome, was patronized by Alexander VI., and particularly distinguished himself by his able management of the chiar-oscuro, and his imitations of bas-relievo, in his architectural views. He died, by poison, in 1536.

PESELLIER, CHARLES STEPHEN, a French writer, was born at Paris in 1712. He was bred to the law, and became assistant to a farmer-general; notwithstanding which he found time to compose some pieces of poetry, particularly fables, and comedies. He was also the author of "Letters on Education," &c. Died, 1763.

PESCENNIUS NIGER, CAIUS, a Roman emperor, was a native of Aquino. He was appointed governor of Syria, and commander of the legions in Asia, by Commodus; and on the death of Pertinax, in 193, the troops of Pescennius appointed him emperor. He was defeated at Issus, in 195, and was killed by some soldiers, while on his flight to the Parthian dominions.

PESTALOZZI, HENRY, a practical philosopher, celebrated for having introduced a new method of education, was born at Zurich, in Switzerland, in 1745. After having studied theology and jurisprudence, he relinquished his views with respect to the church and the bar, and adopted from inclination the employment of a teacher. Having become acquainted with the moral wretchedness of the lowest classes, he began a career of instruction by the admission of the children of paupers into his house; and, in 1798, the directory of Switzerland invited him to establish a house of education at Stanz, where he became the kind and attentive instructor of eighty poor children. War destroyed this establishment, and Pestalozzi then took charge of a school at Burgdorf, where he also received pupils, who paid for their instruction, so that he was enabled to employ able assistants. This institution flourished, and, in 1804, he removed it to Yverdon, where he occupied the castle given to him by government. Pestalozzi's method turns on the idea of communicating all instruction by immediate address to the sensations or conceptions, and effecting the formation of the child by constantly calling all his powers into exercise. He composed several works illustrative of his plans; and closed a long life of labours for the benefit of society, in 1827.

PETAVIUS, DIONYSIUS, or DENIS PETAU, a French Jesuit of great erudition, born at Orleans, in 1583; died, 1652. He published "The Works of Synesius," and "of Chrysostom;" but is most highly celebrated, even at the present day, for an excellent work, entitled "Rationarium Temporum," which is an abridgment of universal history, from the earliest times down to 1632, digested in a chronological order, and supported throughout by reference to proper authorities.

PETER III., king of Arragon, succeeded his father, James I., in 1276. Having married the daughter of Mainfroy, king of Sicily, he resolved to make himself master of that island, and, to effect his purpose, contrived the horrid massacre of the "Sicilian vespers," or the murder of all the French in the island at the hour of vespers, on Easter-day, in 1282. For this crime, pope Martin IV. excommunicated Peter and the Sicilians, and laid Arragon under an interdict. He died in 1285.

PETER THE CRUEL, king of Castile, succeeded his father Alphonso XI., in 1350, at the age of sixteen. He commenced his reign by several wanton acts of barbarity. Having married the daughter of Philip, duke of Bourbon, he repudiated her three days after, and sent her to prison, that he might renew his connexion with Maria de Padilla, his former mistress. His cruelties provoked his subjects to take up arms against him in 1366, and they placed at their head Henry of Trastamare, his natural brother, who slew Philip in battle, in 1369.

PETER THE HERMIT, a French officer, of Amiens, who, quitting the military profession, made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land about 1093. Being instigated by the difficulties and dangers he had undergone in his progress, and witnessing the deplorable situation of the few Christians residing in that country, he preached up that crusade for the recovery of Palestine from the infidels, which precipitated the whole strength of Christendom into the plains of Syria, there to fall by the sword of the Saracen, or to perish with hunger and disease. Peter himself led the first irregular band of crusaders, amounting to about three hundred thousand men, and displayed great personal courage at the storming of Jerusalem; and having so far witnessed the accomplishment of his undertaking, returned to his native country, where he founded the abbey of Noir-moutier, and died in 1115.

PETER ALEXIEVITSCH, usually styled PETER THE GREAT, czar of Russia, was born in 1672; and in 1696 he obtained the sole authority, on the death of his brother Ivan, with whom he had before associated in the government of the empire. After having suppressed a conspiracy of the Strelitzes against his life, in which he displayed much personal courage, he travelled in foreign countries, setting out on this celebrated journey, not in the character of czar, but as a member of an embassy, which was to visit foreign courts, according to the old Russian custom. At Amsterdam he worked, incognito, in a Dutch ship-yard, went to the village of Saardam, where he appeared in the dress of his own country, and caused himself to be enrolled among the workmen, under the name of Peter Michaeloff. Here he lived in a little bed for seven weeks, made his own bed, and prepared his own food, corresponded with his ministers at home, and laboured at the same time in ship-building. Induced, by his love for the sea, to accept the invitation of king William III., to visit London, he resided there in the royal ship-yard, and often declared that, if he were not czar of Russia, he would be an English admiral. Having proceeded to Vienna, he there received intelligence of a new rebellion of the Strelitzes, on which he returned home, crushed the insurrection, and visited the rebels with all the severity that a despotic tribunal could suggest. In 1700 he entered upon a war with Sweden, which lasted till 1721. At the commencement of it he was repeatedly defeated, at Narva and other places; but he at length acquired the ascendancy, gained a decisive victory at Pultowa, and wrested several provinces from the Swedes. The history of his life and reign, however, is so eventful as to defy abridgment into any reasonable limits. The most striking passages of it are his travels, studies, and personal fatigues, for the attaining of knowledge in civil and military affairs, and the improvement of his subjects; his introduction of arts and sciences, a naval force and commerce with foreign nations; his many reformations in church and state, the army, and the customs and manners of his people; his wars with the Swedes, Turks, Tartars, and Persians; victories by sea and land, acquisitions of territory, and increase of power; his regard to genius and merit, and his severe justice on offenders against the laws. All these very justly entitle him to the appellation he obtained, of "Father of his Country," which he left to lament his death, Jan. 28, 1725. It has been truly remarked, that Peter was a man of powerful and original genius, who did every thing himself, and was never the instrument of others. His ardour was joined with prudence, resolution, and a generous humanity; and if he suffered himself to be swayed, as he often did, by passion and prejudice, it may fairly be attributed to his defective education, and the position in which he was placed.

PETER OF BLOIS, so named from the place of his birth, was a learned ecclesiastic of the 12th century, who settling in England in the reign of Henry II., obtained the archdeaconry of Bath, and afterwards that of London. He wrote "De Officio Episcopi;" "De Studio Sapientie;" &c. Died, 1200.

PETER DE CLUGNY, sometimes styled PETER THE VENERABLE, from the gravity of his deportment, was a French monk, who in 1123 became abbot of Clugny. In 1140 he afforded shelter to the unfortunate Abelard, and by his interposition at Rome he prevented the execution of the unjust sentence which had been pronounced against him. Died, 1156.

PETERS, HUGH, an English fanatic, was born at Fowey, in Cornwall, in 1399, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, from whence he was expelled for irregular behaviour. He afterwards went on the stage, where he acquired that buffoonery which subsequently distinguished him in the pulpit. He was for some time lecturer of St. Sepulchre's, London; but afterwards joined the Independents, and went to America. At the beginning of the rebellion he returned to London, where he became a zealous preacher in the cause of the parliament, and an active promoter of the king's death. For this he was tried and executed, with the regicides, in 1660. Some of his Discourses, and his "Last Legacy to his Daughter," have been printed.

PETHION, DE VILLENEUVE, JEAN-ROME, a French revolutionary statesman, originally an advocate at Chartres, was chosen deputy, by the tiers état of that city, to the states-general, and, December, 1790, was elected president of the national assembly. In June following, he became president of the criminal tribunal of Paris, and was made mayor, November, 1791. He became the first president of the national convention, but excited the jealousy of Robespierre, and was included in the proscription of the Girondists, May, 1793. He escaped to the department of Calvados, but, some time after, his body was found in a field, half devoured by wolves, and it was supposed that he had perished from hunger.

PETION, ALEXANDRE, president of the southern parts of the island of Hayti, was a mulatto, and received his education in the military school of Paris. Being a man of cultivated understanding and attractive manners, and moreover, well instructed in the art of war, he served in the French, and afterwards in the Haytian armies, with success and reputation. He was in high credit as a skillful engineer, in which capacity he rendered the most essential services to Toussaint and Dessalines; and, assisted by the English, they at length, in 1804, expelled the French from the island. After a variety of struggles for superiority between Christophe, the lieutenant and successor of Dessalines, Petion was elected president, in 1807, and retained his office, in spite of all opposition, till his death, in 1818, when he was succeeded by general Boyer.

PETIS DE LA CROIX, FRANCIS, a French scholar, was born in 1654. He became secretary, and interpreter of the oriental languages, to the king of France, in which offices he succeeded his father. He also undertook several voyages into the East, and in 1692 was made Arabic professor in the royal college. He died in 1713. His "Persian Tales" were first published in 1722, in 5 vols. His other works are, "The History of Timur Bec," 4 vols. 12mo.; "The State of the Ottoman Empire," 3 vols. 12mo.; and "The History of Genghis Khan."

PETIT, PETER, an eminent French mathematician, was born at Montlucon, in 1593, and died in 1677. He wrote treatises "On the Compass of Proportion;" "On the Construction and Use of the Calibre of Artillery;" "On Sight;" "On Comets," &c.

PETIT, PETER, a physician, was born at Paris, in 1617. He was a member of the academy of Padua, and died in 1687. He wrote some Latin poems of merit, particularly one entitled "Codrus."

PETIT, ANTHONY, a French anatomist, was born in 1708, at Orleans; and in 1760 was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences. He was appointed inspector of military hospitals, and professor of anatomy and surgery in the king's garden. Died, 1794.

PETITOT, JOHN, an unrivalled painter in enamel, was born at Geneva, in 1607.

He visited England, where he was greatly patronized by Charles I.; after whose death he went to France, and was employed by Louis XIV. He painted the face and hands, and his brother-in-law, Bordier, added the drapery. Died, 1691.

PETITOT, CLAUDE BERNARD, director-general of the university of Paris, was born at Dijon, in 1772. He was appointed chief of the bureau of public instruction of the prefecture of the Seine, in 1800; became a member of the royal council of the university in 1821; and died in 1825. He was the author of three tragedies; and the translator of the tragedies of Alfieri, the novel of Cervantes, &c.

PETIT-THOUARS, ALBERT DU, a distinguished French botanist, who was for more than twenty years director of the royal nursery of Boule, and a member of the Institute, &c. He was the author of "Mélanges des Botanique;" "Dialogues sur l'Histoire Naturelle," &c. Died, 1841.

PETIVER, JAMES, an English botanist, who was apothecary to the charter-house, and died in 1718. He was fellow of the royal society, and made so great a collection of rare and curious plants, animals, and insects, that Sir Hans Sloane, who afterwards purchased it, offered him in his lifetime 4000*l.* for his collection. He was the author of several botanical works.

PETRARCH, or PETRARCA, FRANCESCO, one of the most celebrated Italian poets, was born at Arezzo, in 1304. On account of the dissensions which raged in his native country, his father removed with him to Avignon, and afterwards to Carpentras, where Petrarch received his education, which was completed at Montpellier and Bologna. He was intended for the law; but Cicero and Virgil had more charms for him than Justinian. On the death of his parents he enrolled himself in the clerical order, but not being much confined by the duties of his several benefices, he followed the impulse of his genius, which led him to literary pursuits. Having brought to light Cicero's "Epistolæ Familiæres," and formed a collection of manuscripts with great labour, one of the first places is due to him among the restorers of ancient literature. Having settled at Avignon, he became inspired with a lasting passion for the beautiful Laura de Noves; but though he poured forth his tributary odes and sonnets to her charms, he failed to gain the object of his affections. After having travelled in the vain hope of moderating his love, he settled at Vaucluse, a romantic spot, where he wrote some of his finest works. His literary reputation attracted the regard of princes; he was invited to Paris, to Naples, and to Rome; and received the laurel crown in the latter city, wherein the title and prerogatives of poet-laureate were revived, after a lapse of 1300 years. In 1348 his feelings were deeply wounded by the death of Laura, who appears to have fallen a sacrifice to the pretence, then raging throughout Europe, and which also deprived him of his great patron, cardinal Colonna. He survived the idol of his soul, however, nearly thirty years; during all which period he was ad-admired and honoured by his countrymen. Petrarch was undoubtedly one of the most memorable characters of his age and nation; and although his countrymen may have estimated his genius at too high a rate, he merits the applause and admiration of posterity. He died, near Padua, in 1374.

PETRE, SIR WILLIAM, a native of Devonshire, was educated at Exeter college, Oxford; elected fellow of All Souls in 1523; and became principal of Peckwater Inn. He was employed by Thomas, lord Cromwell, in a visitation of the monasteries; became master of the requests, was knighted, made one of the secretaries of state, and was appointed treasurer of the court of first fruits. He was a liberal benefactor to Exeter and All Souls colleges; and died in 1573.

PETROF, BASIL PETROVITCH, a Russian poet and philologist, was born in 1736, at Moscow; became reader to the empress Catharine, and held a place under government; but he resigned his offices in 1780, and devoted the remainder of his life to literary pursuits. Died, 1799.

PETRONIUS, TITUS, surnamed ARBITER, a Roman author, notorious for his licentiousness and obscenity, was born at Marseilles, and lived in the court of Nero. He was, for a time, the favourite of the emperor, who made him master of his voluptuous banquets and revelries. But he finally fell a victim to the suspicions of the tyrant, and was condemned to death, but he avoided the ignominy of a public execution by opening his veins, A. D. 66.

PETTY, SIR WILLIAM, the founder of the Lansdown family, was born in 1623, at Ramsey, in Hampshire, where, and at Caen, in Normandy, he was educated. Having studied medicine and anatomy at Leyden and Paris, he took his degree, and was subsequently made professor of anatomy, and Gresham professor of music. In 1632 he was appointed physician to the army in Ireland, and secretary to Henry Cromwell, by whom he was employed in surveying the forfeited lands; for which, charges were alleged against him to the House of Commons, and he was dismissed from his places. At the Restoration he was knighted, and made surveyor-general of Ireland. He was one of the first fellows of the royal society; to which he presented the model of a double-bottomed ship, to sail against wind and tide. He suffered much by the fire of London; but, by marriage, and various speculations, he recovered his loss, and died very rich, in 1687. Of his works, the "Political Arithmetic" is the most important.

PETTY, WILLIAM, the first marquis of Lansdown, was a descendant of the preceding, and born in 1737. He succeeded his father as earl of Shelburne in 1761, and in 1763 was placed at the head of the board of trade, which he soon quitted to join lord Chatham, with whom he came into power, in 1766; but on the change of ministry, in 1768, he became a zealous oppositio- nist, and so continued till 1782, when he was appointed secretary of state for the foreign department. When the marquis of Rockingham died, his lordship became the head of the ministry, but was forced to yield to the coalition of lord North and Mr. Fox; after which he was created marquis of Lansdown. He died in 1806.

PEUTINGER, CONRAD, a celebrated scholar, was born in 1463, at Augsburg. He was one of the first Germans that employed himself in collecting antiquities; and he was the author of several erudite works. Died, 1547.

PEYRE, ANTOINE FRANÇOIS, a French painter and architect, born in 1739. He became a pensionary student at Rome in 1763, and executed some very beautiful designs. After his return he was made comptroller of the royal buildings at Fontainebleau, and then at St. Germain. During the reign of terror he was imprisoned; but being liberated on the death of Robespierre, he was admitted a member of the institute, of the council of civil architecture, &c. Died, 1823.

PEYRERE, ISAAC DE LA, was born in 1592, at Bourdeaux; was for many years in the service of the prince of Condé; and obtained considerable notoriety by a work which he wrote to support a favourite theory he entertained respecting the existence of a race of men previous to Adam. Died, 1676.

PEYRON, JEAN FRANÇOIS PIERRE, a French historical painter, was born at Aix, in 1744. He was a member of the royal academy, and director of the royal manufacture of the Gobelins, of which situation he was deprived by the revolution. Died, 1820.

PEYSSONNEL, CHARLES DE, an ingenious antiquary, was born in 1700, at Marseilles. He was secretary to the French embassy at Constantinople, and afterwards consul at Smyrna. He travelled over the greater part of Asia Minor, collecting rare coins and medals; and published the result of his observations on the topography and antiquities of the countries he visited. Died, 1757.—His son, born at Marseilles, in 1727, succeeded him as consul, and died in 1790; was a sensible writer, and published, among other works, an "Historical Account of the Ancient Inhabitants of the Banks of the Danube and the Borders of the Black Sea;" "On the Commerce of the Euxine," 2 vols.; "Les Numéros;" "Political Situation of France," 2 vols., &c.

PEZAY, MASSON, marquis of, a native of Paris, who was a captain in the dragons. He instructed Louis XVI. in military tactics, for which he was appointed inspector-general of the coasts; but, complaints being preferred against him, he was exiled to his estate, where he died, in 1778. He wrote some elegant poems, and translated Catullus and Tibullus into French. He was also the author of the "Campagnes of Maillebois," 3 vols. 4to.; "Les Solécismes Hélicéennes;" and other works.

PEZRON, PAUL, a Bernardin, and doctor of the Sorbonne, born at Hennebion, in 1639. For a time he held the abbey of Charnoy, which he resigned to pursue his studies; and died in 1706. He was the author of several able works on theological and antiquarian subjects, in one of which he endeavours to support the chronology of the Septuagint against that of the Hebrew Bible.

PFEFFEL, CHRISTIAN FREDERIC, a juriscult and diplomatist, was born at Colmar, in 1726. Becoming the friend of the count de Bruhl, he was employed on various diplomatic missions, and was made juriscult to the king; but during the revolution his property was confiscated, and he was placed on the list of emigrants. He was the author of several excellent works, among which is "Abrégé Chronologique de l'Histoire, et du Droit public d'Allemagne." Died, 1807.

PFEFFERCORN, JOHN, a converted Jew, who endeavoured to persuade the emperor Maximilian to burn all the Hebrew books except the Bible, as blasphemous; but this was prevented by Reuchlin. He wrote "Narratio de ratione celebrandi Pasche apud Judæos," and "De abolendis Judæorum scriptis."

PFEIFFER, AUGUSTUS, a learned orientalist, was born at Lauenbourg, in 1640. He professed the eastern languages at Leipzig, and was superintendent of the churches in Lubeck, where he died, in 1698. Among his works are, "Pansophia Mosaica;" "Critica Sacra;" "Scelographia Systematica Antiquitatum Hebræorum," &c.

PFEIFFER, FRANCIS LOUIS, a Swiss general in the French service, was born at Lucerne, in 1716. After being fifty years in the army, he retired to his native country, and devoted his leisure hours to the construction of a model of the cantons of Unterwalden, Schwitz, and Uri, 22 feet by 12, in which every object was laid down with the greatest precision. Died, 1802.

PHÆDON, a Greek philosopher of Elis, who flourished about 400 B.C. was originally a slave, but obtained his freedom by the interest of Socrates, whose disciple he became, and remained with him till his death. After this he settled at his native place, where he founded a school called the Eleatic.

PHÆDRUS, LUCIUS, an elegant Latin poet, was a native of Thrace, and appears to have been the freed man of Augustus. Under Tiberius he was persecuted by Sejanus; to which circumstance he has alluded in his fables, which are written with great purity of style.

PHALARIS, a native of Crete, whose cruelty, and the horrid instrument with which he wreaked his vengeance on those who fell under his displeasure, have become proverbial. In 571 B.C., he made himself master of Agrigentum, in Sicily, where he was guilty of horrible cruelties. Among other instruments of destruction, he caused a hollow brazen bull to be made, so contrived, that when a fire was kindled under the body, the cries of the unhappy victim within resembled the roarings of the animal it represented. Phalaris, after commending the work, ordered Perillus, the artist, to be the first to make trial of it. After a sanguinary reign of eight years, the citizens at length seized the tyrant, and with a severe, but just retaliation, consumed him by a slow fire in his own bull, A.C. 563.

PHARAMOND, according to many historians, was the name of the first king of France, who reigned at Treves about A.D. 420. To him is attributed the celebrated Salique Law, by which females were excluded from the succession to the throne.

PHÉLIPPEAUX, A. LE PICARD DE, a French officer of artillery, the fellow-pupil and rival of Buonaparte, was born in 1766. Having quitted France in 1791, he made a campaign the following year with the corps of emigrants under the French prince. In 1793 he re-entered France to organize a royalist insurrection in the central provinces, when he took Sancerre, and for some time maintained his position in Berry. He afterwards went to Paris, where he effected the liberation of Sir Sidney Smith from the prison of the Temple, and, accompanying him to England, obtained the rank of colonel in the English service. He assisted Sir Sidney in the defence of Acre against Buonaparte; but died of fatigue shortly after the raising of the siege, in May, 1799.

PHERECRATES, a Greek comic poet, the contemporary of Plato and Aristophanes; some fragments of whose plays only have been preserved by Hestellus and Grotius.

PHÉRECYDES, a philosopher of the Isle of Scyrus, who flourished about 600 B.C. He was the disciple of Pittacus, and the master of Pythagoras, who regarded him as a father, and derived from him the doctrine of the metempsychosis.

PHIDIAS, a celebrated Athenian sculptor, supposed to have been born about 460 B.C. and to have died 433 B.C. His Olympian Jupiter represented the serene majesty of the king of heaven, and was ranked, for its beauty, among the wonders of the world. Phidias received great honours from the Athenians, while Pericles had the sovereign power; but he was subjected to a change of fortune when the popularity of his patron declined, and died in prison.

PHILIDOR, ANDREW, a musician of some reputation, and celebrated as the best chess-player of his age, was born at Dreux, in France, in 1726; became a page in the king's band; and, before his twelfth year, made much proficiency in music. As he grew up, his fondness for the game of chess increased into a passion, in order to indulge which he travelled over great part of Europe, engaging every where with the best players. He continued in England some time, during which he printed his "Analysis of Chess." He was a member of the chess-club thirty years; and of his skill in that game, a stronger proof could not be given than that of his defeating blindfold two of the best players a short time before his death, in 1793.

PHILIP II. king of Macedon and father of Alexander the Great, equally renowned as a legislator, politician, and warrior. After having conquered Greece, he meditated the conquest of Persia; but while he was preparing for this expedition, he was assassinated at a banquet by Pausanias, a captain of his guards, 336 B.C.

PHILIP, MARCUS JULIUS, called the Arab, was born of an obscure family, and became a common soldier in the Roman army; but by his merit he rose to the rank of captain of the imperial guard. In 344 he assassinated nated the emperor Gordian the younger, and seized upon the throne. He gained great popularity at Rome by his generosity, and by making a canal for supplying the city with water. He celebrated the secular games with great pomp, and gave toleration to the Christians. Philip was slain by his soldiers, near Verona, in 249, after having been defeated by Decius. His son Philip, aged twelve years, was assassinated in the arms of his mother.

PHILIP I. king of France, succeeded his father Henry I. in 1060, under the regency of Baldwin V. count of Flanders, and died in 1108.

PHILIP II. surnamed the August, was born in 1165, and succeeded his father Louis VII. in 1180, at the age of fifteen. Died, 1223.

PHILIP III. surnamed the Hardy, was proclaimed king of France on the death of St. Louis, his father, in 1270. Peter of Aragon having occasioned the horrible massacre of the French in Sicily, called the "Sicilian Vespers," Philip marched against him, and took Gironne; but died on his return, at Perpignan, in 1285.

PHILIP IV. called the Fair, succeeded his father, the preceding monarch, at the age of seventeen, and died in 1314.

PHILIP V. surnamed the Long, was the younger son of the last mentioned, and succeeded his younger brother Louis Hutin, by virtue of the Salique law, in 1316. Died, 1321.

PHILIP DE VALOIS, the first king of France of the collateral branch of Valois, was the son of Charles, count of Valois, brother of Philip the Fair. In 1329 Edward III. king of England did homage for the duchy of Guienne, but not long after he assumed the title of king of France, on the pretence of being a grandson of Philip the Fair by his mother. This produced a disastrous war, which lasted, with a few intervals, many years. In 1346, Edward gained the great battle of Crecy, in which the French lost near 30,000 men, and the flower of the nobility. This was followed by the loss of Calais and other important places. Edward sent a challenge to Philip to decide their pretensions by single combat, which the latter refused. Philip died in 1350.

PHILIP II. king of Spain, was the son of the emperor Charles V. In 1554 he became king of Naples and Sicily, and the same year married Mary, queen of England. In 1556 his father resigned to him the crown of Spain. He declared war against France, and was present at the battle of St. Quintin, where it is said he made two vows, the one never again to hazard his person in any engagement, the other to build a monastery by the name of St. Laurence. This last he executed at Escorial, near Madrid. In 1559 he made peace with France, and on his return to his own country he caused an auto de fe to be celebrated. In 1588 Philip fitted out his famous expedition called the "Invincible Armada," for the invasion of England. This fleet was nearly all destroyed by the storm, or the English ships. When Philip heard of the disaster, he said, "I sent my fleet to combat the English, not the elements; God's will be done." He died in 1596, aged 72.

PHILIP III., the son of Philip II. and of Anne of Austria, succeeded his father at the age of twenty. This prince was the victim of etiquette. Being at a council, he complained of the fume arising from a pan of charcoal which was burning in the room. The proper person who had the charge of the fire was not present, and no one would undertake the office of removing it; which piece of ridiculous etiquette cost the monarch his life, in 1621.

PHILIP V. duke of Anjou, the second son of Louis, dauphin of France, and of Mary-Anne of Bavaria, assumed the title of king of Spain in 1700, by virtue of the will of Charles II. His claim, however, was contested by the house of Austria in favour of the archduke Charles. This produced the grand alliance, in which Austria was supported against France and Spain, by England, Holland, Savoy, Portugal, and Prussia. The beginning of this war was very disastrous to Philip, who lost Arragon, Gibraltar, and the islands of Minorca and Majorca, also Sardinia, and the kingdom of Naples. The victories of the duke de Vendome, and those of marshal Villars in Flanders, confirmed Philip on the throne, and restored peace to Europe by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713. Died, 1746.

PHILIPPON, Baron, a French lieutenant, distinguished for his defence of Badajos, in 1811. He was taken prisoner, and in 1812 made his escape from Oswestry. Died, aged 76, in 1836.

PHILIPS, JOHN, a poet, was born at Bampton in Oxfordshire, in 1676; was educated at Winchester-school, and Christchurch, Oxford; and was the author of "The Splendid Shilling;" "Blenheim," a poem in praise of Marlborough's victory; and one on "Cyder," formed on the Georgics of Virgil. Died, 1708.

PHILIPS, AMBROSE, a poet and dramatist, was a native of Leicestershire. He received his education at St. John's college, Cambridge; and on coming to London, associated with Steele, Addison, and the literary wits of the day. He was the author of the tragedies of the "Distrest Mother," "The Briton," and "Humphrey, duke of Gloucester;" some pastoral poems; a "Life of Archbishop Williams;" and was also a contributor to a periodical paper called "The Free-thinker," through his connexion with which he was made registrar of the Irish prerogative court. Died, 1749.

PHILIPS, FABIAN, an English lawyer, was born at Prestbury, in Gloucestershire, in 1601. He was a zealous partizan of Charles I., and wrote several political pamphlets in his favour. Died, 1690.

PHILLIPS, EDWARD, one of the nephews of Milton, was born in London, in 1630, and was educated by his celebrated uncle. He was the author and compiler of several works, but that by which he is best known is the "Theatrum Poetarum, or a complete collection of the Poets."—JOHN PHILLIPS, the brother of Edward, was also educated under his uncle, whose political opinions he espoused and defended till the Restoration, and then he became a writer on the side of royalty.

PHILLIPS, THOMAS, a Roman catholic divine, was born at Ickford, in Buckinghamshire, and received his education at St. Omers. He entered into orders, and became a Jesuit, but quitted that society, and obtained a prebend in the collegiate church of Tongres. He was the author of "The Study of Sacred Literature, stated and considered;" and "The Life of Cardinal Pole," 2 vols. Died, 1774.

PHILO, JUDMUS, a learned Jewish writer of Alexandria, who was one of the deputation sent by the Jews to lay their complaints against the Greeks of Alexandria before the emperor Caligula, A.D. 40. He wrote several works in Greek, the principal of which is entitled, "Of the Contemplative Life."

PHILO, of Byzantium, an architect, who flourished 300 A.C. He wrote a treatise on the machines used in war; and there is also attributed to him a piece, entitled, "De septem Orbis Spectaculis."

PHILPOT, JOHN, an English divine, who in the reign of Mary was brought before bishop Gardiner, convicted of heresy, and burnt in Smithfield, in 1555.

PHILOLAUS, of Crotona, a celebrated Pythagorean philosopher, who flourished B.C. 375. He belonged to the Pythagorean school, and by some is supposed to have written the "Golden Verses of Pythagoras." He is also said to have first taught the true system of the universe, revived by Copernicus, but this supposition is erroneous.

PHILOPEMEN, a celebrated general, and the last great commander among the ancient Greeks, was born at Megalopolis, in Arcadia, B.C. 233; became generalissimo of the Achaean League; reduced the Spartans to a tributary state, dismantled Sparta, and abolished the laws of Lycurgus, which had lasted 700 years. He was at length, however, taken prisoner by the Messenians, and was put to death by poison, A.C. 183. The unworthy fate of this great man excited general resentment throughout the League; and when the Achaeans took Messene, the perpetrators of his death were immolated on his tomb, and a yearly sacrifice was instituted to commemorate his heroism.

PHOCION, a renowned Athenian general and philosopher, the disciple of Plato. After having resisted all the offers of Alexander the Great, and Antipater, his successor, to desert the Athenian service, he was at last condemned on a false accusation of treason, by his ungrateful fellow-citizens, and put to death, A.C. 318.
